A N

Universal HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earlieſt Account of Time to the Preſent:

COMPILED from

ORIGINAL AUTHORS;

And ILLUSTRATED with

Maps, Cuts, Notes, Chronological and Other Tables.

VOL. X.

Ἱστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεσθαι μὴ κατανόει, ἐν ἀυταῖς γὰρ ἐυρήσεις ἀκόπως, ἅπερ ἕτεροι συνῆξαν ἐγκόπως. Baſil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

DUBLIN:

Printed by EDWARD BATE, for the EDITORS:

M,DCC,XLV.

CONTENTS

OF VOLUME X.

CHAP. XI.

The Continuation of the History of the Jews from their return from the Babyloniſh Captivity to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, by Titus Veſpaſian, with an account of their diſperſion and condition to this preſent time.

SECT. III.

THE ſequel of the Jewiſh hiſtory, from Judas Maccabeus, to the conqueſt of Judæa by the Romans, Page 1

SECT. IV.

From their ſubjection to the Romans to the reign of Herod the Great, and the taking of Jeruſalem by him, 108

SECT. V.

From Herod the Great's reign to the birth of Chriſt, with an account of the principal ſects that then reigned in Judæa, 154

SECT. VI.

From the birth to the death of Chriſt, 254

SECT. VII.

From Chriſt's reſurrection to the total deſtruction of the city and temple, and diſperſion of the Jewiſh nation, 391

CHAP. XII.

The hiſtory of the Parthians, from Arſaces, to the recovery of the kingdom by the Perſians, 495

CHAP. XIII.

SECT. I.

The hiſtory of the Perſians from their recovering the empire from the Parthians, to their being ſubdued by the Arabs, 562

A N

Directions to the Book-binder for placing the Cut.

Page
A view of Jerusalem, the Temple, &c. 183

AN Universal History.

CHAP. XI.

The continuation of the History of the JEWS from their return from the Babyloniſh captivity to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem by Titus Veſpaſian, with an account of their diſperſion and condition to this preſent time.

SECT. III.

The ſequel of the Jewiſh hiſtory, from Judas Maccabeus, to the conqueſt of Judæa by the Romans.

Judas Maccabeus ſucceeds his father.

JUDAS, ſurnamed Maccabeus, from whom the heroes of this epocha had the name Maccabees (P), did not ſuffer his troops to continue longer idle, than till they had ended the days of his father's mourning. His little army amounted to no more than ſix thouſand men [a]; but what they

[a] 2 MACCAB. viii. 1.

(P) There are various conjectures concerning the etymology of this word, and not one of them to be depended upon; not only becauſe nothing is more uncertain than etymologies, but becauſe, the book of the Maccabees being only extant in Greek, we have no certainty which were the original letters of the word; ſo that ſome have taken the middle letter to have been a ר, others a כ, others the they wanted in number, they made up in zeal and bravery, and God gave them such success, that they quickly got into some the ק, according to which the sense of the verb will vary exceedingly.

It might indeed appear at first sight, that the Maccabees were so called from the Hebrew מחבה, Mucchabeh, or Mecchubeh, hid, as a term of contempt, because they hid themselves in holes and caverns; and that having afterwards wiped off the reproach of it by their bravery, they retained still that appellative in memory of their former absconsion, or from the word Makkabah, which signifies a cavern; and so they might be called caverners, or lurkers in caverns.

Others derive it from the verbs macab to wound, from nakab to perforate, from hakab to supplant; all which they do, by some seeming analogy, apply either to those Jewish heroes who fought, or to those who suffered martyrdom, for their religion, whether in Judæa or out of it. Rufinus above-mentioned tells us indeed, that the eldest of the seven brethren, who suffered under Antiochus, was called Maccabeus; and that all the rest, who fought or suffered for the same cause with him, were called Maccabei; but he gives us no authority for it but his own.

The most general opinion is, that it was taken from the four initial letters מ כ ב י of the 11th verse of the 15th of Exodus, Micamoca baelim Jehovah, Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the Gods? which four letters are supposed to have been embroidered upon their standards and shields, in the manner of the Romans S. P. Q. R. That the Jews were afterwards fond of these abbreviations, appears from those of the treble or quadruple names of their learned Rabbies; such is that of Rambam for Rabbi Moses Ben Maimon; Ralbag for Rabbi Levi Ben Gershom, and many more (1); but whether or no these kind of abbreviatures were so antient as as the Maccabees, it seems plain from the text, that Judas had that surname long before he displayed his standards against his enemies (2); not by anticipation, but in the same manner as his other brethren had each his different one, of which it would still be more difficult to find the cause or meaning.

However that be, Judas the Jewish chief seems to have bore it by way of eminence; and from him it passed to his brethren and successors, and thence to all who took up arms, or died, for the Jewish cause; and lastly it was given to the books which contain the history of those wars and persecutions, and of which it will be therefore necessary to give our readers a short account, before we close this note.

(1) De his, vide Wolf. biliotb. Rabbin. & Buxtorf. tract. de abbreviatur. (2) Vide 1 Maccab. ii. 4.

The

ſome of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes of Judæa, fell upon their enemies ſo ſuddenly, and with ſuch courage, that they drove them

The firſt book of the Maccabees was written originally either in Hebrew or in the Chaldee, which became the current language of the Jews after the captivity. Its ſtyle and phraſe come neareſt that of the ſacred hiſtorians of any of the Apocrypha, and its chronological computation is purely Hebrew, and begins always at the month Niſan, anſwering to our March and April; whereas the Syrians, &c. began their year ſix months later. St. Jerom tells us, that he had ſeen it in the former (3); and Origen tells us, that it was intitled Sharbit Sar Bene El, or, the ſceptre of the prince of the ſons of God (4); or, according to others (who read Sarbene in one word, and with the ſamech inſtead of the ſhin) the ſceptre of the rebels againſt the Lord, intimating, that the Maccabees had maintained the divine ſceptre or power, againſt thoſe who had rebelled againſt it; but the original has been long ſince loſt, and the Greek verſion is now reckoned the moſt authentic.

It contains a clear and ſuccinct hiſtory of what happened to the Jews, from the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, to the death of the high-prieſt Simon (5); that is, of about forty years. It was partly compiled from the memoirs which Judas Maccabeus had cauſed to be collected (6), and partly from thoſe of the high-prieſt Hyrcanus the ſon of Simon, who began his government where the book ends, and who is therefore by ſome ſuppoſed to be the author of it, though he be barely quoted in it as having furniſhed him the materials out of his chronicle (7), and ſeems therefore to have lived after him.

Theodotion is generally ſuppoſed to have tranſlated this book into Greeek; but it being quoted by ſome fathers as ancient as that writer, ſeems to argue this verſion to be of older date. It is, however, from this that our Engliſh verſion was made.

The ſecond book of the Maccabees is, as we have obſerved in another ſection, an epitome of a larger hiſtory written by one Jaſon, but long ſince loſt. Both the author and the abridger ſeem to have been Helleniſts, by their manner of computation and ſtyle; or rather it looks like a collection of ſome valuable pieces relating to the Jewiſh hiſtory, from the attempt of Heliodorus upon the treaſury of the temple, to the ſignal victory which Judas Maccabeus gained over Nicanor fifteen years after

It begins with two letters from the ſanhedrin at Jeruſalem, one to the Jews of Alexandria, the other to thoſe in Egypt, to notify to them the purification of the temple and dedication of the new them out of their cities, villages, and advantageous posts; insomuch, that Judas's name began to become terrible to the Syrians, Samaritans, and apostate Jews, whilst those who had forsook their country to avoid persecution, were encouraged to resort daily to him from their retreats, whereby his troops increased to such a degree as to make Apollonius, the then governor of Judæa and Samaria, think it high time to suppress their growing power, before it was grown to a greater height. He hastened therefore to raise a considerable army, which chiefly consisted of Samaritans, Jewish renegadoes, and other neighbouring nations, with whom he marched against the Maccabean chief. Judas, on the other hand, in no ways terrified with the superiority of the enemy, came out against him with his handful of men, and gave him a total defeat. Apollonius was killed on the spot, with a great number of his men. The rest were put to the rout, leaving a rich plunder behind them. Among the rest of the spoil, Judas took the slain governor's sword, and used it ever after in those wars which he waged against the enemies of the Jewish nation [b].

(3) Prolog. galeat. (4) Apud Euſeb hiſt. eccleſ l vi c. ult. & Comm in Pſalm Vol. II edit. Huetian. (5) Vide 1 Maccab cap. ult ver. 11, & ſeq. (6) 2 Maccab ii. 14. (7) 1 Maccab. xvi. ver. ult.

This defeat so enraged Antiochus, that, upon his hearing the first news of it, he swore again the total extirpation of the Jews; and happy was it for them that his treasury was then so exhausted, by his extravagant largesses, that he was forced to suppress his resentment, till he could raise a sufficient supply of money to renew the war against them; but before he could accomplish this, another of his generals, received likewise a signal overthrow. this was Seron, deputy-governor of Cœle-Syria [c] under Ptolemy Macron, who took it into his head to come against Judas, in hopes, that if he could defeat that little army of his before the king sent more forces thither, he should gain no small glory by it. He advanced therefore with Seron defeated.

[b] 1 Maccab. iii. 10, & seq. Joseph. ubi supra. [c] 1 Maccab. iii. 13, & seq altar, instead of that which had been polluted with the idol of Jupiter, and to exhort them to join in the celebration of the festival of it on the twenty-fifth of the month Cisleu. But both these letters are esteemed even more apocryphal than the rest of the history, and therefore neither of them need be longer dwelt upon.

We have already spoken of the third book of the Maccabees as previous in time to these two, and in authority to the latter of them. We shall likewise refer the reader to what we subjoined in that note concerning the fourth book of that name.

his

his troops as far as Bethoron, where Judas met him with a handful of his men. These, seeing the superiority of the enemy, expressed a great reluctancy to engage, fatigued as they were with marching and fasting (Q); but Judas soon dispelled their fears, by reminding them, that they fought the cause of God, who was not wont to save by strength or number, and whose glory, now concerned in their success, would display itself the more, by the disproportion there was between the two armies. Having thus put new life into them, they fell upon the Syrians with such vigour, that Seron was overthrown and killed, with eight hundred of his men, on the spot. Some of the rest fled as far as Bethoron, and the greatest part saved themselves by running into the land of the Philistines [d]. These continued successes of the new Jewish general made Philip, governor of Judæa, think it high time to acquaint Antiochus with the danger that province was in of being lost, if not speedily relieved. Antiochus had then left the government to Lysias, whilst himself was gone beyond the Euphrates, as we have seen elsewhere *. Lysias, who had orders to invade Judæa, and to destroy all the Jews, dispatched immediately to Ptolemy Macron, governor of Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia, and to Nicanor and Georgias, two experienced officers, forty thousand foot, with orders to see the king's commands punctually obeyed against the Jewish nation. These came and encamped on the plains of Emmaus, not far from Jerusalem, about twenty miles from Lydda, where they were reinforced with seven thousand horse. Nicanor, who had resolved to raise, if possible, the sum of two thousand talents, which the king his master did owe to the Romans, caused proclamation to be made in all the cities and sea-ports round about, that he would sell his Jewish captives Nicanor and Georgias sent against Judas.

[d] Ibid. ver. 14, & seq. * See before, Vol. VIII. p. 575, & seq.

(Q) It was, it seems, this Hebrew general's method to keep a fast before they engaged the enemy (9); and here, their march, fast, and onset so closely followed, that his men began to despond of the victory, when they saw the superiority of Seron's army to theirs.

As for Bethoron, it was, according to St Jerom and Eusebius, about twelve thousand paces from Jerusalem (10); but, according to Josephus, one hundred stades (11). It was situate northwards of Jerusalem, and between that metropolis and Shechem (12).

(9) 1 Macrab. iii. 17, & seq. (10) Loc. Hebr. (11) Conf. antiq. l. 20. c. 4 & bell. Judaic. c. 11. (12) Hieron. ubi supra.

at the rate of ninety for a talent; and this brought a great concourse of merchants, who came with large sums of money to purchase those captives. Our author reckons no less than a thousand of them, besides a great number of servants, who brought chains and other materials to convey them away [c].

Judas's speech to his troops.

Judas, being thoroughly appriſed of this bloody apparatus against his nation, gathered his little army together, consisting only of six thousand men, and reminded them not only of his late signal victories, but of those which had been formerly gained in a more miraculous manner against Senacherib, and other powerful enemies of the Jews; and particularly of a recent one, which six thousand of their nation had gained over an army of one hundred and twenty thousand Gauls and Macedonians [f]. However, concluded he, remember that, let the success be what it will, it is still more glorious to die sword in hand, in defence of our religion, lives, and liberties, than to fall into the hands of an enemy fully determined on our utter destruction. After this exhortation he was obliged, by the Mosaic law, to make proclamation, that all who had married wives, planted vineyards, &c. or whose hearts failed, should depart [g]; and this carried off near one half of his men, whilst the rest, who remained intrepid, were scarcely furnished with weapons fit for so bold and unequal an enterprize [h]. However, he led his three thousand men to Mizpa (R), there to implore the divine assistance by

[c] 1 MACCAB. iii. 41. 2 MACCAB. viii. 34. JOSEPH. l. xii. c 11. [f] 2 MACCAB. viii. 19, & seq. [g] Vide Deut. xx. 5. [h] 1 MACCAB. iv. 6.

(R) This place, which is famous in the Old Testament upon many accounts, and where the Jews used to assemble themselves to worship before the temple was built (13), was now made choice of upon this occasion, the temple being then polluted, and kept by a Syrian garison.

Here they fasted in sackcloth and ashes, whilst Eleazar, Judas's brother, read and expounded to them some proper portions out of the scriptures. The Nazarites likewise, who should have performed the conclusion of their vows at the temple †, assembled themselves with the priests in their robes; and, at the close of their fast and prayers, the priestly trumpets gave a signal, as a sure omen of their future victory; and the Maccabean chief gave for the watch-word, the help of God (14).

(13) Vide int al 1 Sam. vii. 5, & seq † De his, vide Vol. III p 229, & seq. (14) 1 Maccab. iii. 46, & seq. 2 Maccab. viii. 23, & seq.

prayer,

prayer, faſting, and ſacrifices, in confidence of which he marched with them againſt the enemy, and encamped as near them as he ſafely could, reſolved to give them battle early on the next morning, of which he gave his troops notice that very night[i]. In the mean time news was brought him by ſome of his ſcouts, that Georgias was coming, at the head of five thouſand of his choiceſt men, and one thouſand horſe, to ſurpriſe him in his camp; which gave him ſuch an opportunity of countermining him, as gained him a complete and eaſy victory; for, taking the advantage of Georgias's abſence, he and his three thouſand men fell on a ſudden on the Syrian army, killed three thouſand of their men, and put the reſt to flight, and into ſuch confuſion, that they could not be rallied again by any means, but left their camp, and all their baggage and ſpoil behind them, and fled. Georgias, having in vain ſought for his enemy, whom he ſuppoſed to have retired again into the mountains, was returning back to his army, when he perceived his camp on fire, which threw his men into ſuch a panic, that, in ſpight of all he could do to prevent it, they threw down their arms, and ran after the reſt. Judas did not leave off purſuing them, till he had killed ſix thouſand more of their men, beſides a great number of maimed and wounded; after which he led his victorious troop to plunder the enemies camp, where, among other rich ſpoil, they found that money which the greedy merchants had brought to buy the Jewiſh captives with. This ſignal victory was gained on the Friday, and the next day, being their ſabbath, was celebrated with ſuitable returns to the divine providence for their miraculous deliverance[k].

Defeats the Syrians.

THIS defeat proved doubly advantageous to the conqueror. It furniſhed him with quantities of arms and ammunition for his men, and his fame drew daily freſh reinforcements from all parts of Judæa, whom his ſucceſs encouraged to repair to him from all the places of their diſperſion; ſo that he found himſelf ſoon after in a condition to attempt another action, which proved no leſs glorious and ſucceſsful to him. Timotheus, governor of the country beyond Jordan, and Bacchides, another experienced officer of the Syrian army, had joined their forces, and were coming againſt him, with a deſign to retrieve their late defeat; but Judas was by this time ſo well reinforced, that he met and overthrew them in a ſet battle, killed twenty thouſand of their men, inriched himſelf with

[i] Ibid. iii. 57, & ſeq. [k] Ibid. cap. iv. paſſ. JOSEPH. ubi ſupra. 2 MACCAB. viii 24, & ſeq.

with their ſpoil, got a new ſupply of proviſions for his men, and took preſently after ſeveral ſtrong fortreſſes from the diſheartened Syrians, which he gariſoned with ſome of his troops, and depoſited in them the arms which they had taken from the enemy. In the diſtribution of all the ſpoil, Judas's generoſity outwent what was even preſcribed by the Moſaic law, which intitled none to ſhare it with the combatants, but thoſe who were left to take care of the baggage †; but he cauſed a conſiderable part to be divided among his indigent brethren; ſo that the old, decrepit, the ſick and lame, the widows and the fatherleſs, were made partakers of the fruits of his victories. In this battle was killed one of Timotheus's chief officers, named Philarchus, who had been a bitter enemy to the Jews; and whilſt they were making their rejoicings for their ſucceſs, news was brought, that Caliſthenes, the man who had firſt ſet fire to the gates of the temple, had concealed himſelf in a little houſe not far from them; upon which Judas diſpatched a detachment, who went and ſet it on fire, and burnt him in it, as a juſt retaliation for his ſacrilege [l]. As for Nicanor, he ſaved indeed his life, but loſt his honour, being forced to retreat to Antioch in the diſguiſe of a ſervant, and there excuſe his late diſgrace, by owning, that the Jews, when under the protection of their God, were invincible [m].

Divides the ſpoil.

Caliſthenes burnt.

Nicanor's ſhameful flight.

When Lyſias heard the news of the total defeat of the army he had ſent into Judæa, he made all the haſte he could to put himſelf at the head of ſixty thouſand foot, and five thouſand horſe, all of the choiceſt troops he could get; and entering Judæa with them through the territories of Idumea, was met at Bethzura (S) by the Maccabitiſh general, at the head

† Vide Numb. xxxi. 25, & ſeq. 1 Sam. xxx. 24. [l] 2 Macc. viii. 30, & ſeq. [m] Ibid. ver. 35, & ſeq.. 1 Macc. & Joseph. ubi ſupra.

(S) This was a very important fortreſs about that time. It was in the tribe of Judah (15), and had formerly been fortified by king Rehoboam (16), it being one of the keys of Judæa on the ſouth ſide of Idumea (17). The ſecond book of the Maccabees places it at five furlongs diſtance from Jeruſalem (18); but this muſt be a miſtake either of the tranſlator or tranſcriber, it being, according to Euſebius, full twenty miles from it, on the road to Hebron (19).

(15) Vide Joſh. xv. 58. (16) 2 Chron. ii. 7. (17) 1 Maccab. iv. 61. 2 Maccab. xiii. 19. (18) Chap. xi. 5. (19) Loc. Hebr.

It

head of only ten thouſand men. The two armies engaged, and Judas, tho' ſo much inferior to the Syrians, fell upon them with ſuch courage, that he immediately killed five thouſand of them on the ſpot, and routed the reſt; and Lyſias, obſerving that the Jews fought like men determined either to conquer or die, dared not venture a ſecond engagement with the remainder of his ſcared army; but returned to Antioch, with a deſign to bring a much greater force againſt them by the return of the year [n] (T).

Lyſias defeated in Judæa. Year of the Flood, 2834. Before Chriſt, 165.

BUT

[n] 1 MACCAB. iv. 30, & ſeq.

It is likely that this was one of the fortreſſes which Judas had retaken from the Syrians, and which Lyſias came now to beſiege; but was defeated in the attempt by the Jewiſh chief, who came immediately from Bethoron to its relief.

(T) This is one of the moſt ſignal victories that ever Judas yet gained againſt the Syrians, and at the ſame time the moſt difficult to be accounted for, from the imperfect relation which the Jewiſh authors give us of it. That which he gained againſt thoſe two experienced generals, Nicanor and Georgias, was owing to a ſurprize, the Syrian army being attacked in the night, and in the abſence of one of their generals, whilſt the other, depending on his ſtratagem, did lie in profound ſecurity. In that which he gained over Timotheus and Bacchides, he killed twenty thouſand of their men before they gave ground; neither is it ſaid of either of theſe two actions, whether Judas attacked the two commanders jointly or ſeparately; ſo that if we may gueſs from his character, it is more likely he fell upon them both, before they had joined their forces.

But in this, Lyſias comes at the head of ſixty thouſand choice foot, and ten thouſand horſe, ſets down before Bethzura, is attacked by only ten thouſand men, and has ſcarcely five thouſand of his own killed, a ſmall number out of ſeventy thouſand; before he is routed, and ſo diſheartened, as to leave the province, and retire to Antioch. Our authors do not tell us in what order either ſide diſpoſed their troops; but from what we have formerly mentioned of the Jewiſh way of fighting †, and even by what we can gather from that of the Maccabees, who ſeem to have ſtill followed the old way, the method was, (whenever their army was too ſmall to make a front equal to that of the enemy) to divide their troops into four or five bodies of a conſiderable depth, and ſo fall on the enemy at proportionable diſtances.

As for the Syrians, we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that they did like other nations, ſpread their phalanges according to the number of their troops, and cover at leaſt their two wings with their † Vol. III. p. 57.

'But all these successes seemed still too small to our Jewish general, whilst the sanctuary continued polluted with abominable idols, the temple garisoned by idolaters, and the city a ruined heap. As soon therefore as their enemies were gone out of the province, Judas marched with his army to the metropolis, fully purposed to recover and purify it, and was as chearfully followed by them. Upon their coming to mount Sion, and seeing the desolation in which it did lie, the houses, palaces, and gates of the temple burnt down, the courts of the sanctuary over-run with shrubs and briars, the priestly apartments demolished, the altar and holy places profaned and stripped of all their antient splendor, they rent their cloaths, covered their heads with dust, and filled the air with cries and other tokens of the livelicst sorrow. As soon as Judas observed these first emotions a little assuaged, he posted some of his bravest troops to guard all the avenues of the city from surprize, and then appointed such of the priestly order, as had best signalized themselves for their zeal and sanctity, to enter into the temple, and see it thoroughly rid of all its profane lumber, whilst the rest of the people were busy in clear-

Comes and purifies the city and temple.

cavalry; and in this last respect Lysias had vastly the advantage, as well as in number, since we find not any where that the Maccabees made use of any cavalry; for, if they had, it is hardly to be supposed their historians would have omitted mentioning it, as well as that of the enemy.

'Let us therefore suppose ever so great a superiority in the Jewish army, either in point of courage and experience, knowledge of the ground, advantage of situation, or the like, it will appear next to a miracle, that seventy thousand choice men of horse and foot should be routed and broken, upon the death of five thousand of their men, and by so small a number as ten thousand, (suppose none of these were either killed or wounded) so as not to be rallied again by their old experienced officers; but that they should, one and all, be flung into such consternation, as to quit both the field and the country to so inferior an enemy.

If therefore the Jewish authors have not exaggerated the number of their enemies, we may very well suppose they have their character; and, by their defeat, and their general's so suddenly retiring from Judæa, it may be reasonably concluded, that his army, instead of consisting of such choice horse and foot, was only an undisciplined multitude, gathered up in haste, and easily scared at the sight of so brave and resolute an enemy What confirms this conjecture is, that Lysias had much better success the next year, when he came against Bethzura with a fresh army, whilst that of Judas, as well as his fame, and consequently the courage of his troops, increased by every one of these victories.

ing

ing the ſtreets and places of all the rubbiſh. Whatever old materials they found, that had undergone any defilement, they broke in pieces, and carried them out of the city, and buried them in ſome common place, eſpecially the altar of burnt-offerings, which had been ſo notoriouſly profaned, that no part of it was fit for future uſe; and which was therefore demoliſhed, and carried off, and another of unhewn ſtones o ſubſtituted to it (V). There were ſtill many things wanting before the divine ſervice could be reſumed; the altar of perfumes, the table of ſhew-bread, the ſeven-branch candleſtick, cenſers, and other ſacred utenſils, all of the pureſt gold, had been carried off, as well as the rich veil which covered the holy of holies: all theſe therefore the Jewiſh chief cauſed to be made anew out of the ſpoils of their enemies; and all being ſet up in their reſpective places, and the holy and moſt holy place repaired, they began the divine worſhip, with the o Ibid. ver. 43, & ſeq. 2 MACCAB. x. 6, 7.

(V) It ſeems there aroſe no ſmall difficulty among the Jewiſh doctors, about diſpoſing of the materials of this old altar. On the one hand, it had been dedicated to, and had a long time been uſed in, the ſervice of God; ſo that they thought it unlawful to apply them to any common uſes. On the other hand, the heathens had polluted it in ſo many ways, by ſacrificing unclean beaſts upon it to their idols and falſe deities, that the retaining any part of it, would have been deemed to defile all their future offerings. At length a middle expedient was agreed on, that they ſhould be depoſited into ſome convenient cavity of the mountain on which the temple ſtood, till ſome prophet aroſe that could direct them how to diſpoſe better of them 20).

Among the ſacred utenſils which Judas cauſed to be made, inſtead of thoſe which Antiochus had carried off, we do not read of an ark and mercy-ſeat to ſtand in the moſt holy place; nor is it ſaid by Ezra, Nehemiah, or even by Joſephus, that ever they made a new one.

The Talmudiſts, after the author of the ſecond book of the Maccabees, tell us indeed, that Jeremiah cauſed the old one which Moſes had mode, to be buried in ſo ſecret a place a little before the captivity, that it could never be found; and the former add, that it will never be brought forth, till God is reconciled to the people, and has gathered them all under the king Meſſiah. It is therefore reckoned one of the five things that were wanted in the ſecond temple; but whether they made any thing like it after their return, is more than we dare affirm We ſhall ſee in the ſequel, that when the Romans plundered the ſanctuary, they found it quite empty of all thoſe utenſils.

(20) 1 Maccab. iv. 44.

dedication of the new altar, and other holy utenſils, on the twenty-fifth day of the month Ciſleu, it being the very ſame day on which it had ceaſed by the profanation of the temple three years before, and in the ſecond year of Judas's government.

This ceremony, which was performed with all imaginable ſolemnity, was uſhered in with the earlieſt dawn, by the ſound of the trumpets, by raiſing a freſh fire by the ſtriking of two fire-ſtones; which was no ſooner kindled, than they began with offering the lamb for the daily ſacrifice, lighting the lamps, burning the uſual portion of incenſe, and all other parts of the divine ſervice, according to the Moſaic law; from which time it was never diſcontinued, till the deſtruction of the temple by the Romans. This feſtival was kept eight days with great devotion and joy, after which it was ordered to be ſolemnized every year in the ſame manner by the whole nation, under the name of the feaſt of the dedications [p]. During this time the front of the temple was adorned with crowns, garlands, eſcutcheons, and other ornaments of the beſt gold. Every houſe was likewiſe illuminated and adorned; and from thence it was alſo called the feaſt of lights [q] (W). The author

[p] 1 Macc. iv. 58, & ſeq. [q] Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c. 11.

(W) It was accordingly continued to be celebrated by lighting many candles, ſome at their doors, and ſome in their houſes. Even to this time they light a certain number of large wax-tapers in their ſynagogues during this feſtival; that is, one on the firſt day, two on the ſecond, and ſo on to eight on the laſt day of the feaſt; the occaſion of which, the Jews tell us, was, that when they came to light the lamps on the great candleſtick, they could find no holy oil to feed them with, till, after much looking, they found a little veſſel ſealed, which contained juſt as much as would ſerve one day; but to their ſurprize, burnt eight whole days. On this day they likewiſe celebrated the death of Holophernes by Judith, tho' they are not all agreed that it happened about this time (21).

It was lawful, however, to work during the feſtival, it being only obſerved by mirth and going to the ſynagogue. The Jews call it hanuca, which ſignifies reſtoration, or renewing. One of the Evangeliſts calls it encænia (22), which implies the ſame thing, and adds, that it fell in the winter, about the time of that ſolſtice.

This circumſtance is ſo much the more material, becauſe Chriſt, vouchſafing to aſſiſt at it, tho' appointed only by human authority, ſufficiently proves the lawfulneſs of inſtituting feſtivals in memory of public bleſſings (23).

(21) Vid. Leo, de Moden. ceremon. Jud. par. 2, c. 9. (22) John x. 22. (23) Vid. Grot. in John x.

The

thor of the ſecond book of the Maccabees adds [r], that in memory of their having kept the feaſt of the tabernacles whilſt they lurked in their dens and on the mountains, they repaired to the temple on this new feſtival with palms and other curious branches in their hands, and celebrated this wonderful deliverance with pſalms and ſuitable hymns to the occaſion.

AND now there remained but one obſtacle more to be removed, namely, the gariſon which Apollonius had placed in the fortreſs of Acra, on the eminence over-againſt the temple (X), to annoy thoſe that went to and from it; for whilſt that was ſtill kept by heathens and apoſtate Jews, it could not but obſtruct their concourſe to that place of worſhip. A ſiege would have taken up too much time, had Judas been furniſhed with men and warlike inſtruments for it; becauſe the place was very ſtrong both by art and nature: and to have blockaded it would have taken up a greater number of men than he could ſpare. There was therefore but one way left, namely, to fortify the mountain of the temple with a high wall and ſtrong towers round about, and to leave a ſtout gariſon to defend it, and hinder that of Acra from diſturbing thoſe who reſorted to Jeruſalem. At the ſame time Judas cauſed ſome additional fortifications to be made to Bethzura, it being, as was lately obſerved, an advantageous fortreſs, to obſtruct the entrance from Idumea (Y); for which reaſon it had been lately attempted by Lyſias [s].

BY

[r] 2 MACCAB. x. 6, & ſeq. [s] 1 MACCAB. iv. 60, & ſeq.

The Jews did indeed celebrate two other dedications, viz. that of Solomon and that of Zerubbabel, which were properly founded on divine authority, becauſe inſtituted by perſons divinely inſpired; but that this, which our Saviour is obſerved to have been preſent at, could be neither of theſe, is plain, becauſe that of Solomon was kept in the month Tiſhri, which is about our autumn (24); and that of Zerubbabel in the month Adar, or the laſt month, which falls in the ſpring (25); whereas that of Judas Maccabeus was in the winter, which agrees with what the Evangeliſt ſays of it in the place above-quoted.

X) The word, Ακρα acra, properly ſignifies an eminence, or fortreſs built on ſome eminent ground, which has the command of the country round about; and as this of Acra ſtood higher than that of Sion, it gave that gariſon the advantage of annoying all that paſſed to and from the temple, as was obſerved above.

(Y) It will not be improper here to remind our readers, that

(24) 1 Kings viii. 2. 2 Chron. v. 3. (25) Ezra vi. 15, & ſeq.

this

By this time all the neighbouring nations, having heard what had been done at Jeruſalem, were ſo exaſperated againſt the Jews, that they reſolved to join their forces to extirpate the whole nation. They began with murdering all thoſe that chanced to live among them, and waited only the coming of Antiochus into Judæa to aſſiſt them in the utter deſtruction of the Jews; but, happily for theſe, Antiochus's death, which happened ſoon after, broke all their meaſures, and freed them from the bloody deſigns which that exaſperated tyrant had ſworn againſt them, when he heard of their ſucceſs againſt his three generals [t]. We have already given an account, both of his preparations and extraordinary death in a former chapter *, and to which nothing needs to be added here.

Antiochus's death.

The minority of the young Antiochus cauſed ſome alterations in Paleſtine, and gave the Jews a kind of reſpite, which proved, however, but ſhort-lived. Ptolemy Macron, governor of Cœle-Syria, who had been an inveterate enemy to the Jews, and had made them ſuffer great hardſhips during the laſt reign, was now by ſome means become their friend; but he was ſoon after accuſed for it to the king, and deprived

[t] 1 Maccab v. 1, & ſeq. 2 Maccab. ix. 1, & ſeq. Joseph. Antiq. l. xii. c 14. Euseb. Chron. * Vol. VIII. p. 546. & ſeq.

this Idumea is not the Idumea antiently ſo called in the ſacred books of the Old Teſtament, otherwiſe the land of Edom, ſituate between the Dead and the Red ſea, and known ſince by the name of Arabia Petræa; concerning which the reader may ſee what has been ſaid in a former volume *

But this we are now ſpeaking of, was a portion of the inheritance of the tribes of Simeon and Judah, taken in poſſeſſion by ſome Idumeans, during the time of the Babyloniſh captivity; who, being driven out of their land by the Nabatheans, came at ſettled here, and inlarged their territory from the ſouth part of the lot of Judah, as far as Hebron, which they made their metropolis, as it had been that of the tribe of Judah. Theſe, therefore, and not the antient Edomites, are the Idumeans we ſhall have often occaſion to mention in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

Now Bethzura, lying on the road between Hebron and Jeruſalem, at about twenty miles from the latter, as we have hinted in a former note, was an important barrier againſt the incurſions of the Syrian troops that were in Idumea, and did well deſerve all the care that Judas beſtowed in the fortifying of it.

* See Vol. II. p. 146, & ſeq. & Vol. III. p. 93, & note (E).

of

of his government by Lyſias, who ſucceeded him in it, and came preſently after with a powerful army into Judæa. In the interim, Gorgias, who commanded the Syrian forces there, having gathered a freſh body of ſtrangers, was making continual incurſions againſt the Jews, whilſt the Idumæans, who had joined with him, held the moſt advantageous poſts, and received in them all the renegado Jews, in hopes to tire the reſt by prolonging the war. But Judas, having gathered his army together, went and attacked them in that part of their territories, which was called Acrabatene, and killed no leſs than twenty thouſand of them [u]. From thence he marched againſt the children of Bean (Z), who had proved a great thorn in his ſides, and drove them into two of their ſtrongeſt towers; and when he underſtood they were furniſhed with every neceſſery thing to hold out a ſiege, he left his three brethren, Simon, Joſeph, and Zaccheus, with a ſufficient force to reduce them, whilſt he led the reſt upon a more important expedition. During the ſiege, ſome of Simon's head officers ſuffered themſelves to be bribed with a ſum of ſeventy thouſand drachms, to let ſome of the beſiegers eſcape. Judas being informed of it, ordered thoſe traitors to be tried by the heads of the army, and to be put to death; after which he took the two fortreſſes by aſſault, put both gariſons, which conſiſted of about twenty thouſand, to death, burnt the towers to the ground, and paſt over Jordan into the land of the Ammonites [w]. Theſe he found likewiſe in a good poſture of defence, having Timotheus the Syrian general at their head, who had gathered a great number of forces out of Aſia, and was coming to invade Judæa; he had ſeveral ſkirmiſhes with the Ammonites, before he could come at the Syrian commander, defeated and killed great numbers of them; after which he took the city of Jazar, put a gariſon in it, and marched back into Judæa [x].

Judas falls on the Idumæans.

[u] 2 MACCAB. x. 14, & ſeq. [w] 1 MACCAB. v. 1, & ſeq. [x] Ib. ver. 8.

(Z) Whether Bean was the name of a man, city, or tribe, is not certain; but moſt probably they were a tribe of Idumeans, of whom the text ſays, that they were a ſnare and decoy to the Iſraelites, and did lie in wait againſt them on the high ways (26), as they paſſed to and from Jeruſalem.

(26) 1 Maccab. v. 4, & ſeq Conf. cum Gen. xxxvi. 27. & Numb. xxxii. 3. & xxxiii. 31, & ſep.

IN

IN the mean time Timotheus had not been idle, but had gathered together an army from among all the heathen nations, who were now more than ever exasperated against the Jews, resolved, if possible, to wipe of the disgrace of his former defeat, with the extirpation of that people. To this end, he entered Judæa with his new forces. Judas did not let him penetrate far, before he met and totally defeated him, killed twenty thousand five hundred of his foot and six hundred horse, and forced him to retreat into the city of Gazara (A), which was commanded by his brother Chereas. Hither Judas pursued and invested him, and, having carried the place in five days, slew him with his brother and another Syrian general named Apollophanes [y]. This defeat, though very advantageous to the Jews, proved the cause of great numbers of their nation being murdered by the heathens, who could not brook the continual success of the Maccabitish general. A thousand of them were sacrificed to their fury in the land of Tob, and their wives and children carried into captivity; the rest of their brethren must have undergone the same fate, had they not timely prevented it, by flying into Dathema, a fortress in the land of Gilead, and there timely provided for their own defence [z]. From thence they sent letters to Judas, informing him of their condition, and that Timotheus, perhaps the son of him that was lately killed at Gazara, at the head of the Tyrians, Sidonians, Ptolemaidans, and others, was besieging them in it. Judas had scarcely done reading these letters, when he received others from other brethern in Galilee, who were also in the same distress. The general immediately convened a sanhedrin, in which it was resolved, that Judas and his brother Jonathan should go to help the Gileadites, with part of his troops, making in all about eight thousand: that Simon, another of his brothers, should go with another part to succour those of Galilee; and that Joseph and Azarias his other brothers, should stay to defend Jerusalem with the residue of their troops. To these latter Judas gave strict charge in no case to act of-

Defeats Timotheus.

Gileadites and Galileans assisted.

[y] 2 MACCAB. x. 31, & ad fin. [z] 1 MACCAB. v. 1, & seq.

(A) Probably the same with Gadara and Gaderoth, situate in the neighbourhood of Diospolis and Nicopolis (27). Eusebius places it about five miles northward of the latter (28).

(27) Vide Steph. Byzant sub Gadara, Reland. Palest. l. iii.
(28) Loc. Hebr.

fensively,

fenſively, but to ſtand in their own defence, till his or his brother Simon's return [a].

UPON Judas's paſſing the Jordan, he was informed by the Nabatheans, with whom he was then at peace, that not only the Jews of Dathema, but likewiſe thoſe of Boſſora, Caſphon, Maked, Alema, Carnaim, and other conſiderable cities of the land of Gilead, were likewiſe cloſely ſhut up by their enemies, and, if not timely relieved, were deſigned to be all deſtroyed in one day. As there was no time then to be loſt, Judas immediately fell on Boſſora, took it, and deſtroyed all the males; and, having freed his brethren, ſet fire to the city, and marched directly to Dathema. Upon his arrival thither early on the next morning, he found Timotheus ready to ſtorm the place; and fell upon him ſo unexpectedly, and with ſuch force, that he put all to the rout; for they no ſooner heard the ſound of their trumpets, and underſtood that Judas was at the head of their enemy, than they threw down their arms in the utmoſt confuſion, and betook themſelves to flight. Judas purſued them ſome time, and killed about eight thouſand of them; but remembering the condition of his other brethren in the Gileaditiſh cities, he marched againſt and took them one after another, made them undergo the ſame fate as he had that of Boſſora, loaded himſelf with the richeſt plunder, and returned, with his victorious army and delivered brethren, to Jeruſalem [b]. Delivered by Judas.

ON the other hand, Simon, his brother, though inferior in ſtrength, having but three thouſand men, was no leſs ſucceſsful in Galilee; he defeated his enemies in ſeveral rencounters, killed about three thouſand of them, and purſued them as far as Ptolemais, inriched himſelf with their plunder, and delivered his brethren from their cruel thraldom; but finding it impoſſible with his handful of men to ſecure their longer abode there, by the total reduction of their oppreſſors, he choſe rather to bring them with their families and valuable things to Jeruſalem; whence Judas ſoon after ſent them to new people the deſolate cities of Judæa, where they might dwell in more ſafety. Whilſt things went on thus ſucceſsfully in Gilead and Galilee, the two brothers, that were left at Jeruſalem, unluckily took it into their heads to ſignalize themſelves alſo by ſome brave exploit on their heathen neighbours, though contrary to Judas's expreſs commands. Jamnia appeared to them a fair ſea-port town (B) and worth Joſeph's their unlucky attempt on Jamnia. Simon's ſucceſs in Galilee.

[a] Ibid. ver. 19. [b] Ibid. v. 22, & ſeq.

(B) It was ſituate on the Mediterranean, between Joppa and Azotus, or Aſhdod, about two hundred and forty furlongs diſtant from their conquering, before the return of their victorious brethren. Thither therefore they led their little army, but were unhappily defeated by Gorgias, who commanded the place, and who sallied out against them, killed about two thousand of their men, and forced the rest to return with shame and loss to Jerusalem [c]. This disgrace, however, did not hinder the fame of their worthy brother's increasing daily, and his valour being more and more dreaded by their enemies. This gave the Jewish chief a fresh opportunity of falling upon the Idumeans, who, as we have seen, had joined with the Syrians and had been in some measure humbled by them. But as he found them still stirring against him, he led his forces into the south parts of Idumea, laid siege to Hebron their famous metropolis, took and demolished it, with all the neighbouring towns, and carried off a considerable plunder [d]. From thence he entered the terrritories of the Philistines and Samaritans, injecting terror where-ever he past, and discouraging those nations at least from acting offensively against him. In this expedition, some indiscreet priests, that were in his army, endeavouring to signalize their valour by some exploit against the enemy, fell a sacrifice to their untimely ambition, being all slain in the attempt, and by their deaths convinced both him and his army, how dangerous it was to go one step beyond the orders of such an experienced general. Judas did not return into Judæa till he had taken a tour thro' the land of the Philistines, and destroyed, with their fortresses, all their altars, groves, and other instruments of idolatry [e].

Judas's success against the Idumeans.

All these repeated successes raised such a jealousy and shame in the lately defeated Syrian governor, that he assembled an army of eighty thousand foot together with all the horse and elephants he could get, and marched with them into Judæa, not doubting but speedily to reduce that unhappy kingdom into as miserable a condition as Antiochus had for-

Lysias invades Judæa.

[c] Ibid. v. 55. & seq. [d] Ver. 65, & seq. [e] 1 Maccab. v. 67, 68.

Year of the Flood, 2836. Before Christ, 162

from Jerusalem (29). Its name is not to be found in the Hebrew, but the septuagint places it after the city of Ekron, mentioned in Joshua (30). It is supposed to be the same with Jabneh, which Uzziah king of Judah is said (31) to have taken from the Philistines.

(29) 2 Maccab. xii. 9. (30) Cap. xv. 45. (31) 2 Chron. xxvi. 6.

merly

merly done. After which his design was to extirpate the whole Jewish nation, and to repeople their land with heathens, and to inrich his master and himself, both with the richest plunder of the land, and with the sale of the high-priest-hood and other dignities. Flushed with these great hopes, he marched through the southern territories of Judah, probably because the other was too mountainous and craggy for his elephants and cavalry, and laid siege to the fortress of Bethzura. Judas, who was then at Jerusalem, having first implored the divine blessing on his arms, set out with his little army to its relief. On the road there appeared to them a man on horseback in rich shining armour, and seemingly brandishing his spear against their enemies. This sight, whatever it was, gave his men such flush of courage, that they fell like lions on the Syrian camp, killed eleven thousand foot, and put the rest to flight. Is defeated.

Lysias, now more than ever convinced how impossible it would be to carry on the war against such an enemy, with either honour or advantage, sent Judas some overtures of peace [f], with a promise that it should be ratified by the king his master, and that the young prince should make him all the concessions he should with justice demand, and conclude an alliance with him. Judas accepted the proposal, and sent soon after John and Absalom, two of his captains, with the conditions upon which he would agree to a peace, to Lysias, who caused them to be forthwith conveyed to Antiochus. They contained upon the whole a general amnesty for whatever had been done before; a total revocation of the late edict, which obliged the Jews to renounce their religion and to conform to that of the Greeks; a free exercise of their religion and customs; and safe passports for commissioners to pass from Jerusalem to Lysias, or, if need required, to Antioch. These conditions, advantageous as they were to the hated Jews, were readily granted by the king, and two letters were sent, the one to the governor, and the other to the Jewish senate. Lysias likewise wrote to them, as did also Q. Memmius and T. Manlius, two Roman embassadors to the Syrian court. All these four letters the reader may find in the chapter last quoted [g]; by which it appears, how ready both the governor and his master were to agree to a peace with the victorious Jews, and how friendly those two Romans Sues for peace.

[f] 2 MACCAB. cap. 11. 1, ad 13. [g] Vers. 17, to the end.

had had interposed their good offices on their behalf (C). It appears also by the king's letter, that Menelaus, the apostate high-priest, who in all likelihood was then at the Syrian court, had also laboured to promote this peace, and was desirous to be included in it, since he was sent back to Jerusalem by Antiochus, as his letter terms it, to comfort or confirm the Jews [h].

This peace, however, which seems to have been obtained from the young king by the sole interest of Lysias, unless we join with him the high-priest above-mentioned, could not be brooked by the other Syrian generals; so that, as soon as [h] Ibid. ver. 32.

(C) Lysias's letter, being dated from the month Dioscorinthius, or, as the Latin version abridges it, Dioscorus, has very much puzzled the chronologists, because there is no such month to be found in the Syro-Macedonian calender, or indeed in any other of those times. Those who suppose it to have been an intercalar one, placed between those of Dystrus and Xanthicus (32), answering in part to our March and April, have not given us any proof, that either Syrians, Macedonians, or even Chaldeans, had any such intercalary month; and the main reason on which they build their supposition, viz that the ratification of the peace is dated from the month Xanthicus, immediately following, doth make rather manifestly against it.

For Antioch and Jerusalem being at least four hundred miles asunder, it is hardly credible, that these articles of peace could have been sent for, transmitted, and ratified in so short a space as a month. We must therefore either suppose some mistake in the text, occasioned by the inadvertency of the transcribers, or suppose, that the king was not then at Antioch, but either in Phœnicia, or some other place nearer Jerusalem; and this latter seems indeed the most probable, if we consider, that, according to the king's letter (33), those Jews, who were to transact this peace and to go from Jerusalem to Lysias's camp, or, as was observed above, to the Syrian court, had but fifteen days allowed them, viz. from the fifteenth to the thirtieth day of Xanthicus, which would have been too short a space to have gone to and from the king, and makes it reasonable to suppose he was nearer Judæa.

In this case Dioscorinthius and Dioscorus may be probably enough either a corruption, or more likely, other names for Dystrus, immediately

(32) Scalig. de emend. temp. l. ii. Usser. sub A. M. 3841.
(33) 2 Macc. xi. 30.

as Lyſias was retired to Antioch, Timotheus, Apollonius (D), Hieronymus, Demophon, and Nicanor governor of Cyprus, began to renew their hoſtilities againſt the Jews. The neighbouring nations, whether out of innate hatred againſt them, or by the ſuggeſtion of the Syrian officers, were equally forward to infeſt them. Some inſtances of which the author gives us in thoſe of Joppa, who treacherouſly invited, upon ſome pretence, a number of Jews, with their wives and children, who lived in the place, on board ſome barges by the ſea ſhore, rowed them further into the deep, and flung them over-board, to the number of about two hundred. This barbarous action was ſoon after heard of at Jeruſalem, and Judas, juſtly provoked at it, marched againſt thoſe murderers, came upon them in the dead of night, ſet fire to their boats and port, and killed all thoſe that had ſaved themſelves from the flames. He would have done the ſame to the city itſelf, but they had timely ſhut their gates upon him; and when he was reſolving its utter deſtruction, he heard that thoſe of Jamnia had hatched the ſame cruel miſchief againſt thoſe Jews that lived with them; he turned his arms thitherward, and came ſuddenly upon them, burnt their ſhips, port, and magazines, inſomuch, that the flames were ſeen from Jeruſalem, though, as we hinted before, at near two hundred and forty furlongs, or about thirty miles diſtance [i].

Judas ſtaid not to take a further revenge of thoſe two perfidious towns, becauſe he heard, that Timotheus, who had by this time got a freſh army, was entered the land of Gilead; but marched directly to their aſſiſtance; he had mediately preceding Xanthicus, or, if the former be derived from Δι῟ κορινθι῟, as who ſhould ſay the month Dius of the Corinthians, becauſe Dius among the Bithynians anſwered the Dyſtrus of the Syro-Macedonians, which is not improbable, then the Dioſcorus of the Latin verſion will be only an abbreviation or corruption of the Dioſcorinthius (34).

[i] 2 MACC. c. xii. 1, & ſeq. ad 9.

Theſe letters bear moreover the date of the hundred and forty-eighth year, viz. of the Seleucidæ, which the learned author laſt quoted has proved to anſwer to the year before Chriſt 163, and the reſt in proportion accordingly; to which we refer the reader.

(D) Not the general that has been ſpoken of in the former ſection, who was the ſon of Thyrſeus, and was killed by Judas, but another, who is here called the ſon of Gennæus †.

(34) Vid. Prid. ſub an. 163.

† See Vol. VIII. p. 604, (I).

Icarce

scarce gone nine furlongs, before he was attacked by a band of Arabian Nomades (E), in number about five thousand foot and five hundred horse. A fierce engagement immediately ensued, in which Judas having got the better, forced those free-booters to sue for peace, and granted it to them the more readily, that his march into Gilead might not be stopt [k]. However, he obliged them to furnish him with a certain number of cattle and provisions, and extorted a promise, that they should assist him in any thing he should require of them, after which he marched in all haste to the other side Jordan to attack the Syrian general. However, he met with several other obstacles, and was forced to take some places in his way. The first of them was Caspis, a city well fenced with high walls, and so well provided within, that the inhabitants, trusting to their own strength, threw many scornful and blasphemous sarcasms at the Jewish army; but Judas assaulted it with such an unexpected bravery, that he made himself master of it, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, insomuch, that a neighbouring lake, about two furlongs broad, was seen running with blood [l].

Judas defeats the Arabians.

From thence he marched into the land of Tob, where the Jews, called from thence Tubieni, had shut themselves up in the fortress of Characa (F); and whence Timotheus having in [k] Ibid. ad ver. 12. [l] Ibid. ad ver. 16.

(E) These were a kind of wandering people, living in tents, and staying in a place no longer than it afforded them provision for themselves and cattle. They were the descendants of Ishmael, and, according to the angel's prediction of them (35), their hands were against every man, and every man's hand against them; for they lived chiefly upon plunder, especially of the caravans, who did therefore go well armed, and whenever they met, they seldom gave quarter to one another; and as those plunderers were stout, warlike, and well acquainted with the course of all those countries, it was no ill policy in the Jewish chief to secure their friendship and future services.

(F) Probably the same with Charac Moab, as Carnion may be reasonably supposed the same which, in the Hebrew and the first book of the Maccabees, is called Carnaim, al. Ashtaroth Carnaim, or Astar with two horns (36), which city was the residence of Og (35) Gen. xvi. 12. See also, Vol. II p. 365, note M. (36) De his vid. Byzant. Reland Palest. tom. 1. p 212, & seq & alib. Bochart. & al.

king

in vain tried to diſlodge them, was gone, after having left a good gariſon in a place ſtrongly ſituate within its neighbourhood to keep them in awe. As ſoon therefore as Judas found him gone, he ſent two of his generals with a detachment to take that gariſon, whilſt he with the reſt of his army, marched in ſearch of the Syrian chief. Doſitheus and Soſipater, the two Hebrew generals, ſoon after forced the gariſon, and put it to the ſword, to the number of ten thouſand. By this time Timotheus had got an army of one hundred and twenty thouſand foot and two thouſand five hundred horſe; and when he heard that Judas was in full march againſt him, he ſent all the women, children, and other luggage, into Carnion, a ſtrong city of Gilead and very difficult of acceſs, whilſt himſelf incamped his army in the neighbourhood of Raphon, upon the borders of the river Jabboc. As ſoon as Judas was come near enough for his van-guard to be ſeen by the enemy, they ſeem to have been ſeized with a panic fear, for they made ſuch haſte to fly from him, that they wounded one another with their own weapons in the flight. In this running fight Timotheus loſt thirty thouſand of his men, and, unable to rally the reſt, betook himſelf to his heels. Thoſe who eſcaped the ſlaughter, finding themſelves cloſely purſued, fled into Carnion, and a great number of them went and took refuge in the temple of Atargatis (G). Judas, who came cloſe after them, burnt the temple and them in it; then ſetting fire to the reſt of the city, they all periſhed likewiſe, either by the flames or by his ſword, to the number of ten thouſand. And Timotheus.

Takes and burns Carnion.

king of Baſhan †. We find a city mentioned by Strabo and Ptolemy by the name of Carno in Arabia. Euſebius mentions one near Jeruſalem (37); and there might be many more of the ſame name, if Aſtarte was either the moon, worſhipped under that name, or the Egyptian Iſis, repreſented by a bullock's head with two horns (38).

(G) Suppoſed to be the ſame with the Aſtarte mentioned in the laſt note. Diodorus ſays (39), ſhe was worſhipped at Aſcalon, under the figure of a woman from the navel upward, and fiſh downward, like the dagon of, if not the ſame with that of, the Philiſtines; for ſhe was worſhipped under ſeveral names, though under the ſame form, being called Derceto at Joppa, Aſhtaroth, Atargatis, and Atergata in other places (40).

† See Vol. II. p 174, 200. (37) Vid. infra, in ſeq. (38) Vid Sanchoniat. ap Euſeb. Præp. lib. 1 c ult. & Vol. II. p. 308, G. & 310. (39) Bibl l ii. (40) Vid. Strab Geogr. l. Plin. l. v. c. 23. Selden. de diis Syr. & Vol. II. p. 308, & ſeq.

ber

ber of twenty five thousand. As for Timotheus, he fell in his flight into the hands of Dositheus and Sosipater, who were hasting from the land of Tob to join their commander. These two captains, however, were persuaded by him to give him his liberty, upon promise that he would do the same to a great number of Jews, whom he held prisoners, many of whom were very nearly related, either to some of those officers, or to some of their troops there present [m]. This victory quite compleated the reduction of the land of Gilead, and put it out of his enemies power to undertake any thing against him there. However, as the cities of Judæa were still in great measure unpeopled, he chose rather to follow his brother Simon's example, and bring the Jewish Gileadites to inhabit and fortify them [n].

And Ephron.

In his way to Judæa he was of necessity to pass through Ephron, that city being so advantageously situate, that he could neither turn to the right nor the left hand of it. It was moreover well fortified and peopled by strangers of all nations. He therefore sent in a peaceable manner to demand a passage through it; but they, instead of opening their gates to him, did shut, and even wall them up, and prepared themselves for a siege. Judas therefore caused it to be proclaimed through his camp, that every man should scale the walls in the place that chanced to be over-against him. On the other hand, the city which had been well garisoned by Lysias, had placed their choicest men on the battlements of it. The assault was fierce, and lasted the whole day; at length Judas carried it and took the city, put all the males, about twenty five thousand, to the sword, took their wives and daughters captive, seized all the richest plunder, and burnt and quite erazed the place. From Ephron, crossing the Jordan, he spread his army along the plains of Bethshan, then called Scythopolis, a considerable city, about a hundred furlongs from Jerusalem †. Here he enquired of the Jews how they had been treated by the Scythians, and they answering much to the commendation of that people, Judas returned them thanks for their kindness to his brethren, exhorted them to live in friendship with them, and assured them of his own [o], and then continued his journey towards Jerusalem. During their march, Judas kept still in the rear of his army, encouraging those that lagged behind, and brought them at length to that metropolis about the time of pentecost. Here they went to the temple to return thanks to God for their

[m] Ibid. ad ver. 24. [n] Ibid. v. 24, 25. † De hac. vid. v. p. 365. [o] 2 Macc. ubi supra v. 30, & 31.

their quick and wonderful ſucceſs (H), and particularly that they were all returned ſafe and victorious without the loſs of one man [p].

Judas had ſtill a powerful enemy left: Georgias, governor of Idumea, was at the head of that nation, and had haraſſed the Jews for ſome time. He therefore made no longer ſtay at Jeruſalem than the ending of that feſtival, immediately after which he marched at the head of only three thouſand foot and four hundred horſe. The two armies met, and the onſet was ſo fierce on both ſides, that Judas, till then ſo victorious, had the mortification to ſee ſome of his men killed on the ſpot. Doſitheus likewiſe, a brave captain of his, whom we have lately mentioned upon another occaſion, having ſeized the Idumean general alive, had his arm cut off cloſe to the ſhoulder by a Thracian horſeman, and was forced to quit his priſoner, who took that opportunity to fly into Mareſa, a fortreſs near Eleutheropolis. Another part of his troops, commanded by Eſdrin, had ſuſtained the ſhock ſo long, that they were quite exhauſted. At length, Judas having again revived his men by freſh prayers and warlike canticles, the enemy took flight and fled, which gave him an opportunity of rallying his ſcattered forces to Odollam, a town near the field of battle, where they purified themſelves for the ſabbath then enſuing. On the day following, when he and his men came to view the ſlain, in order to bury them, they found upon every one of them ſome gold and ſilver idols, which had been conſecrated by the Jamnites, and which, though taken in plunder, were forbidden to be worn by the law of Moſes [q]. It was then eaſy for them to diſcover the true cauſe of their late defeat, and the juſt puniſhment of thoſe wretches, who had ventured to tranſgreſs in that clan-

[p] 1 MACC. v. 46, & ſeq. 2 MACCAB. xii. 30, & ſeq. [q] DEUT. vii 25, & ſeq.

(H) Quick and wonderful indeed! if we conſider, that the peace could not be broken as ſoon as made, and that it was concluded on the fifteenth of Xanthicus, anſwering to the beginning of our April; and that the feaſt of pentecoſt fell either on the latter end of May or beginning of June; ſo that in leſs than two months time they burnt the two havens of Joppa and Jamnia, beat the Arabian Nomades, took the city of Caſpis, defeated Timotheus and his numerous army, burnt and deſtroyed Carnion and Ephron, beſides ſeveral other ſtrong fortreſſes, releaſed a vaſt number of their brethren, and were returned to Jeruſalem loaden with ſpoils and a vaſt multitude of female captives, and all this without any loſs on their ſide deſtine manner. Judas did not loſe ſo fair an opportunity of inſpiring the ſurvivers with an abhorrence againſt all ſuch heatheniſh ſuperſtitions; and with a ſure confidence in God, as long as they kept themſelves free from them. He then ordered a voluntary collection to be made among them which amounted to two thouſand drachms of ſilver, which he ſent to Jeruſalem, and cauſed an expiatory ſacrifice to be offered up for thoſe that had thus died in their ſin, and to avert any further puniſhment being inflicted on them for it in the other life [r] (I). From thence Judas fell upon the ſouthern parts of Idumea, took Hebron and other fortreſſes; after which he went and took Azotus from the Philiſtines, and pulled down all their images and altars wherever he paſſed, and ſo returned to Jeruſalem loaden with freſh laurels and plunder.

Offers ſacrifices for the ſlain.

All this while the fortreſs of Acra was in the hand of the enemy, and not only hindered many of the Jews from reſorting to the temple, but annoyed thoſe that did, eſpecially in Judas's abſence. Opon his coming therefore from Odollam, he reſolved to form the ſiege of it, and to that end gathered together his whole army, furniſhed himſelf with engines for throwing large ſtones, and with other inſtruments

Beſieges Acra.

[r] 2 Macc. ubi ſupra, verſ. 38, ad fin.

(I) This is certainly the meaning of the hiſtorian (whatever might be that of the Jewiſh chief in cauſing this ſin offering or reconciliatory ſacrifices and prayers to be made for thoſe dead ſinners); for he adds (41), that Judas gave thereby a ſignal proof of his belief of a reſurrection; for, ſays he, if he had not hoped that thoſe ſlain men would have riſen again from the dead, it had been vain and ſuperfluous to have cauſed prayers to be made for them.

Judas might, in all likelihood, have in his eye the defeat which the Iſraelites had formerly had upon ſuch another occaſion, in the caſe of Achan's ſacrilege 42; but it may as well be likewiſe, that the notion of praying and offering of ſacrifices for the dead might be then in uſe, if not of longer ſtanding. However that be, it muſt have been ſo in the time in which the hiſtorian wrote it, unleſs we will ſuppoſe with ſome interpreters, that the paſſage above quoted was a gloſs of the tranſlator (43).

We may further obſerve that the Arundelian copy and Syriac verſion mention three thouſand drachms, and the Latin one twelve thouſand (44).

(41) 2 Maccab. xii 44. (42) Joſh. vii 16, & ſeq Vid. & Vol. III. p 71, & F. (43) Vid int. al. Tremel. in loc. (44) Vid. Uſſer. anx. ſub A. M. 3841.

for

for the ſiege. The place being very ſtrong, and the gariſon numerous and well furniſhed with arms and proviſion, made it likely to hold out a conſiderable time. But the renegado Jews, a great number of whom were then in the place and knew the valour and ſtoutneſs of Judas and his troops, finding that they ſhould be forced at length to ſurrender, and knowing how little mercy they had to hope for from the conqueror, adviſed the commanders to make a vigorous ſally, in order to give an opportunity to ſome of their brethren to go to Antioch, and inform the young king of their diſtreſs. Their advice was taken, and the ſally ſo well managed, that a number of thoſe renegadoes, with ſome officers, found an opportunity to divide from the reſt, and to take the way to the court unperceived. Upon their arrival they went and informed the king of all that Judas had done. They added, that he perſecuted with the moſt mercileſs hatred all that dared ſhew any fidelity to the Syrians, that he plundered, ſacked, and put to fire and ſword all that came in his way; and laſtly, that to ſhake wholly off the Syrian yoke, he had beſieged the gariſon of Acra, which had been placed there to keep their metropolis in awe, and that it muſt undergo the fate of Bethzura and other of his cities and fortreſſes, if not ſpeedily relieved. This news failed not to alarm the Syrian monarch, who ordered immediately all his generals to aſſemble his troops, and if they were not thought ſufficient, to hire a number of auxiliaries, and to march with the utmoſt diſpatch into Judæa. His orders were punctually obeyed, and a vaſt army was drawn together, conſiſting of a hundred thouſand foot and twenty thouſand horſe, thirty two elephants, and three hundred armed chariots. Theſe, having the young king and his uncle Lyſias at their head, marched to the borders of Idumea, where they laid ſiege to the fortreſs of Bethzura [f]. We have already given an account of this war in a former volume [†], and of the miraculous deliverance of the Jews, which ended in an advantageous peace to them, though diſhonourable to Antiochus, who, contrary to the articles of it, cauſed the fortifications of their metropolis to be demoliſhed.

Invaded by Antiochus.

Menelaus, the apoſtate high-prieſt, who had accompanied the king in this expedition, in hopes of being reſtored to his ill-gotten dignity, and perhaps of obtaining the government of Judæa, left no ſtone unturned to ingratiate himſelf to the young monarch, though at the expence of his nation and religion; but his wicked policy failed him, and Lysias, tired with so dear and dishonourable a war, and fearful, lest, if that wretch was left at Jerusalem and invested with any power, he should stir up a new revolt, either to ingratiate himself to the Jews, or to maintain his own authority against a people who he foresaw would never brook it; thought it more adviseable to find out some expedient to rid himself of so dangerous a wretch. He easily compassed his end, and his great credit with the young monarch, to whom he accused him as the author and cause of all the late mischiefs, soon prevailed upon him to condemn him to such a death as his treason, if not to Antiochus, yet to his God and nation, had deserved.

[f] 1 Macc. vi. 18, & ſeq. 2 Macc. xiii. 1, & ſeq. [†] See Vol. VIII. p. 584, & ſeq.

Menelaus put to death.

He was accordingly sent under a strong guard to Beræa, and there made to undergo the cruel punishment of the ashes [t], a death we have already described in a former volume *.

The Jews, though glad at the death of that monster, did not, however, gain much by the change, Lysias found means to persuade the young monarch, that there was a necessity of bestowing the high-priesthood on one that was not of the pontifical family; so that that dignity, which of right belonged to Onias, the son of that worthy high-priest, who had been murdered at Antioch, was bestowed on Alcimus, or Jacimus as he is called by Josephus, who was of another family, tho' of the Aaronic race, and a person no less wicked than his predecessor. As for Onias, when he found his right given to one who had neither title nor merit, he resented the wrong to such a degree, that he retired into Egypt, in hopes by some other way to recompence himself for his loss. Accordingly, upon his coming to that court, he found means to ingratiate himself so well to Ptolemy Philometor and to his queen Cleopatra, that they granted him, some time after, the liberty of building a temple at Alexandria, like unto that of Jerusalem, of which he secured the priesthood to himself and descendants, as shall be seen in the sequel [u].

Onias deprived of the high-priesthood.

Demetrius recovers Syria.

We have elsewhere seen how Demetrius, the lawful heir of the Syrian crown, had found means to escape from Rome, where he had been long kept as an hostage; and, being arrived at Antioch, had put to death both Antiochus Eupator and Lysias, and had made himself master of that capital, and [t] 2 Macc xiii. 3, & seq. * See Vol. V. p. 19. & note.

[u] 2 Macc. xiv. 9, &c. Joseph. antiq. l. xii. c. 15. xx. 8.

soon

ſoon after of the whole kingdom *. In the mean time Alcimus, whom the Jews had refuſed to admit to the high-prieſthood, becauſe he had obtained and ſullied that dignity by open apoſtacy and conforming to the religion and cuſtoms of the Greeks, came to complain of it to the new monarch; he brought with him a number of other Jewiſh renegadoes, whom Judas had cauſed to be baniſhed Judæa for the ſame crime. At the head of theſe miſcreants he applied himſelf to the king, accuſed Judas and the reſt of the Maccabean or Aſmonean race, of having deſtroyed thoſe that ſtood firm to their allegiance to him; of baniſhing others for not joining with his revolted party and of other ſuch crimes as they thought would render them odious to the court. They added, that their preſent diſtreſs was owing to their readineſs in obeying the edicts of the late king, his uncle; and in the end, Alcimus forgot not to beg to have the high-prieſthood confirmed to him by Demetrius. This accuſation, carried on with ſuch ſeeming zeal for the king, did ſo exaſperate him againſt the Jews, that he ſent back the apoſtate, and with him Bacchides, governor of Meſopotamia, at the head of a conſiderable army, and with orders both to reinſtate Alcimus to his dignity, and to carry on the war againſt the Maccabees. Theſe two were joined in the ſame commiſſion, and Alcimus, impatient to ſee himſelf reſtored to his dignity, haſtened the Syrian general, who was wholly devoted to him, to march forthwith into Judæa [w].

Judas accuſed by Alcimus.

UPON their arrival, the two collegues, who knew what an enemy they had to deal with, endeavoured at firſt to decoy him by ſome treacherous ſtratagem; and to this end ſent deputies to the Jewiſh chief to invite him to a conference, in order to end their diſpute in an amicable way. They ſpared no promiſes nor vows, that he ſhould come and go with utmoſt ſafety. Judas eaſily ſuſpected their deſign, and rightly judged, that ſuch a powerful army was intended rather to ſurprize him, than to decide the title of an intruding prieſt, hated and rejected by the whole nation. Inſtead, therefore, of accepting of their invitation, he ſet himſelf about preparing for a vigorous defence. His behaviour, however, was diſapproved by ſeveral doctors and ſcribes, and particularly by ſome of the Aſſideans, whoſe ſect we have ſpoken of in a former ſection. Theſe, pretending to a greater degree of ſanctity than the reſt, inſiſted, that an amicable way was preferable to an hoſtile one, and that Alcimus, being of the race of

* See Vol. VIII. p. 591, & ſeq.

[w] 1 MACCAB. vii. 8, & ſeq.

Aaron,

Aaron, ought not to be lightly ſuſpected of treachery againſt them. But finding Judas unmoveable, they took it into their heads to try how far their mediation would work towards the deſired peace; and having obtained an oath of ſafety from the treacherous high-prieſt, they came to him accompanied with ſome of their doctors and ſcribes. Alcimus gave them at firſt a friendly reception, but as ſoon as he had got them into his power, he cauſed ſixty of them to be ſeized and put to death [x]. This action proved of ſingular ſervice to Judas and his council, and ſufficiently juſtified his refuſal; and his whole army, being now fully convinced that nothing but the blackeſt perfidy was to be expected, from that baſe pontiff and his collegue, reſolved to ſtand up for their general, their relgion and liberty. Some few indeed, being terrified, either at the news of Alcimus's perfidy, or at the ſight of ſo great an army, left Jeruſalem and retired into the country; but there ſtayed with him a ſufficient number to ſuppreſs the power of the treacherous pontiff, in ſpite of his daily reinforcements from the renegado Jews, who reſorted to him, eſpecially after Bacchides's departure. For that general, whether ſtung with the reproaches, which his late perfidious action brought upon him, or with ſhame for not having been able to ſubdue an enemy by treachery, whom he dared not attack openly, left Judæa and returned to Antioch, leaving Alcimus what he thought a ſufficient number of troops, to maintain himſelf in his new dignity. However, whilſt he was in his way to the Syrian court, he could not forbear committing ſome cruelties againſt thoſe Jews that came in his way. Particularly at Beſeth, or Bethſetha, he cauſed a conſiderable number of them to be ſeized and killed, and their bodies to be flung into a well [y].

Alcimus, on the other hand, ſpared neither pains nor coſt, flatteries nor cruelties, to ſtrengthen himſelf. Thoſe that were of greateſt ſervice to him were the Jewiſh renegados and malecontents, whom his careſſes and generoſity drew daily to his ſide. For with theſe, ſupported by the Syrian troops, he was making continual excurſions into ſome part or other of the country, plundering, burning, and deſtroying all that refuſed to acknowledge him. Judas on his ſide was no leſs watchful of all opportunities to oppoſe and ſuppreſs him; he defeated him in ſeveral rencounters, and took ſuch a ſevere vengeance on as many of the revolted Jews as fell into his hands, that the reſt dared no longer act againſt him. Alcimus, being by this time

[x] Ibid. ver. 12, & ſeq. [y] Ibid. v. 19.

time convinced of the impoſſibility of maſtering his enemy, and of ever being admitted to approach the ſacred altars, unleſs he procured a much greater army to force the Jews into a compliance, returned to the Syrian court, renewed his former accuſations and complaints, which failed not to be backed by all the enemies of the Jews that were then at Antioch; and having preſented Demetrius with a rich crown of gold and other valuable preſents, obtained of that incenſed monarch a freſh army, the command of which was given to Nicanor, one of the bittereſt enemies the Jewiſh nation had, with expreſs orders to cut off Judas and his party, diſperſe his army, and to ſettle Alcimus in his power and dignity, beyond the poſſibility of any future oppoſition [z]. But Nicanor, who had lately been ſo feelingly convinced of the ſtrength and bravery of the Jewiſh chief, and juſtly reckoned that one defeat more would complete his diſgrace, ente ed Judæa with a numerous army indeed, but with a full reſolution if poſſible, to bring Judas to accept of a peace, rather than hazard any more battles with him.

Nicanor ſent againſt the Jews.

HOWEVER, upon his firſt coming into that province, all the apoſtate Jews and the heathen, whom Judas had driven out of Judæa, came in ſhoals to liſt under him, in hopes to be ſoon reſettled in their former habitations, ſo that his army was increaſed exceedingly, before he reached the neighbourhood of Jeruſalem. On the other hand, the Jews, being informed of his approach, went to the temple to implore the divine aſſiſtance by faſting and prayers, and then prepared themſelves for a vigorous defence. Nicanor advanced as far as the fortreſs of Deſſau, where Simon, Judas's brother, having attempted to come out againſt him, was ſo terrified at the ſight of his numerous army, that he was glad to retire to Jeruſalem [a]. All this, however, could not induce the Syrian general to begin any hoſtilities againſt the valiant Judas; on the contrary, he ſent three of his head officers, Poſidonius, Theodoſius, and Matthias, to make overtures of peace to him. Judas, who had ſo lately obſerved the propenſity of his men to a peace, acquainted them with the propoſals made to him by Nicanor, which was ſo well approved by them, that a day and a place for an interview was agreed on by thoſe two generals to give it the finiſhing ſtroke. Judas, however, Makes peace with them. juſtly ſuſpecting the ſincerity of the Syrians, cauſed a certain number of his ſtouteſt men to be ſo advantageouſly poſted, that they might come to his relief, in caſe any violence were offered to him. But his precaution at this time was needless, and Nicanor was so bent upon clapping up a peace with him, that their conference was carried on to the satisfaction of both parties; the articles were agreed on, after which Nicanor went and stayed some time in Jerusalem, without giving the Jews the least cause of complaint; so far from it, that, to avoid giving them any umbrage, he disbanded the greatest part of his army, and lived in perfect friendship with the Jewish nation [b] (K).

[z] Ibid. 21, & ſeq. [a] 2 MACCAB. xiv. 12, & ſeq.

offered

[b] Ibid. ver. 26, & seq.

(K) In this year some chronologers (45) place the introduction of the cycle, or rather period, of eighty four years, in order to settle the return of their new moons and festivals depending on them, we have shewn in a former volume †, what a wretched method they had used before the captivity, for discovering those new appearances without the help of astronomical tables The inconveniency they found in it after their dispersion, obliged them to fall upon some surer method, that the whole nation might, in every place, observe them and the other festivals on the same day.

This method was the period of eighty four years, which in all probability was only the period of Calippus, which that learned astronomer had published about a hundred and seventy years before, and consisted of seventy six Julian years, and to which they added the Quoeteris, either thinking it answered their purpose better, or, which is more likely, as dean Prideaux conjectures (46), to make it look like a discovery of their own. For the Jews, who were always very jealous of being suspected to borrow any thing of the heathen nations, may be supposed to have been more so at this time, when they had just gone through so great and general a reformation in their church.

But whether Judas and his sanhedrin, harassed as they were on all sides by their enemies, could have leisure enough to find out and settle this new method, or whether they had not brought already something like it, either from Babylon, or from some of the Greeks; one thing is certain, and worth observing, that this period of eighty four years was peculiar to the Jews, and has been used from thence downward to the time of the famous Hillel, who corrected their calendar in the year of Christ 300. It was afterwards followed by the primitive fathers in the christian church in the settling of their Easter, till new disputes arose, and new corrections were introduced, which are foreign to our present subject, (45) Vid Bochart. de antiq. Paschal Cyclo ap Prid. connect. sub an 162. † Vol. III. p. 186, (H). 46, Ubi supra.

THE

THIS harmony was, however, interrupted ſoon after by the perfidious high-prieſt, who, thinking the peace not ſufficiently advantageous to him, went a third time to Antioch to complain againſt Nicanor, as a betrayer of his maſter's intereſt, and a friend to his mortal enemies; in teſtimony of which he urged the peace lately concluded between them. Demetrius, though juſtly ſurpriſed that his general ſhould venture to take ſuch a ſtep, not only without his leave, but without informing him of it, would not, however, recall him: he contented himſelf with refuſing to ratify the articles, and ſending him freſh orders to renew the war againſt the Jewiſh chief, and not to ſheath his ſword till he had killed him, and wholly ſuppreſſed his party. Upon receiving this unexpected order, Nicanor was extremely diſpleaſed; on the one hand, he was loth to violate the peace, which had been ſo ſtrictly kept by the Jews; on the other, he feared the reſentment of the king, if he diſobeyed ſuch an expreſs command. The laſt motive having at length determined him, his main ſtudy was now to find out ſome plauſible pretence for laying hold on the Jewiſh chief. To this end he began to alter his behaviour towards him, and, inſtead of their former intimacy, to treat him with coldneſs, and an air of ſuperiority. This ſoon gave Judas to underſtand, that it was high time to look to himſelf, which he accordingly did, with ſuch ſpeed and ſecrecy, that he was quite diſappeared before they had the leaſt ſuſpicion of it. Nicanor, ſurpriſed to find him gone out of his reach, endeavoured, as well as he could, to conceal his reſentment: he found himſelf now obliged to raiſe a new army, and to act againſt him as an open enemy, and yet was both afraid and unwilling to do it. At length, having gathered a ſufficient number of forces, and come towards Jeruſalem, he reſolved once more to try to ſurpriſe him by ſome foul ſtratagem, before he ventured upon an open rupture. To this end he ſent ſome deputies to acquaint him, that he was not come to make war againſt him, but to treat of peace with him, and to invite him to a new interview. Judas came accordingly to the place agreed on, where their firſt greeting was in all appearance very friendly and peaceable; but having diſcovered his treacherous intent, he withdrew, and from that time refuſed to meet him any more. Nicanor then ordered his troops to advance towards Capharſalama, not far from Jeruſalem, where, being met by the Jewiſh army, a battle was fought, in which he loſt five thouſand men. But the Jews, finding themſelves unable to make head againſt the enemy's ſuperior forces, retired, ſome to the city of David, and ſome into the temple c. Nicanor then led his army ſtrait to Jeruſalem, and, getting upon the eminence of mount Sion, was addreſſed by ſome of the prieſts and heads of the people, who came in a ſubmiſſive manner to him, and ſhewed him from that place the ſacrifices which were then offered up in the temple for the proſperity of king Demetrius. But the exaſperated general, having caſt many inſolent and blaſphemous reflections on what he called their baſe ſuperſtition, ſwore the utter deſtruction of them and their temple, unleſs Judas was immediately delivered up to him. But Judas had happily put it out of their power, having betimes withdrawn himſelf into the land of Samaria with ſome of his faithful troops. However, it was in vain for the prieſts to urge this or any thing elſe in their own defence, to a man who was now determined to make them feel the effects of his reſentment, for having miſſed his blow. The poor prieſts, ſeeing an exaſperated enemy at the head of a powerful army, at the very gates of the temple, and their valiant protector forced to abandon them to his mercy, had no other recourſe but to their prayers and tears; whilſt Nicanor, ſtill bent rather upon ſtratagem than open war, bethought himſelf of a helliſh expedient to oblige the Jews to apoſtatize, both from their God and their brave deliverer d.

Year of the Flood, 2838. Before Chriſt, 161.

Ordered to renew the war.

Attempts to ſurpriſe Judas.

Threatens Jeruſalem.

THEY had at that time an aged member of their ſanhedrin, named Razis, a man highly eſteemed by the nation for his ſtrict piety and virtue, and whoſe inviolable fidelity to his religion and nation had gained him the title of father of the Jews. Nicanor, having heard ſo good a character of him, and that his example had preſerved numbers of his people from apoſtatizing, conceived a deſign either to force him to it by fair or foul means, or elſe to do a deſpight to the nation, by putting him to ſome cruel death. To this end he diſpatched five hundred of his ſoldiers to take and bring him to him. Theſe, finding his caſtle ſtrongly guarded, were endeavouring to break open the doors, or to force him out by ſetting it on fire, when the old man, after a long and ſtout defence, finding himſelf on the brink of being either taken or burnt, ruſhed on the point of his ſword, and pierced himſelf through. However, the wound not proving mortal, and he ſeeing the ſoldiers ruſhing into the houſe, he ran to the top of one of the turrets, and flung himſelf headlong down. This fall not having put an end to his life, he raiſed himſelf up, ran through the midſt of them to a neighbouring ſteep rock, leaving a rivulet of blood behind, which iſſued

c 1 Maccab. vii. 27, & ſeq. d Ibid. ver. 32, & ſeq.

out

out of his wounds, and having gained the top of it, he opened his wound with his hands, tore out his bowels, and flung them at his agaſhed enemies[e]. Thus died the brave old man, with an intrepidity rather to be admired than imitated. The Jews, however, have made no ſcruple to canoniſe him a martyr, though his death was rather that of a madman, or a deſperado. Kills himſelf.

WHILE this was doing at Jeruſalem, Nicanor, having heard that Judas was in the land of Samaria, marched againſt him with an army of thirty five thouſand men; and as he ſtill truſted more to his political ſtratagems, than to his ſtrength, he reſolved to attack him on the ſabbath, not doubting but they would, as they had formerly done, chuſe to be all murdered, rather than fight on that day. He was, however, aſſured of the contrary by ſome of that nation who were in his army, and who begged that he would pay a regard to that ſacred day, which the God of heaven had conſecrated to his ſervice. Nicanor aſked them, with a ſcornful taunt, Whether there was indeed a mighty God in heaven, who had ordered the ſanctification of the ſabbath? And being anſwered in the affirmative, he replied, And I, who am powerful upon earth, do command you to fight for the king your maſter, and to obey his orders. This blaſphemous arrogance, as well as his former threatnings againſt the temple, did not go long unpuniſhed; for whilſt he was incamped in the neighbourhood of Bethoron, Judas marched immediately againſt him with his three thouſand men, and incamped near Adaſa, a place about thirty furlongs diſtant from the enemy. The firſt thing he did was to encourage his little army with proper texts out of the ſacred books, and, to aſſure them further of the divine aſſiſtance, he acquainted them with a comfortable viſion which he had lately had, in which he ſaw Onias, the late worthy high-prieſt, and after him the prophet Jeremiah, interceding for the Jewiſh people, and that the latter had preſented him with a ſplendid ſword, and given him at the ſame time an aſſurance of a complete victory. This ſpeech had the deſired effect, and his men were on a ſudden fired with ſuch courage, that they routed the enemy on the very firſt onſet; for Nicanor being killed one of the firſt, his men were ſeized with a panic, threw their arms down, and ſought in vain for a ſhelter; for Judas purſuing them, and the Jews of the neighbouring cities hearing of this victory, ſtopping their flight, killed them all to a man, inſomuch, that there was not a ſingle perſon left to carry the news to Antioch. Nicanor attacks the Jews. Is defeated and ſlain.

[e] 2 MACC xiv. 37, & ſeq.

This battle was won on the thirteenth day of the month Adar, anſwering to our February; and on the next day, the body of Nicanor being found among the ſlain, Judas ordered his head and right hand, which he had ſo lately lifted up with threatening oaths againſt the temple, to be cut off, and carried in triumph to Jeruſalem; where, being arrived with his army, he cauſed them to be expoſed to the view of the Jews and Gentiles, reminding them at the ſame time, that thoſe were the head and hand of the profane Nicanor, who had ſworn the total deſtruction of their ſacred temple. His tongue he likewiſe ordered to be cut out, and minced, and to be thrown to the birds, and his head and hand to be hung up on ſome of the higheſt towers of that city. After the uſual rejoicings for their late ſucceſs, a public anniverſary was inſtituted by the ſanhedrin, to be kept by future generations on the thirteenth day of Adar, by the name of the day of Nicanor [f], which has been kept ever ſince.

This victory gave the Jewiſh nation ſome peaceful intermiſſion, and their enemies being juſtly terrified at the continual ſucceſſes of their leader, ſuffered him to return and take quiet poſſeſſion of the city, which his ſucceſſor was, however, forced to quit ſoon after to the then ſuperior power of the Syrian general and apoſtate Alcimus, who held it but a ſhort while, and for the laſt time, as the ſequel will preſently ſhew.

The Jews make alliance with Rome.

During this peaceful interval, Judas, always intent on the intereſt of his religion and nation, obſerving how powerful the Romans were now grown, and how faithfully they protected and aſſiſted their friends, reſolved to procure an alliance with them, which might prove a bulwark againſt the oppreſſive power of the Syrians. Eupolemus the ſon of John and Jaſon the ſon of Eleazar, who had been already ſent with ſucceſs to Seleucus Philopator, were likewiſe choſen for this embaſſy. Their propoſals were readily accepted by the Roman ſenate, and a decree was accordingly made and ingraven on copper, in order to be ſent to Jeruſalem; importing, that the Jews were thenceforth acknowledged as friends and allies of the Romans; that both nations ſhould be ready to ſuccour each other and the allies of either with all their power, and in no caſe ſhould aſſiſt their enemies: and for as much as Demetrius Soter had been complained againſt to the ſenate, as an oppreſſor of the Jewiſh nation, they ſent a letter to him, injoining him for the future to forbear all hoſtilities againſt them, and threatening him with an invaſion of his country by [f] 1 Macc. vii. ad ver. 50. 2 Macc. xv. 1, & ſeq. Vid. & Joseph, antiq l. xii. c. 17.

ſea

ſea and land, in caſe he did not comply with the purport of their decree [g]. This alliance was made in a lucky time; for whilſt it was tranſacting at Rome, Demetrius, having received the news of Nicanor's defeat and death, was ſending the right wing, that is to ſay, the flower (L) of his army, into Judæa, with [g] Idem, ibid.

(L) It was uſual in thoſe days for the king to command the right wing of their army, ſo that the beſt of their troops were generally placed there

With relation to the alliance above-mentioned, Joſephus obſerves (47), that it was the very firſt that ever the Jews made with Rome, which is very probable alſo, from the manner in which the author of the firſt book of Maccabees prefaces his account of it (48); for it appears from it, that the Jews till then knew but little of the Roman ſtate.

And here it will not be amiſs to inquire, how far the account which Joſephus gives of this alliance (49) is liable to the reproof which our learned Uſher gives it (50; that hiſtorian tells us, that the decree of the ſenate was written by Eupolemus and Jaſon, when Judas was high prieſt, and his brother Simon general of the Jews. That Judas died before Alcimus, and ſo could not be choſen by the people to ſucceed him in that dignity, as he there affirms a little before, is plain, not only from the firſt book of Maccabees, but even from Joſephus himſelf, who tells us in another place, that Alcimus had no ſucceſſor till ſeven years after his death (1), but that the ſuperſcription abovementioned was therefore forged by him, doth not ſo clearly follow. It is probable, on the contrary, that his finding it in thoſe very terms, in the Roman records which he was then conſulting, might lead him for the preſent into that miſtake, that Judas had been choſen to the high prieſthood after Alcimus's death

If it be aſked, how it came to be ſo worded, we anſwer, that the Jewiſh nation being known to have had a high-prieſt at the head of all their affairs, both religious and civil, ſuch an alliance could not be well contracted without one. On the other hand, Alcimus having been conſtantly rejected by reaſon of his apoſtacy, it is not likely, that they would make uſe ſo much as of his name in ſo public a tranſaction. What other expedient could then be found, but that Judas, who was then at the head of all affairs, ſhould take that title upon him, at leaſt in the tranſacting of this alliance?

(47) Antiq l. xii. c. 17. (48) Cap. viii. 1, & ſeq. (49) Antiq l. xii. ſub fin. cap. 17. (50) Sub. A. M. 3843. (1) Antiq. l. xx. c. 8.

We

with Bacchides and Alcimus at their head. It conſiſted of twenty thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, and with theſe Bacchides entered Galilee, and took the city of Maſeloth or Maſſadoth in the territories of Arbela, where he killed a great number of Jews. From thence they marched towards Jeruſalem, but being told that Judas was retired into the neighbourhood of Eleaſa, they went to attack him there. Judas had then but three thouſand men, and when theſe beheld the ſuperiority of the enemy's army, their hearts failed them ſo far, that only eight hundred of them ſtayed with him, and the reſt conveyed themſelves away, to the great regret of their valiant chief, who was now ſo ſorely preſt, that he had no time to get a new reinforcement, but muſt either fight or be cut in pieces. However, truſting in that ſuperior aſſiſtance which had accompanied him hitherto, he encouraged his men the beſt he could; a dreadful fight enſued, which laſted from morning till evening; and Judas obſerving that the enemy's right wing, commanded by Bacchides, was the ſtrongeſt, made a ſtout puſh at it, broke and purſued it as far as mount Azotus; but in the mean time, the left having quite ſurrounded him and his men, he was at length over-born by their numbers, and ſlain, after a long and vigorous defence; ſo that he fell down on a heap of his enemies, which he had killed round about him. As ſoon as the news of his death had reached Jeruſalem, the whole city was filled with the moſt lively ſor-Judas's death.

We might add, that it is not eaſy to gueſs, how the nation could be ſo long without a high prieſt; for ſetting aſide thoſe religious functions which were peculiar to that dignity, and which might, for ought we know, have been ſuſpended during this interval; it is plain, the ſanhedrin, or grand Jewiſh ſenate, could neither aſſemble nor make any authentic decrees without him; ſo that we muſt ſuppoſe, either that every thing went irregular, or that they choſe ſome perſon to that dignity; in which caſe, why might not the choice of the nation, or at leaſt of the heads of it, be deemed as valid at leaſt, as that of a heatheniſh king, or rather tyrant and uſurper? for ſuch the Jews deemed even the beſt foreign princes that ruled over them.

How the generalſhip came to be given in this inſcription, rather to Simon the third brother, than either to Judas, or to Jonathan the next in birth, can only be gueſſed at. Judas treating then with the Romans as high prieſt, might think the quality of general incompatible with it, and Simon might, for ſome ſignal exploit or other, have been at that time more famed than his brother.

One thing may be added, that this ſuppoſed inſcription might impiy no more in the Jewiſh hiſtorian, than that Eupolemus and Jaſon wrote, or ſent the written decree to Judas the high-prieſt, and to Simon the general.

row.

row. An universal mourning was made for him for some time, and in imitation of that which David made for Saul and Jonathan, they sung these lines of his, How is the mighty fallen? How is the preserver of Israel slain? However, his body did not fall into the hands of the enemy; for whether the Syrians, after this victory, which redounded less to their honour than a defeat, left the field of battle, or whether a truce was made for the burying of the dead, the author tells us, that it was taken and carried off by his two brothers, Jonathan and Simon, and buried in the sepulchre of his father at Modin [h]. Thus died the brave Jewish general, six years after his father Matthias, and was succeeded by his brother Jonathan. The Maccabitish historian adds, that the rest of his victorious wars were omitted, because they were too numerous; and Josephus, that he never departed from the precepts of his father, who injoined him never to shun any labours or hazards for the service of his country, and that he died on the third year of his executing the office of high-priest [i], which confirms what was observed in the last note; so that, for ought appears, his only mistake was in making him die so long after Alcimus.

THE news of his death was no sooner spread through Judæa, than it gave a new life to all the enemies of the Jews, so that the greatest part of those found themselves obliged, partly for want of a chief of known valour and conduct, and partly through a grievous famine, which then raged in the land, to acknowledge Bacchides their governor, and to submit themselves to him. Whilst therefore this general was taking all proper measures to secure his own government, some of the chief officers, that served under him, were ordered to make a diligent search after the principal friends and adherents of the Maccabees, and to put them to the most torturing deaths; insomuch, that this persecution did seem to exceed all that they had suffered since their return from Babylon, and caused as general a defection. Under these dismal circumstances, those few who retained still a love for their religion and country had recourse to Jonathan, surnamed Apphus, and desired him to take upon him the command of the Jewish forces, and to endeavour to stop the cruel progress of the Syrian general. Jonathan was easily prevailed upon, and was gathering what forces he could get. But Bacchides, being informed of it, and coming against him with a design to surprize and put him to death, forced him and his few Jonathan succeeds him.

[h] 1 MACCAB. ix. 1, & seq. ad 22. JOSEPH. antiq. l. xii. c. ult. [i] Id. ad fin.

followers

followers to retire into the deſerts of Teckoa, where they encamped near the lake Aſphar, being fenced by a large moraſs on the one ſide, by woods on the other, and the Jordan before him [k]. This ſituation, which he thought very advantageous to his handful of men, becauſe there was but one narrow way to come at them, proved the very reverſe, when they came to engage the enemy, as we ſhall ſoon ſee.

John killed by the Jambrians.

IN the mean time, as ſoon as he heard that Bacchides was in full march againſt him, his firſt care was to ſecure their goods and equipage, which were very numerous, till better times. The Nabathæans, as we obſerved before, were then at peace with them. John therefore, the brother of Jonathan, was ſent at the head of a convoy to go and depoſit them with them. But in the way he was ſurprized by the Jambrians (M), who iſſuing out of their city, fell upon him, ſlew him and his men, and carried away all their baggage. This injury did not long go unrequited. Jonathan being informed ſoon after that a great wedding was to be celebrated at Medaba, between one of the Jambrian chiefs and a daughter of a Canaanitiſh prince, or perhaps rather a prince of the Arabians now ſettled there, and having got notice of the day on which the bride was to be conducted to her new home, he and his men lay in ambuſh behind a hill; and as ſoon as the company, which was very numerous and of both ſexes, was come nigh enough, they fell upon them, killed them to the number of four hundred, and carried away their plunder to their camp.

Bacchides comes againſt the Jews.

As ſoon as Bacchides heard of this retaliation upon the Jambrians, he haſted his army, with a reſolution to attack the Jewiſh general on the ſabbath, at which Jonathan found himſelf in no ſmall diſtreſs. On the one hand, he was hemmed in on all ſides, and on the other his men were with difficulty prevailed upon to ſtand in their own defence, partly at the ſight of their ſuperior enemy, and partly out of reſpect to the day; whether they had forgot the reſolution and example of their late chiefs to the contrary, or whether they ſcrupled the validity of it. At length Jonathan, finding

[k] 1 MACCAB. ix. 23, ad 45. JOSEPH. antiq. l. xiii. c 1.

(M) Theſe were a tribe of the plundering Arabs, who lived then at Medaba, formerly one of the cities which the Moabites took from the tribe of Reuben (2), and afterwards the Arabs from them.

(2) Conf Joſh. xiii, 16. Iſaiah xv. 2. & Joſeph. ant. l. xiii. c. 1.

himſelf

himself preſſed by the enemy on one ſide, and on the other by the reluctancy of his men to engage them, addreſſed himſelf to the latter in the following ſhort, but pathetic ſpeech; "Come on, and let us fight for our lives; for it is not now "with us, as it was in time paſt; for you ſee plainly, that "the battle is both before and behind us, and the Jordan on "this, and the moraſs and the wood on that ſide. Neither "is there a place left for us to turn aſide to. Wherefore "cry ye now unto heaven that ye may be delivered out of "the hand of your enemies". As ſoon as he had done ſpeaking, his men, what through his encouragement, and what through deſpair, made a bold puſh at the enemy, and killed a good number of them on the firſt onſet. Bacchides all the while ſeemed to aim ſolely at Jonathan, which being perceived by him, he attempted to make a full and effectual blow at him, but was prevented by his addreſs. The Jews, finding themſelves at laſt unable to cope with ſuch an army, caſt themſelves one and all into the river (MM), and ſwam to the other ſide, after having killed about a thouſand, or, according to Joſephus, two thouſand of the enemy [1]. Jonathan put to flight.

[1] Id ibid.

(MM) Whoever compares the ſituation of theſe places with the abſtruſe and imperfect account which the author of it gives of this action, muſt confeſs, with the judicious Calmet *, that Jonathan muſt have croſſed the Jordan twice, inſtead of once, elſe he could never have had that river before, and Bacchides behind. For when he retired to Teckoa, the river muſt then have parted them, and he muſt have croſſed it again to come to Medeba to puniſh the Jambrians; for Medeba was on the eaſt ſide, and Teckoa, where they had encamped at firſt, was on the weſt ſide of that river.

Had he then croſſed it again, after this bloody expedition, which would have been the third time, he could not have had it before, and Bacchides behind him, unleſs we ſuppoſed that he alſo croſſed it either higher or lower, and ſo fetched a long compaſs about to incloſe him; in which caſe there would be three croſſings omitted, viz. two of Jonathan's and this of Bacchides's. But it is more probable, conſidering what haſte the latter was in to fall upon him, that he overtook him as they returned from Medeba, and before he could croſs again to return to Teckoa; and this may be the reaſon when they found themſelves overpowered, of their flinging themſelves into that river, and ſwimming acroſs it, in order to recover their camp, which might be ſo well ſituate and fortified, that it diſcouraged the Syrians from purſuing them further.

* Sub voce Jonathan I.K

Bacchides, now convinced that they would fight on the ſabbath, as well as on other days, did not think fit to purſue them further, but returned with his army to Jeruſalem, and there gave orders for the fortifying and gariſoning of ſuch places as were moſt likely to keep the Jews in awe, and oblige the Maccabitiſh party, either to ſubmit, or at leaſt to forbear all future attempts againſt him. Among theſe were Bethoron, Jericho, Emmaus, Bethel, Thimnatha, Bethzura, and ſome others, eſpecially the fortreſs of Acra, into which, beſides a new ſupply of men, arms and proviſions, he ſent the children of ſome of the principal Jews to be kept as hoſtages there, to prevent their parents and relations going over to Jonathan and his party. At the ſame time the apoſtate Alcimus, finding himſelf maſter of Jeruſalem, gave orders for demoliſhing the wall of the temple, which incloſed the court of the prieſts from that of the people (N), and which had been formerly built by the direction of the prophets Haggai and Zachary. But he had ſcarce began the work, before he was ſtruck with a dead palſey, which took his ſpeech from him, ſo that he died without being able to ſpeak a word, or to take any care of his houſe. After his death Bacchides, having by that time brought all Judæa into ſubjection, thought he had no further buſineſs there, but returned to Antioch, and left the Jews and heathens to live in peace there, which they did for about two years [m] (O).

Year of the Flood, 2139 Before Chriſt, 160.

[m] Iid ibid.

(N) Or more probably that which divided the court of the circumciſed from that of the uncircumciſed. For as his apoſtacy had made him incur the hatred of all the ſincere Jews, it is not unlikely, that he cauſed this partition wall to be pulled down to mortify them, and to ingratiate himſelf with the heathen and the renegadoes of his nation. However, the book of Maccabees calls it the wall of the inner court of the ſanctuary (3), and Joſephus (4) the wall of the old ſanctuary, and adds to it the works of the prophets.

(O) It may be alſo likely enough, that he was privately recalled by Demetrius; for that prince at this time ſtood in great need of the friendſhip of the Romans (5), and had probably received their letter, which ordered him to ceaſe all hoſtilities againſt the Jewiſh nation; ſo that he was forced to recal him, yet ſo privately, that the Jews ſhould not be too elated by it; and this may be the reaſon why neither Joſephus nor the book of Maccabees mention it.

(3) 1 Maccab. ix. 54. (4) Antiq l. xii, c. 17. (5) Vide Polyb. legat. 120. Jonathan

Jonathan and his party made the beſt of this ſhort interval to ſecure themſeves, ſo that they lived quietly and without any miſtruſt. This gave his enemies an opportunity to make afreſh attempt upon him, by inviting Bacchides to ſurpriſe and deſtroy the whole party, which they ſent him word might be done in one night. Demetrius, who had been by this time acknowledged king of Syria by the Romans, and had made a new alliance with them, having now nothing to fear from that ſide, was eaſily perſuaded to ſend Bacchides with a powerful army into Judæa. As ſoon therefore as this general was got there, he ſent letters to thoſe of his party, with orders to ſeize Jonathan and his men, and to bring them to him, as had been agreed before. This plot, however, had not been carried on with ſuch ſecrecy, but that vigilant chief had notice of it time enough, both to diſappoint it, and to puniſh thoſe traitors that had hatched it; for he came ſuddenly upon them, took fifty of the chief conſpirators and put them all to death; after which the reſt were ſoon diſperſed, and the whole deſign diſcomfited [n].

A plot againſt Jonathan.

AFTER this ſignal eſcape, Jonathan, being informed of Bacchides's coming againſt him, and finding himſelf by far too weak to withſtand ſo great a force retired to Bethbaſi, or, as Joſephus calls it, Bethlagan, a place ſtrongly ſituate in the deſert of Jericho, which he and his brother Simon fortified, and filled with all neceſſary proviſions for a ſiege. Bacchides came, according to his expectation, and laid cloſe ſiege to the place with his numerous army, which he had increaſed with all his adherents in Judæa, whom he ſummoned to repair to him thither. As the ſiege was like to laſt long, Jonathan, after a vigorous defence, left the place under the care of his brother, and with a ſmall brigade went out to reinforce his army; and croſſing the country, defeated Odonarches and his brethren, and the ſons of Phaſiron, in their tents. Theſe we ſuppoſe were part of the beſieging hoſt. From thence he went on, attacked, and annoyed other parts of their camp, and forced Bacchides to come to their aſſiſtance; which being perceived by Simon from within, he made a vigorous ſally, burnt their engines, then falling upon his army, diſcomfited it on one ſide, whilſt his brother did the ſame on the other. Bacchides vext at the heart to meet with ſuch a defeat, where he expected an eaſy victory, vented his rage on thoſe who had invited him out of Syria, and put many of them to death, reſolved to raiſe the ſiege and to return to Antioch. The only difficulty was how to do it, if not with honour, at leaſt with as little diſgrace as might be; which as ſoon as Jonathan underſtood, he ſent him ſome meſſengers with propoſals for a peace; which were gladly accepted, and ſoon after ratified by both parties. By theſe articles all priſoners were to be releaſed on both ſides, which was accordingly done; and Bacchides, having ſworn never more to act hoſtily againſt Jonathan, departed into Syria, and punctually kept his oath to him as long as he lived [o]. It ſeems likewiſe, that by theſe articles Jonathan was left, if not governor, at leaſt deputy governor, of Judæa; for as ſoon as Bacchides was gone, he went and ſettled in Michmaſh (P), where he judged Iſrael, pretty near like the antient Judges. He began with making a ſevere example of all the apoſtate Jews, who were the cauſe of all the wars and perſecutions that fell upon their nation, from the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes downwards to that time. After this he ſet about reforming the Jewiſh church and ſtate. So that from this time Judæa began to enjoy a perfect peace and free exerciſe of their religion, the happy effects of their general's valour and piety [p].

Jonathan beſieged by Bacchides.

Defeats him.

[n] 1 MACCAB. ubi ſupra. v. 57. ad 61. JOSEPH. ubi ſupra.

Makes peace with him.

Judges the Jews.

Soon after this, the troubles that happened in Syria, and of which we have already ſpoken in a former volume [†], gave the Jews a fair opportunity of wholly recovering their liberty, and not only of raiſing themſelves into a ſtate of independency, either from that kingdom, or that of Egypt; but of being highly courted by both. But, above all, Demetrius, who ſo feelingly knew their ſtrength and bravery, had moſt cauſe to uſe all poſſible means to prevent their declaring for his competitor Alexander Balas. To effect which, he wrote a letter to Jonathan full of expreſſions of the ſincereſt friendſhip and confidence, and in which he gave him full power to levy what forces he ſhould think fit, and to cauſe new arms to be fabricated, and declared him his new friend and ally. In the end, he added an order for ſetting at liberty all the hoſtages which had been ſent by Bacchides into the fortreſs of Acra, and had been detained there ever ſince, notwithſtanding the late peace concluded with him. As ſoon as Jonathan had re-

Year of the Flood 2846. Before Chriſt 153.

Demetrius's letter to Jonathan

[o] Id. ibid & ſeq. [p] Maccab ubi ſup. verſ 62. ad fin. antiq. l. xiii. c. 2. [†] Vol. VIII. p. 598, & ſeq.

(P) This town was in the tribe of Benjamin eaſt of Bethaven (6), about nine miles from Jeruſalem (7), and between it and Gibeon. Euſebius tells us in the place laſt quoted, that it was ſtill very conſiderable in his time.

(6) 1 Sam. xiii. 5. (7) Loc. Hebr. ſub voce.

ceived

ceived the letter, he brought it to Jeruſalem, cauſed it to be read before that gariſon, and demanded the hoſtages to be delivered unto him according to the tenor of it. The people, ſeeing how great a power he was now inveſted with, dared not to heſitate about the matter, but immediately complied with his demand; after which Jonathan found his army increaſe exceedingly, there being now no check nor danger in joyning him. On the other hand, thoſe gariſons which Bacchides had left in ſeveral ſtrong places of Judæa above mentioned, not finding themſelves ſtrong enough to withſtand him, forſook them and fled. Thoſe only of Bethzura and Acra, which were moſtly filled with apoſtate Jews, not daring to follow their example, leſt they ſhould be purſued and meet with their juſt deſerts, reſolved to ſtand it out to the laſt, and either ſurrender upon ſafe terms, or to die ſword in hand. Jonathan, however, did not think fit to beſiege them immediately, but went to Jeruſalem, where his preſence was more required, and there cauſed the repairs both of the city and temple to be forthwith ſet about, fixing his abode in that city to ſee the work more effectually finiſhed [q].

WHEN Alexander underſtood what a powerful friend Jonathan was like to prove to the ſide he ſhould declare himſelf for, and the favours which Demetrius had lately bribed him with, he reſolved to outbid him and to draw him to his intereſt. He ſent him a moſt obliging letter (Q), in which he beſtowed the high-prieſthood on him, and accompanied it with rich preſents, and among them a purple robe and a golden crown [r]. Jonathan readily accepted of them, put on the Alexander's letter to him.

Jonathan made high-prieſt.

[q] 1 MACCAB. x. 10, & ſeq. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 3, & 4. [r] 1 MACCAB. ibid. ver. 17, & ſeq. Ant. ubi ſupra, c 5.

(Q) The purport of it was to this effect: King Alexander to "his brother Jonathan, &c Being informed of your power and va- "lour, and that you are worthy of our friendſhip, we conſtitute "you high prieſt of your nation, and it is our pleaſure that you "be inrolled in the number of the king's friends To this end "we have ſent you a purple robe and a golden crown, not doubt- "ing a ſuitable return from you for our affection and friend- "ſhip (8).

We have often obſerved in the courſe of this hſtory, that the purple wa a mark of the greateſt dignity next to the royal one; it was eſteemed ſuch among the Jews, Perſians, Macedonians, &c. and thoſe that wore it were called the king's friends, and implied the ſame as the king's couſins here with us.

(8) Joſeph. antiq. l. xiii. c. 5.

prieſtly

prieſtly veſtments, on the feaſts of tabernacles [r], in the ninth year of his government (R), and in the ſeventh month of that year. However, as he would not ſeem wholly to receive that dignity from a prince, whoſe right to the Syrian crown was ſo juſtly ſuſpected, he got himſelf choſen to it by the ſuffrages of the Jewiſh nation; and indeed not without a ſpecious right to it; for being, as we hinted in the laſt note, of the family of Joarib, and conſequently of the firſt claſs of the Aaronic race, that was ſufficient to intitle him to it upon the failure of that of Jozadac, which had enjoyed it ever ſince their return from Babylon; and we don't read of any ſurvivor of it except Onias, who was then in Egypt, and had there, if not apoſtatiſed, at leaſt made a conſiderable ſchiſm, by ſetting up a new temple, altar, and prieſthood there. As ſoon therefore as Jonathan was inveſted with his new dignity, his firſt care was to raiſe new forces, and to cauſe a great number of arms to be made, reſolved to ſide with Alexander. When Demetrius found that his competitor was likely to deprive him of ſo important an ally, he ſpared neither favour nor promiſes to prevent it: he ſent him a long letter, couched in the moſt obliging terms, and wherein he artfully diſguiſed his reſentment for his defection, under the Demetrius's ſecond letter to him.

[r] Iid ibid.

(R) Joſephus (9) ſays in the fourth year after the deceaſe of his brother Judas; but we have already ſhewn in a late note his miſtake in making this laſt outlive and ſucceed Alcimus, the contrary of which appears from the book of the Maccabees (10), which expreſsly mentions the inſtallation of Jonathan to have been on the hundred and ſixtieth year of the Grecian kingdom, which anſwers to the three thouſand eight hundred and fifty-ſecond year of the world, and one hundred and fifty three before Chriſt (11).

We have likewiſe ſhewed at the cloſe of the laſt ſection †. that Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees, was deſcended from the prieſtly family of Joarib, though not from that of Jaddua or Jaddus, the high-prieſt, whoſe lineal heir and ſucceſſor was the Onias whom we lately mentioned to have retired into Alexandria, and there built a temple for the uſe of the Egyptian Jews.

Jonathan, if not his brother Judas, was therefore the firſt of the family who enjoyed the pontifical dignity, which continued in it through a number of ſucceſſors till Herod's time, who, from hereditary, made it venal and arbitrary, as we ſhall ſhew in the ſequel.

(9) Ibid. (10) Conf. 1. Macc. x. 21. & ix. 3. 28, & 54. (11) Vid. Uſſ ann. & the Marg. of the Macc. in loc: † Vol. IX. p. 6. 12. (K).

greateſt

greateſt profeſſions of confidence in his friendſhip and loyalty. In acknowledgment of which, and to bind him ſtill faſter to his intereſt, he promiſed him a general relaxation of all arrears, an exemption from future tribute, impoſts, or taxes, a free exerciſe of their religion, with many other conceſſions and privileges, vaſtly exceeding thoſe which Alexander had made to him, and too great indeed to be really deſigned by that monarch: at leaſt the memory of the many miſchiefs and perſecutions, which they had ſo lately ſuffered under him, made them ſuſpect the ſincerity of them; and indeed ſuch was the character of that prince, and the preſent ſituation of his affairs, that they might well exort ſuch exorbitant promiſes from him, without any real intention to perform them. However, whether through reſentment or diffidence, Jonathan choſe rather to enter into an alliance with his competitor, and diſclaimed all future friendſhip with a man who had given them ſo many feeling proofs of his hatred to their nation. So that from this time they ſtuck cloſe to Alexander's intereſt [t], and it was lucky for them that they did ſo, ſince Demetrius was ſoon after defeated and killed by him, as we have ſeen in a former volume *.

Suſpected of inſincerity.

The new monarch, however, having by that deciſive battle made himſelf maſter of the Syrian crown, forgot not to expreſs his gratitude to the Jewiſh chief; he invited him ſoon after to his nuptials, to which Jonathan went with a numerous retinue, and was received with great marks of friendſhip and eſteem. During his ſtay at Ptolemais, where they were celebrated, ſome diſaffected Jews came to exhibit ſome accuſations againſt him: but the king, reſolved not to hear any thing againſt his friend, cauſed a proclamation to be made through the city, expreſsly forbidding any ſuch complaint to be brought before him. To mortify his enemies the more, he cauſed him to ſit by him cloathed in purple, confirmed all his former grants to him, and made him generaliſſimo of Judæa, and gave him ſome other titles and government in his kingdom (S); all which did caſt ſuch a damp upon his accuſers,

Year of the Flood, 2849. Before Chriſt, 150.

Jonathan's reception at Ptolemais

[t] Iid. ibid. * Vol. VIII. p. 602.

(S) The book of Maccabees ſays, that he made him one of the Malabarchas, which our verſion after the vulgate renders a duke, ſome critics lord high ſteward, others lord chief ſewer; which offices, and ſome others of the like nature, are ſtill held by the electors of Germany. But it is more likely, as Grotius in another place ſeems fers, that they ſneaked away for fear of further miſchief. Jonathan, on the other hand, having made ſome conſiderable preſents to the king and queen, and to their court, returned into Judæa [u], highly ſatisfied with his reception, and much more with his choice of ſuch an ally. From this time the Jewiſh nation became more and more conſiderable, not only in Judæa, where they enjoyed every branch of liberty, whether religious or civil; but in other countries alſo, and particularly in Egypt; where Ptolemy Philometor and his ſiſter and wife Cleopatra raiſed many of them to conſiderable poſts both at court and in the army, intruſted them with the keeping of their principal fortreſſes, and had given the command of their army to Onias and Doſitheus. Theſe two, if we may believe Joſephus [w], ſeem to have wholly ingroſſed the king's favour during his whole reign. But Onias could not be ſatisfied with it, whilſt he ſaw himſelf deprived of the dignity of the Jewiſh high-prieſthood, and of the pleaſure of performing the functions of that ſupreme dignity, which his birth intitled him to. Since therefore there were no hopes that Jonathan would ever yield to him that of Jeruſalem, he had no other way to make himſelf amends for it, but by ſetting up a new one in Egypt; and his great credit with the king and queen did eaſily procure him the liberty of doing it. But as this tranſaction did no further concern the Jews of Judæa, to which we confine ourſelves, than as it made a great ſchiſm with them, we ſhall relate it in the margin (T).

Jews in Egypt highly eſteemed.

A Jewiſh temple built in Egypt.

By

[u] 1 Macc. ab. ibid. ver. 59. ad 66. Antiq ubi ſupra. [w] Antiq ubi ſupra, c. 6. Cont. Apion. l. ii. See alſo, Vol. IX. p. 106.

ſeems to have proved it (12), that it meant ſome higher place than an office in the king's houſe, viz the government of ſome tribe or province in the kingdom.

(T) This edifice which was built after the model of that of Jeruſalem, but neither ſo large nor ſo ſumptuous, the reader may ſee deſcribed in Joſephus (1). It was ſurrounded with a very ſtrong ſtone wall, and had the altar of incenſe and burnt offerings, &c. like that in Judæa; only, inſtead of the ſeven-branch candleſtick, Onias contented himſelf with a ſtately golden lamp, which hung from the roof by a chain of the ſame metal.

The place he pitched upon was the ruins of an antient Egyptian temple, within the nome of Heliopolis; which being therefore pol-

(12 Comment in Matth. xix. 23. (1) Antiq. l. xiii. c. 6. l. xiv. c. 14. l. xviii. c. 20. Bell. Jud. l. vii. c. 30.

luted

By this time Alexander having, partly by his negligence and debaucheries, and partly by the tyranny and cruelties of his favourite Ammonius, as it were, invited young Demetrius out of his retirement in Cnidos, to come and recover the crown from him †, Apollonius, then governor of Cœle-Syria and Paleſtine, revolted to him, whilſt Jonathan, rememebring his late alliance and obligations, ſtuck cloſe to Alexander's intereſt. Apollonius, therefore, having got a conſiderable army together, marched againſt him as far as Jamnia; but not daring to advance farther into the mountainous parts of Judæa, for fear of loſing the benefit of his cavalry, he ſent him a daring meſſage to come and fight him in the plain Year of the Flood, 2851. Before Chriſt, 148.

† See Vol. VIII. p. 603, & ſeq.

luted, gave no ſmall ſcandal to the Jews there, who were moreover very ſtrenuous againſt the ſetting up any temple againſt that of Jeruſalem, as being expreſsly contrary to the Moſaic law. To remove theſe two ſcruples, Onias trumped up a prophecy out of Iſaiah (2), importing, that an altar ſhould be ſet up unto the Lord in the midſt of the land of Egypt, and alluding to the times of the goſpel, which he applied to this new edifice he was about to build; and whereas one of the Egyptinn cities there mentioned is called הַחֶרֶס עִיר, hair hacheres in the text, which ſignifies the city of the ſun, though the keri or margin reads it עִיר הַהֲרֵסֶת, hair heres, the city of deſtruction (3); Onias took it in the former ſenſe, and ſo is ſuppoſed to have made choice of the territory of Heliopolis, as if it had been alluded to by the prophet (4). Though the laſt quoted author adds another reaſon, viz. his being governor of that diſtrict, and having built a city in it, which he had peopled with Jews, and called by his name Onion.

When he had once removed theſe two difficulties, he did not want for prieſts and levites to officiate under him, ſo that the divine ſervice was afterwards performed in this new temple in the ſame manner as it was at Jeruſalem, till both were deſtroyed by the ſame Roman emperor (5).

However, thoſe prieſts, who had once officiated in the Egyptian, were never ſuffered to do ſo in the Jewiſh, but were, if we may believe the talmudiſts (6), looked upon as guilty of the ſame ſchiſm with thoſe who had ſacrificed on the high places, and as ſuch were only admitted to the very loweſt ſervices. They received their elemoſynary ſtipends out of the revenue of the temple, but were excluded from eating any of its holy things.

(2) Iſaiah xix 18, 19. (3) Vid. Munſter in loc. (4) Scaliger. in Chronol Euſeb. Prid Connect ſub an 149. (5) Vid. Joſeph. Bell Judaic. l. vii c. 30. (6) Vid. Miſhn. tract. Minchoth, c 13.

Jonathan challenged by Apollonius.

country. Jonathan readily accepted the challenge, and marched from Jeruſalem to Joppa at the head of ten thouſand men, and in his way was met by his brother Simon with a reinforcement. The town being gariſoned by the troops of Apollonius ſhut their gates againſt the Jewiſh general, and obliged him to take it by ſiege, which he quickly did, and almoſt in full ſight of the enemies army. As ſoon as Apollonius perceived it, he came againſt him with eight thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, leaving a thouſand more of theſe behind to ſurprize the Jews on the rear, whilſt he atacked them in front, and ſo made a feint, as if he was marching with the former ſouthward towards Azotus. Jonathan came out as he expected, and he, facing about, fell upon him, not doubting but his ſtratagem would gain him a complete victory. But he ſoon found his project diſcomfited by the experienced Jewiſh general; for having drawn up his army in the figure of an oblong ſquare, not unlike the Macedonian phalanx, his brave troops bore the brunt of the battle on both ſides with unuſual firmneſs till the evening, when Jonathan, obſerving the enemies horſe to be quite ſpent, ruſhed on the ſudden upon the foot which was now deſtitute of their cavalry, and totally routed them. The greateſt part of them fled to Azotus, and ſheltered themſelves in the temple of Dagon, whither the Jewiſh army purſued them; and having made themſelves maſters of the town, ſet it on fire temple and all. The number of the ſlain, whether by the ſword, or the flames, amounted to eight thouſand. From Azotus Jonathan went and plundered ſome other neighbouring towns; only that of Aſcalon, which met him with preſents and compliments of ſubmiſſion, was ſpared, after which they returned to Jeruſalem loaden with rich plunder.

Defeats him.

Alexander's gratitude to him.

Alexander, ſoon after hearing of Jonathan's faithfulneſs and victory, ſent him a preſent of a rich buckle or claſp, ſuch as thoſe only of the royal family uſed to wear, and which faſtened their purple mantle to the ſhoulder: he gave him moreover the city and territory of Ecron, and ſome other marks of his eſteem [x].

On Philometor's coming with his army into Paleſtine, on pretence to ſuccour his ſon-in-law, but in reality to diſpoſſeſs him of his kingdom, whether to ſeize it for himſelf, as the author of the Maccabees pretends [y], or, which is more likely from the ſequel, in favour of young Demetrius; ſome of the enemies of the Maccabees tried to render them odious to him, by ſhewing him the devaſtations they had lately made, particularly larly the the ruins of Azotus and of the temple of Dagon, and the carcaſes of thoſe they had ſlain, and which were ſtill ſtinking above ground. But that prince, whatever his reaſons were, could not be induced to ſhew any reſentment againſt them for it. On the contrary, he laid all the blame of it upon Apollonius; and when Jonathan came to pay him a viſit at Joppa with a numerous retinue, he met with a kind reception from him, accompanied him to the river Eleutherus, and returned to Jeruſalem [z].

[x] Maccab. ibid. ver. 74. ad fin. [y] Ibid. c. xi. 1. & ſeq.

THE reader may remember, how this prince, having given the kingdom of Syria and his daughter Cleopatra from Alexander to young Demetrius, ſurnamed Nicanor, died of the wounds he received in the laſt battle, before he could well ſettle him on his throne. Jonathan therefore took this opportunity, Egypt being then imbroiled in a civil war about the ſucceſſion, and neither able nor inclined to aſſiſt the new Syrian king, to begin the ſiege of Acra, which was ſtill gariſoned by Syrian troops, and was a great check to, and always ready to annoy, the Jews, going to and from Jeruſalem. He wanted neither forces nor engines to form it in the beſt manner; but in the height of the ſiege, complaint having been made of it to the young king, he was forced to leave it to appear before him at Ptolemais. However, he gave orders that it ſhould be carried on with the ſame vigour, as if no ſuch ſummons had been ſent to him; and taking with him ſome of the moſt conſiderable prieſts and elders of his nation, came to the court, where he pleaded his cauſe ſo well before that prince, and backed it with ſuch rich preſents, that he was received into his favour and friendſhip, and quite diſcomfited his accuſers, who were ſent away with diſgrace. After this, Nicanor confirmed him in his pontifical dignity, inrolled him in the higheſt place among his friends, and, for the annual tribute of three hundred talents, releaſed, not only Judæa, but alſo the three toparchies of Lydda, Apharema, and Ramatha (U), from all future taxes whatſoever [a].

Jonathan beſieges Acra.

Jonathan

[z] 1 MACCAB. xi. 4, & ſeq. See Vol. VIII. p. 606, & ſeq.
[a] 1 MACC. Ibid. ver. 20, & ſeq JOSEPH. Ant. lib. xiii. c. 8.

(U) Theſe three with their territories had been diſmembered from Samaria, ſome time before, and joined to Judæa; and the late Demetrius, in his courting letter to Jonathan, confirmed to him the poſſeſſion and immunities of them (13); and now the preſent king renews the ſame grant, and allots the revenues of it towards

(13) Vid. 1 Macc x. 30.

Jonathan upon his return to Jeruſalem doubled his ſtrength and vigour againſt the fortreſs; but finding that it was like to hold out long and to coſt him dear, he bethought himſelf of procuring an order from the king for the evacuation both of that and ſome other places, from which he complained to him the gariſons were ſtill annoying the Jews. He choſe a lucky juncture for ſending this requeſt: for Demetrius having a little before diſbanded his troops, had given occaſion to that revolt which Tryphon raiſed at Antioch, and ſpoken of in a former volume *. He was therefore glad to grant it to him, upon condition he ſhould aſſiſt him with ſome of his forces to quell the rebels; and we have ſeen there, how effectually the three thouſand men, which he ſent him, did it, and at the ſame time retaliated to the Antiochians the many cruelties which thoſe of their own nation had formerly ſuffered from the Syrians, both in Judæa and out of it [b]. Demetrius, however, inſtead of performing his promiſe to Jonathan, broke even thoſe which he had made to him at Ptolemais, and began to inſiſt on his paying all the taxes and cuſtoms which he had remitted to him at that interview. But it was not long before a new inſurrection, in which he was driven out of his kingdom by Antiochus, the ſon of Alexander, made him repent of his perfidy to the Jews, and of his tyranny to his own ſubjects.

Demetrius's treachery to the Jews punished.

Antiochus mounts the Syrian throne. Year of the Flood, 2857. Before Chriſt, 144.

THE new king did not forget to ſecure the Jewiſh general to his intereſt; he confirmed to him all the former grants, and added ſome others to them; and among them he made his brother Simon general of all his forces, and governor of all the ſea-coaſts, from the ladder of Tyre to the frontiers of Egypt, upon condition, that thoſe two brothers ſhould declare for him. Jonathan was eaſily prevailed upon to forſake his old treacherous ally, and to accept of the offers of the new one: he ſent him immediately an embaſſy to thank him for his favours, the maintainance of the ſervice of the temple, and of the prieſts in duty (14).

* See Vol. IX. p 8, & ſeq. [b] 1 Macc. xi. ver. 41, & ſeq.

The reader may ſee the letter which he ſent to Laſthenes in favour of the Jews in the place laſt quoted. He there ſtyles that Cretan general his father, becauſe he had aſſiſted him in the recovery and preſerving of his crown; and commands him to ſend a copy of his letter to the Jewiſh general, to be ſet up on ſome eminent place of the temple, to be peruſed by all comers.

(14) Ibid. xi. 22. ad 30. Ant. l. xiii. c. 8. ad fin.

vours, and to assure him of his best services. In pursuance of which, having obtained a commission for raising a good army, the two Jewish generals put themselves at the head of it, crossed the Jordan, and defeated Demetrius's troops that were sent to make a diversion in Galilee. In this expedition, Jonathan was in imminent danger of being cut in pieces by the enemy: he had incamped his army near the lake of Geneza-reth, and was advancing early one morning towards Azor. In his march he fell unexpectedly into an ambush, which had been placed among the defiles of the mountains to surprize him. As soon as he perceived his danger, he disposed his men the best he could for a brave defence; but the greatest part of them, being seized with a panic, forsook him and fled; so that he was left with only fifty resolute fellows, and two of his commanding officers, Mattathias and Judas. With these he faced about, and fought so desperately, that the enemy began to give way; which being perceived at a distance by his runaways, they rallied again to him, and renewed the fight with such vigour, that they gained a complete victory, and pursued the Demetrians to their very camp at Cadesh. They killed of them about three thousand men [c]; after this Jonathan sent his brother to go and besiege Bethzura, which had till then been garisoned by heathens and renegado-Jews, whilst himself went and secured some of the principal cities of that province; particularly that of Ascalon, which opened its gates to him; that of Gaza, which he forced to surrender, and, in a word, all the towns from thence to Damascus. Simon on his side, having made himself master of Bethzura, freed that neighbourhood from the continual insults of that garison, and returned to Jerusalem, whither his brother came also presently after.

Jonathan falls into an ambush.

Fights desperately and beats the enemy.

THESE successes of the two brothers abroad, had cast such a damp on their enemies at home, that they found all things in quietness at their return. However Jonathan did not think fit to trust to the gratitude of the new king, to whom he had done such signal services; but set about means of preserving the peace and liberty of his nation, on the foot he had so happily established it. To this end he sent a new embassy to Rome to renew his alliance with the senate, which was done with great readiness on their part. In their return, his embassadors were ordered to do the same with the Lacedæmonians and other Grecian states, with whom they were in friendship, which they did with the same ease and success. In their letter to the Lacedæmonians, the substance of which the reader er will find in the margin (W), they reminded them of their letter formerly sent to their high-priest (Onias III.) by Arius their king †, and inclosed a copy of it with their own. But whilst these alliances were transacting, news was brought to him, that the Demetrian generals, whom he had lately defeated, were advancing towards him with a more numerous army. To prevent therefore their entering into Judæa, he marched out with utmost expedition at the head of his forces, resolved, if possible, to attack them in their own territories. He made such good speed, that he reached Amathis, a place on the frontiers of Syria, and incamped over-against them. Their design it seems was to surprize his camp on the following night, but Jonathan having timely notice of it, kept his men under arms all that night, ready to receive them; which being perceived by the enemy, they retired immediately into their camp; where having lighted a good number of fires, to † See Vol. VI. p. 403, & note.

Alliance with Rome renewed.

And with Sparta.

[c] Ibid. ver. 67, & seq. JOSEPH. ubi supra, c. 9.

(W) Jonathan, high-priest, with the elders and priests of the Jewish nation, unto the ephori, senate, and people of Lacedæmon, their brethren, greeting:

" Whereas we have found, among our records, a letter long " since written by Arius, one of your kings, to Onias, formerly " high-priest of the Jews, wherein he expressed your friendship " and affinity to our nation, which affinity we acknowledged with " greater honour, because we find it confirmed by our sacred " books: We have sent these our deputies unto you to renew the " said alliance and brotherly union with you, lest we should be " thought unmindful of it, by reason of the long interval which " has elapsed since the receipt of it.

" Be it therefore known unto you, that we have had you al- " ways in our minds, both in our solemn festivals and in our pray- " ers and sacrifices, as our brethren and allies, rejoycing at your " successes, and beholding with pleasure the prosperity and " splendor of your republic. As for us, though we thought our- " selves honoured by your friendship and alliance, yet have hi- " therto forborn to be chargeable or troublesome to you during all " the grievous wars and persecutions which we have been exposed " to from our tyrannous neighbours; but now, since heaven has " blest us with better times, we have thought fit to send to you " Numenius and Antipater, our late deputies to the Roman senate, " with fresh offers of our best services to you, not doubting but " they will be as heartily accepted of by you, as they are tender- " ed by us (15)".

(15) Vid. Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c 9.

conceal

conceal their flight, they forſook it, and marched off unperceived. When the riſing morning gave the Jews notice of their flight, Jonathan ſtrove in vain to purſue them; they were already got far enough beyond the Eleutherus, before he could reach that river. To make himſelf therefore ſome amends for his diſappointment, he fell upon ſome Demetrian Arabs, whom he defeated, and carried off a conſiderable plunder, and from thence paſſing through Damaſcus, making ſtill ſome excurſions all the way, he arrived at Jeruſalem [d].

WHILST theſe things were doing, Simon, who had been left to take care of Judæa and Galilee, kept a watchful eye over thoſe places he had lately ſecured to Antiochus in the laſt of thoſe provinces. He went and took a review of the gariſons of Aſcalon, and other fortreſſes in that neighbourhood; and being told that the citizens of Joppa were inclined to receive a Demetrian governor and ſome Syrian forces, he went and took it, and put a ſtrong gariſon of his own in it, and returned to join his brother at Jeruſalem. Here they called a council, wherein it was reſolved, that all the forts and ſconces of Judæa ſhould be forthwith repaired; that new ones ſhould be erected where they were wanted; that the wall of the city ſhould be rebuilt; and a new one be raiſed between mount Sion and the reſt of the city, of ſuch a height, as might effectually cut off all communication between them; to the end that the gariſon of Acra, being thereby deprived from all future ſupply, might be the ſooner either forced to ſurrender, or be ſtarved in it. All theſe wholeſome reſolutions were immediately put in execution; Jonathan undertook to overſee the work within the city, and Simon that without. A ſtrong and high wall was accordingly built by the former, which reached quite cloſe to the old one that was then repairing, and made up that place which was called Chaphenatha, towards the eaſt of the city, near the brook Cedron. This did ſo effectually incloſe that mount, that the gariſon was not long after forced to ſurrender. Simon on his part went and repaired all the old forts, and added to them that of Adiba, or Adiaba, in the region of Sephala, weſtward of Eleutheropolis. By all which Judæa was now in a better condition for defence, than it had ever been ſince their return from captivity [e].

Jeruſalem new fortified.

BY this time Jonathan had governed the Jewiſh ſtate near ſeventeen years, with great wiſdom and ſucceſs, when he Jonathan treacherouſly murdered by Tryphon.

[d] 1 MACC. xi. 62, ad fin. Antiq l. xiii, c. 9.

[e] 1 MACC. xii. Antiq. ibid.

was

was unwarily decoyed into the perfidious Tryphon's power, and ſoon after murdered by him. That traitor knew but too well how vain it would be to attempt to wrench the crown from the young monarch, whilſt he had ſo faithful and powerful an ally; and therefore ſpared neither promiſes, oaths, nor any other treacherous means to perſuade him to diſband his numerous army, now become, as he pretended, uſeleſs and burdenſome. Jonathan, too eaſily prevailed upon to take that deſtructive ſtep, was ſoon after as unhapply decoyed into the city of Ptolemais, attended only by one thouſand of his men, who were all treacherouſly murdered by his orders, and their chief only ſpared till the villain had obtained a large ſum from Judæa under the name of a ranſom, and cauſed him to be maſſacred as ſoon as he had got it into his hands *. So that Jonathan died as much a ſacrifice to his too generous credulity, as to his unſhaken fidelity to Antiochus. As ſoon as the news of his being ſeized, and kept priſoner, and of the murder of his men, reached Jeruſalem, the whole city was in the utmoſt conſternation. They doubted not, but the perfidious murderer would ſoon be at their gates, and be joined by all the heathens and apoſtate Jews, whom the bravery of their late leader had ſuppreſſed hitherto; and indeed their fears were but too well grounded; for Tryphon was making great preparations to march into Judæa, with a full reſolution to extirpate, if poſſible, the whole nation; and all their enemies who had been till now kept in awe, but had received a kind of new life at the news of Jonathan's being in his hands, had began to expreſs an impatient deſire to ſee the land once more invaded, and threatened the Jews with a ſevere retaliation.

Simon was now the only one of the ſons of Mattathias that was left, and the courage and conduct which he had ſhewed hitherto made him looked upon as the only fit perſon to ſucceed his brother. An aſſembly was therefore called at the outer court of the temple, in which he was by their unanimous conſent deſired to take the command upon him; which he readily did, not only as he was the next in ſucceſſion, but that he might find ſome means, either of releaſing, or, at the worſt, of revenging his worthy brother. To diſſipate, therefore, as much as poſſible, that fear which he obſerved in their countenances, he addreſſed himſelf to them in words to this effect: You are not ignorant how bravely my father, brothers, and I, have fought in the defence of our laws and religion, our temple and our nation. They have already

Simon ſucceeds his brother.

* See Vol. IX. p. 7, & ſeq.

already ſacrificed their lives for that glorious cauſe, and I am now the only ſurviving one to maintain it. God forbid I ſhould value my own more than they did theirs, as long as I ſee you groaning under any oppreſſion. Behold me then as ready and willing as they to undertake the defence of our nation and temple, of our wives and of our children. This ſpeech was received with univerſal applauſe, and the people, having in great meaſure recovered their drooping ſpirits, proclaimed him their commander and high-prieſt (X), promiſing at the ſame time to follow him through all difficulties and dangers in defence of their religion and country [g].

As ſoon as he was inſtalled in his new dignity, his firſt care was to finiſh the fortifications of the city with all ſpeed, and to get together an army ſufficient to make head againſt that of Tryphon, who was in full march againſt him. But when that traitor came to find the Jews in ſuch a brave condition of defence, he contented himſelf with ſending him word that he had ſeized his brother for a debt of a hundred talents, which he owed him; and that, if he would ſend them to him, and his two ſons as hoſtages, their father ſhould be immediately releaſed. Simon eaſily ſaw through this treacherous pretence, but dared not refuſe his demand, for fear of bringing ſome unjuſt ſuſpicion on himſelf, as if he was the cauſe of his brother's detention. In the mean time the Syrian gariſon, being ſorely preſt for want of proviſion, found means to ſend Tryphon word, and to beg his aſſiſtance; and he, having increaſed the number of his forces, was coming to their relief, but was prevented with a deep ſnow, and forced to withdraw into winter quarters; ſoon after which, he cauſed both Antiochus and Jonathan, with his two ſons, to be murdered (Y), as

Tryphon's treachery.

[f] 1 MACC. xii. 39, & ſeq. Antiq. xiii. 10. [g] 1 MACC. xiii. paſſ. JOSEPH. ubi ſupra. c. 11.

(X) It ſeems as if the aſſembly, however, had ſome ſcruple about the regularity of this election to the pontifical dignity; and therefore we find a kind of an apology made for it in the enſuing chapter (16); where, having recapitulated all his glorious deeds and his lineal deſcent from Joarib, they add, that they had choſen him their governor and high-prieſt, and intailed thoſe dignities on his poſterity, until there ſhould ariſe a faithful prophet (17), who might ſet them to rights about it

(Y) The text ſays, that it was at Boſcama that he cauſed the three laſt to be put to death and buried; but it is not eaſy to find the ſi-

(16) 1 Macc. xiv. 26, & ſeq. (17) Jer. 41.

Jonathan buried at Modin. Year of the Flood, 2856 Before Christ, 143.

as we have elsewhere related, and returned to Syria. As soon as he was gone, Simon ordered their bones to be fetched from that place, and to be deposited in the sepulchre of his fathers at Modin, with the solemnity suitable to his rank, and then caused a stately monument to be reared over it [h] (Z).

Alliance with Rome and Sparta renew'd.

His next care was to send an embassy to the Roman senate to notify to them the treacherous murther of his brother, his succession to his office, and to renew his alliance with them. They were to do the same with the Lacedæmonians, and in both places they were received with great honour. Both nations shewed an uncommon resentment at Tryphon's treachery, and chearfully renewed their friendship with Simon, to whom they sent back letters of congratulation on his accession to the Jewish high-priesthood and government, together with the ratification of their alliance engraved on copper. All which being received, Simon caused them to be read before their great assembly; and then set about fortifying afresh both Jerusalem and other places of Judæa, and to raise new forces against any future invasion [i]. Having thus far strengthened himself by alliances, and the land with men, arms, and other necessary stores, he sent an embassy to Demetrius, whom Tryphon had by this time stripped of almost his whole kingdom; and in his letter to him, offered to actuation of that place; only one may conjecture, that it was in the land of Gilead, where he is said to have taken his winter quarters. Josephus calls the place Basca [18].

[h] 1 Macc. xiii. 20, & seq. Ant. ubi supra. [i] Id. ibid.

(Z) This noble piece of architecture stood on an eminence, which commanded the whole country round about; and, being in itself raised to a great height, was seen at a great distance at sea, and served for a land-mark. It was made of white marble, curiously carved and polished. Simon caused also seven pyramids to be built round it, viz two for his father and mother, and four for his four brethren, and the last for himself. The whole was surrounded with a stately portico, whose arches were supported by marble pillars, each of a whole piece. The top of it was adorned with shields, armour, ships, and other such embellishments curiously carved. All which were still to be seen, not only in Josephus, but in Eusebius and St. Jerom's time (19)

(18) Ant l. xiii. c. 11. (19) Ibid. Euseb. περι των τοπικων ονομαστων. Hier. Loc. Hebr.

knowledge

knowledge him king of Syria, and to assist him in the recovery of his kingdom from the usurper, upon condition that he confirmed him in all his dignities, and his country in all their privileges and immunities. He backed his offers with a rich crown of gold and some other presents; and Demetrius, glad at heart to accept the conditions, sent him a letter under the royal signature, by which he granted all his demands, together with a general amnesty and oblivion for all past hostilities, and constituted Simon sovereign prince of the Jewish nation, and freed his land from all foreign yoke. From this time Simon took upon him the name and authority of prince and high-priest of the Jews, which dignities having been confirmed to him and to his descendants on the next year, by an act of the sanhedrin, all public acts were ordered from thenceforward to be made in his name (A).

Simon's

(A) In pursuance, and by virtue, of this grant the Jews from that time ceased to date their contracts and other instruments, as formerly, by the reigns of the Syrian kings, and dated them by the years of Simon and his successors (20). This change was made by the general assembly of the Jews, both priests and elders, wherein the supreme government and high-priesthood were bestowed on Simon, upon account of his great exploits and extraordinary merit, which are there enumerated (21); and with this further addition, that those dignities should be intailed on his posterity, as we observed in a late note. Moreover a copy of the grant, which was inscribed, King Demetrius unto Simon the high-priest, and friend of kings, and to the elders and nation of the Jews (22). was ordered to be engraven on tables of brass, and to be hung up in the sanctuary, and the original to be deposited among the archives of the nation.

This grant, which continued some generations in his family, was dated on the eighteenth day of the month Elul, answering in part to our August, in the hundred and seventy second year of the Seleucidæ, and the third of Simon's pontificate It is said to be given at the general assembly held at Saramael, which the margin of our English version supposes, with Vatablus and others, to mean Jerusalem, by transposition of the letters. The vulgate reads it Asaramel, which, if right, may be properly enough supposed to be put according to the Greek way of writing Hebrew words and names, for chazar-mello, or the court or porch of Millo. Millo was the deep valley between old Jerusalem and the city of David, which that monarch, and after him Solomon, caused to be filled up at a vast

(20) 1 Macc. xiv. 27, & seq.
(21) Ibid. ver. 4, & seq.
(22) Ibid. cap. xiii. 36.

Simon fortifies Judæa.

Simon's main business now was to strengthen himself in this new dignity, to which end he set about repairing and fortifying all his garisons afresh, especially that of Bethzura, which, being on the confines of Judæa, had been formerly made the chief magazine of the enemy, and was like to be one of the first places they would attempt. He therefore took care to secure it with good walls, towers, and ammunition, and with a garison of the stoutest Jews. About the same time he sent Jonathan the son of Absalom with a good army to besiege Joppa, which being taken, he drove out all its inhabitants, filled it with men of his own nation, repaired its fortifications; and, liking the situation of it, built himself a house, and settled there. The place from this time became the head sea-port to Jerusalem and all Judæa, being distant about forty miles from Jerusalem, and opening a trade to all the Mediterranean coasts and islands. Strabo [1] tells us, it was a port of the Jews in his time, and it has continued so ever since, notwithstanding its being a dangerous one, by reason of the great rocks that lie before it [m]; though, in other respects, very pleasant, being situate on a beautiful plain, and having Jamnia on the south, Cæsarea on the north, and Ramah on the east [n]. About the same time Simon went with another army to reduce the city of Gaza, or, as some more probably guess, that of Gazara (B), which had revolted ever labour and charge, and was therefore called by that name from the Hebrew root, which signifies to fill; but whether this conjecture be right, or what the meaning of Saramael or Asaramel is, is hard to guess.

Takes Joppa.

[1] Geogr. l. xvi. [m] Josephus. Bell. Jud. l. iii c. 15. [n] Vid. int. al. Rel. Palæst. illust.

(B) Dean Prideaux justly suspects the former to have slipt in by the inadvertency of the Greek transcriber, instead of the latter (23), which is the Gazer or Gezer often mentioned by the sacred historians (24); and was likewise called Gader, Gedara, Gaderoth, and by Strabo Gadaris (25), who places it, as the book of Maccabees (26) doth Gazara, near Azoth, or Azotus, and Eusebius about two miles from Nicopolis (27).

For, first, as the learned dean above-mentioned rightly observes, Gazara, and not Gaza, is mentioned among the towns taken by Simon (28). Secondly, Gazara is often mentioned, as in the hands (23) Connect. sub an. 143. note (X). (24) Vid. int. al 2 Sam. v. ver. ult. (25) Geogr. ubi supra. (26) xiv. 34. (27) Ubi supra. (28) 1 Macc. xiv. 7, 34.

of

ever ſince Jonathan's death. He battered it ſome conſider- And Ga-able time with his engines, and was juſt on the point of za.
ſtorming it, when the inhabitants appeared on the walls, men, women, and children, with their cloaths rent, and implored his mercy with ſuch doleful cries, as prevailed upon him to ſpare their lives, and to ſend them away to ſhift for themſelves where they could. He entered the town, and purified it of all its idolatrous monuments, put a ſtrong garriſon of Jews in it, and cauſed a houſe to be built for himſelf, to which he often retired, either for relaxation, or to keep the neighbourhood in order [o].

On the next year the fortreſs of Acra, which had been inveſted, as we hinted above, near two years, without any ſupply from without, being now reduced by famine, began to capitulate, after it had been held by the Syrians about twenty five years, to the great nuiſance of the Jewiſh nation. Simon, who wanted to be rid of them at any rate, gave them leave to march out peaceably, whilſt he and his troops entered it with palms in their hands at the ſound of their trumpets and other inſtruments, accompanied with ſongs and other demonſtrations of joy. At firſt he ordered it to be luſtrated, and cleanſed from all the heatheniſh idols, and other ſuperſtitious traſh, intending probably to put a Jewiſh garriſon in it. But having thought better on it, he called a grand council, and propoſed to them the demoliſhing of both it and of the hill on which it ſtood. He reminded them, among the other miſchiefs it had cauſed hitherto, of its having been a conſtant refuge for all the diſcontented and renegado Jews, and of the danger of its becoming ſo again, in caſe it ſhould be taken from them [p]. This propoſal met with a general approbation; the work was immediately ſet about, and carried on with indefatigable aſſiduity, during the ſpace of three years, every man taking his turn in it, till the mountain was brought down to the level of that of the temple, that it might

Year of the flood, 2857. Before Chriſt, 142.

Acra ſurrendered.

And is demoliſhed.

[o] 1 MACC. xiii. & xiv. paſſ. JOSEPH. ubi ſupra. [p] Id. ibid ad fin.

of Simon in this and the foregoing chapter; but Gaza only in this place. Laſtly, he is ſaid to have built him a houſe in that town (29), after he had taken it; and yet we find his ſon dwelling in Gazara, and made governor of it (30); ſo that upon the whole, it is moſt likely, Gaza was only a ſlip of the pen.

(29) Ibid. xiii. 48. (30) Ibid. ver. ult.

never never more be in a condition to annoy it (C). All this while Simon employed another set of hands in repairing and fortifying the outer wall, and other parts of the temple, building of new apartments, particularly a palace for himself, where he dwelt from thenceforth. In memory of the surrender of that fortress, Simon ordered a festival to be kept yearly; and that he might the more fully vacate on the religious and civil affairs of the nation, appointed his son John general of all his forces, and ordered him to fix his residence at Gazara [q], as was observed in a late note. It was in this year that the great sanhedrin, and the whole assembly of the Jews, confirmed to him all his dignities, and intailed them on his posterity, in consideration of the eminent services he had done to his country; which are therefore recapitulated in the preamble to their decree (D), which we have had occasion to mention a little higher.

We

[q] 1 Macc. xiii. 49. ad fin.

(C) This circumstance of demolishing the fortress and the hill, which we have mentioned out of Josephus, and those who have followed him, is not only omitted, but seems even contradicted by the first book of Maccabees, which affirms (31), that Simon fortified and garisoned it with Jews; and, in the very next chapter, that Antiochus sent Simon a challenge to surrender it to him (32), which was three years after.

However, since that fortress was actually demolished, and the hill itself lowered to the level of the temple, it is likely that Josephus has only antedated it by some years.

(D) Among other things that are there mentioned to his great honour, it was not a small one, that Judæa enjoyed a perfect peace during the whole time of his government, whilst Syria and other neighbouring kingdoms were almost destroyed by the wars which were there raised by competitors to their crowns, by traytors, and hostile depredations; so that it is there observed, that the Jews lived quietly every man under his vine and fig-tree, enjoying without fear the fruits of their labours, and beholding with pleasure the flourishing state of their country; their trade increased by the reduction of Joppa, and other maritime places; their territories inlarged; and their religion and liberties secured; their towns and other fortresses well garisoned; their army under good discipline; the land free from heathen enemies and Jewish apostates; their friendship courted by all the nations about them, and even by the Romans and Greeks, and themselves free from all foreign yoke, and from danger of invasion (33).

(31) Cap. xlv. 36, 37. (32) c. xv. 28. (33) Ibid. xiv. 4, & seq.

His

WE have seen in a former chapter *, how Demetrius, driven from his dominions, had been taken and kept prisoner by the Parthians, whilst Tryphon's tyranny caused a general defection from him to Cleopatra. This princess, despairing ever to recover her captive husband, sent to invite his brother Antiochus out of his retirement, to make a push for the Syrian crown. Upon his coming therefore to her, he sent a very obliging letter to the Jewish high-priest, in which he confirmed to him all his dignities, revenues, and authority, and to his nation all the freedom and immunities which had been formerly granted to them by his brother, or which they were now in actual possession of. To this he added, besides many great promises, a power of coining their own money in Judæa, which John immediately made use of (E). But when

Year of the flood, 2859. Before Christ, 140.

* Vol. IX. p. 10, & seq.

His panegyrist adds, that he was no less zealous for the service of God, in exterminating apostacy, superstition, idolatry, and every thing else that was contrary to his laws; that he was a great protector of the true Israelites, and a friend to the poor; that he restored the service of the temple to its antient splendor, and multiplied its sacred utensils; so that we need not wonder, if the Jewish sanhedrin thought no dignity or honour too great for a man of such uncommon merit

The Jewish chronologers tell us moreover, that in his days, and about this time, flourished those two great lights of their synagogue, Simeon Ben Shetach and Jehuda Ben Tabai, directors of the divinity-schools at Jerusalem; and that the former was president, and the latter vice president, of the sanhedrin (34).

(E) Several pieces of this Jewish coin are still preserved by the curious; the inscription of some of them is, The shekel, or half-shekel of Israel; in others, the first or second, &c. year of the deliverance of Israel, of Sion, of Jerusalem, &c Others again are inscribed, Simon prince of Israel What is remarkable in these inscriptions is, that they are not in the new Assyrian characters, adopted by Ezra, but in the old Samaritan; for which no other reason can be assigned, if they be authentic †, except that Simon was willing to preserve the antient form of those that had been coined before the captivity, as well in the character, as the metal, and figure, and weight.

Accordingly these, like the old ones, have on the one side a cup or pitcher, supposed to have been the pot of manna, and on the other a branch, or the budding rod of Aaron, or a palm branch

(34) Seph. Juchasin Shalshel, &c. † See what has been said, Vol. III. p. 408, & seq. & 411, sub note.

Alliance renewed with Rome, &c.

when that prince had eſtabliſhed himſelf on his throne by the marriage of Cleopatra, and the death of Tryphon *, Simon, whether he ſuſpected the ſincerity of his late promiſes, or was willing to make his friendſhip to him appear more conſiderable, ſent a freſh embaſſy to Rome, to renew and ſtrengthen his alliance with that nation. Among other valuable preſents which he ſent, one was a ſhield of gold, which weighed a thouſand Minæ, amounting, according to the loweſt value of the Attic mina, to ſixty thouſand pounds of our money. His deputies were received with the uſual honours, and procured letters from the ſenate to the kings of Syria, and Egypt, Pergamus, Cappadocia, and other ſtates, to notify their alliance with the Jews, and to threaten them with an immediate war, who ſhould venture to commit any hoſtilities againſt them, and ordering them, if any Jewiſh criminals, apoſtates, or other Jewiſh out-laws, had ſheltered themſelves in their dominions, to ſend them bound to the Jewiſh high-prieſt, if demanded by him.

Antiochus's ingratiude to Simon.

THAT to the king of Syria was indeed directed to Demetrius, it being written before that prince's falling into the hands of the Parthians; but had it been directed to Antiochus, it is likely he would have had as little regard to it, as he had to that which he had ſent to the Jewiſh chief. For even whilſt he was beſieging of Tryphon in Dora, whither Simon had ſent him two thouſand choſen men, with warlike ſtores, engines, and other ammunition, inſtead of accepting of them, he ſent them all back, together with a threatening meſſage to Simon, inſiſting upon his ſurrender of Joppa, Gazara, and the citadel of Jeruſalem, which he ſaid did belong to the crown of Syria, or elſe to pay him five hundred talents for each, and five hundred more for the ravages which the Jews had done in his dominions. Athenobius, one of that monarch's favourites, was the perſon who was diſpatched upon that errand, and came accordingly to Jeruſalem, and beheld with wonder the richneſs and ſplendor of the high-prieſt's court, at the ſame time that he informed him of his maſter's

Athenobius ſent to Jeruſalem

* Ibid. p. 11, & ſeq.

branch; ſome a vine, others a bunch of grapes, or a wheat-ſheaf; ſome have two doves, others two towers, or the front of an edifice, ſuppoſed to be that of the temple.

Thoſe we have left of him are all of ſilver; whether he coined any in gold, is not certain; the king's letter mentions neither metal, but permits him in general to coin his own money.

demands

demands (F). Simon nothing terrified at this meſſage, anſwered him coolly, that he was in poſſeſſion of nothing, but what was the inheritance of his anceſtors; except indeed the fortreſſes of Joppa and Gazara, which he had been forced to ſeize, to ſuppreſs the continual ravages and devaſtations they made in Judæa: that for theſe therefore he was willing to pay the king a hundred talents; but as to the fortreſs of Acra, he could by no means think that he had any right to demand it from him. Athenobius did not ſtay to make any reply, but went off abruptly and returned to Antiochus, who was ſtill carrying on the ſiege of Dora, and to whom he returned the anſwer which the Jewiſh pontiff had given him. He likewiſe related to him the pomp and grandeur of his houſhold, the great quantity of ſilver and gold veſſels uſed at his table, and other ſuch marks of the Jewiſh wealth, which he knew would not fail to incenſe that monarch againſt him; for, as Joſephus obſerves, he was very covetous, and conſequently ungrateful, and could not fail envying him ſo much riches and grandeur; and juſt ſo it happened. Antiochus, forgetting at once his letter and Simon's ſervices, ordered Cendebeus, one of his nobles, to invade Judæa with a powerful army, whilſt himſelf went with another in purſuit of the traitor *Triphon.

Cendebeus, having received the government of all the coaſts of Phœnicia and Paleſtine, and being at the head of a powerful army of horſe and foot, began his expedition with fortifying the town of Cedron, or, as the vulgate perhaps more properly calls it, Gedor[r], a place advantageouſly ſituated, and putting a ſtrong gariſon in it. In the mean time he himſelf marched towards Jamnia and Joppa, from whence he made many inroads into Judæa, took a great number of priſoners, and laid waſte all that part of the country[ſ]. The news of it Judæa invaded. Year of the Flood, 2860. Before Chriſt, 139.

* 1 MACCAB. xv. 38, & ſeq. Antiq l. xiii. c. 12, & 13. [r] De hac vid. JOSHUA xv. 58. [ſ] 1 MACCAB. ibid. 40, & ſeq. JOSEPH. ubi ſupra.

(F) Thus ſays the book of Maccabees (35); but Joſephus who takes no notice of this meſſage by Athenobius, relates the ſtory ſomewhat otherwiſe, and tells us (36), that Antiochus having writ to Simon to ſend him men and proviſions for the ſiege, did alter his mind before they were come, and ſent Cendebeus preſently after to invade Judæa.

(35) Ch. xv. 28, & ſeq. (36) Antiq. l. xiii c, 12, & 13.

ſoon reached John, who, as we hinted above, was made general of the Jewiſh forces, and kept his reſidence at Gazara. He went immediately to Jeruſalem to acquaint his father with it; and Simon, being by this time too old to head his Jewiſh troops, called his two brave ſons, viz. this John and his brother Judas, to whom he committed the command of them, charging them on his bleſſing, to imitate the valour of their brave uncles, and to venture their lives in defence of their religion and liberties (G). On theſe two ſetting out, at the head of twenty thouſand choice foot, beſides ſome horſe, they encamped on the firſt night at Modin; and on the morrow, as they advanced towards the plain, they came in ſight of the enemy, and drew ſo near each other, that only a brook parted the two armies. That of John at firſt expreſſed ſome reluctancy to croſs it; but he aſhamed to ſee their backwardneſs, flung himſelf firſt into it, and moved forward; which ſo animated his men, that they immediately followed him. As ſoon as they were got over, he ranged them in order of battle, with his cavalry in the centre. An obſtinate onſet immediately enſued, in which the enemy, being ſeized with a ſudden fright at the ſound of the ſacred trumpets, did immediately give way. Many of them were killed and wounded, and the reſt fled, ſome to the ſconces, which they had in the plains of Azotus, where about two thouſand of them periſhed in the flames, John, now ſurnamed Hyrcan (H), having

(G) Here again Joſephus (37) differs from the book of Maccabees, and makes the good old prieſt to forget his age, and to ſally out at the head of his troops, with as much vigour and reſolution, as if he had been but in his prime; ſo fond is he to raiſe the character of his own anceſtors.

(H) The fourth book of the Maccabees, of which we have given an account in a former note †, tells us, that John received the ſurname of Hyrcan on account of his defeating a famous general of that name, and killing him with his own hand, which ſome think may be the Cendebeus, whom he here defeated, who might be alſo ſurnamed Hyrcanus, either becauſe he was a native of Hyrcania, or on ſome other account (38).

Joſephus Bengorion ſays, it paſſed from the eldeſt ſon of Simon, who was called Hyrcan, to this brother John (39). Others think he had it given him on account of his beating the Hyrcanians (40), all without any certainty; ſince neither the firſt book of Maccabees, (37) Ibid † Vol. IX p. 589 in fin. note (Q) (31) Calmet. Hiſt. V. T. ſub. A. M. 3869. (39) l. iv. c. 2. (40) Euſeb. in Chron. S. Sever. hiſt l. ii & al.

nor

having cauſed them to be ſet on fire. The reſt with Cendebeus fled as far as Cedron, the place lately fortified by him, and John purſued him all the way thither; after which he faced about, and came and rejoined his brother Judas, who, having received ſome wound in the action, had been forced to ſtay behind. The two brothers, having by this defeat cleared thoſe parts from the Syrian troops, led their victorious army back to Jeruſalem, without any conſiderable loſs [t]. After this Judæa continued quiet and free from invaſion, till the murder of their worthy high-prieſt, which happened about three years after, and brought Antiochus again with an army againſt that metropolis. The manner in which this perfidious act was perpetrated, is as follows.

Simon had then a ſon-in-law named Ptolemy, the ſon of Abadus, whom he had made governor of Jericho and its territories, and who was grown exceeding rich in that government; but ſuch was his ambition, that nothing leſs could ſatisfy him, than his being maſter of all Judæa. This wretch took the opportunity of Simon's taking a progreſs about the country with his two ſons Judas and Mattathias, to invite them to his caſtle of Dog, where he had prepared a ſumptuous entertainment for them. The old pontiff, who ſuſpected nothing leſs than what was deſigned againſt him, was eaſily perſuaded to accept of the invitation; but after they had feaſted and drank pretty freely, ſome ruffians, whom he had privately poſted, ruſhed upon the three gueſts and murdered them. His deſign was to have cut off Hyrcan alſo, who was then at Gazara; and to this end he diſpatched ſome meſſengers to invite or bring him to him: but happily for him, one of his father's retinue had eſcaped the ſlaughter, and brought notice to him of what had paſſed; ſo that Hyrcan was beforehand with him, and cauſed his meſſenger to be taken and put to death (I). Hyrcan, thinking himſelf now no longer ſafe there, nor Joſephus, give us any reaſon for it; beſides we have ſeen that all the ſons of Mattathias had their particular ſurnames; ſome of them more uncommon, and as little to be accounted for as this of Hyrcan.

Simon treacherouſly murdered.

[t] MACCAB. xvi. 1. & ſeq.

(I) Thus far goes the firſt book of the Maccabees, which concludes its epocha of forty years with this eſcape of Hyrcan, and refers us for the remainder of his life and actions to a book of chronicles (41) long ſince loſt; ſo that we muſt now fill up the ſe-

(41) Cap. ult. ver. ult.

there, made the beſt of his way to Jeruſalem, whither Ptolemy arrived as ſoon as he. Both offered themſelves at different gates and demanded admittance; but Hyrcan was received quel of the Jewiſh hiſtory for the moſt part out of Joſephus; in the following of whom care ſhall be taken to diſcover ſuch errors of his, as are either accidental or otherwiſe, by comparing him with himſelf or other hiſtorians, till we come to the ſacred ones of the New Teſtament; ſo that whatever we find in him, either that bears not an authentic face, or claſhes, or has been confuted by other authors, will be either thrown into the margin, or if of ſmall moment, quite ſet aſide.

To begin then with ſome of the improbabilities with which he continues the hiſtory of this high prieſt, he tells us, (42), that as ſoon as he was inſtalled in his new dignities, he put himſelf at the head of the Jewiſh army, and went and beſieged Ptolemy in his caſtle of Dog or Dagon, where he ſtill kept alive Simon's wife and his two ſons, contrary to the book of Maccabees, which ſays, that he aſſaſſinated the two latter with their old father, and mentions nothing of the wife.

He goes on, and tells us, that, as Hyrcan went on with the ſiege, Ptolemy cauſed his mother and two brothers to be brought upon the walls of the caſtle, and there had them ſeverely ſcourged, threatening at the ſame time to caſt them headlong down, if he did not deſiſt; and that the old lady, obſerving her ſon to relent at the ſight of her danger and cruel uſage, made ſigns for him to go on with the ſiege, and to take no thought of her ſafety or life; and that her ſon, being unable to ſee them ſo cruelly tortured, did as often ſlaken his hand.

At length, continues he, the ſabbatic, or ſeventh, year being come, which was a year of reſt as well as the ſeventh day, and Hyrcan upon that account being obliged to raiſe the ſiege, gave the murderer an opportunity to eſcape beyond Jordan; ſo that having put to death his three priſoners, he retired to Zeno ſurnamed Cotylas, who had uſurped the government of the city of Philadelphia.

The fourth book of the Maccabees tells us much the ſame ſtory, and only differs in two circumſtances from Joſephus. The firſt is, that Gaza, and not Jeruſalem, was the place where Hyrcan was received and preferred to the aſſaſſin; and the ſecond, that the feaſt of the tabernacles, and not the ſabbatic year, obliged that pontiff to repair to Jeruſalem to perform the function of his office; during which ſolemnity Ptolemy found means to eſcape far enough out of his reach.

This account, did it not contradict the firſt book of the Maccabees, which expreſly ſays, that the father and the two ſons were murdered

(42) Antiq. l. xiii. c. 1 14, & 15. & bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 2.

ceived out of respect to his worthy father, whilst his murderer, and the men that came with him, had the mortification to be repulsed. Hyrcan was immediately declared prince and high-priest in his father's stead, and put himself at the head of his army, fortified himself in the mountain of the temple, and provided every way for his own safety, and for that of the city and country. On the other hand, Ptolemy, seeing himself disappointed of his designs on Hyrcan and Jerusalem, and having in vain endeavoured to bribe some of the heads of the Jews over to his interest by sumptuous promises, was at length reduced to the necessity of writing to Antiochus, to acquaint him with what he had done, and to beg of him to come to his assistance; promising him at the same time to reduce all Judæa under him, provided he made him governor of it. Antiochus, whom the late defeat of Cendebeus had still more exasperated against the Jews, did easily embrace his offer, and was actually coming with a powerful army to his assistance; but whether through fear, or whatever other reason, the rebel did not think fit to stay till his arrival, but fled to Zeno, tyrant of the city of Philadelphia. What became of the wretch afterwards, we cannot find. The author of the fourth book of Maccabees adds to what we observed in the last note, that after he had killed the mother and two brothers of Hyrcan, he fled, and retired into some place where he could not be come at, whilst Hyrcan was detained at Jerusalem to perform the priestly function, it being then the feast of tabernacles. All that we know is, that no further mention is made of him, either by Josephus or the first book of the Maccabees, since his flight into Philadelphia.

Antiochus, allured into Judæa, partly at the news of the brave Simon's death, and of the riches of his successor, and partly by the fair offers which the traitor Ptolemy had made dered at the same time (43), would be much more probable than that of Josephus, at least with regard to the suspension of the siege; since there is no law that obliged the Jews to abstain from war, especially a defensive one, during the sabbatic year; if there had, how could they have continued a nation without a miracle? And yet Josephus not only affirms it to have been the cause of Hyrcan's raising the siege of Dagon, but of Antiochus's taking the advantage of it to invade Judæa and besiege its metropolis. This siege of Dagon is therefore justly called in question by several learned men (44).

(43) Cap. ult ver 16. (44) Vid int. al. Salien. annal. sub. A. M. 3919, & 3920. Vide & Usser sub A. M. 3809.

to

to him, entered Judæa on the enſuing year with a powerful army, and went directly to beſiege Jeruſalem, driving Hyrcan all the way before him, till he had ſhut himſelf up with his men into that metropolis. To incloſe him the more effectually, Joſephus tells us [u], that he cauſed two deep and ſpacious trenches to be dug round the city, and divided his army into ſeven camps; ſo that all poſſibility of ingreſs or egreſs was intirely ſtopped. He reared likewiſe one hundred towers; the fourth book of the Maccabees ſays one hundred and thirty, which were three ſtories high, upon which he placed his men to annoy thoſe that defended the walls, whilſt he was battering them from below. Joſephus adds, that his army ſuffered ſome time for want of water, and was at length relieved with a good laſting rain. On the other hand, the beſieged made a vigorous defence, and, by their frequent ſallies, did greatly annoy the beſiegers (K). As therefore no relief could be expected from without, either of men or proviſions, Hyrcan bethought himſelf at firſt of a way of ridding himſelf of all uſeleſs mouths, by putting them out of the city; by which means they, being pent up between the wall and the enemies ditch, muſt infallibly have been ſtarved in a little time, had they not been taken in again. What raiſed the compaſſion of thoſe within the walls was the approaching feaſt of tabernacles, which was uſually ſolemnized with great joy and feaſting, and could not but have been very much diſturbed by the cries of their periſhing brethren without. Hyrcan then ſent to Antiochus to deſire a truce of ſeven days, that they might quietly celebrate that feſtival; which was not only readily granted, but that prince, being thereby ſtirred up to ſome ſenſe of religion, ſent them a conſiderable number of victims, with their horns gilt, together with ſeveral rich veſſels of gold and ſilver [w], filled with precious perfumes, and ſome money and other neceſſaries, which were, by Hyrcan's orders, thankfully received by the prieſts

Jeruſalem beſieged.

Antiochus's piety.

[u] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 16. [w] Idem ibid. Vide & PLUT. in Apophtheg.

(K) To what we have related of this ſiege out of Joſephus, the fourth book of Maccabees adds, that as Antiochus was ordering the ſapping of the walls, he obſerved, that the foundations were of timber, upon which he cauſed them to be ſet on fire, which ſoon brought down a great part of the wall; but that the beſieged coming inſtantly to defend the breach, not only hindered the beſiegers from entering the town, but drove them back, and made a ſtout ſally after them, in which, beſides a great number of the Syrians, which they killed, they deſtroyed moſt of the enemies towers.

at

at one of the gates of the city, and thence conveyed into the temple (L). This unexpected instance of the king's piety and liberality gave him some hopes, that a peace might probably be obtained from him with the same ease. He was not mistaken, and Antiochus, whether tired with the brave and constant defence of the besieged, which is not unlikely, if the account we have just now given in a note out of the fourth book of the Maccabees is not exaggerated, or moved by some other reason, granted it to him, upon the conditions following:

Grants peace to the Jews.

THAT the Jews should deliver up their arms; that the city wall should be demolished; and that John should pay him a certain tribute for Joppa and other towns he held out of Judæa. The king insisted hard upon two other conditions, namely, that they should receive a Syrian garison into their metropolis; and secondly, that the fortress of Acra should be rebuilt. The first of these they bought off at the price of five hundred talents, three hundred of which were to be paid instantly, and the rest at some distance of time. They likewise engaged to put into the king's hands a sufficient number of hostages to secure him of their future allegiance, that they might be wholly free from any commerce with strangers. As for the second, Hyrcan, who remembered what a grievous thorn in their side the late fortress had been to them, would by no means agree to the building of a new one; and the king, according to his usual clemency, remitted this also. And yet Josephus tells us, that when this peace was transacting, the city was reduced to the last extremity, having quite exhausted all their provisions; and, which is still more surprising, that the besiegers were so well informed of it, that they earnestly pressed the king to make use of so favourable an opportunity to destroy and extirpate the whole Jewish nation, which they traduced to him in the bittersest terms, as the pest of mankind, and sworn enemies of all other nations; so that, all things considered, it seems as if providence had interposed in their behalf, and had mollified that monarch's heart towards them, and a [illegible]then author owns * with Josephus, that it was owing to his surprising goodness and generosity,

* DIODOR. SICUL. Bibl. l. xxxiv. & apud Phot. cod. 244.

(L) In this, and the following particulars relating to the peace, Josephus and the fourth book of Maccabees agree, tho' they seem to differ in those which relate to the siege and the defence made by the besieged.

rosity, that the whole nation had not then been intirely destroyed, and that they obtained a peace upon such easy terms.

However that was, the peace was signed on both sides, and the proper hostages sent to Antiochus, among whom was Hyrcan's brother; the city was dismantled; the money paid; and the siege raised: but Hyrcan was forced to make use of a strange expedient to procure the three hundred talents stipulated. It seems their treasury was then at so low an ebb, that it could not furnish him with that sum; so that John was forced to open a hidden treasure, which had been laid up by some of the kings of Judah [y]; Josephus says the tomb of David [z], from which he took out three thousand talents; a thing which had never been attempted before by any of his predecessors, nor was after him by any, except by Herod (M). With this fresh supply he paid Antiochus, and undertook

[y] Lib. 4 Maccab. [z] Ubi supra ad fin. & bell. Judaic. l. iv. c 2, & alib.

(M) The story of a hidden treasure, whether laid up by David, or by any of his successors, is justly suspected by the judicious, as a fable invented by those two authors, without any foundation; only that of the Maccabees delivers it as a common report; whereas Josephus affirms it both of Hyrcan and Herod without hesitation.

That both David and Solomon heaped immense riches, we have formerly seen; but that they caused any part of them to be hidden under ground, much less in their own tombs, is no-where said, either by the sacred or apocryphal writers; but the contrary may be fairly deduced from them. For, if they had left any such hidden treasure, is it likely, that their wicked successors, who made no scruple to rifle the temple of its sacred utensils and ornaments (45), would have left it untouched? Is it likely, that good king Hezekiah would have chosen to take all the silver and the gold vessels of the temple, and even tear off the gold with which the gates, pillars, and other parts of that sacred building were covered (46), rather than to break into this immense, but useless, treasure?

Again, is it probable, had there been any such depository, that so many Assyrian and Chaldean monarchs, as had formerly rifled both city and temple, would not have got some knowledge of it, and gutted it of all its riches? And if they had till then been preserved by some kind of miracle (for nothing less could do it how should Hyrcan dare to break in upon them, and not rather, like the good king above-mentioned, have rifled the temple of some of its valuable ornaments, which, by what we have seen hitherto, were

(45) Vide int. al 2 Kings xvi. 8, & seq 7, 18. (46) Ibid. xviii. 15,

by took, what had never been done before, to take a number of foreign troops into his ſervice. This peace was followed with an alliance with Antiochus, after which that monarch was invited into Jeruſalem with his chief officers, where he was received and feaſted in a ſumptuous manner, and, after mutual aſſurances of friendſhip and aſſiſtance, the king ſet out for Syria, and Hyrcan about repairing the breaches and damages which had been made during the ſiege. This peace was made on the ninth month after Simon's death (N). Hyrcan was punctual in his promiſes to that prince for ſome years after, and did him ſeveral ſignal ſervices in his war againſt Phraartes, ſpoken of a little higher *, and bore a great ſhare in the

Year of the Flood, 2868. Before Chriſt, 131.

* Vol. IX, p. 16.

by this time grown very numerous and coſtly, by the generoſity not only of his predeceſſors, but of foreign princes?

We have lately ſeen, that there was a treaſury or bank in the temple, part of which conſiſted of donatives for the ſupport of the poor, partly of the portions and dowries of the fatherleſs and widows, and partly of the ſubſtance of the richer ſort, who depoſited their wealth there for ſecurity *, beſides that which was allotted for the maintenance of the divine ſervice (47). Now, if we conſider, that they were ſo continually harraſſed with wars, invaſions, and oppreſſions, it is not improbable, that they kept theſe riches in ſome proper ſubterranean places, known but to a few truſty men at the head of affairs, and kept the whole as much a ſecret as poſſible; if therefore Hyrcan was now hard put to, to raiſe money, is it not more probable that he borrowed it out of this bank, till better times enabled him to repay it?

But when Herod did totally rifle it for his own uſe, if ever he really did it, might he not trump up this plauſible ſtory, that it had been depoſited there by David, or his ſucceſſors, againſt times of need? And might not that cunning monarch colour this wicked deed with the ſpecious pretence, that Hyrcan, a perſon of unexceptionable character, had done the ſame thing upon the like emergency †?

(N) Joſephus (48) tells us, that, in the firſt year of Hyrcan's pontificate, a prieſt of the family of Joarib, named Matthias Aphlias, was married to a daughter of the late Jonathan, by whom he had Matthias Curtus, who begot Joſephus, who was his grandfather.

In the ſecond year of the ſame Hyrcan, came from Jeruſalem into Egypt, Jeſus the ſon of Sirac, a learned Jew, who there tranſlated the book of Wiſdom, written by Jeſus his grandfather, into Greek, for the uſe of the helleniſtical Jews (49). We have already ſpoken of that work and its author in a former note, to which we refer (50).

* Vol. IX. 595. & 2 Maccab. iii 10. (47) Ibid. ver. 6. † Vide Salien. Uſſer. & Prid (48) In vita ſua. (49) Vide prolog. in eund. (50) Vol. IX p. 605, note (F).

victories which that prince gained againſt him. Some authors think [a], that it was in this war that John got the name of Hyrcan, on account of ſome ſignal victory he gained over the Hyrcanians. However that be, Joſephus tells us [b], on the authority of N. Damaſcen, that Antiochus ſhewed him ſo much regard, as to halt two days on account of the feaſt of pentecoſt, becauſe it beginning that year on the day immediately following the ſabbath, it was not lawful for the Jews to march on theſe two days. Antiochus was ſoon after defeated and killed, as has been elſewhere related †; and Hyrcan, in his return to Jeruſalem, took Aleppo, and laid it under a tribute [c]. After this, finding that the kingdom of Syria was rent with inteſtine diſturbances, and their cities naked and defenceleſs, he marched thither with a good army, reſolved to ſeize upon ſuch of them as lay moſt convenient for him. The firſt he took was that of Madeba, which coſt him a ſix month's ſiege. From thence he went to that of Samega, which he ſubdued, with ſeveral others both in Arabia and Phœnicia [d]. From this time we may date the total deliverance of the Jews from the Syrian yoke; for neither he nor any of his deſcendants paid either hom age or obedience to thoſe monarchs ever afterwards, but lived free and independent from them [e]. From thence he turned his arms againſt the Samaritans, and took Shechem and mount Garizim, and the temple formerly built by Sanballat, and demoliſhed it, after it had ſtood two hundred years; together with all the edifices, altars, and monuments which had been built there by Jezabel, and put ſeveral of the Samaritan prieſts to death (O). The following year Idumea was likewiſe conquered by him [f], where he cauſed proclamation to be made throughout that province, obliging all thoſe that would not be circumciſed to depart out of the land; but the Idumeans chuſing rather to Antiochus's death. Year of the Flood 2859 Before Chriſt 130.

Hyrcan ſhakes off the Syrian yoke.

His conqueſts.

[a] Euseb. in Chron. Sulp. Sever. & al. [b] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 16. † Vol. IX p. 16. [c] 4 Maccab. [d] Idem, Joseph. Antiq. l. xiii. c. 17. Strabo, Geogr. l. xvi. [e] Justin. ex Trog. l. xxxvi. c. 1. [f] Joseph. ubi ſupra, & l. xv. c. 11. Strabo, ubi ſupra. See alſo Vol. II. p. 147.

(O) Theſe two laſt particulars, which we have out of the fourth book of the Maccabees, Joſephus ſays nothing of; but only mentions the demoliſhing of their temple, which was from that time never attempted to be rebuilt; however, the Shechemites built themſelves an altar there, on which they offered their ſacrifices, according to the Moſaic law, and have continued to do ſo ever ſince.

forſake

forſake their old idolatry than their country, ſubmitted to his conditions, and were from that time incorporated into the Jewiſh commonwealth (P).

IN the year following Hyrcan ſent Simon the ſon of Doſitheus and Apollonius the ſon of Alexander, on an embaſſy to the Roman ſenate, to renew the alliance they had lately made with Simon his father, and ſent ſome valuable preſents by them (Q). Theſe met with an honourable reception at Rome. Hyrcan renews his alliance with Rome.

Rome,

(P) From that time downward to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem by the Romans, they continued in the Jewiſh religion; ſo that the word Idumean ſignified no more than incorporated Jews, in contradiſtinction to thoſe that were ſo by natural deſcent (1); and from their total diſperſion, the former name has been intirely abſorbed in the latter.

With reſpect to theſe Idumean proſelytes, it will be proper to obſerve here, that Herod, who obtained afterwards the kingdom of Judæa, was of that race. From his reign therefore the Jewiſh writers began to ſtyle it מלכות הגרים malkuth hagerim, the kingdom or reign of proſelytes or ſtrangers; which not being obſerved by Scaliger and Munſter, they have tranſlated it the kingdom of the Hagarens; but our learned Uſher has ſufficiently confuted that miſtake (2); and we ſhall further ſhew, when we come to the reign of that prince, that he was really one of theſe Idumeans, incorporated into, and thereby intitled to all the privileges of a natural Iſraelite. There was indeed to be this difference in the true Edomites, that they could not intermarry with them till the third generation, according to the law of Moſes (3); but as we have ſhewn theſe Idumeans to be of a different race, or rather a mixture of other nations, how that matter was regulated by the ſanhedrin, we know not.

We have heretofore obſerved †, that the word Edomite and Idumean, which often occurs in the rabbinic writings, is not that of any nation, but the name by which they call the Chriſtians, againſt whom they write, and is indeed one of the civileſt; but they oftner uſe thoſe of goi, heathen, and Nozri or Nazarite, and ſometimes that of Samaritan and Cuthean; which caution we here repeat, to prevent thoſe that read them being miſtaken by any of thoſe feigned names.

(Q) Among theſe the fourth book of Maccabees mentions a large diſh and a ſhield, amounting to fifty thouſand pieces of gold. That author mentions ſome other particulars, which are not in Joſephus; ſuch as, that the ambaſſadors were made to ſit down

(1) Vide Prid. connect. ſub ann 129 note t. & Buxorf. lexic. Rabbin. ſub voce אדום. (2) Sub A. M. 3855 (3) See Vol. II. p. 147. & Vol. III. p. 294. Vide & Deut. xxiii. 7, 8.

† Vol. II. p. 147, note.

Rome, and a ready compliance with all their demands. The ſenate, beſides the renewing of the alliance, granted the Jews the poſſeſſion of Joppa, Gazara, and ſome other places, which Antiochus had taken from them, and ordered the ambaſſadors a ſum out of the public treaſury, to defray their charges homewards. They likewiſe ſent letters to all the governors of the provinces through which they were to paſs in their return, to ſee them treated with all the marks of honour due to their character. The ſenate likewiſe ordered, that all the complaints they had exhibited againſt the Syrians ſhould be redreſſed; declared null and void all that Antiochus or his ſucceſſor had done, or ſhould do, contrary to their late league with the late Jewiſh high-prieſts; that the Syrians ſhould reimburſe to them all the loſſes ſuſtained by them, and appointed commiſſaries to come and ſee the purport of their decree fully executed. The embaſſadors had likewiſe deſired letters from the ſenate, directed to all the princes and free ſtates with whom they were in alliance, to recommend the Jewiſh intereſt to them; but there being at that time other important matters on the tapis, the affair was deferred for further deliberation; and they returned to Jeruſalem highly ſatisfied with what they had.

A ſecond embaſſy ſent to Rome.

This embaſſy having ſo well ſucceeded, Hyrcan, on the next year, ſent a new one with freſh preſents, to thank the ſenate for their laſt favour, and to obtain a ratification of all their former decrees in their behalf; all which was readily granted, and the embaſſadors returning, brought this new act, which the reader may ſee at full length in Joſephus (R). By theſe alliances John ſaw himſelf more and more ſtrengthened with the Roman conſul; that they were allowed the free exerciſe of their religion; and that the letter which they brought from the ſenate to Hyrcan, did give him the name and title of king, which that pontiff took upon him, and bore it from thenceforward. The letter is there related at full length; but as it contains nothing particular except that inſcription, we ſhall refer the reader to that book for it.

(R) Here Joſephus has again committed a manifeſt blunder, by inſerting this decree in the wrong place (4), and inſtead of another then granted by the ſenate upon another occaſion, and at the recommendation of Julius Cæſar, to Hyrcanus the ſecond. This has been fully proved by ſeveral learned men, whom the reader will find

(4) Antiq. l. xiv. c. 16.

ened in his dominions, whilſt the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt were ſtill troubled with continual wars. Alexander Zebina having by this time mounted the Syrian throne *, was find in the margin (5); and he may further convince himſelf, by comparing the contrariety between the decree itſelf and the occaſion upon which the Jewiſh hiſtorian there quotes it, with reſpect to the following particulars:

* See Vol. IX. p. 22, & ſeq.

1. He ſays it was obtained for the rebuilding of the city wall demoliſhed by Pompey; but there is not a word in the decree about the wall, but only of renewing and confirming the former alliances. 2. The decree was dated on the ninth year of Hyrcanus, who could not be the ſecond of that name; for if it had been obtained to this laſt by Julius Cæſar, it muſt have fallen in the ſeventeenth, not of his reign, for that he had been diſpoſſeſſed of by Gabinius, but of his prieſthood, which was all the dignity that was left to him, as Joſephus himſelf owns in another place (6): and if his reign were to be dated, not from his reſtauration by Pompey, but from the death of his mother, it muſt have been the twenty third, and not the ninth of his reign.

Again, there is a manifeſt difference between the dates of the preamble to and the decree itſelf. The one dates it the ninth of Hyrcan, in the month Panemus, anſwering to our July, and the other the ides (or thirteenth) of December. From all which it is evident, that Joſephus has, by a miſtake, inſerted here one decree for another; and that this belonged not to any year of Hyrcanus the ſecond, but to the ninth year of Hyrcanus the firſt.

Another ſtrong proof of this is; Numenius the ſon of Antiochus, who is mentioned in the decree as one of the embaſſadors ſent by Hyrcan to procure it, is the ſame who had been ſent about ſeventeen years before, on the like errand, to Rome by Jonathan, as we have lately ſeen; he might therefore be ſtill young enough to be ſent on this new embaſſy in the ninth year of Hyrcanus the firſt; but muſt have been long dead and rotten before the decree obtained by Cæſar in favour of Hyrcanus the ſecond, there being near eighty years diſtance between them. To all this may be added, that the decree here inſerted is that of an alliance made by proper embaſſadors between the Roman ſenate and a free ſtate, ſuch as the Jewiſh was in Hyrcan the firſt's time; whereas that obtained by Cæſar for Hyrcan the ſecond, was not an alliance by embaſſy, but a favour conferred on the Jews, in conſideration of the ſervices they had done

(5) Scalig. animad. in Chron. Euſeb. num. 1971. Uſſer. annal. ſub A. M. 3877. Salien. ſub A. M. 4007. ſect. 36. Prid. connect. ſub ann. 127. (6) Antiq. l. xiv. c. 10.

was glad to make him his friend; but being ſoon after killed, and ſucceeded by Antiochus Grypus, this laſt did ſo reſent it, that he was preparing himſelf to invade Judæa; but was happily prevented by his brother, who was then levying an army at Cyzicum, and coming againſt him. Hyrcan left them to fight it out between them, without concerning himſelf on either ſide, chuſing rather to enjoy his ſovereign authority peacefully, which gave him an opportunity of heaping up immenſe treaſures, by the tributes which he received both from his own now flouriſhing land, and from thoſe countries which he had lately ſubjected to his dominions. At length ſome hoſtilities, which the Samaritans committed againſt the Mareſſans (S), who were then in friendſhip with him, gave him a fair handle for renewing the war, which he had lately begun againſt thoſe of the city of Shechem. He went therefore with his two ſons Ariſtobulus and Antigonus, at the head of a powerful army, and with all the proper engines for the ſiege of Samaria, which had been ſince rebuilt and fortified (T). Theſe encompaſſed the city with a wall and a deep ditch, of about eighty furlongs, or four thouſand paces circuit; by which they ſoon reduced the city to ſuch ſcarcity of proviſions, that they began to eat all manner of unclean beaſts, ſuch as cats, dogs, and other carion. In this extremity they found means to ſend and implore the aſſiſtance of done the Roman general in the Alexandrian war; at which time they were no longer a free, but a conquered, nation, as the ſequel of this hiſtory will ſoon ſhew.

(S) The city of Mareſſa, or Mareſa, which ſtood at about two miles diſtance from Eleutheropolis, had been ſome time before taken by him, and ſince retaken by the Syrians, under whom it now was; but ſtill in alliance and friendſhip with the Jews (7).

(T) It will be proper here to remind our readers, that theſe Samaritans were not now of the old race and ſect ſo much hated by the Jews, for theſe, we have ſeen a little higher, had been either deſtroyed, or driven out of that metropolis, by Alexander the Great, for the murder of his favourite Andronicus; immediately after which he repeopled the place with Syro-Macedonians, or a mixture of Syrians, Macedonians, and Greeks.

Theſe being ſettled there did incompaſs the town with a double high wall, a deep ditch, and other fortifications; thoſe therefore are miſtaken, who think, that the Jewiſh hatred againſt the former ſort of Samaritans was the occaſion of this war; for theſe were all heathens, and conſequently ſtrangers to the diſputes and intailed enmity between thoſe two.

(7) Vide antiq l. xiii c. 17.

Antiochus

Antiochus Cyzicenus, who was now on the Syrian throne *, and who came accordingly with a great army to their relief [g].

IN the mean time, the grand expiation day being at hand, Hyrcan was obliged to go to Jeruſalem to perform the office of it, and left his two ſons to carry on the ſiege. Upon their hearing that Antiochus was coming againſt them, Ariſtobulus was diſpatched with part of the army to meet him. A bloody engagement enſued, in which the Syrians were totally routed, and purſued as far as Scythopolis; and Antiochus eſcaped with great difficulty. After this defeat, the ſiege was renewed with ſuch vigour, that Antiochus was again applied to; but he not caring to hazard a ſecond battle, contented himſelf with ſending ſix thouſand men to make a diverſion in Judæa, in hopes to oblige the Jews to raiſe the ſiege; neither were theſe his own troops, but ſuch as he had with ſome difficulty obtained from the king of Egypt. We have already ſeen the ill ſucceſs of this expedition in a former volume, as well as the betraying of Scythopolis to Hyrcan by Epicrates, and the ſurrender and utter demolition of Samaria †. From this time Hyrcan became more and more powerful, and made himſelf maſter not only of all Paleſtine, but added alſo unto it the provinces of Samaria and Galilee; all which he enjoyed to the end of his life, without any moleſtation from without, or diſcords from within his dominions. His reign was no leſs remarkable on the account of his great wiſdom and piety at home, than his conqueſts abroad. Never did the Jewiſh religion or commonwealth appear in greater luſtre ſince the return from captivity; but that which raiſes his glory, above any of his predeceſſors or ſucceſſors, was, if we may believe Joſephus [h] and the fourth book of Maccabees [i], his enjoying three dignities, which never all met in any but him; namely, the royal dignity, the high-prieſthood, and the gift of prophecy. Of the laſt of theſe we ſhall give two or three inſtances out of thoſe authors in the margin (V); but the ſecond, or high-prieſthood, Samaria beſieged. Year of the Flood, 2889. Before Chriſt, 110.

* See Vol. IX. p. 29. [g] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 18. † See Vol. IX. p 28. [h] Antiq. ubi ſupra, & bell. Judaic. l. ii. c. 3. [i] Cap. vii.

(V) Joſephus affirms him to have had very extraordinary viſions and revelations, more particularly about his own children. He tells us for inſtance, that on the day in which his forces defeated thoſe of Antiochus, himſelf was then offering up incenſe in the moſt holy place, where he heard a voice telling him of the victory gained by his ſons.

As

prieſthood, tho' he had exerciſed it in ſuch a manner as ought to have rendered him doubly venerable, yet in the end proved the ſource of ſuch perſecutions from the proud and hot-headed Phariſees, as quite embittered the latter end of his reign, if not ſhortened his days. It is under his reign that this ſect, as well as thoſe of the Sadducees and Eſſenians, of which we have already ſpoken ſomething, are ſuppoſed to have ſtarted up. This therefore may be thought a proper place of ſpeaking of them more at large, as well as of that of the Caraites, which ſprung up afterwards; but as each of thoſe four ſects had many favourite tenets, quite oppoſite to the ſpirit and doctrine of the goſpel and its divine author, and proved ſo many invincible obſtacles againſt its reception, we ſhall defer ſpeaking of them, till we come to that glorious epocha. By this means the reader will have them ſo freſh in his mind, and, as it were, in one view, that inſtead of wondering at the Jews rejecting ſo univerſally the perſon and doctrine of the Meſſiah, he will rather look upon it as a kind of miracle, that ſo many of that blind and prepoſſeſſed nation ſhould ſo readily embrace them.

But, to return to our ſubject, Hyrcan had always ſhewed himſelf a zealous ſtickler for the Phariſees; they had hitherto monopolized his favours, and enjoyed the moſt conſiderable poſts under him, whilſt the other two were deſpiſed and kept under by him. But an untimely piece of condeſcenſion towards them, or perhaps rather of vanity, from which the beſt of men are not always exempt, gave one of the heads of that imperious ſect, named Eleazar, an opportunity to caſt a reflection againſt him, which touched him in the moſt ſenſible part. It was no leſs than calling in

As he was very fond of thoſe two brave youths, he was no leſs importunate with heaven to know which of them was to ſucceed him; but, to his great mortification, he ſaw in a viſion a third ſon, not yet born, who was pointed at as his ſucceſſor. This grieved the good old man ſo much, it ſeems, that when Alexander was ſoon after born, he ſent him to be privately brought up in Galilee; but this did not hinder the viſion being verified by the ſequel; of which he was made, however, ſo ſenſible before he died, that he foretold the reigns of his two eldeſt ſons Ariſtobulus and Antigonus to be but ſhort, after which Alexander would ſucceed them.

There are ſome other ſingularities related of him, which have ſtill more the air of fables, and therefore not worth mentioning; only this one is very remarkable, if true, that the ſtones of the breaſt plate and the carbuncle on his ſhoulder quite loſt their luſtre after his death, and never recovered it ſince.

queſtion

queſtion his legitimacy, at leaſt as being leſs pure and undefiled than the Moſaic law requires in a high-prieſt; and this he did by pretending, that his mother had been formerly a ſlave, intimating thereby, that either ſhe was not of Jewiſh extraction, or elſe, that being ſo, ſhe had been taken captive by the enemy, and forced to proſtitute herſelf for a maintenance. The ſtory being, as Joſephus aſſures us, abſolutely falſe, and only trumped up by that proud Phariſee to mortify the good old prelate, we ſhall throw it in the margin (W), and only add, that Eleazar's baſe ſuggeſtion, and the partiality

(W) Hyrcan's deſire to ingratiate himſelf ſtill farther to this imperious ſect, which he obſerved to grow daily more and more the darling of the people, by reaſon of their ſpecious pretence to a greater degree of ſanctity, made him one day, after he had given ſome of the heads of them a moſt ſumptuous entertainment, aſk them, if they had any thing to object or to find fault with againſt his government, that he might rectify it; ſince he had always made it his chief ſtudy and delight to act with the utmoſt regard to God, and according to the rules and maxims of their ſect.

Whilſt therefore the reſt of the company were extolling his piety, zeal, valour, and conduct up to the ſkies, the ſurly and turbulent Eleazar ſtarted up, and, with his wonted ill nature, told him, that if he was really deſirous to deſerve the praiſes which his brethren had ſo laviſhly given him, he ought to diveſt himſelf of his high-prieſthood, and be content with the civil government of the nation. Being aſked the reaſon of ſo ſtrange a propoſal, he anſwered him, That they were well aſſured, upon the teſtimony of ancient perſons ſtill living, that his mother had been taken captive in the wars, which rendered him incapable by the law of Moſes † to ſucceed to the pontifical dignity

This malicious ſuggeſtion, it ſeems, was reſented by all the company; but much more by the old pontiff, who thereupon reſolved to take ſome ſignal ſatisfaction for the calumny caſt on his mother and himſelf. He had then a favourite friend named Jonathan, a zealous Sadducee, who took occaſion from it to intimate to him, that Eleazar was but the tool and mouth of the Phariſaic ſect; but that the ſlander muſt have been concerted by the whole party. To convince him of it, he adviſed him to conſult the brotherhood concerning the puniſhment of the calumniator, and he would ſoon find, either by their lenity or ſeverity towards him, whether they had any hand in the calumny.

Hyrcan took his advice, and asked the heads of that ſect, What puniſhment they thought Eleazar deſerved for raiſing ſuch an impi-partiality of his brotherhood in aſſigning him a condign puniſhment, did ſo exaſperate the high-prieſt againſt the whole ſect, that from that time he gave himſelf up wholly to that of the Sadducees, who were not a little glad to aggravate the affront as hatched againſt him by the whole Phariſaic body, tho' one only of them had had the courage to blab it out. From thenceforth therefore there grew the bittereſt enmity between him and that revengeful ſect, who ceaſed not to raiſe troubles and ſeditions againſt him during the ſhort time he lived, and againſt his ſons after him. Hyrcan was then in the twenty-eighth year of his pontificate when this quarrel happened, and he died in the very next year, greatly lamented by all but the Phariſaic crew, who left no ſtone unturned to blacken his memory, and to get into the ſame credit and authority they had formerly enjoyed under him [k] (X).

† See what has been ſaid of theſe marriages, Vol. III. p. 235

Hyrcan

[k] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 18.

ous and unjuſt ſlander on the prince and high-prieſt of their nation? expecting, no doubt, but they would have condemned him to death; but, to his ſurpriſe, they told him, that as calumny was no capital crime, the ſevereſt puniſhment he could inflict on him, was that of ſcourging and impriſonment

There wanted no more to convince the pontiff of the truth of what Jonathan had ſuggeſted to him; ſo that from that time he became an irreconcileable enemy to the whole ſect, forbad, under ſevere penalties, the obſervance of their commandments and traditions, and became a zealous patron of the oppoſite ſect of the Sadducees On the other hand, the Phariſees became mortal enemies not only to him and his family, but to the whole Sadducean party, and never ceaſed plotting againſt them till they had gained the ſaddle again; which they did in ſome few years after, as the ſequel will ſhew.

(X Joſephus is very inconſiſtent in the years of this prelate's reign, if there be not ſome error crept into the copies we have of him, and in the Latin verſion of Ruſinus; for in one place (8) he gives him thirty three, and in two others (9) thirty one; yet Euſebius out of him gives but twenty nine (10), and ſo doth St Jerom in his Latin verſion of him, and elſewhere (11), and rightly too; for, as the learned Uſher obſerves in the place laſt quoted, Simon, Hyrcan's father, died in the 177th year of the Grecian kingdom, and in the

(8) Bell Judaic l. i. c 3. (9) Antiq. l. xiii. c. 18. & l. xx. c 8. (10) In chronic. & demonſt Evang. l. viii. c. 2. (11) Comm. in ix. Dan. Vide & Uſſer. annal. ſub A. M. 3896.

11th

Hyrcan is affirmed by Josephus to have built the stately tower, or rather castle, of Baris (Y), the same which served afterwards for a palace for the Asmonean princes, and was some time after rebuilt, inlarged, and fortified by Herod, and called by him Antonia, in honour of the emperor Marc Antony. This castle was built upon a steep rock, fifty cubits high from the valley that ran beneath it to the top on which the building stood, and was inaccessible on all sides, except that towards the temple, with which it was even. It was of a square figure, two furlongs in compass; that is, half a furlong, or three hundred feet, on every side. The rock stood without the outer square of the temple, and upon the same mountain with, and on the north side of it, running parallel with its outer wall, but incompassed with that which Simon had built to stop the communication between the temple and the fortress of Acra. Here Hyrcan built an apartment, where he deposited his pontifical robes and ornaments, whenever he divested himself of them to vacate on his other affairs; which method was afterwards observed by his successors. Here he kept his court, and spent most of his time; and so did they after him [1], till Herod, observing the strength of its situation, turned it into a fortress; in which, however, the

[1] Bell. Judaic. l. vi. c. 5. Antiq. l. xviii. c. 6. Vide & Lightfoot's view of the temple, c. 7.

11th of month Sebat (12) answering to the 4579th of the Julian period; and his wife Alexandra, who reigned after his sons, died, as the sequel will shew, in December 4644 of the same period; so that the distance is 65 years, and about 9 months; from which if we subtract the 37 years which Josephus allows to her and her sons, the remainder will be 28 years and 9 months.

(Y) St. Jerom. in his comments on those sacred books, which were written after the Babylonish captivity, such as those of Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, and on some other prophets (13), observes the word Baris to be of Chaldee extraction, peculiar to Palestine, and to signify a house or castle inclosed on every side In the same sense the Septuagint have used it likewise; and as that word in the plural is Βαρεις, which likewise signifies heavy, their interpreters have sometimes taken it in the latter sense without any reason, and puzzled thereby several places of scripture, which were plain enough in the former signification, particularly the ivory palaces mentioned by the psalmist (14).

(12) Vide 1 Maccab xvi. 14. (13) Vide & comm in Jerem. xxii. & Hos. ix. (14) Psal. xlv, 8. Vide Calm. sub voce Baris.

prieſtly attire was ſtill kept, even after the Jews were ſubdued by the Romans, and under the cuſtody of the commander of that garifon, called by St. Luke the captain of the temple [m]. This officer kept them in his cuſtody under lock and ſeal, and delivered them up to the high-prieſts upon all ſolemnities in which they were required; immediately after which they were put into his hands again, as we ſhall ſee in the next ſection.

Hyrcan left three ſons, according to the fourth book of Maccabees (Z), or five, according to Joſephus [n], who gives us, however, the names but of four of them; namely, Ariſtobulus, who was alſo called Judas, and ſurnamed Philellen, by reaſon of his fondneſs for the Greeks; 2. Antigonus; 3. Alexander, and Abſalom, who was the youngeſt. What was the name of the fourth he no-where tells us. Ariſtobulus ſucceeded his father in all his dignities in right of primogeniture, according to the Moſaic law; and having a great affection for his brother Antigonus, he admitted him to ſhare the government with him for ſome ſhort ſpace; after which, upon ſome ſuſpicion or diſlike, he cauſed him to be put to death. The other three he kept cloſe priſoners during his ſhort reign, which laſted but one year, which he yet ſtained with his own mother's blood; for that princeſs having claimed a right to the ſovereignty, by virtue of Hyrcan's will, her unnatural ſon not only ſhut her up in a priſon, but there barbarouſly ſtarved her to death. Soon after this he aſſumed the title of king, and began to wear the royal diadem, which, if we may believe Joſephus, had never been done by any of his predeceſſors [o], who had till then Ariſtobulus ſucceeds Hyrcan. Year of the Flood, 2892. Before Chriſt, 107.

His cruel reign.

[m] Acts xxi. 31. & ſeq & alib. [n] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 19. & l. xiv c. 8. bell. Judaic l. i. c. 3. [o] Antiq. l. xiii c. 19 & bell Judaic ubi ſupra.

(Z) This author adds (15), that Hyrcan was ſo exceſſively fond of his two eldeſt ſons, that he would name neither to the ſucceſſion, but left it wholly to providence to direct it. On the other hand he bore as great an averſion to Alexander who had been pointed out to him as his ſucceſſor in a viſion, of which we have ſpoken in a late note, but yet without attempting any thing againſt him to prevent it Joſephus, on the contrary, tells us, that he left the government to his wife during her life, tho', by the cruelty with which her eldeſt ſon uſed her, one would rather think, that ſhe had forged ſome ſuch will againſt him.

(15) Cap. vii.

contented

contented themselves with the title of governors, or at most with that of prince (A). As soon as he had settled his affairs at home, he marched at the head of his army to invade Iturea; but being taken ill in the midst of his successes, he was forced to be brought back to Jerusalem, and to leave his brother to complete the conquest of that province (B); which he soon after did, causing all the Itureans either to be circumcised and incorporated with the Jews, or else to depart into some other country [P].

Invades Iturea.

WHILST he was carrying on this successful war, there wanted not those at court, who, envying his happiness, endeavoured to prepossess the sick king with strange suspicions against him. The queen more particularly seemed to have conceived some irreconcileable hatred against that prince, and to have been the chief engine of his ruin; which happened soon after, when Antigonus innocently furnished her with the means of working it more effectually. For as soon as he had finished the conquest of Iturea, he marched directly to Jerusalem, it being then the feast of tabernacles; and being in haste to repair to the temple, to offer up his thanks for his success, and his vows for his brother's recovery; he went directly thither in his armour, without staying to shift his cloaths, and accompained with a number of his men. This was immediately interpreted to the timorous king as a Antigonus murdered.

[P] Id. ibid. c. 20.

(A) We have seen, however. in a late note *, that Hyrcan took the royal name and dignity upon him long before Strabo says (16), that it was Alexander, Aristobulus's successor, who first took that title upon him

(B) This province was so called from Itur the son of Ishmael, whom our English and some other versions wrongly call Jetur. It was situate on the other side of Jordan, on the north side of the half tribe of Manasseh, be tween that and the territories of Damascus; so that it made one part of Cœle-Syria, and did lie on the one side of Judæa, as Idumæa, formerly conquered in the same manner, did lie on the other It had the province of Battanea on the east, and the Trachonitis mentioned by St. Luke (17) on the south (18). The Reubenites, Simeonites, and Manassites, are said in the chronicles to have invaded these territories (19), and to have subdued the Itureans.

* Supra, p 76. in fin not. (Q). (16) Lib. xvi. (17) c iii. 1. (18) Vide Reland. Palæst. l. i. c. 22. (19) 1 Chron. v. 19.

manifest

manifeſt attempt upon his life, to which he gave but too eaſy credit. However, to ſatisfy himſelf more fully about it, he ſent him orders to put off his armour, and to come immediately to him, which, if he complied with, would ſufficiently juſtify him; but if not, would fully prove his treaſonable intent. The king was then at his caſtle of Baris, mentioned a little higher, where he ordered ſome of his guards to be privately poſted in the ſubterranean gallery, through which Antigonus was to paſs, and who were charged to murder him, if he preſumed to come armed to him. But the miſchievous queen corrupted the meſſenger, and made him go and tell the young prince, that his brother having heard his armour highly commended, deſired to ſee him in it immediately; ſo that when Antigonus came to paſs through the gallery, the guards fell immediately upon him and killed him (C). The king, however, was ſoon undeceived, and could not think upon his brother's murder without reflecting on the more cruel one, which he had lately committed on his own mother; the remorſe of which increaſing his diſeaſe, he fell into a violent vomiting of blood. A ſervant happening ſoon after to ſpill ſome of that blood, which he was carrying away in a baſon, upon the very ſpot where that of his brother Antigonus was ſtill to be ſeen; ſome of the by-ſtanders, thinking he had done it wilfully, gave a great cry, which was heard by the king. He ſent

(C) The gallery here ſpoken of was, it ſeems, under one of the towers of the caſtle, called upon ſome account or other Straton's tower; and ſo verified, according to Joſephus, the prediction of one Judas, of the ſect of the Eſſenians, concerning this prince's death. This man, who was then at Jeruſalem, had foretold, ſome time before, that Antigonus ſhould be killed on that very day at Straton's tower; but as he underſtood it of another more famed on the ſea-coaſt, and at a diſtance from this, he was not a little ſurprized to ſee that prince come to the temple, looking upon it as a demonſtration of the falſhood of his prediction, ſince, the day being already far advanced, it was impoſſible for him to reach it, it being above ſix hundred furlongs from Jeruſalem.

This threw him into ſuch a fit of raving, that he vented his complaints for the ſuppoſed deluſion in a very indecent manner, and, Jonas like, cried out, it had been better for him to have been dead, before he had been found a falſe prophet. Whilſt he was in the height of his murmuring, news was brought of Antigonus's murder, and the name of the tower convinced both him and the reſt of the truth of his prediction (20).

(20) Antiq. l. xiii. c. 19. Bell. Jud. l. i c. 3.

to aſk the meaning of it, and found them unwilling to acquaint him with it; which made him ſtill more deſirous of knowing it. At length he forced the fatal ſecret from them, which threw him into an exceſs of grief and deſpair, which he vented in words to this effect: Since the privacy of the place could not hide from God's all-ſeeing eye the deteſtable deed I have committed, but muſt now vomit up my own blood, as it were, by drops, to atone for that which I have ſo inhumanly ſhed, would not a ſpeedy death be much more deſirable to me? He gave up the ghoſt ſoon after, having reigned but one year (D), and was ſucceeded by his brother Jannæus, or Alexander, whom the queen Salome, called by the Greeks Alexandra, releaſed out priſon with his other two brethren, and cauſed him to be proclaimed king, as being the eldeſt of the three, and of a milder diſpoſition than either of them.

HE was, however, forced to begin his reign with the death of his fourth brother, who had made ſome treaſonable attempt againſt him; but was much kinder to Abſalom the youngeſt of all, whom finding contented to lead a private life under him, he took under his protection as long as he lived; and ſo privately did this prince live, that we hear no more of him, till above forty two years after, when, having ingaged in the war againſt the Romans, he was taken by Pompey and ſent priſoner to Rome. Alexander being a ſubtle and warlike prince, and Syria being then torn by civil wars between the contending brothers, Antiochus Cyzicus and Antiochus Gypus *, and therefore in no capacity to oppoſe him, he led an army in the very firſt year of his reign againſt the city of Ptolemais; but met with worſe ſucceſs in that ſiege than any of his predeceſſors had done, being forced to raiſe it to ſuccour his own territories, which were invaded by Ptolemy Lathyrus, who took from him the city of Azochis in Galilee, and carried off ten thouſand captives, and gave him ſoon after a dreadful overthrow near the banks of the Year of the Flood 2895. Before Chriſt, 104.

* See Vol. VIII. p. 26, & ſeq.

(D) Ariſtobulus had ſo far ingratiated himſelf to the Greeks, of whom he was exceſſive fond, that they were great admirers of him; and Joſephus quotes one of their authors (21), who gives him the character of a prince of great equity and beneficence; but the actions of his ſhort reign ſhew him to have been of a quite different diſpoſition.

(21) Timagen. ap. Strabon. ex Joſeph. Antiq. ubi ſupra.

Jordan,

Jordan, as we have seen in a former chapter †. This defeat, in which he loſt thirty thouſand men, beſides thoſe that were taken priſoners, and which was a juſt reward for his treachery to that prince, would infallibly have opened a way for the latter into Judæa, Alexander being now in no condition to have ſtopped his progreſs; had not Cleopatra come to his aſſiſtance. It was indeed that princeſs's intereſt not to let Lathyrus grow too great, and be thereby enabled to come and wreſt the crown from her; but there was another ſpring that moved her to what ſhe did. The Jews of Alexandria were highly in her favour, and Chelkias and Ananias, two of the moſt conſiderable, being the ſons of Onias the high-prieſt, who built the Jewiſh temple at Alexandria, were at the head of affairs: and theſe could not behold Judæa in ſuch imminent danger from an exaſperated enemy, without uſing all their intereſt with that queen to prevent it. We ſhall not repeat what has been ſaid in a former chapter  concerning the ſucceſs of her arms againſt that competitor. Alexander reaped ſo far the benefit of it, that it obliged Lathyrus to ſet aſide the invaſion of Paleſtine for ſome time; and Cleopatra being come to Ptolemais, which had ſurrendered to her, the Jewiſh monarch came to acknowledge her favour to him by preſents ſuitable to her dignity. He was received outwardly like a prince in diſtreſs, and who had no other refuge than her friendſhip; but that which ingratiated him moſt to that politic princeſs was, his being an enemy to her ſon Lathyrus, who was by that time returned into Paleſtine, and had taken his winter-quarters at Gaza.

Year of the Flood 2897. Before Chriſt, 102.

Alexander aſſiſted by Cleopatra.

During Alexander's ſtay with Cleopatra, ſome of her friends adviſed her to take ſo favourable an opportunity to make herſelf miſtreſs of Judæa; which would at once increaſe her dominions and ſtrength, and give her a ſuperiority over her competitor. But Ananias the Jew lately mentioned, who was one of her lead generals, diſſuaded her from ſuch an attempt, alledging, that it would be very ungenerous and unjuſt to diſpoſſeſs of his dominions an ally, who was come to implore her friendſhip and aſſiſtance; that it would leſſen her character in the eyes of the world, and, above all, make her deteſted by all the Jews. Theſe reaſons, joined to the influence which that general, who was Alexander's kinſman, had over her, did not only divert her from her deſign, but procured an alliance between them, which was concluded in the city of Scythopolis; after which Alexander returned to Jeruſalem, where, being now pretty ſecure of any danger from Lathyrus, he recruited his broken army, and, croſſing the Jordan, went to beſiege Gadara, and took it at the end of ten months. From thence he marched to Amathus another ſtrong fortreſs on that ſide of the river, into which Theodotus the ſon of Zeno, tyrant of Philadelphia, had laid up an immenſe treaſure; and took it in a much ſhorter time than he had that of Gadara; and with it all Theodotus's treaſure. But he did not keep it long; that prince, having got together a numerous army, fell ſuddenly upon him, as he was returning from the ſiege, killed him ten thouſand men, routed the reſt, recovered all his wealth, ſeized on Alexander's baggage, and carried off a conſiderable plunder from his men [q]. This defeat however, did not diſcourage Alexander from purſuing his warlike views, only it afforded great matter of triumph to the Phariſees, his implacable enemies, who took occaſion from thence to vilify him to the people, and to uſe all poſſible means to make his crown ſit uneaſy on him.

† Ibid. p. 118.  Ibid. p. 115, & ſeq.

to

Takes Gadara.

Year of the flood, 2899. Before Chriſt, 100.

As ſoon as Alexander had recruited his army, he ſtayed not in Jeruſalem to quell the Phariſaic faction, but left them to make the moſt of his late diſgrace, whilſt he went to vent his reſentment on the treacherous Gazeans, who, by inviting Lathyrus againſt him and furniſhing him with auxiliaries, had been the cauſe of his late overthrow. He immediately beſieged the towns of Raphia and Anthedon, ſince called Agrippias by Herod: theſe two places ſtood at a few miles diſtance from Gaza, by which means having in ſome meaſure blocked up this laſt, he on the next year ſet about beſieging it with a powerful army. The city, being then under the command of Apollodotus, a man of great valour and conduct, made a ſtout defence againſt him one whole year, and in one ſally were like to have routed him and his army; and much longer it might have held out in all likelihood, had not the brave governor been treacherouſly murdered by his own brother Lyſimachus, and the place betrayed by him to the beſiegers. Alexander upon his entering it made great ſhew of clemency to the Gazeans, but ſoon betrayed his rancour and cruelty againſt them, by abandoning them to the fury of his men; who thereupon made ſuch horrid ſlaughter of them, as was like to have proved a dear revenge to him; for the Gazeans, ſtanding deſperately on their own defence, killed him almoſt as many of his men as he did of theirs. Having at laſt glutted himſelf with the blood of thoſe unfortunate wretches, he vented the reſt of his reſentment on that great and antient city, by reducing it into a heap of ruins; after which he returned with his army to Jeruſalem[r]. The fourth book of Maccabees adds[f], that he took afterwards the cities of Emath and Tyre, but Joſephus ſays nothing of it.

Goes againſt Gaza.

His cruelty to the Gazeans.

[q] Antiq. l. xiii. 21.

BUT whilſt he had been abroad with his army, the Phariſees, who, as we hinted before, bore a mortal hatred to him and his whole family, had taken ſuch means to exaſperate the people againſt him by evil ſurmiſes and ſlanders, which they privately inſtilled into them, that it broke out at laſt into an open affront, which came little ſhort of a rebellion. They choſe the feaſt of tabernacles, on which ſolemnity they go to the temple with palm and other branches in their hands, eſpecially that of a kind of citron, which they call attrog, with the fruit upon it (E); and when he was performing the prieſtly office at the great altar, probably on the laſt day of that ſolemnity, they pelted him, not only with thoſe attrogs but with the moſt injurious reflections and opprobrious

Alexander pelted by the people

Year of the Flood 2904. Before Chriſt 95.

[r] Ibid. [f] cap. xxix.

(E) This attrog, which the Jews imagine to have been the forbidden fruit which our firſt parents eat in paradiſe, very much reſembles a citron or lemon, except that it has on the rind ſome unevenneſſes, (ſuch as we obſerve ſometimes in the Seville orange) and which they fondly believe to have been originally impreſt upon it by Eve's planting her teeth upon it, from which time they think that fruit has retained the print of it on both ſides.

Where-ever therefore it is to be had, they carry it during this feſtival in their hands to the ſynagogues, as they did then to the temple, and are very curious in the choice of ſuch only as beſt repreſent that fatal bite; and as our Jews here, and in Holland, Germany &c. are forced to have it from ſome parts of Greece, none but the richer ſort are able to purchaſe it; and it ſometimes happens, either through contrary winds, ſhips being taken or caſt away, that there is ſuch a ſcarcity of them, that the price of them advances to a guinea a ſprig Thoſe who are curious enough may ſee them on that feſtival in their ſynagogues, it ſeldom or never happening but ſome quantity is brought over againſt that time. But when it doth, they are forced to ſubſtitute ſome other odoriferous tree inſtead of it; but the poorer ſort content themſelves with branches of willows.

On the ſeventh day, which cloſes the feſtival, they break their branches or throw them away; and we ſuppoſe it was on this day that the mutinous crowd did pelt the high-prieſt with thoſe attrogs, they being ſo common at that time in Paleſtine, that the meaneſt people might purchaſe them.

language, language, crying aloud, that ſuch a ſlave as he (F) was unworthy of either the pontifical or regal dignity. This inſolence, which ſeemed the fore-runner of ſomething worſe, did ſo exaſperate the pontiff, that, ſuſpending his office for a while, he ordered his ſoldiers to fall upon the mutinous mob; which they did with ſuch ſpeed and fury, that they killed ſix thouſand of them, and diſperſed the reſt[t]. As ſoon as the tumult was quelled, he cauſed the court of the prieſts to be incloſed with a wooden wall, to prevent ſuch inſults being offered to him for the future, and at the ſame time provided for his further ſafety, by taking into his pay ſix thouſand auxiliaries out of Piſidia and Cilicia, being afraid to truſt his perſon any longer to the guard of thoſe of his exaſperated nation, who, as he found now to his great grief, were not to be quelled by the greateſt ſeverities, nor mollified by the greateſt lenitives. So that being quite wearied out with their continual clamours, he marched out of Jeruſalem at the head of his army, croſſed the Jordan, and went and deſtroyed the city of Amathus, without meeting with any oppoſition from Theodotus, who contented himſelf with carrying off his treaſure and gariſon, leaving the city to his mercy; ſo dreadful was become the name of Alexander by this time to all the nations round about. From thence he marched againſt the Arabians, whom he ſubdued; after which he laid the Moabites and the mountaineers of the land of Gilead under tribute. Makes war abroad. Soon after this, as he was carrying on the war againſt Obdas king of the Arabians, he fell into an ambuſh near Gadara, where he was forced by a large drove of camels into a ſtreight ſo narrow and craggy, that it was with the greateſt difficulty that he eſcaped and regained his own metropolis (G). Here he

[t] Antiq. l. xiii. 21. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 3.

(F) By calling him a ſlave, it is plain, they harped upon that ſcandalous ſuggeſtion of Eleazar mentioned in a late note, of his mother having been a ſlave But the true foundation of the Phariſaic grudge was his treading in his father's ſteps, not only in careſſing the oppoſite ſect, but in continuing the penal laws againſt thoſe who ſhould obſerve the traditions and cuſtoms introduced by the Phariſees. This was ſuch a crime againſt them, that nothing but his blood could expiate, and they did not ſcruple to tell him ſo ſoon after, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel.

(G) Joſephus mentions theſe wars ſo confuſedly, that it is impoſſible to gueſs at what time they happened, or how long they laſted.

he found to his great mortification, that the news of this laſt defeat had not only reached the place, but had given a new life to his enemies, who began to exclaim louder than ever againſt him. His endeavours to quell them, as he had done before, did now but increaſe the tumult, till it broke out into an open inſurrection againſt him. He was however, too wiſe and brave to be either ſurpriſed or terrified by it, but quickly gathered a number of forces to make head againſt them. A civil war immediately enſued, which laſted ſix whole years, during which above fifty thouſand of the rebels loſt their lives, beſides thoſe he loſt on his own ſide (H), and the innumerable calamities it brought on the Jewiſh nation.

The Phariſees cauſe a rebellion

Alexander, however, tho' he ſtill got the better of them, was ſo weary with deſtroying both his people and country, that he ſpared no means, no offers or promiſes, to bring matters to a pacification. But as he had to do with a crew of rebels, and they of the Phariſaic leaven, every advance he made did but harden them the more. At length being reſolved, if poſſible, to bring them to a better mind, he ſent ſome of his friends to know what would ſatisfy them, promiſing to grant them whatever they ſhould in reaſon and juſtice demand. To this they unanimouſly cried out, that he muſt cut his own throat, telling him at the ſame time, that he ought to think highly of them, if they thought his death a ſufficient recompence for the blood he had ſhed, and the miſchiefs he had brought upon his nation [u]. This anſwer made him loſe all hopes of an accommodation, and look out for ſome more effectual means to ſuppreſs their horrid inſolence, whilſt they, on the other hand, ſent to Damaſcus, to beg of [u] Id. ibid.

It ſeems as if he had lumped them thus together at the fag end of a chapter (22), to ſhew his readers what a warlike prince Alexander was, and that his neighbours led but a weary life during his reign. Perhaps it would have been better for him to have continued them longer, ſince his return to Jeruſalem proved the cauſe of freſh tumults, which ended at laſt in an open rebellion.

(H) The fourth book of the Maccabees tells us, that this inteſtine war was between the Phariſees and Sadducees; and that Alexander having declared himſelf againſt the former, had put fifty thouſand of them to death, within the ſpace of theſe ſix years; which did ſo exaſperate the reſt of them, that they would hearken to no accommodation, but ſent to invite Demetrius king of Syria to come to their aſſiſtance againſt him (23).

(22) Ant. l. xiii. in fin. cap. 21. & Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 3.
(23) Cap. xxix.

of

of Demetrius, ſurnamed Euchærus, to come to their aſſiſtance [w].

Demetrius came accordingly into Judæa, with an army of three thouſand horſe and fourty thouſand foot, who were partly Jews and partly Syrians; and Alexander came againſt him with another, conſiſting of ſix thouſand Greek auxiliaries and twenty thouſand Jews; each of them tried for ſome time to gain over the troops of his competitor, Demetrius to debauch the Greek auxiliaries to forſake the Jewiſh king, and this latter to bring over thoſe Jews that were in the Syrian army. But all their efforts proving vain, they came at length to a deciſive battle, in which Alexander was defeated, and forced to flee to the mountains for ſhelter, with the ſmall number of men that ſtuck cloſe to him. This is the account which Joſephus gives us of this action, wherein he again claſhes with the fourth book of Maccabees, which makes the advantage to have been vaſtly on Alexander's ſide, as the reader may ſee in the margin (I). But be that as it will, the former tells us that he was reduced by this defeat to ſuch a low ebb, that he ſeemed irrecoverably loſt, when an unexpected accident turned again the ballance on his ſide. Thoſe Jewiſh troops, whom he could not, with all his art and fair promiſes, withdraw from the enemies army, before the battle was fought, were now, upon his loſing it, taken with ſuch a fit of compaſſion, that they came all over to him; ſo that Demetrius Alexander defeated by Demetrius. Relieved.

[w] Ibid. c. 22. Bell. Judaic. ubi ſupra.

(I) This author tells us (24), that Alexander defeated the Syrian king, and purſued him quite to Antioch, where he kept him beſieged three whole years; that at length Demetrius, having ventured out with his army againſt him, was killed; and that Alexander, after this ſecond victory came back to Jeruſalem, where he was well received by the people; that he went afterwards and ſubdued the Idumeans, Moabites, Ammonites, Philiſtines, and Arabian mountaineers; but all this ſeems exaggerated, and Joſephus's account perhaps more juſtly preferred to it, who is ſeldom leſs liable to ſuſpicion, than when he ſpeaks againſt his own nation. Yet it muſt be remembered here, that Joſephus was a zealous phariſee, and Alexander an inveterate enemy to, not to ſay in ſome meaſure a proſecutor of, that whole ſect; and how far this conſideration may have ſowered the phariſaic leaven in that hiſtorian, and have made him repreſent that prince as leſs ſucceſsful than he really was, and guilty of ſuch cruelties as he was a ſtranger to, may be eaſily gueſſed,

(24) Chap. xxix.

metrius,

metrius, fearing left the the defection should still increase, left Judæa and mached against his brother Philip. This retreat gave Alexander an opportunity of getting his army together, with which he marched against the rebellious Jews, and beat them in every engagement he had against them; though without being able to bring them to submission, or in the least abate the fury of their resentment against him, till a decisive battle put an end to the war. In this last action A- Year of the Flood, 2913. Before Christ, 86. lexander cut off the greater part of their army, and drove the rest, at least the chief of them, to Bethome, where he closely besieged them, and on the next year made himself master of the place; and here it was that he began to let loose the reins of his fury against them, in such barbarous manner, as can hardly be read without horror, if our historian has not exaggerated the matter. He caused eight hundred of the principal of them to be carried to Jerusalem, and there to be all crucified, in one day and at one place; and as if this had not been punishment sufficient to appease his resentment, he caused their wives and children to be brought and butchered before their faces, whilst they were hanging each upon their cross. But what swells the account of his barbarity almost beyond all credibility is, that he caused a banquet to be prepared for himself and his concubines, near enough to this scene of horror, from whence he might glut his eyes with their sufferings. Hence the historian adds [x], that he had the name of Tracidas or Thracian given him, that nation being infamous above all others for their horrid barbarities; and was indeed a name rather too good for him, if he was really guilty of all these cruelties.

His cruelty to the rebels.

After this dreadful havock the rebels did quite disperse themselves, and eight thousand of them disappeared on the very night following, and never more molested him during the remainder of his reign, so that from that time forth the pharisaic faction never dared to lift up their heads as long as he lived. Soon after this, the king of Syria, intending to invade the territories of Arabia Petrea, marched his army through part of Judæa, which was the only passage he could have to come thither. Alexander, who suspected him to have some design against him, endeavoured in vain to obstruct him, by drawing a deep trench twenty miles long, that is, from the town of Capherſaba, now Antipatris, quite to the sea of Joppa, and fortifying it with wooden towers at convenient distances. Antiochus forced his way through them and penetrated

[x] Id. ibid.

into

into Arabia, where he loſt his life, as we have ſeen elſewhere * ; and Alexander, being rid of that fear, marched his army over Jordan to recover ſome of thoſe places in Arabia and the lands of Moab and Gilead, which he had formerly taken, but had been forced to ſurrender during the civil wars, to prevent the Arabian king's ſupporting his rebellious ſubjects. This brought Aretas, now king both of Arabia and Cœle-Syria, into Judæa, where he defeated Alexander ; but having ſoon after made a treaty with him, he retired with his forces, and left him to purſue his other conqueſts. Alexander accordingly marched againſt the city of Dion, and took it by aſſault [y]. Pella was taken next [z], after which he went and beſieged Eſſa, alias Geraſa, into which Theodotus had ſecured all his treaſure ; and having built a treble wall about it, took it by ſtorm, and carried off all the rich plunder he found in it. The inhabitants of Pella having refuſed to be circumciſed, he forced them, according to the cuſtom of the Aſmonean princes, to leave the country, and their city was demoliſhed. Alexander marched from thence and took Gaulana, Seleucia, the valley of Antiochus, and Gamala, and ſtripped Demetrius, who commanded in thoſe places, of his principality, becauſe he had been guilty of ſome foul crimes and malverſations. This expedition took him up three whole years, after which he returned triumphant to Jeruſalem, and brought Demetrius priſoner with him thither, where his late conqueſts gained him the loud acclamations of his ſubjects [a]. But giving himſelf from thenceforward to drinking and other debaucheries, he was ſeized with an obſtinate quartan ague, which ſtuck to him till the day of his death, which happened about three years after. All this while, neither his diſtemper, nor his pleaſures, which he ſtill purſued, could alleviate his invincible thirſt after conqueſts (K). Perhaps alſo he was in hopes to overcome

His conqueſts.

His death.

Year of the flood, 2920. Before Chriſt, 79.

* See Vol. IX p. 32. [y] Antiq. ibid. c. 23. [z] Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 4. [a] Antiq. ubi ſupra.

(K) Witneſs the vaſt number of places he died poſſeſſed of, in Syri , Idumea, Phœnicia, Arabia, &c. beyond all his predeceſſors, and which we ſhall here ſubjoin out of Joſephus, that the reader may have them all in one view †.

Along the ſea, the tower of Straton, the ports of Apollonia, Joppa, Jamnia, Azotus, Gaza, Anthedon, Raphia, and Rhinocorura. In the mid land of Idumea, Adora, Mariſſa, and all Samaria, with the mountains of Carmel and Itabyr, and the cities of † Antiq. l. iii. 23,

Scythopolis,

overcome the one by the other; but it happened quite otherwiſe, and his ſtrength being quite exhauſted by fatigues and debauch, he died in his camp before Ragaba, a fortreſs in the territories of the Geraſens, beyond Jordan, which he was then beſieging, in the twenty-ſeventh year of his reign [b].

He left two ſons at his death, Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus, but bequeathed the government of the kingdom to his wife Alexandra during her life, and then to which of her two ſons ſhe ſhould think fit to leave it. The queen, who was then with him at the ſiege, ſeeing him to be paſt recovery, addreſſed herſelf to him, all in tears; and, in a moſt pathetic ſpeech, repreſented to him the extreme danger ſhe and her children were going to be expoſed to, from the inveterate grudge which the phariſaic faction did ſtill bear to him, and to all that belonged to him; and who, being the idol of the people, would not fail to make her feel the effects of their bittereſt rancour, by raiſing up new ſeditions againſt her, as they had formerly done againſt him, and perhaps to the total extirpation of his race. As her fears were but too well grounded, they could not but awake thoſe of her dying huſband, who, luckily for her, happened to have ſtill preſence of mind enough to bethink himſelf of an expedient, which would effectually put her out of all danger from that revengeful ſect. Having therefore thought ſome time upon it, he ſpoke to her to this effect: "You know, ſaid he, but too well the cauſe of our mutual enmity; and ſince your ſecurity and happineſs muſt riſe or fall, according as you make them your friends or your foes, when I am dead, be ſure to conceal the ſecret from my army, till they have taken the fort; and then lead them triumphant to Jeruſalem, carry my body along with you, and, as ſoon as you are come thither, ſend for the principal leaders of that factious ſect, and lay it before them, and tell them that you wholly ſubmit it to them, either to give it a burial,

His dying advice to his queen.

[b] Ibid. & bell. Jud. ubi ſupra.

Scythopolis, Gadara, Gaulona, Seleucia, and Gabala. In the land of Moab, Heſhbon, or Eſſebon, Medaba, Lemba, Oron, Telithon, and Zara. In Cilicia, Aulon and Pella; this laſt and that of Gaza were demoliſhed, as we have ſeen before. Beſides thoſe he conquered in Arabia, and was forced to ſurrender to Aretas, and many more in the land of Gilead, and ſome freſh ones in the land of Syria, whoſe names our author has omitted; and what a ſubject would there have been here for a lofty panegyric, had the hiſtorian been a ſadducee, or the prince a phariſee! and how truly is the ſaying verified, Cedunt arma togæ!

or

" or to throw it in the high-way, for the injuries I have " done them. Aſſure them at the ſame time, that, as to " yourſelf, you are ſo entirely devoted to them, that you " deſign to place them again at the head of affairs, and that " you will do nothing without their advice and conſent.
" Give them immediately ſome marks of your favour and " friendſhip, and then you need not doubt but they will not " only extol me to the ſkies, and give me a royal burial,
" but will likewiſe ſupport you, and my ſons after you, in
" the peaceful enjoyment of your kingdom." He juſt lived to give her this ſalutary counſel, and then expired in the forty ninth year of his age.

Alexandra was too wiſe not to follow his injunctions, if they were really his, and not a pretence trumped up by that politic princeſs. However, it had the deſired effect; and the phariſees, glad to ſee themſelves again at the head of affairs, were beyond meaſure laviſh of their praiſes and honours to the deceaſed king. They extolled him for a great conqueror and patriot, they beſtowed a magnificent funeral on him, and applauded above all his wiſdom in bequeathing the government to his queen. He did certainly right in that, ſeeing his eldeſt ſon Hyrcanus, who was then about thirty years of age, was a prince of a ſluggiſh diſpoſition, without ambition or ſpirit. Him therefore the queen thought fit to nominate to ſucceed his father in the pontifical function, not ſo much out of reſpect to his primogeniture, as becauſe he was leſs likely to interfere with the affairs of ſtate than the younger brother; who, being of a more enterprizing genius, was for that very reaſon ſecluded and confined to a private life. But though ſhe had ſo carefully ſecured her prerogative from any attempt from her two ſons, yet was ſhe far enough from enjoying it ſo abſolutely and quietly as ſhe expected. For the phariſees, as they grew more and more powerful, grew alſo more and more inſolent and untractable, inſomuch that the fear of their raiſing a new rebellion forced her to conſent to many of their demands, much againſt her will, as well as her intereſt.

THE firſt thing they obtained of her was, a total revocation of all the edicts which Hyrcan the firſt, and the late king, had made againſt their conſtitutions and traditional doctrines; the next was, an amneſty for all their faction, together with the releaſe of ſuch of their brethren as had been confined ſince the late civil war; and the third was, the recalling of all thoſe who had been either baniſhed or forced to fly the country ſince the concluſion of it, and their being reinſtated into the poſſeſſion of all their forfeited eſtates.

By the firſt of theſe, the phariſaic traditions grew again into credit, by which means they became more and more numerous; and that ſect being at full liberty to impoſe them on the people at their pleaſure, they not only became an intolerable burden to the people, but by degrees quite obliterated the written word, of which they were pretended to be the true ſenſe and explanation; and by the other two decrees, they ſo increaſed and ſtrengthened their party, that the queen was now afraid to deny them any thing; whereby they became ſtill more exorbitant in their demands, till they let her ſee plainly that they deſigned to leave her only the name of ſovereignty, and the power to command her ſubjects to obey them. She retained indeed ſix thouſand auxiliary troops in her pay, by which ſhe kept at leaſt her neighbours and conquered provinces in awe, and received from time to time freſh hoſtages from them [c]. But as the phariſaic crew looked upon this as the effects of their friendſhip to her, they claimed all the merit of her peaceful reign to themſelves, and ſoon gave her to underſtand, that nothing leſs than the total extirpation of the Sadducees, who were the only ones that ſtuck cloſe to the late king, ſhould purchaſe the continuance of their friendſhip and aſſiſtance. They began with inſting upon her puniſhing all thoſe, who had counſelled him to crucify the eight hundred rebels lately mentioned, with immediate death. Accordingly Diogenes, one of the chiefs of the Sadducees, and a confident of Alexander, was preſently diſpatched, and after him a great many others, againſt whom they laid the ſame accuſation, right or wrong, that is, againſt as many of that ſect as they thought had been too attached to that monarch's ſervice [d].

Year of the Flood, 2922. Before Chriſt, 77.

Sadducees proſecuted.

THESE proſecutions were continued ſeveral years, though much againſt the queen's mind, who could not but feel ſome lively remorſe to ſee ſo many of her huſband's moſt zealous friends daily butchered; but the phariſees ſtill inſiſting, that to put a ſtop to theſe ſeverities would be to ſtop the courſe of juſtice, contrary to the laws of God, and the ſecurity of every good government; the fear of a new inſurrection, the dreadful effects of which ſhe had ſo lately felt, made her ſtill look upon thoſe executions as the leſſer evil of the two. At length ſome of the moſt conſiderable perſons of that perſecuted party, having got young Ariſtobulus at their head, came to the royal palace, to beſeech the queen that Petition the queen.

[c] Antiq. ubi ſupra, comp. with l. xx. c. 8. & bell. Jud. l. i. c. 4. [d] Id. ibid.

ſhe

ſhe would put an end to their miſery. They reminded her of their great ſervices and invincible loyalty to her late huſband, and that it was in conſideration of it that he had beſtowed on them thoſe marks of his favour and eſteem, which expoſed them now to the fury of their enemies. They conjured her not to ſuffer the late king's beſt and moſt loyal friends to be thus daily ſacrificed to the rancour of his ambitious and bittereſt enemies, in a time eſpecially of a profound peace, and under her government, who had been a witneſs of all the difficulties and hardſhips they had ſuffered with and for him. They concluded with their earneſt prayer, that if ſhe could not ſuppreſs the phariſaic rage againſt them, ſhe would at leaſt give them the liberty of ſheltering themſelves from it, either by retiring into ſome foreign countries, or by her placing them in ſuch of her gariſons, where they might be out of the reach of their enemies. Ariſtobulus at the ſame time backed their petition in ſuch manner, as ſufficiently ſhewed his diſguſt to ſuch cruel proceedings. The queen, though doubtleſs highly affected with their diſtreſs, dared not grant the firſt part of their petition, for fear of exaſperating the phariſees. To grant them the ſecond, that is, to permit them to depart the kingdom, was in fact depriving herſelf of ſo many faithful ſubjects, whoſe friendſhip might one time or other be of ſervice to ſuppreſs the arrogance of that tyrannic ſect. Upon mature deliberation therefore ſhe agreed to the laſt expedient propoſed, of placing them in the ſeveral gariſons of her kingdom, whence ſhe might at any time fetch them when occaſion ſerved, and where they might be either ſafe from their enemies, or at leaſt in a condition to ſtand in their own defence. She excepted, however, thoſe of Hyrcania, Alexandria, and Macheron, in which ſhe had depoſited her moſt valuable treaſures, leſt by ſhewing too great a confidence in them, ſhe ſhould give umbrage to their enemies the phariſees (L). How ſhe took her ſon's interceſſion

(L) The fourth book of the Maccabees (25) takes no notice of their being ſent into gariſons; but only tells us, that ſhe gave them liberty to retire into what cities of Judæa they pleaſed; and that the Eſſenians, no leſs hated by the phariſees, joined themſelves to them.

In this year, our learned Uſher obſerves (26), was born Herod, ſince king of Judæa, of whom we ſhall have a great deal to ſpeak in the ſequel; for he was twenty five years old when he was made governor of Galilee, in the year before Chriſt 47.

(25) Ch. xxxii. (26) Sub. A. M Jul. Per. 4642.

Concerning his father Antipas, or, as he grecified his name, Antipater, authors have given us various accounts, according as they were well or ill affected towards his ſon. Thus N. Damaſcen, who had received great obligations from him, and publiſhed his hiſtory in Herod's life, derives his pedigree from one of the principal Jews that returned from the Babyloniſh captivity; for which flagrant flattery Joſephus, who muſt have been better informed, doth ſharply reprove him, and aſſures us (27), that Antipater was of a noble Idumæan family, and had been made governor of Idumæa by Alexander Jannæus, and continued ſo under his queen Alexandra; ſo that, according to this laſt hiſtorian, he was of Idumæan race, but by religion a Jew, the Idumæans having long ſince been proſelyted, and incorporated into the Jewiſh church and ſtate, as we have ſeen before

But a modern jeſuit (28), who has pretended to prove Joſephus's hiſtory to be a mere forgery, makes Herod to have been an Athenian; his proofs are, that he is called in ſome medals a benefactor to Athens, and that there actually was one of his name in that city in Cæſar's time. He has advanced ſeveral other ſingularities concerning that prince, which we may have occaſion to mention, when we come to ſpeak of his reign.

But none have more debaſed his origin than Julius Africanus, who, in his letter to Ariſtides mentioned by Euſebius (29), makes Antipater to have been the ſon of one Herod, an Aſcalonite, who was veſtry keeper of Apollo's temple in that city; and withal ſo poor, that when his ſon (this our great Herod) was taken priſoner by ſome Idumæan robbers, he was not able to redeem him, ſo that he was brought up among thoſe banditti, who were, however, of the Jewiſh religion; and this notion, it ſeems, was readily adopted by ſeveral of the fathers (30).

One thing ſeems beyond contradiction, namely, that one of the main cauſes of the invincible hatred which the whole Jewiſh nation bore againſt that prince, in ſpite of all his grandeur, generoſity, and munificence, was his not being of Jewiſh extract; ſo that what Damaſcen, and after him the Arabic hiſtory, printed at the end of the Paris polyglot, affirm of his noble deſcent, from a Jewiſh ſtock, muſt be falſe and groundleſs.

His oppoſite pedigree from a ſexton of Apollo's temple, is at beſt founded on a tradition, attributed to Chriſt's kinſmen, according to the fleſh, without the leaſt authority, and ſeems to be trumped up to debaſe the whole Herodian family, which was univerſally hated; and can conſequently never outweigh the teſtimony of Joſephus, who wanted neither means nor inclination to inform himſelf of his genealogy, and whoſe authority is ſtill univerſally received, in ſpite of all the cavils which the jeſuit above-quoted has raiſed againſt it.

(27) Antiq. l. xiv c. 2. (28) Hardouin. de Numm. Herodian. (29) Eccl. Hiſt. l. i. c. 6, & 7. (30) Vid. Ambr. Comment. in Luc. c. iii.

ceſſion

ceſſion on their behalf, our hiſtorian doth not tell us; but intimates, that ſhe ſent him ſoon after with an army into Syria againſt Ptolemy Meneus, who infeſted all the neighbouring countries, and that he returned ſoon after without effecting any thing worth notice [e].

ABOUT the ſame time news came to her, that Tigranes king of Armenia was come into Syria with an army of fifty thouſand men, and had beſieged Ptolemais, and that his deſign was to march from thence into Judæa. This news threw the whole kingdom into the greateſt conſternation, it not being in a condition to make head againſt ſuch a powerful invader. She therefore haſtened ſome embaſſadors, laden with the richeſt preſents, to beſeech him to ſpare her dominions, and to grant her his friendſhip. Both preſents and embaſſy were received with marks of the ſincereſt kindneſs and affection, not ſo much out of regard to that princeſs, as to his own affairs, which had by this time taken a different turn; his territories being now threatened with an invaſion from the Romans, who had already penetrated into Pontus and Cappadocia, where Lucullus was then ravaging all that country. So that he was forced to go and defend his own territories, inſtead of invading thoſe of his neighbours [f].

The queen's ſickneſs.

THE queen was ſcarcely rid of this danger before ſhe fell into new ones. A fit of ſickneſs, which ſeized her about this time, dangerous in its nature, and much more ſo on account of her great age, made her youngeſt ſon believe that her death was near at hand, and that it was therefore high time for him to think of ſecuring the crown for himſelf, which his elder brother was unfit for. To this end he went out of Jeruſalem one night, accompanied by one ſingle confident, with a deſign to go and bring over to his intereſt thoſe friends of his father, who had the cuſtody of the ſeveral fortifications, of which we have lately ſpoken. This ſecret he intruſted with none but his own wife, whom he left behind with her children, till he came to the caſtle of Agaba, where Gabeſtus, one of his father's chief confidents, who commanded there, received him with no ſmall joy. He immediately declared to him the deſign of his coming, and the reaſons he had to fear, leſt, if his mother died before he had made ſure of the crown, not only he and his whole family, but all their friends in general, ſhould again fall under the tyranny of the Phariſaic ſect, through the indolence and ſtupidity of his elder brother, who would doubtleſs ſuffer himſelf to be wholly governed by them. As his fears were but too well grounded, he eaſily

[e] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 24. bell. Jud. l. i. c. 4. [f] Id ibid.

gained

Ariſtobulus ſecures the crown.

gained Gabeſtus, whoſe example was ſoon followed by all the governors of the other fortreſſes, who all declared for him. The queen miſſed her ſon from the firſt night, but did not ſuſpect him of any deſign, till the alarmed Phariſees brought her word, that theſe fortreſſes were gone over to his intereſt, by which means he had got in ſome meaſure the whole ſtrength of the kingdom into his hands. As to the army, and even the people who were heretofore ſo ready to idolize their ſect, they were ſenſible they had uſed them of late with ſuch ſeverity and inſolence, that, inſtead of expecting any ſupport from them, they had great reaſon to fear they would upon the very firſt occaſion go over to Ariſtobulus, and embrace the milder government of the Sadducees [g].

THEY had brought Hyrcan with them to the queen, when they came to acquaint her with the diſmal ſituation of their affairs, and both he and they were very preſſing with her to adviſe them what to do in ſuch a dangerous caſe. The queen, who found herſelf dying, had juſt ſtrength enough to tell them, that her condition would not now permit her to think of their ſafety, and that ſhe left it wholly to them to ſee to it themſelves. She added, that they wanted neither ſoldiers, arms, nor money to make head againſt her other ſon, and that ſhe appointed Hyrcan her ſucceſſor. She expired immediately after, in the ſeventy third year of her age, and the ninth of her reign, to the inexpreſſible grief of the Phariſaic faction, who now could expect nothing elſe but a ſevere retaliation for all their cruelties to the late king's friends; but to the great joy of all the reſt of the kingdom, who now hoped to ſee an effectual end put to the Phariſaic tyranny, by her brave ſon Ariſtobulus (M).

The queen's death.

WHILST

[g] Ant. l. xiii c ult. Bell Jud. l. i. c. 4.

(M) This defection from Hyrcan, whom ſhe had nominated her ſucceſſor, to her younger ſon, who was in ſome meaſure in open rebellion againſt her, did not proceed from any diſreſpect the people had for her; for ſhe appears to have been a princeſs of great wiſdom and conduct; and could ſhe have ſuppreſt the Phariſaic tyranny, would have left an unblemiſh'd character behind her; and even this circumſtance of her giving too much way to it, appears to have been rather her misfortune than her fault.

Some authors (31) have abſurdly confounded this queen with Salome the wife, and afterwards the widow, of Ariſtobulus, the el-(31) Capel. & al Vid. Prid. Connect. ſub A. 70.

der

WHILST therefore the hopes of such a happy change brought daily both army and people over to him, the Pharisees found no other expedient to provide for their own safety, than seizing on his wife and children, and confining them in the castle of Baris, to be kept there as hostages against him; but when they found that this did not stop his progress, but that he took the royal title and state upon him, and daily gained strength, they raised an army against him; and Aristobulus, who desired nothing more than a decisive battle, well knowing the valour and fidelity of his army, and that he had little to fear from that of his brother, soon gave him an opportunity of joining issue with him. A battle was accordingly fought near Jericho, in which most of Hyrcan's forces went over to his brother, so that he had no way left but to retire to Jerusalem, and to shut himself up in the same castle, where they had confined Aristobulus's wife and children. The few forces that stuck by him followed his example, and took sanctuary within the verge of the temple, where they had not been long, ere they came over to his victorious brother. Things being brought to this desperate state, Hyrcan was glad to accept of a peace upon any terms; and Aristobulus granted it to him, upon condition that he divested himself of his regal and pontifical dignity, and wholly resigned them to him, and contented himself with a private life, with the enjoyment of his private fortunes. Hyrcan, who, as we have observed more than once, was a man without ambition or spirit, made no difficulty to yield to those conditions, and to divest himself of a government he could keep no longer, after a three month's troublesome possession of it [h] (N).

[h] Ant. l. xiv. c. 1, 2, 3. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 5.

THIS

der brother of the late Alexander, and who, as we observed a little higher, out of Josephus, was also called Alexandra; so that they have supposed her to have been the same person, and that being left a widow, Alexander the next brother had been obliged, according to the Mosaic law, to marry her, and to raise up seed to his brother.

But this has been fully confuted by our learned Prideaux in the place above quoted, since Hyrcan, who is every where allowed to have been the son of Alexander, is there proved to have been five years old before Aristobulus died; for Hyrcan being according to Josephus above eighty years of age when he died, which happened in the year before Christ 30, eighty one years will carry us back to the year before Christ 111, whereas Aristobulus did not die till the year 106.

(N) So says the text in Josephus; but our excellent Usher has clearly

THIS depoſition did not, however, hinder Hyrcan's retaining ſtill a powerful party, which conſiſting chiefly of Phariſees, clearly ſhewn from the ſix years which elapſed between the conſulate of Q. Hortenſius and Q. Metellus, in which Hyrcan began his reign, and that of C. Antonius and M. T. Cicero, in which his brother Ariſtobulus was depoſed by Pompey, that there muſt be an error crept into Joſephus, who allows but three months reign to the former, and three years and ſix months to the latter

But the learned prelate has not ſo well ſucceeded in correcting that miſtake, by ſuppoſing that Hyrcan reigned three years and three months (32), and that the former of the two numbers had been dropped by the careleſſneſs of the tranſcribers; but this ſeems quite contrary to the tenor of Joſephus, who makes his reign and depoſition to have followed much cloſer, than this ſuppoſition will admit of.

Another great antiquary (33) has taken a different way to ſolve the difficulty, by ſuppoſing that Hyrcan was diveſted of his regal dignity after the firſt three months; but that he preſerved the high-prieſthood three years longer, that is, till his flight to Aretas, of which we ſhall ſpeak by and by; and that the three years and ſix months allowed to his brother by the Jewiſh hiſtorian are to be reckoned only from the time that he aſſumed the pontifical dignity. But this is again contradicted by Joſephus, who makes Ariſtobulus to have diveſted his brother of both dignities, and to have taken them upon himſelf at one and the ſame time, and Hyrcan to have been reduced to a private ſtate.

Dean Prideaux, in the place above quoted, ſuppoſes therefore, that the original had ſix years and ſix months, it being more reaſonable that a numerical letter ſhould be changed by the careleſsneſs of the ſcribe, than a whole word, that is, that he ſhould miſtake a three for a ſix, rather than a month for a year, as in the ſuppoſition of archbiſhop Uſher.

From the objection, that Joſephus in another place (34) gives him but three years reign, and that not in numerical letters, but in words at length, which might be therefore looked upon as a confirmation of the former; the ſame judicious author rather confirms his own hypotheſis in as clear a manner as the ſubject can admit of. To give his anſwer at length would ſwell this note too much; we ſhall therefore content ourſelves with hinting at the main ſtreſs of his argument.

He obſerves, that this laſt place has three years, and the ſame number of months, whereas the former has three years and ſix months; from whence he ſuppoſes, that ſome critic, finding this difference between thoſe two places, and not ſuſpecting this laſt to have

(32) Sub A. Jul per. 4647. (33) Petav. ap Prid. ubi ſupra. (34) Antiq. l. xx. c. 8. a fin. Conf. eund. l. xiv. 11. & 12. 9.

riſees, who had nothing to hope for, but a great deal to fear, from his ſucceſsful brother, were ſtill buſily plotting to raiſe up their old idol over him. This was gladly obſerved by Antipater the father of Herod, whoſe nation and pedigree we have ſpoken of in a late note. This perſon, tho' in all likelihood indifferent as to the diſtinction between Phariſee and Sadducee, being, as we there obſerved, an Idumean proſelyte, was in as great danger of feeling the reſentments of Ariſtobulus, as any of the former ſect. His peculiar ſkill and addreſs, backed by an unmeaſurable ambition, had long before recommended him to the favour of the late king Alexander and of his queen Alexandra, who had beſtowed the government of Idumea upon him; and as he ſtill looked upon Hyrcan as their ſucceſſor, the hopes of advancing himſelf ſtill higher under that ſoft prince, had betrayed him into a more than ordinary zeal for him. So that when he came to ſee his brother on the throne, he had all the reaſon in the world, not only to deſpair of further advancement, but to dread his reſentment. This determined him to join with the diſcontented Phariſees, whom from that time he ſtill took care to fill with fears and jealouſies from that prince, whom he ſtyled an uſurper; and who, he told them, would never think himſelf ſecure, till he had cut off his brother, and with him all that had been in his intereſt. By theſe inſinuations he ſoon drew them into his deſign to dethrone him, and ſet up his brother again; but his great difficulty was to prevail upon Hyrcan to join with them. That prince being of an eaſy and indolent diſpoſition, could not be perſuaded that his brother would attempt any thing againſt his life; neither had he any ambition to recover his loſt dignities, or, if he had, it was eaſily cooled by the danger of attempting it, which he viewed in the moſt diſmal light. When therefore Antipater perceiv- Antipater cabals with the Phariſees.

have been corrupted, that is, three to have been put inſtead of ſix years, has altered the other place according to it, in order to reconcile the Jewiſh hiſtorian; and ſo inſtead of ſix years and juſt as many months, as he found it written, he made it three years and as many months as he found it corrupted in the other place.

This ſuppoſition, which cannot but appear very probable to thoſe who are acquainted with manuſcripts, and with the inadvertency of tranſcribers, as well as the boldneſs of critics in correcting them, takes away at once all the difficulties, reconciles Joſephus to himſelf, and fills up the ſix years ſpace between Hyrcan's reign and Ariſtobulus's depoſition, according to the conſulates under which each of them happened according to the ſame hiſtorian (35).

(35) Conf. ant. l xiv. c. 1, et 8.

ed that fear was his predominant paſſion, he raiſed ſuch a battery againſt it, by repeated aſſurances that his life was in manifeſt danger, and that he muſt reſolve either to reign or die; that the weak prince was at length wrought upon to ſeek for ſafety and aſſiſtance from Aretas king of Arabia.

Carries Hyrcan into Arabia.

As ſoon as he had gained his conſent, he offered himſelf to go and negotiate that affair; which he did with ſuch privacy and diſpatch, that he came back very ſoon after, took Hyrcan with him in the night, and by long journies brought him to Petra, the metropolis of Arabia, where he preſented him to the king. It is likely that Antipater, at his firſt interview with Aretas, had only engaged him to protect Hyrcan againſt his brother; but now they were both at his court, he began to open to him the other part of his deſign, and to convince him how much it would be his intereſt to aſſiſt him in the recovery of his kingdom, by aſſuring him that he ſhould have all the places reſtored to him, which had been heretofore taken from him by the Jewiſh kings, which were very conſiderable (O), and which he muſt never hope to recover, as long as Ariſtobulus was on the throne. He told him moreover, that Hyrcan had ſuch a powerful party in Judæa, ready to join with his forces, that he looked upon the dethroning of the uſurper as a very eaſy taſk. Hyrcan was eaſily perſuaded to confirm all his miniſter had ſaid, and to ratify all the engagements he had made to the Arabian king, who came ſoon after with them into Judæa, at the head of an army of five thouſand men, where he was joined by thoſe of Hyrcan's party. Ariſtobulus marched againſt him, and an obſtinate fight enſued, in which he was totally defeated, and forced to flee into Jeruſalem. Aretas purſued him thither, and entered that metropolis without oppoſition, drove him and his few men, moſt of them prieſts, into the precinct of the temple, and there cloſely beſieged him, whilſt the reſt of the people declared for the conqueror.

Aretas invades Judæa.

Ariſtobulus defeated.

Beſieges the temple.

The temple being thus beſieged, and the approaching feaſt of the paſſover thereby likely to be wholly obſtructed, many of the chief of the the Jews retired into Egypt to celebrate

(O) Theſe were Medeba Nebalo, probably Abela, al Arbela, and Abel of the vineyards; and Rabbah, once the capital of the Ammonites; Livias Agalla, perhaps the ſame with Gallim; Therabaſa, Athone, Zoara, probably Segor; Oronæ, or Oronaim, on the dead ſea; Mariſſa, Rydda, Luſa, and Oryba (36).

(36) Ibid. cap. ii. ad fin. De his vid. Euſeb. loc. Hebr. Bochart &c.

it

it there. On the other hand, the beſieged having neither lambs nor other victims for the ſacrifices of that ſolemnity, Ariſtobulus applied himſelf to the beſiegers to ſupply them with a competent number of them; which thoſe at firſt promiſed, upon condition that they payed them a thouſand drachms of ſilver for every head, and had the money delivered before hand. But when the ſum ſtipulated was let down to them by a rope from the top of the wall, they refuſed to ſend the victims; upon which the prieſts went to the altar, and inſtead of them, offered up their prayers to God, that he would ſpeedily puniſh their perfidious contempt of his religion. To this guilt the beſiegers added another, neither of which went long unpuniſhed.

THERE was at that time in Jeruſalem one Onias, a man in high eſteem for his ſanctity; and who was thought to have ſaved the land from a famine, by obtaining from heaven a comfortable rain, after a long and grievous drought. This good man, ſeeing his unhappy country involved in a civil war, had retired into ſome of the neighbouring deſerts, and hid himſelf there. Him they found out, and brought by main force to the ſiege, and would have obliged him to curſe Ariſtobulus and his adherents. He reſiſted a long time, till conſtrained at length by their threats, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and addreſſed it in words to this effect: O Lord God, ſovereign Governor of the world, ſince theſe that beſiege thy temple are thy people, and thoſe that are beſieged in it are thy prieſts, I beſeech thee to hear the prayers of neither ſide. He had ſcarce pronounced theſe words, before the exaſperated multitude let fly on him ſuch vollies of ſtones as put an end to his life. This double crime brought a double puniſhment very ſpeedily upon them: a vehement ſtormy wind did ſhortly after deſtroy all their fruit and grain, inſomuch, that a meaſure of wheat ſold for eleven drachms, and other proviſions in proportion [1]. But the moſt dreadful of all was, their falling preſently after under the yoke of the Romans; a yoke which they never more could ſhake off, but groaned under the ſevere weight of it, till the utter deſtruction of their city and temple, and their total diſperſion throughout the world, as will be ſeen in the next ſections.

Onias's murder puniſhed.

[1] Ibid & ſeq.

SECT. IV.

The History of the Jews from their being subdued by the Romans to the reign of Herod the Great.

The Romans invited by Aristobulus.

Year of the Flood, 2934. Before Christ, 65.

ARISTOBULUS being thus straitly besieged by the Arabian king, and forsaken by all his party, was forced to have recourse to the Romans; for Pompey, having by this time overcome Tigranes, was retired into the Lesser Armenia, and from thence had dispatched Gabinius into Judæa; and this last having received three hundred talents from Aristobulus, was gone back without acting for or against him. Scaurus came next from Syria into Judæa, and in his way was met by some embassadors from the two contending brothers (P), each to implore his friendship and alliance, for which they offered him four hundred talents. Scaurus, who knew Aristobulus to be the more liberal and the braver of the two, suffered himself to be gained by him; besides, as he rightly judged, it would be the easier task to restore him, since he need but oblige Aretas to raise the siege and to depart out of Judæa, and Hyrcan would soon be abandoned by his party. He therefore wrote a threatening letter to Aretas, in which he told him, that if he did not forthwith withdraw his troops, he should be declared an enemy to Rome, and oblige Pompey to turn his army against him. Aretas, who had no mind to exasperate the Roman general, did readily obey, and led his army out of Judæa, Scaurus returned to Damascus, and Aristobulus being thus timely relieved, gathered up what forces he could, and pursued after the Arabian king. He overtook him and his brother Hyrcan at a place called Papyrion, and gave him a great overthrow, in which he killed seven thousand of his men, and amongst them Cephalion the brother of Antipater [a]. Much about the same time, Pompey being come to Damascus, received embassadors from all the neighbouring states, especially those of Judæa, Syria, and Egypt. These three last being but a kind of usurpers, were extremely desirous to bring the Romans over to their interest, and endeavoured to gain their general by most magnificent presents. Aristobulus for his part sent him a golden vine, upon a square

Aretas defeated by Hristobulus.

[a] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 4. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 5.

(P) The fourth book of Maccabees says (37), that only Aristobulus sent presents to Scaurus, and that Hyrcan omitted it, which determined the Roman general in favour of the former, and made him come to his assistance; but that he retired as soon as he heard that Aretas had raised the siege.

(37) Cap. xxxvi.

mount,

mount, with the fruit on it, and deer, lions, and other beasts about it, all of the same precious metal. This curious piece had been formerly made by Alexander Jannæus, and was now sent by his son to Pompey, who conveyed it to Rome, where it was deposited, in the temple of Jupiter, in the capitol. Strabo tells us [b], that he saw it there, and that it was reckoned worth five thousand talents. However, the senate, not being willing to acknowledge Aristobulus for king of Judæa, caused the present to be inscribed to his father Alexander, king of the Jews.

The two brothers send presents to Pompey.

SOON after this the two contending brothers sent a separate embassy to Pompey, on his coming into Cæle-Syria, each to implore his friendship and patronage against the other; Antipater in behalf of Hyrcan, and Nicodemus in behalf of Aristobulus. Both were heard with seeming equanimity, and dismissed with fair promises, and the two brothers ordered to appear in person, and to plead their causes before him, and, after a full hearing, he engaged to decide the controversy as justice should direct. Unfortunately for Aristobulus, his embassador took it into his head to complain of Scaurus and Gabinius, for having received the former four hundred, and the latter three hundred, talents from his master, by which he made those two generals, who had a great influence on Pompey, to become his enemies [c]; and the fourth book of Maccabees adds, that the Roman general did accordingly promise him to decide in favour of Aristobulus, but did underhand act in favour of his brother [d].

Send a second embassy.

EARLY on the following year, Pompey came again into Syria, where he deposed several petty tyrants, took several fortresses, particularly that of Lysiad, of which Silas a Jew had made himself master, and came at length to Damascus. Here he found the two brothers, who were come to plead their cause and pretensions before him, and had brought a great number of witnesses to their respective pleas. But, besides these, there came also another set of Jews, to plead against them both, alledging, that their nation had been for a long time governed only by the high-priests of the God of Israel, without the regal dignity; and that, though the two brothers were of the sacerdotal race, they had governed them contrary to their antient laws, by taking the power and title of kings, and thereby reducing the Jewish nation into a state of slavery. Hyrcan spoke next, and complained, that, being the elder brother, he had been unjustly deposed by Aristobulus, and by him forced into a private state, with only the income of a few paternal lands, whilſt he, not contented with the revenues of the whole kingdom, committed continual depredations on his neighbours both by ſea and land. For proof of all which he brought a thouſand of the principal Jews, who had been gained by Antipater, to witneſs what he had alledged. To this Ariſtobulus replied, that he had indeed turned his brother out of the government; but that it was, becauſe he was incapable of holding of it, and not from any ambitious views of his own; that Hyrcan was a perſon of ſuch unactive and ſluggiſh diſpoſition, and ſo deſpiſed by the people, that he had been forced to wreſt the power out of his hands, leſt it ſhould be transferred into another family. He added, that as to the royal title, it was no other than his father Alexander had bore before him. The witneſſes he brought to juſtify his pretenſions were, a numerous ſet of young gentlemen ſo ſumptuouſly cloathed, that they rather diſcredited him, and ſeemed to have been introduced to expoſe his vanity more than to back his cauſe. However, Pompey, after a full hearing of all parties, wiſely deferred giving his ſentence, leſt Ariſtobulus, againſt whom he deſigned to declare, ſhould obſtruct his intended expedition againſt the Nabatheans, and contented himſelf with diſmiſſing them with a promiſe, that, as ſoon as he had ſubdued Aretas, he would come himſelf into Judæa, and there determine their controverſy. Ariſtobulus, who looked upon this delay as an ill omen, and did not perhaps care to ſee Pompey in Judæa, went away in a huff, firſt to Delion, and thence into Judæa, without ſo much as taking leave of him [c].

Plead their cause in person.

[b] STRAB. ap. JOSEPH. ubi supra. Vid. & PLIN hist. l. xxxvii. c. 2. [c] Ant. l. xiv. c. 5. [d] c. xxxviii.

come

This proceeding highly offended the Roman general againſt him, who thereupon ſent for his troops, which he had in Syria, and with thoſe which he deſigned againſt the Arabians, and the legions which he had with him, marched ſtrait againſt Judæa. Ariſtobulus had not been idle, but had got a good army under him, and was himſelf at the caſtle of Alexandrion, a place of no ſmall ſtrength (Q), when Pompey entered Judæa. As ſoon as this laſt

[c] Antiq & bell. Jud. ubi ſupra.

(Q) This fortreſs had been built by his father Alexander Jannæus, and was from him called Alexandrion; it was ſituate on a high mountain, in the very entrance into Judæa, near to the town of Coreæ (38), which was the firſt place in Judæa on the Samari-

(38) Vid. Joſeph antiq. l. xiii. c. ult. xiv. 6. & alib.

tan

laſt had reached Corea, he ſent for Ariſtobulus to come to him; who would have willingly excuſed himſelf from it, but was at length prevailed upon by thoſe that were about him to obey the ſummons, and prevent thereby a war with the Roman general. He came accordingly, more than once or twice, to him, and conferred with him about the diſpute between his brother and him, ſparing neither compliments, promiſes, nor preſents, to engage him on his ſide. Pompey as often diſmiſſed him with a ſhew of friendſhip, and ſuffered him to return to his caſtle. At length he propoſed to him that he ſhould put all his fortreſſes into his hands, and ſend orders to all his governors to reſign them to him without heſitation. It was eaſy then for him to ſee now that the Roman general was in his brother's intereſt, and wanted only to put it out of his power to maintain himſelf againſt him. But tho' he had been long before ſuſpecting this partiality, and had taken all poſſible methods to ſecure himſelf againſt it, yet was he forced, tho' much againſt his will, to comply with the propoſal, being now in that general's hands. But as ſoon as he was got away from him, he fled with all ſpeed to Jeruſalem, with full reſolution to defeat his deſign [f].

Pompey comes againſt Jeruſalem.

Pompey was not long in following him thither, and upon his encamping in the plain of Jericho, received the agreeable news, that Mithridates had killed himſelf, and that his treacherous ſon had ſeized upon the kingdom; and in ſuch haſte was the army to know it, that the general, for want of a tribunal to communicate it to them, according to cuſtom, cauſed one to be raiſed by laying a number of ſaddles one upon another, from which he acquainted them with the Pontic king's death, and received their congratulations with the uſual ſignals of joy [g]. He purſued his march on the next day towards Jeruſalem, whence Ariſtobulus, repenting now of what he had done, came out, and went to throw himſelf at his feet, and to beg of him to forbear any hoſtilities againſt the Jewiſh nation, promiſing him a conſiderable ſum of money upon pan ſide, and upon the road to Jericho, on the frontiers of Judah and Benjamin (39). Alexandrion was afterwards the burying place of the Jewiſh kings, ſo that, though it was demoliſhed by the Romans, it was rebuilt by Herod, and his ſons ſent thither to be buried, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel.

[f] Ant. ubi ſupra, c. 6. Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra. [g] PLUTARCH. in vit. Pomp.

(39) Ibid. & bell. Jud. l. v. c. 4.

that

that condition. The general agreed to it, and, keeping him in his camp, ſent Gabinius with ſome troops to receive the money; but he was repulſed by the gariſon, who ſhut the gates againſt him, and refuſed to perform the agreement. This diſappointment ſo exaſperated Pompey, that he ordered Ariſtobulus to be clapt in chains, and marched directly with his whole army againſt the city (R). We have had frequent occaſion to ſpeak of the ſtrength of this place, both with reſpect to its excellent ſituation, and of its other fortifications; ſo that being now ſo well gariſoned and provided, it might in all likelihood have found the Roman general work enough to have taken it by ſiege; but unfortunately for it, thoſe that ſhould have defended it were divided into two parties; that for Ariſtobulus were for ſtanding out to the laſt againſt a general, who dared to keep their king in chains; but that for Hyrcan, which were the more numerous, were on the contrary for opening the gates to him, and prevent thereby the ſad effects of a ſiege and deſtructive war. The prieſts declared for the former, but the generality of the people were for the latter; ſo that Ariſtobulus, finding himſelf overpowered, was forced to retire with his men within the precinct of the temple, breaking down all the bridges between that and the city, that were over the deep valley, which parted thoſe two places; before Pompey could be admitted into the latter.

Beſieges it.

HE was accordingly invited ſoon after, and ſent Piſo, one of his generals, with a number of troops, to ſecure the place and the royal palace, whilſt thoſe that were in the temple were buſy in fortifying every part of it, that could be of ſervice to them to hold on the ſiege. Pompey at firſt ſent to them ſome propoſals of peace, but finding them reſolved to ſtand it out, he ſet himſelf immediately to beſiege them in form. He be-

(R) The fourth book of the Maccabees differs a little from Joſephus, and mentions nothing of this ſubmiſſion of Ariſtobulus to the Roman general; but tells us (40), that Pompey marched directly againſt Jeruſalem, where, obſerving the ſituation of the place, the ſtrength of its walls, towers, &c. he reſolved to try to gain Ariſtobulus by fair means; that he invited him to come to his camp, and promiſed him all the ſafety he could deſire; that he came accordingly, and promiſed that general to deliver up all the treaſure of the temple, if he would declare for him. But that the prieſts having refuſed to ratify their king's promiſe, made the diſappointed general lay ſiege to the temple.

(40) c. xxxvi.

gan

gan with inclosing the place with a ſtrong wall, to prevent either their flight, or their receiving any help from without; Hyrcan gladly furniſhing him with all neceſſary things to carry on the work. Battering rams and other engines of war being brought to him from Tyre, he ordered the attack to be made on the north ſide of the temple, which was the weakeſt, though incloſed with ſtrong walls, high towers, and other fortifications, and had a large deep ditch and a ſpacious valley beneath it. As for the other ſides of it, they were in a manner inacceſſible, after the bridges had been broken down, by reaſon of their craggedneſs and ſteepneſs. The battering engines were accordingly raiſed on mounds and plat-forms, and began to play in earneſt againſt the place, and to fling large ſtones into it, whilſt the beſieged were as induſtrious in levelling the one and diſmounting the other as faſt as they were raiſed by the beſiegers. The ſiege had already took him up three months, and might in all likelihood have laſted much longer, if not perhaps been raiſed, had not the beſieged been ſeized again with their old and fatal ſuperſtition about the breach of the ſabbath, which hindered them from making ſuch a defence as they had formerly, and ſhould now have done.

Strange ſuperſtition of the Jews

WE have had occaſion heretofore to ſhew how deſtructive that notion had been to their forefathers, and how wiſely it had been condemned by the brave Maccabees, ſo that from their time they had made no ſcruple to take up arms againſt an offending enemy; but now they were, it ſeems, taken with a qualm of conſcience, that though it was lawful to ſtand in their defence on the ſabbath, when an actual aſſault was made upon them, it did not therefore follow, that they might do any thing on that day towards preventing thoſe preparatives which the enemy made towards ſuch future aſſaults. This ſcruple had ſuch an effect upon them, that they never moved a hand on that day to hinder either mounds and batteries being raiſed, or breaches being made on their walls; which being at laſt perceived by the beſiegers, they took the advantage of getting all things ready for an aſſault on that day, without throwing either ſtones or any miſſive weapons that might force them on their own defence, ſo that the beſieged let them go on with their other works without the leaſt oppoſition; and ſuch was their zeal for the divine ſervice of the temple, that no annoyance from the enemy could obſtruct it from being performed, with the ſame regularity and calmneſs, as in time of the profoundeſt peace. By theſe means the beſiegers made at length ſo deep a breach by playing down one of their towers, which in its fall brought down a conſiderable part of the wall (S), that they eaſily maſtered the place. Cornelius Fauſtus, the ſon of Sylla, at the head of a number of troops, mounted one end of the breach, Furius the other end, and Fabius in the middle. A horrid ſlaughter immediately enſued, in which no leſs than twelve thouſand of the beſieged were killed by the Romans, beſides many more, who died by their own hands; in this action the Jews of the contrary faction acted with greater fury and cruelty againſt them than the heathen.

The city taken. Year of the Flood, 2935. Before Chriſt, 63.

Admirable conſtancy of the prieſts.

What was moſt ſurpriſing, during this horrid ſcene of action, was the conſtancy of the prieſts, who never intermitted one moment the divine ſervice of the temple, but continued to offer up their uſual prayers, praiſes, and ſacrifices, with the ſame calmneſs and aſſiduity, as if no ſuch ſlaughter had been then acting in the ſacred place; and at laſt ſuffered themſelves to be butchered before the altar, with as much meekneſs and conſtancy, as the victims they were then offering upon it (T). Pompey, though ſurpriſed at their religious conſtancy, cauſed all the priſoners that were found to have been moſt zealous againſt him to be put to death (U), whilſt a great number

(S) The fourth book of the Maccabees (41) ſays, that ſome of the Jews, who were on Pompey's ſide, ſcaled the wall, and, having ſlain all the prieſts that oppoſed them, opened the temple gates to him.

(T) It is obſervable, that the city was taken on the very day on which the Jews were keeping a ſolemn faſt in memory of its having been formerly taken by Nebuchadnezzar, viz. on the 28th of the month Ciſleu, anſwering to our December, according to the learned Uſher (42), who takes the third month here mentioned to have been that of the ſacred year; but it is more probable to have been the third of the civil year called Thammus, anſwering to our June, as dean Prideaux has ſhewn (43). On the ſame day, twenty ſix years after, it was likewiſe taken by Soſius, by which the Jews became ſubject to the Herodian ſceptre (44).

(U) Among theſe is ſuppoſed to have been Abſalom, the uncle and father-in law of Ariſtobulus. This prince, who was a younger ſon of the famed John Hircanus, had led a private life under the protection of his brother Jannæus, without meddling with public affairs, till he unfortunately gave his daughter to Ariſtobulus. For this marriage having drawn him into his ſon-in-law's party, he was taken priſoner, and in all probability put to death. At leaſt no further mention is made of him from that time (45).

(41) Ibid. (42) Sub A. M. 3641. (43) Sub A ant. Chriſt. 63. (44) Antiq. l. xiv. c. ult. (45) Antiq. l. xiv. c. 8.

of

of the reſt prevented him by a deſperate exit, ſome throwing themſelves down the deepeſt precipices, and others ſetting their apartments on fire, burnt themſelves in it. Theſe were the fruits of Ariſtobulus's ambition, and of the two contending brothers calling in the Romans. Theſe new maſters, who, ſeldom, if ever, lent their aſſiſtance but with a view of inſlaving, ſoon altered the face of the Jewiſh affairs, according to their uſual method. Hyrcan was indeed reſtored to the pontifical dignity, with the ſpecious title of prince, though from thenceforth tributary to Rome; but he was wholly diveſted of his regal one, and forbid to reſume either the diadem or royal ſtyle, or to extend his territory beyond the old borders of Judæa. All the cities, which had been taken by his predeceſſors in Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia, were taken from him, and reſtored to Syria (W), of which province Scaurus was left governor, at the head of two Roman legions, to keep the country in awe, whilſt the conqueror prepared himſelf to return to Rome.

Hyrcan half reſtored.

BUT before he left Jeruſalem, he gave the Jews a more mortifying ſtroke than any we have yet mentioned. We have had frequent occaſion to mention how jealous they were of having their temple prophaned by ſtrangers, whom they abſolutely debarred not only ſetting a foot into that holy place, but even caſting a diſtant look towards it. But Pompey was above humouring them in what he looked upon as a piece of Jewiſh ſuperſtition. Reſolved therefore to ſatisfy his curioſity, and to view the moſt ſacred receſſes of that building, he cauſed them to be opened to him; and, attended with a number of his chief commanders, penetrated even into the moſt holy place, into which the high-prieſt alone was permitted to enter once a year, on the grand day of expiation †. He view-

Pompey enters into the temple.

† See Vol. III. p. 202, & ſeq.

(W) Theſe were, among many others of leſs note, thoſe of Hyrcan, Scythopolis, Pella, Dion, Samaria, Mariſſa, Azotus, Jamnia, and Arethuſa in the inland, together with Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and the tower of Straton on the ſea coaſts. This laſt was afterwards magnificently rebuilt by Herod, and by him called Cæſarea, as ſhall be ſeen in the ſequel

Among thoſe cities which had been deſtroyed during the wars, that of Gadara was rebuilt by Demetrius, a native of it, and a freed-man and favourite of Pompey (46), of whoſe exceſſive inſolence, Plutarch gives us ſeveral inſtances in the life of that general.

(46) Id. ibid.

ed with a curious eye the golden table, candleſtick, cenſers, lamps, and other golden veſſels, the great quantity of rich perfumes and ſpices uſed in the divine worſhip; and in the treaſury he found about two thouſand talents. But whether the ſacredneſs of the place inſpired him with an uncommon reſpect for thoſe coſtly things, which he there ſaw, our author tells us, that he not only forbore to touch any of them, but that he immediately ordered the prieſts and officers of the temple to purify it, and to offer up their ſacrifices according to cuſtom (X). But this moderation of his did not hinder the Jews from reſenting the indignity he had offered to that holy place, more than all the miſchiefs they had ſuffered from him, and from aſcribing all the misfortunes that befel him afterwards to this ſacrilegious attempt [h]. Many chriſtians have been of the ſame mind, and men are indeed too apt to judge raſhly in matters of this nature; but whatever may have been the cauſe of that great general's misfortunes, it is plain, that this victory over the Jews was the laſt he ever gained, and that from this time his affairs went from bad to worſe, as we ſhall ſhew when we come to the Roman hiſtory.

Ariſtobulus carried to Rome.

Pompey, having thus ſubdued the Jewiſh nation, to prevent a future revolt, pulled down the walls of Jeruſalem, and [h] Joseph. antiq. l. xiv. c. 8.

(X) The fourth book of the Maccabees ſays, (47), that Pompey reſtored the kingdom to Hyrcanus, and ſent Ariſtobulus in chains to Rome. As for Alexander, he tells us, that he could not be taken, but continued hid in Judæa, till he appeared at the head of a ſtrong party; and as for Hyrcan, though he had the title of king, yet he was to pay a yearly tribute and acknowledgment for his crown.

This expedition and ſucceſs of Pompey againſt the Jews is alſo related by ſeveral heathen authors, and, excepting ſome difference in ſmall particulars, almoſt to the ſame purport with Joſephus. Cicero highly commends the reſpect that general ſhewed to the ſacred utenſils of the temple (48). Livy (49), Oroſius, Eutropius, Strabo, Lucan, Tacitus, Florus, Dio, and Appian, as well as Plutarch, have made likewiſe mention of it. Only Appian (50) will have it, that Pompey cauſed Ariſtobulus and Tigranes to be put to death, which is not taken notice of by any other. On the contrary, Joſephus and Dio tell us, that he ſpared them; and accordingly we ſhall find in the ſequel, that Ariſtobulus found means to return into Judæa, and to raiſe new troubles there.

(47) Cap. xxxvii. (48) Orat. pro L. Flacc. (49) In Syriac. & bell. civil. l. v. (50) Lib. xxxvii.

left left Scaurus governor with a ſufficient force. He ſet out for Rome ſoon after, and took Ariſtobulus, his two ſons, Alexander and Antigonus, and his two daughters with him, as captives fit to adorn his future triumph. However, they were not, it ſeems, ſo cloſely guarded, but Alexander found means to eſcape and return into Judæa; where he ſoon drew a conſiderable party after him, which proved the ſource of new and more grievous troubles. As for his father and brother, they were brought to Rome, and led in triumph among the many other princes whom Pompey had conquered. What became of Ariſtobulus afterwards, we have mentioned in the cloſe of the laſt note. Among the rich ſpoils which Pompey carried with him, was the golden vine we have ſpoken of in the laſt ſection, the worth of which is ſaid to have amounted to five or ſix hundred talents, and which he dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus [i].

Alexander returns into Judæa.

As ſoon as Hyrcan found himſelf rid of his rival brother, he relapſed afreſh into his indolence, leaving the care of his affairs to Antipater, who, like a true politician, failed not to turn it to his advantage and the aggrandiſing of his family. He foreſaw, however, that he could not eaſily compaſs his ends, unleſs he endeared himſelf to the Romans; and therefore ſpared neither pains nor coſt to gain their favour. Scaurus was ſoon after beholden to him for a ſupply of corn and other proviſion, without which his army, which he had led againſt the metropolis of Arabia, muſt have been in danger of periſhing. This ſervice was followed by another, and Antipater, who was ſo well known to the king of Arabia, went and prevailed on that prince to pay three hundred talents to the Roman general [k], and thereby ſave his country from being ravaged by him (Y). It is alſo very probable, that Antipater was the perſon who procured thoſe ſervices Antipater's politics.

[i] Antiq. ubi ſupra See alſo the authors quoted in the laſt note.
[k] Antiq. l xiv. c. 9.

(Y) The fourth book of Maccabees adds (1), that Hyrcan and Antipater accompanied Scaurus into Arabia with ſome forces, and that during that time Alexander took the opportunity of ſeizing on Jeruſalem, rebuilding its fortifications, and of raiſing an army, with which he overthrew the high prieſt on his return from the Arabian expedition: but if he got ſuch advantages over his uncle, he did not keep them long; for, according to Joſephus, we find that pontiff in Jeruſalem, and Alexander only plundering the countries round about, till ſuppreſſed by Gabinius.

(1) Ubi ſupra.

from

from Hyrcan to the Athenians, for which, Joſephus tells us [l], they made that honourable act of their ſenate, in which the pontiff is ſtyled a great friend and benfactor to all the Greeks, and more particularly to the Athenians, and for which they decreed him a crown of gold, and a ſtatue of braſs, to be placed in the temple of Demus (Z) and the Graces [m]. Thus did that politic miniſter lay the foundations for his future grandeur, by ſecuring the friendſhip of the moſt powerful ſtates. Herod his ſon followed the ſame maxims, eſpecially with regard to the Romans and Athenians, and thereby completed what his father had begun, as the ſequel will ſoon ſhew.

Alexander waſtes Judæa.

In the mean time Alexander, having got a ſtrong party in Judæa, and an army of ten thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe, began to ſeize and fortify ſeveral eminent fortreſſes, ſuch as thoſe of Alexandrion and Macheron, ſituate near the foot of the Arabian mountains, and from them made frequent incurſions into Judæa. Hyrcan was not in a condition to ſuppreſs him; on the contrary, having endeavoured to ſhelter himſelf from him by rebuilding the walls of his metropolis, which Pompey had cauſed to be demoliſhed, the Romans, always jealous of their new conqueſts, had forced him to deliſt; ſo that he was forced to call them to ſuppreſs this new invader. Accordingly Gabinius, who was preſident of Syria, and was lately come into that province, ſent Marc Antony with ſome troops againſt him, whilſt himſelf, and the reſt of his army were preparing to follow him. Antipater ſent likewiſe ſuch forces as he had

[l] Ibid. c. 10. [m] Id ibid. cap. xvi.

(Z) The original has τὸ Δημῳ, which ſome verſions render Demus, as we have above, though our Engliſh one render it of the people, &c. A learned critic conjectures, that there is an error crept in Joſephus, and that it probably was the temple of the Muſes and Graces, or perhaps the temple of Academus and the Graces (2). For we are told by an ancient writer 3), that there was a temple in their academy dedicated to the Muſes, in which Plato did ſet up the ſtatues of the Graces; and we do not read that the Athenians had any other temple of the Muſes beſides that.

Archbiſhop Uſher places this decree, and preſents in the ninth year of Hircan's reign, from the death of his mother (4); he there rectifies an anachroniſm in Joſephus concerning it, which the reader may ſee in that learned author.

(2) Calmet Hiſt. v. Teſt. l. viii. ſub A. M. 3943. (3) Diog. Laert. in vita Leucip. (4) Annal. ſub an. ant. Chr. 63.

raiſed

raiſed to join the Roman general, and theſe being followed by a number of Jews in the Roman intereſt, with Pitolaus at their head, Alexander was forced to retire into the neighbourhood of Jeruſalem, where a battle was ſoon after fought, in which he was defeated, and loſt three thouſand of his men, beſides thoſe that were taken priſoners. He was thence purſued to Alexandrion, where he had refuged himſelf, and there beſieged by Gabinius; but the place being ſtrong and well provided, that general ordered a number of his troops to inveſt the place, whilſt he marched with the reſt into Judæa, where he cauſed the cities mentioned in a former note to be rebuilt, according to Pompey's order. That of Samaria being one of them, he called it from his own name Gabiniana; but Herod ſoon after changed it into thoſe of Sebaſte[n], as we ſhall ſee in its proper place. Whilſt Alexander was cloſely beſieged, he ſent to deſire peace of the Roman general, promiſing to ſurrender that fortreſs, and that of Macheron and Hyrcanion. About the ſame time his mother, a wiſe and diſcreet woman, whoſe huſband (Ariſtobulus) and her children were ſtill kept priſoners at Rome, came to the Roman general; and, partly by her addreſs, and partly by her ſervices to him, did inſinuate her ſelf ſo much in his favour, that ſhe procured the peace offered by her ſon to be accepted, and him to be diſmiſſed with pardon and impunity for what he had done. After this Gabinius ordered the three fortreſſes delivered up to him to be demoliſhed, that they might be no longer an occaſion of future revolts; and then led Hyrcan, who had, it ſeems, aſſiſted him in the ſiege, to Jeruſalem, where he reinſtated him afreſh into his pontifical dignity. He then divided the province into five ſeveral diſtricts, in each of which he erected a ſeparate court of judicature; the firſt at Jeruſalem, the ſecond at Gadara, the third at Amath, the fourth at Jericho, and the fifth at Sephoris in Galilee[o]; by which the government was changed from a monarchy into an ariſtocracy, and the Jews, who had been till then governed by their own monarchical pontiffs, fell under the ſubjection of a ſet of domineering lords (A).

Defeated.

Beſieged.

Change of the Jewiſh government.

In

[n] Vid. SYNCEL. ap. USSER. ſub A. M. 3979. [o] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 10. Id. bell. Jud. l. i. c. 6.

(A) The Jews had till now been governed by two ſorts of councils or courts of judicature under their ſovereign. Theſe councils or ſanhedrins were of two ſorts, the inferior conſiſting of twenty three, and the greater one of ſeventy two perſons; and this latter was Aristobulus escapes into Judæa.

In the mean time Aristobulus, towards the latter end of the year, found means to escape out of the prison, into which he had been remanded after Pompey's triumph, and to return into Judæa, with his son Antigonus. Here he was soon joined by a considerable number of Jews, and, among the rest, by Pitolaus, who had till then been a chief leader of the Roman party. But a great number of them coming to him without arms, he was forced to dismiss them, and only reserved eight thousand stout men, with whom he went to secure and rebuild the castle of Alexandrion, which had been demolished by Gabinius; but this last sent Cisenna, Mark Antony, and Servilius against him, who, in spite of the bravery of his small army, defeated him, killed five thousand of his men, and forced him to fly into the ruinated castle of Machæron, with only a thousand men he had left, the rest having taken their flight where they could. The Romans did not give him time to fortify himself, but came and besieged him, and, after a two day's stout resistance, took him by assault, covered with wounds, and sent him and his son prisoners to Rome, where he was conveyed into his old prison. But Gabinius wrote soon after to the senate, and informed them of the promise he had made to Aristobulus's wife, upon the delivery of the Jewish fortresses; whereupon the rest of his family were ordered to be set at liberty, and was emphatically called the grand sanhedrin. Of the lesser sort there was one in every city, and two at Jerusalem, where there was a greater concourse of people and business. The grand one sat only at Jerusalem, and had a place appropriated to them in the temple. We have had frequent occasion to speak of this last in several parts of this history; and shall only add here, that it was the last resort to which all other inferior ones might appeal, and from whose sentence there could be no appeal. Both sorts were abolished by Gabinius, who erected in lieu of them a court in each of the five districts independent of each other, and endowed them with the sovereign power, from which no appeal could be made but to Rome.

Defeated and sent prisoner.

The talmud, however, tells us (5). that they retained a kind of council of three to decide all their controversies about bargains, sales, and other such private matters; each of the contending parties chose a judge from among themselves, and these two chose a third, and the three used to decide those controversies among them; which was perhaps done chiefly to avoid the charge, trouble, or rather injustice and arbitrariness of the courts erected by the Romans.

(5) Tract Sanhedrin.

he

he only was kept prisoner during the rest of his life [p]. Gabinius being the next year invited into Egypt, to assist Ptolemy Auletes in the recovery of his kingdom, as has been related in another volume †, Hyrcan, or rather Antipater, proved very serviceable to that general, not only by furnishing him with necessary provisions of corn, arms, and money for his army; but also by writing to the Jews of Onion near Pelusium, which was the key of that part of Egypt, to forward the Romans to the best of their power. By this means Gabinius and Marc Antony easily succeeded in this expedition, which might otherwise have proved too hard for them. The fourth book of the Maccabees, in the place last quoted, tells us, that Gabinius having sent to desire Hyrcan to come and join him in Egypt, the high-priest sent his favourite Antipater with an army to him, who helped him to beat the Egyptians, and restore the king; after which, they returning into Judæa, the Roman general renewed his alliance and friendship with the Jewish pontiff, and then returned to Rome.

Gabinius goes into Egypt. Year of the Flood 2943. Before Christ 56.

DURING this Egyptian expedition, Alexander, taking the advantage of Cisenna's weakness, a rash unexperienced youth, whom Gabinius had left to command in Syria with a small number of troops, had got a considerable army, and was entered Judæa, which was by this time filled with banditti and free-booters, who plundered every-where without controul. He fell on the Romans where-ever he met them, and killed a great number of them: the rest retired to mount Garizim, where he came soon after, and closely besieged them. The news of this having brought Gabinius into Judæa, the first thing he did was to send Antipater to try by fair means to withdraw the revolters from Alexander's party; and this consummate politician acted his part so well, that he brought back a considerable number of them. But all his address could not persuade Alexander to come to any terms. On the contrary, this last, inraged to see such a defection of his men, resolved with the thirty thousand he had left, to put it to the issue of a battle. It was accordingly fought near mount Tabor, and he totally defeated, with the loss of ten thousand men killed on the spot, and the rest put to flight. Gabinius after this victory returned to Jerusalem, where he settled the Jewish affairs according to Antipater's mind, and left Judæa, Alexander raises new troubles.

Defeated by Gabinius.

[p] Id. ibid. 4 MACCAB. cxl. & seq.

† See Vol. IX. p. 137, and ſoon after the government of Syria (B), and was ſucceeded by Craſſus [q].

THIS laſt upon his coming into his new government, found the whole province, and particularly Judæa, in peace, ſo that he was at leiſure to purſue his favourite deſign of invading the Parthians; for which expedition he had obtained, though with ſome difficulty, a decree from the ſenate [r]. As avarice was the chief paſſion that puſhed him to it, he began with plundering the temple of Jeruſalem, not only of the two thouſand talents which Pompey had left there untouched, but of every thing he found valuable in it, to the ſum of eight thouſand Attic talents more. Among theſe there was a large beam of maſſive gold, covered with another hollow beam, which went acroſs the partition, which divided the holy from the moſt holy place. The veil that ſeparated thoſe two rooms was faſtened to it, and over it they threw all the old veils, whenever they hanged a new one; ſo that this valuable piece, which weighed three hundred Hebrew minæ (C), was ſo well

[q] JOSEPH. 4 MACCAB. DIO CASS. ubi ſupra. [r] DIO lib. xxxix. Vid. & PLUTARCH. in Craſſ.

(B) We ſhall not ſo far anticipate the Roman hiſtory as to enter into the merit of this general, and the cauſes of his being deprived of his government. It will be ſufficient here to obſerve, that though he was accuſed to the ſenate of great corruptions, extortions, and ſuch like crimes, yet Joſephus (6) gives him a quite different character, and ſpeaks of him as of a perſon who had filled that poſt with great exactneſs, honour, and applauſe. But Pompey and Craſſus were then conſuls, and the latter, as we ſhall ſoon ſee, had got an invincible itch after the province of Syria, ever ſince he had heard what treaſures the former had left untouched at Jeruſalem. Thoſe riches he thought would come in a good time to help him forward in his Parthian expedition. In all this he only followed the motions of his inſatiable avarice; and what crimes might not ſuch a man trump up againſt Gabinius, in order to diveſt him of that government?

But whether the latter was really ſuch as Joſephus has repreſented him, or had really given cauſe for thoſe accuſations preferred againſt him, two thing are ſure; 1. that he was grown exceeding rich; and, 2. that he was forced to diſgorge all his wealth, to bribe his judges and ſave his life, as the ſequel will ſhew.

(C) The mina amounted to about two pounds and a half of our weight, ſo that the whole bar or beam weighed about ſeven hundred and fifty pounds. The fourth book of Maccabees adds, that

(6) Antiq. l. xiv. c. 11,

all

well concealed, that none knew of it but the treaſurer of the temple. A prieſt named Eleazar, then in that poſt, and being appriſed of Craſſus's plundering deſign, was imprudent enough to endeavour to ſave all the reſt of the coſtly temple furniture at the expence of this; but did not diſcover it to him, till he had made him ſwear that he would ſpare the reſt; but the greedy governor made no ſcruple to break his oath, and to plunder that holy place of every valuable thing he could lay his hands on, without ſparing the moſt ſacred utenſils belonging to it. The whole amount of this ſacrilegious plunder was ſo great, that Joſephus, fearing it would ſcarcely be credited by other nations, is forced to appeal to the writings of Strabo of Cappadocia, and other records not now extant [r]. What we have ſaid at the end of the laſt note will further confirm his account, and the immenſe treaſures of which that rapacious governor ſtripped that ſacred place, though it amounts to above two millions of our money.

Craſſus's treachery and ſacrilege.

We have ſeen, in the laſt volume *, the ill ſucceſs of his expedition againſt the Parthians. That general having been defeated and killed, Caſſius brought the ſhattered remnant of his army into Syria, to ſuppreſs the incurſions which the now elated Parthians made into that province; and here he gave them ſo many overthrows, that he ſoon forced them to ſend home for a freſh ſupply of troops. From thence he marched into Judæa, where he beſieged Tarichæa, a city on the ſouth ſhore of the lake Genezareth, where Pitolaus had ſhut himſelf up with the few remains of Ariſtobulus's faction; and having taken it, carried away thirty thouſand Jews priſoners. Pitolaus was put to death by the advice of Antipater, to prevent his raiſing new troubles in favour of Ariſtoblus (D). As for Alexander, Caſſius contented himſelf all the old veil's which were taken down when a new one was hung up (and which were all extremely rich and beautiful), uſed to be thrown over it (7). Beſides theſe and other coſtly utenſils and ornaments of the temple, we may add the continual offerings ſent to it by the Jews from all parts of Aſia and Europe; but eſpecially thoſe which were preſented to it, not only by the Jewiſh monarchs, but by thoſe of other nations, of which we have given ſome inſtances in a former ſection out of the books of the Maccabees (8).

Caſſius's ſucceſs in Syria. Year of the Flood, 2947. Before Chriſt, 52.

[r] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 12. * page 356.

(D) The fourth book of the Maccabees adds (9), that Caſſius himself with forcing him to be quiet, whilst he marched towards the Euphrates to stop the incursions of the Parthians [t].

(7) Ubi ſupra. (8) Cap. xli. (9) Ibid.

THREE years after, Julius Cæsar having made himself master of Rome, and thinking that Aristobulus might be of service to him against Pompey, released him out of his prison, and sent him into Palestine [u], with two legions under his command, to keep Syria in awe; but those of Pompey's party found means to poison him, and thereby frustrated the designs of that crafty general. His body was afterwards embalmed by some of Cæsar's partisans, and kept in honey in a coffin, till they could convey him into Judæa, there to be interred with his ancestors [w]. His son Alexander did not meet with better fate; the news of his father's return into Judæa had made him raise forces there, to join him on his arrival; but Pompey, who kept a watchful eye over him, sent orders to his son-in-law Q. Metellus Scipio, formerly his collegue in the consulship and now president of Syria, to put him to death. Scipio caused the unhappy prince to be seized, and brought before his tribunal at Antioch, where he condemned him, and caused his head to be struck off. Ptolemy Mennæus, prince of Chalcis, hearing of their death, sent to Alexandra the widow of Aristobulus, who was then retired to Askalon and offered to take her son Antigonus and her two daughters under his care, who sent them to him accordingly. His son Philippion married one of the daughters, named also Alexandra; but some time after, either for some misbehaviour, or perhaps out of love to that princess, Mennæus caused him to be put to death, and married her himself soon after [x].

Aristobulus poisoned.

Alexander beheaded.

[t] JOSEPH. Antiq l. xiv. c. 12. Bell. Jud. l. i. c 6.
[u] DIO, lib. xli.
[w] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 13. Bell. Jud. l. i. c 7.
[x] Id. ibid. Vid & PLUTARCH. in Pompei. DIO, ubi supra. CÆSAR. Bell. Civil. l. iii. & Comment. lib. 1.

came afterwards to Jerusalem, and there reconciled Hyrcan and his subjects, who were then in open rebellion against him.

This is that Cassius who had formerly refused the command which the soldiers had offered him, out of hatred to Crassus; but now that general being dead, and the Roman army miserably shattered he was forced to take the government of Syria upon him, in order to suppress the insolence of the Parthians (10). He was afterwards one of those who assassinated Julius Cæsar, as we shall see in due time.

(10) Dio Cass lib. xl.

IN

In the mean time, the war between Cæsar and Pompey, as well as those that followed between the former and the asserters of the Roman liberty, afforded the Jews not only a long breathing, but also an opportunity of ingratiating themselves to that conqueror. He was now in Egypt waiting impatiently for those new levies which Mithridates the Pergamenian was bringing to him from Syria and Cilicia, where he had been raising them. But, these not being sufficient to break through Pelusium, the strong key of Egypt on that side, he was forced to stop at Askalon, till new reinforcements came to him. But what did him the greatest service at this juncture, and facilitated the taking of that city, was the coming of Antipater, at the head of three thousand Jews well armed, together with some other succours which he had drawn from Armenia, and Syria, and mount Libanus. He also brought letters from Hyrcan, whether real, or forged by himself; exhorting the Jews of the territories of Onion, Deltha, and Memphis, to assist the Roman emperor with all their might. By these means the city of Pelusium was easily carried by assault, Antipater himself being one of the foremost in scaling it, and a way thereby was made into Egypt. We have seen in a former volume the success of that expedition †; some have imagined, that Hyrcan came thither in person at the head of fifteen hundred men [y], but without any likelihood. That pontiff was wholly governed by Antipater, whose main view was the aggrandising himself, rather than recommending the Jewish pontiff to that conqueror; and Hyrcan being in himself a man of no genius or ambition, it is more probable he contented himself with the credit of sending such seasonable aid to Cæsar, whilst Antipater, like a consummate politician, took the advantage of ingratiating himself to him by his valour and gallantry, as well as by his good offices with his master. Accordingly, we find in the subsequent battle, which was fought in the place called the Jewish camp [z], that Mithridates, who commanded the right wing, must have been totally defeated, had not Antipater, who had been victorious in the left, which he commanded, come to his rescue, and gained him that signal victory over the Egyptians, which enabled him to join Cæsar's army, and soon made that emperor master of all Egypt. In all these actions Antipater behaved with such valour and gallantry, that Mithridates did not scruple to own his late success

Antipater succours Cæsar in Egypt.

His valour rewarded.

† See Vol. IX. p. 152, & seq. [y] IPSICRAT. ap STRAB. JOSEPH. Antiq l. xiv. c. 17. CÆSAR. tabul. æn. ap. eund. [z] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 15.

cesses

ceſſes to be owing to him; and in a letter he wrote to Cæſar, he gave the Jewiſh commander ſuch encomiums, that he conceived a more than ordinary eſteem for him; and in token of it, before he left Alexandria, he gave him ſome conſiderable poſts in his army, made him procurator or lieutenant of Judæa, and citizen of Rome, with all the privileges belonging to it, which places he held with great credit all the time of the war (E). Cæſar alſo confirmed Hyrcan in his prieſthood, added to it the principality of Judæa, to be intailed on his poſterity for ever; and to the Jewiſh nation their antient rights and privileges; and ordered a pillar to be erected, whereon all theſe grants and his own decree ſhould be ingraven, which was accordingly done, ſoon after Antipater's return into Judæa. Cæſar being come into Syria, Antigonus came to him, and preferred a ſevere complaint againſt Hyrcan and Antipater, for the injuries which he pretended they had done to him; and at the ſame time repreſented to him the misfortunes of his family, for having ſtuck cloſe to his intereſt; and particularly the poiſoning of his father by Pompey, and the beheading of his brother by Scipio. In conſideration of all which, he concluded with a petition to the emperor, that he wolud reſtore him to his father's principality, of which Hyrcan had unjuſtly ſtripped him. But unfortunately for him, Antipater was then attending upon Cæſar, who defended his own and Hyrcan's cauſe ſo well, that they were both abſolved with applauſe, and Antigonus repulſed as a factious and turbulent perſon, that could never be at reſt. Antipater added farther, that as to Antigonus's father, he had been juſtly ſent priſoner to Rome for being a conſtant enemy to the Roman nation, and that his brother had been deſervedly beheaded for plundering and ravaging that of the Jews. Cæſar had too many obligations to Hyrcan and Antipater, not to admit of a much weaker vindication of their cauſe. But he was reſolved to do more than the bare acquitting of them:

Cæſar's gratitude to the Jews

Rejects Antigonus's ſuit.

(E) The fourth book of Maccabees (11) adds, that Mithridates, being totally defeated in the action, was ſo cloſely ſurrounded by the Egyptians, that he muſt have been cut in pieces by them, had not Antipater come in a lucky minute, and reſcued him and the victory out of their hands. But what the ſame author adds, that Cæſar gave him the command of his own troops, and took him with him into Perſia, ſeems quite to claſh with Joſephus, who doth not ſo much as hint, that he had the command of any of the Roman troops, neither doth it appear, that Cæſar carried any war againſt the Perſians.

(11) Cap. xlii.

He

he confirmed his former decree in favour of them and of the Jewish nation, and caused it to be ingraven on brasen tables in Latin and Greek, and to be hung up in the temples of Tyre, Sidon, and Askalon (F), as well as in the capitol at Rome, whither Hyrcan sent soon after his embassadors to renew the old alliance with that nation; which was by his order published in all the principal cities of the empire, that all the world might know that the Jews were acknowledged the friends and allies of Rome. These embassadors, who were there received with great marks of honour, did likewise obtain a permissory decree for the fortifying of Jerusalem, and for rebuilding of the wall which had been pulled down by Pompey [a] (G).

Cæsar

[a] Ibid. l. xx. c. 7. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 7.

(F) This decree, which at once abolished the aristocracy lately set up by Gabinius, and restored the Jewish state to its pristine sovereignty, has been preserved to us by Josephus (12), and runs to this effect:

"Julius Cæsar, emperor and dictator the second time, &c. "For asmuch as Hyrcanus the son of Alexander, a Jew, hath given "us many singular proofs of his affection, both in time of peace "and war, and particularly by the supply sent to me in the late "war; in consideration of these his services, I do hereby confirm "unto him and his heirs the perpetual government of the Jews, "both as their prince and high-priest, after the manner and rule "of their own laws. I enroll him from henceforth among my "trusty friends; and ordain, that all the legal and pontifical rights "and privileges be devolved upon him and his sons for ever; and "that in all controversies, that shall arise concerning the rights "and discipline of the Jews, he or they be the only judges; and "further, that the Jews be henceforth discharged from the bur"then of winter quarters and all public tribute".

About the same time the Athenians renewed their alliance with Hyrcan, and sent their decree to Jerusalem, in which they acknowledged that pontiff's singular and constant friendship to all the Greeks, and to their own republic in particular. The reader may see it at length in Josephus in the place last quoted

(G) The fourth book of Maccabees adds (13), that Cæsar did those embassadors the singular honour of making them sit down in his presence; and a little lower, that that emperor had decreed for himself and successors, that all the maritime part of the Syrian province, from Gaza to Sidon, should pay yearly to the Jewish temple the tribute they were wont to pay to the empire; and that

(12) Antiq. l. xiv. c. 17. (13) Cap. xliv.

that

Cæsar, having left the government of Syria to Sextus Cæsar his near relation, was accompanied by Antipater as far as Tyre, where he imbarqued for Sicily. On his return to Jeruſalem, Antipater took care in every place he came through to extol the Roman emperor and nation, and to exhort the people to peace and obedience; repreſenting to them with his uſual eloquence, that, whilſt they behaved like faithful ſubjects, they would be bleſt with a mild government, and enjoy their rights, liberties, and religion; but that, if they grew diſcontented and mutinous, they would ſoon find themſelves forced to ſubmit to a ſeverer yoke, and that Hyrcan, from a mild and pacific prince, might eaſily become their tyrant, and the Romans, from friends and protectors, would not fail to turn their bitter enemies. This was not ſaid ſo much to keep the Jews in obedience to Hyrcan, whoſe ſtupidity and indolence Joſephus himſelf tells us, was but too viſible to all his ſubjects; but, by thus over-awing them with the dread of the Romans anger, he plainly intimated to them his own credit and intereſt with them to be ſuch, that they would never ſee his meaſures oppoſed, without interpoſing their own authority; and therefore cloſed the whole with theſe words; For they (the Romans) will be obeyed [b]. By theſe ſpeeches he gained two main ends, he kept a divided and factious people in awe, and took the advantage of his own eſtabliſhed power, and of Hyrcan's weakneſs, to aggrandiſe his family.

Antipater's ſpeech

UPON his arrival at Jeruſalem, he ſet himſelf about putting Cæſar's decree in force, and ſettling, or rather reſtoring, the Jewiſh government to its antient model, and ordering the repairs of the walls and fortifications of Jeruſalem. He made that of the town of Sidon amounted yearly to twenty thouſand five hundred and fifty meaſures of wheat; and that the cities of Laodicea and others, which had been formerly in the poſſeſſion of the high-prieſts, ſhould be now ſurrendered to Hyrcan.

[b] Antiq. ubi ſupra, in fin. c. 16.

All theſe grants, our author ſays, were beſtowed on the Jewiſh nation, in conſideration of the eminent ſervices which they and Antipater at their head had done the emperor in his Parthian expedition. But whether he really was ſent thither by the high prieſt, as is there affirmed, 'tis certain that this great change in favour of the Jews was owing to the wiſdom, conduct and valour of Antipater; and how much it contributed to raiſe his power and intereſt, not only in Judæa, but in Rome and other nations, the ſequel will ſoon ſhew.

His

his eldeſt ſon Phaſaelus governor of that metropolis, and Herod his ſecond ſon governor of Galilee (H); whilſt he and the high-prieſt took a progreſs about Judæa, to ſettle the government and peace of the kingdom. Herod ſoon ſignaliſed himſelf by the ſuppreſſion of a band of thieves, who had till then much infeſted that and the neighbouring provinces. He took their chief, named Hezekiah, with ſome others of his companions, whom he put to immediate death, and thereby diſperſed the reſt of their gang. This action failed not to recommend him, not only to the whole province, but more particularly to Sextus Cæſar, the new preſident of Syria. On the other hand, his elder brother neglected nothing that could recommend him to the people of Jeruſalem, over which he was governor; ſo that Antipater ſaw with pleaſure himſelf and his ſons become the darlings of the nation, without leſſening, at leaſt outwardly, any part of their reſpect to the high-prieſt, who ſeemed ſtill to be at the head of all the national affairs, and to give his ſanction to them.

BUT it was this greatneſs, this exceſſive growing power, of Antipater, which raiſed at length the envy and jealouſy of the principal Jews. Herod's action was doubtleſs a noble one, and the country felt the benefit of it: but he had gone ſome unjuſtifiable lengths in it, in putting the banditti to death, by his own authority and without any formal tryal; and this they looked upon as an earneſt of what he might do in time, if his enterpriſing genius was not nipped in the bud. This made them at length reſolve to try to open the eyes of their indolent pontiff, and to prevail upon him to ſummon that young hero to come and anſwer to this and ſome other accuſations before him and the ſanhedrin.

(H) Antipater had four ſons by his wife Cypris, who were by this time grown up to maturity, and in great reputation for their wiſdom and valour. We have mentioned the two firſt in the text: Joſephus indeed allows the latter of them but fifteen years of age, but that muſt be a miſtake, either of that hiſtorian, or rather of his copyiſts; for both Ptolemy and Nicolas Damaſcen gave him twenty-five years, and our learned Uſher has made it appear that he could have no leſs (14).

The third ſon was called Joſeph, and the fourth Pheroras. He had likewiſe a daughter named Salome, who became afterwards infamous for the feuds and diviſions which ſhe created in her family, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel.

(14) Sub A. M. 3937. Vid. & Prid. Connect. ſub an. 1 C. 47.

Herod ſummoned before the ſanhedrin. Year of the flood, 2952. Before Chriſt, 47.

Hyrcan, who had a great friendſhip for him, betrayed at this juncture an extreme partiality in excuſing him of ſeveral crimes they alledged againſt him. They in vain repreſented to him, how dangerous it was for him to ſuffer the ſon of a proſelyte, who had already ingroſſed all the power and honour, and left him only the bare title of ſovereign, to arrogate to himſelf ſuch an unlimited authority, as to put a number of men to death without trial, or even without aſking his or the ſanhedrin's conſent. At length, ſince they could not work upon his fears, they tried to rouſe his pity, by the daily clamours of the mothers of thoſe whom Herod had put to death, and who ceaſed not to come daily to the temple to demand juſtice of him, for ſo daring and unwarranted an affront on his dignity. Hyrcan was at length prevailed upon to ſend his ſummons to him to come and anſwer to the charge before him and the ſanhedrin. Herod appeared accordingly, but in ſuch a guiſe, and with ſuch a numerous retinue, as gave them to underſtand, that he did not come as a private perſon, much leſs as a criminal to be judged by them. He was cloathed in purple, and, by his father's advice, had brought ſuch a number of ſervants, as ſhould be ſufficient to defend him in caſe he was condemned, and yet not ſo numerous, as to raiſe any jealouſy in the friendly high-prieſt. He alſo brought letters to him from Sextus Cæſar, with expreſs orders to acquit him, and threatening him with his higheſt reſentment in caſe of non-compliance.

These letters ſeem indeed to have been calculated to intimidate the ſanhedrin, rather than to recommend Herod's cauſe to the high-prieſt, who was already ſufficiently in his intereſt. Accordingly, when he appeared before that high-court, he ſtruck ſuch an awe upon them, that none of his accuſers dared to open their mouths againſt him. At length Sameas, a man in great eſteem for his wiſdom and integrity, had the courage to ſtand up and arraign him, not only for his former crime, but much more now for his unjuſtifiable boldneſs in appearing, contrary to the laws of all nations, not in the guiſe of an accuſed perſon, but in that of an arrogant and threatening commander, who came rather to frighten his judges, than to clear himſelf of his accuſation. I do not at the ſame time, continued he, ſo much blame him for the inſolent means he takes to ſecure his forfeited life. What ſurprizes me is, to ſee both the high-prieſt and his judges thus tamely to permit it; but take notice of what I am now going to tell you, ſaid he, turning to them; God is a righteous and powerful judge, and this very man whom you now now ſtrive to acquit, in complaiſance to Hyrcan, ſhall prove the ruin of both king and judges. How true a prophet he proved, the ſequel will ſhew; for Herod was no ſooner got into the poſſeſſion of the government, than he put both the high-prieſt and all his cowardly judges to death, except Sameas and Pollio, for whom he retained a ſingular eſteem ever after (I). Here Hyrcan obſerving that his ſpeech had made ſuch an impreſſion on the court, that the majority were like to be againſt Herod, he adjourned the court till next day, whilſt he ſent private advice to him to flee for his life; which he accordingly did, and went to Damaſcus, where having gained the protection of the Syrian governor, he ſent the ſanhedrin word, that if they ſhould take it into their heads to ſummon him afreſh, he would diſclaim their juriſdiction. This contemptuous meſſage put the judges into a freſh fit of rage; they vented their reſentments againſt the pontiff, and ſtrove in vain to awaken him into a ſenſe of his danger; he remained deaf and inſenſible to the laſt[c].

Sameas's noble perſ.

[c] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 17.

(I) Sameas, or, as the Rabbins call him, Shammai, was, according to Joſephus (15), the diſciple of Pollio, another learned Jewiſh doctor in great eſteem with Herod, not unlikely the ſame which the Rabbies call Hillel; for this latter having been a famous diſciple of Sameas or Shammai, and having in proceſs of time proved the antagoniſt of his maſter, and the founder of that famed ſchool, which retained his name, it is a wonder Joſephus ſhould never mention him, whereas he ſpeaks very honourably of Pollio in ſeveral places of his hiſtory.

St. Jerom (16) has imagined, that the Phariſees had their origin from the diviſion of thoſe two ſchools; but we have already ſeen how powerful that ſect was long before Hillel or Shammai. Concerning this laſt the Rabbies tell us wonders, and if we may believe the father above quoted, they attribute the compiling of the Miſhnah to him and his diſciple Hillel, or, as he elſewhere calls them, Simeon and Helles 17).

We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak to that point, as well as the rupture of thoſe two famed ſchools, in a properer place All we ſhall add concerning them here is, a Rabbinic proverb much in vogue among the Jews: Be courteous as Hillel, and intrepid as Shammai.

(15) Antiq. l. xv. c. 1. (16) In Iſai. cap. viii. (17) Epiſt. ad Algaſ. & quæſt. x. & in Eccleſ. vii.

IN the mean time Herod, having with a large ſum of money purchaſed the government of Cœle-Syria of his friend Sextus Cæſar, raiſed an army with an intent to march againſt Jeruſalem, and be revenged of Hyrcan and the ſanhedrin for the affront they had put upon him; but he was happily diverted from it by Antipater and Phaſaelus, who reminded him of his great obligations to that pontiff, to whom both he and they were beholden for all the power and grandeur they enjoyed. Herod acquieſced for the preſent, and was ſatisfied with having given them ſuch token of what he could do whenever occaſion offered, and remained quiet in his province.

Year of the Flood, 2955 Before Chriſt, 44.

ABOUT three years after this, Hyrcan having ſent an embaſſy to Cæſar, who was by this time entered into his fifth conſulſhip, to renew his alliance with him, obtained a freſh decree for the fortifying of Jeruſalem, which Antipater immediately put in execution; and that metropolis was ſoon after raiſed to its priſtine ſplendor and ſtrength. Cæſar did moreover grant ſome further privileges to the Jews, in conſideration, as he expreſſed it, of the ſignal ſervices they had done to him in Syria and Egypt. The reader may ſee them more fully in Joſephus. As for Hyrcan, he gave him leave to govern in Jeruſalem according to his pleaſure, and confirmed to him the grant of all the towns and villages which had been poſſeſſed by his anceſtors; that the lands and other privileges which the Romans had beſtowed on the kings of Syria and Phœnice, on account of the alliance that had been between them, ſhould likewiſe be beſtowed on him and his ſucceſſors; that he, they, and their embaſſadors, ſhould have the liberty of ſitting down with the Roman ſenators in all public ſhews and games; and laſtly, that when they had any petition to prefer to the ſenate, they ſhould be introduced by the dictator, or by the maſter of the horſe, and that they ſhould have an anſwer within ten days [d]. In a word, ſuch was that emperor's gratitude and friendſhip to the Jews, ſo many and conſiderable the immunities and privileges which he heaped upon their prince and nation, that they could hardly be ſaid to feel the weight of the Roman yoke. His kindneſs extended even to thoſe who lived out of Judæa; witneſs the edict which the magiſtrates of the iſland of Paros had made againſt their exerciſe of their religion, living according to their laws, and ſending their yearly tribute to Jeruſalem, to maintain the

New privileges granted to the Jews.

[d] Id. ibid. & bell. Jud. ubi ſupra.

ſervice

ſervice of the temple (K); and which that monarch obliged them to revoke, as a piece of rigour and injuſtice, which he ſaid was not to be ſuffered againſt the friends and allies of Rome, where all thoſe privileges were indulged to them.

Sextus and Julius Cæſar murdered.

BUT this happy ſtate was ſoon at an end. Two remarkable accidents happened, one on the heels of the other, the one in Judæa, and the other at Rome, which brought on a ſeries of diſtractions and feuds in both. In the former Sextus Cæſar was treacherouſly murdered by Baſſus, and Cæſar himſelf at Rome by Brutus and Caſſius, and their aſſociates, as ſhall be better ſeen in the Roman hiſtory. Marc Antony and Dolabella, who were then conſuls, aſſembled the ſenate; and the embaſſadors from Judæa, among others, were admitted to renew their alliance with them. Purſuant to which (ſome of the Aſiatic Jews having been forced to inrol themſelves in the Roman army) Hyrcan ſent a complaint to Dolabella, reminding him, that the Jews were wont to be exempted from the war, by reaſon of their being obliged to obſerve the ſabbath; and obtained a letter from the conſul to the governor of Epheſus, enjoining him to ſee that the Jews were ſet free, and reſtored to the exerciſe of their religion and laws[c]. By this time Baſſus had ſeized upon the government of Syria, but was ſoon after driven out of it by Caſſius, who immediately came thither after Cæſar's death, and took the command of the Roman troops upon him, who were then beſieging the aſſaſſin of Sextus in the city of Apamea. Caſſius, having drawn him and Marcus into his party, raiſed the ſiege of the place, and got all Syria into his poſſeſſion. He was, however, forced to levy new troops to reinforce his army; and hearing that Alienus, one of Dolabella's lieutenants, was marching through Judæa with four legions ſent to that conſul by Cleopatra, he poſted himſelf ſo advantageouſly, that he ſurrounded and intercepted him with a double number of his own forces, and took them all into his ſervice. Having by this time got an army of twelve legions, which could not be subsisted without great expence, he was forced to levy very large tributes on that province, particularly on Judæa, which he taxed at seven hundred talents. Antipater, who knew the necessity that general was in of some immediate supply, and the consequence of gaining his favour, by sending him a speedy one, committed the levying of one half of that sum to his sons Phasaelus and Herod, and ordered the rest to be raised by one Malichus and some associates. Herod failed not to take this opportunity of ingratiating himself to Cassius, by bringing him the hundred talents which were assigned to his government; and as he was the first that complied with his orders, that general conceived a great esteem for him. His brother came soon after; but the rest of the governors not having followed their examples, particularly those of Gophna, Emmaus, Lydda, Thamna, and some other cities of Judæa, Cassius ordered all their inhabitants to be sold by auction, and would have put Malichus to death, had not the high-priest redeemed him at the expence of a hundred talents, which he sent him out of his own coffers [f].

Caſſius ſeizes upon Syria.

[c] Id. ibid.

(K) We have often mentioned this yearly tribute which every Jew, both of Judæa and of the diſperſion, was obliged to ſend. Beſides this, we muſt further obſerve, that as they were allowed to offer ſacrifices no-where but in that holy place, it was uſual for them to remit the money thither for ſuch victims, as either their religion or extraordinary devotions directed them to be offered up there for them; and theſe were generally ſent thither with the annual tribute of the temple; and in ſome wealthy places they ſometimes amounted to ſuch vaſt ſums, as raiſed the envy and jealouſy of thoſe among whom they lived, and have been often ſeized by covetous princes and governors, who have converted them to their own uſes.

Levies seven hundred talents.

Cassius, being soon after forced to march against Dolabella, left the government of Cœle-Syria to Herod, as an earnest of his future friendship; but Malichus in the mean time, who bore a mortal hatred against Antipater (L), and saw him with an envious eye holding alone the reins of government, resolved to rid himself and the nation of him. Antipater, having had timely notice of his treacherous design, did presently retire to the other side of the Jordan, and there raised some forces, and put himself in a posture of defence. Whereupon Malichus, finding

Malichus conspires against Antipater

[f] Antiq. l. xiv. c 18. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 9.

(L) Malichus was a Jew; he and Antipater had been the main supporters of Hyrcan's interest; so that he could not behold his rival, who was of Idumæan race, as we have hinted before, preferred before him without the deepest envy and regret; and this was the motive which made him conspire against him, not doubting, but if he was once removed, himself would be at the head of the Jewish affairs.

The fourth book of the Maccabees says indeed (18), that they were the heads of the Jewish nation who conspired against Antipater; and very likely Malichus had drawn a great number into the same black design; it being as great a mortification to them as to himself, to see their prince held in a kind of servitude by a stranger, who had ingrossed all the power into his hand.

(18) Ch xlvi.

his plot was discovered, came to him in a seeming friendly manner, and by oaths, protestations, and other crafty insinuations, such as the folly of such an attempt against his life, whilst his son Phasaelus held the government of Jerusalem, and the warlike Herod that of Cœle-Syria; easily persuaded him of his innocency, and a reconciliation was made between them. Antipater was even forced to make use of all his interest with Marcus, now governor of Syria, and who was well acquainted with all his private plots, to prevent his putting him to death. But Malichus was not to be wrought on by such an unparalleled generosity, whilst he beheld his rival's interest raised still higher by it. For about this time Cassius and Marcus, who had bestowed the government of Cœle-Syria on his son Herod, had engaged his fidelity to them by a promise to make him king of Judæa, as soon as the war now begun against Marc Antony and the young Octavius, since named Augustus, was ended. This made him dread the excessive power of Antipater to such a degree, that upon the first opportunity, which was soon after offered, when he was to dine with the high-priest, he bribed that pontiff's butler to poison him in a glass of wine, whilst himself with an armed force seized upon the government of Jerusalem. Phasaelus and Herod easily perceived that Malichus was at the bottom of this villainy, notwithstanding his vows and protestations to the contrary; and Herod, who was of a fierce temper, was for immediately revenging the fact with open force; but his brother, who rightly judged that it would be much safer to dissemble for the present, and to punish the assassin by some private stratagem, without involving the nation into a civil war, easily brought him over to his opinion [g].

Antipater poisoned by Malichus.

ACCORDINGLY, these two brothers feigning to believe Malichus innocent of their father's death, the eldest went and busied himself with rearing a stately monument to him, whilst Herod went into Samaria, under pretence of suppressing some turbulent spirits there. He came some time after to Jerusalem, attended with a number of his men of war, to assist at the feast of pentecost; and Malichus, who was afraid of something worse, prevailed on Hyrcan to forbid him to enter that metropolis with such an escort, as would prophane that solemnity. Herod despising his orders, entered the city by night, but forbore attempting any thing against his enemy, though he had received full power from Cassius to revenge his father's death on that assassin. But a much better opportunity offered itself soon after, in which Malichus was Malichus outwitted by Herod.

[g] JOSEPH. ibid

caught

caught in his own craftineſs. Caſſius had taken Laodicea, and all the chief lords of Syria and Paleſtine haſtened thither with their preſents and congratulations; and Malichus, having left his ſon hoſtage with that governor, deſigned to have taken that opportunity of gettin him off, and to have gone back and excited a revolt in Judæa, whilſt the Romans were taken up with their civil wars, and then to have made a bold puſh for the Jewiſh crown. Whether Herod knew his whole deſign or no, he rightly gueſſed that he would not fail to pay his compliments to the conqueror, and ſo he did accordingly, he accompanying the Jewiſh pontiff thither. Herod fell in with them in the way, and having firſt obtained from Caſſius an order to the Tyrians to aſſiſt him in the puniſhment of Malichus, he invited Hyrcan and him to a ſupper he had prepared for them in the neighbourhood of Tyre, and ſent his ſervants into that city under pretence of getting all things ready, but in reality to acquaint the officers and gariſon of that city with Caſſius's orders. Theſe ſallied out accordingly, and having overtaken him, as many as could come at him at once ſheathed their daggers into his body (M). Hyrcan, upon hearing the news of his death, remained thunderſtruck for ſome time. At length having recovered himſelf, he aſked, by whoſe orders he had been killed? And Herod having calmly anſwered, by Caſſius's, he replied, that he could not but highly applaud the deed, ſince it had rid him of a very dangerous enemy [h].

Aſſaſſinated.

[h] Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra. Antiq. ubi ſupra, cap. 20.

(M) The fourth book of the Maccabees relates this puniſhment of Malichus ſomewhat differently (19), and ſays, that Caſſius being informed of Antipater's murder, exhorted Herod to revenge it as ſoon as himſelf was come to Tyre, and Hyrcan and Malichus were come to pay their reſpects to him there. Theſe being come accordingly to Tyre, as well as Phaſaelus and Herod, Caſſius commanded his men to do whatever theſe two laſt ſhould direct them.

Having therefore invited them all four to a feaſt, as ſoon as they had taken their afternoon's nap, as was uſual in thoſe countries, Hyrcan being ſeated near Malichus, and the two ſons of Antipater, Herod made a ſign, upon which ſome of Caſſius's officers fell upon Malichus, and murdered him. Hyrcan, at ſight of it fell into a ſwoon, from which being recovered, he aſked, why they had killed the man? Herod pleaded ignorance, and Hyrcan was glad to hold his peace.

(19) Ch. about.

BUT Malichus had left a brother behind him as turbulent as himſelf, who, under the ſpeciuos pretence of revenging his death, put Judæa again into a flame, whilſt Caſſius was gone to join Brutus in Aſia. Felix, who at that time was left at the head of ſome Roman forces at Jeruſalem, ſeems alſo to have been gained on that ſide. As for Hyrcan, he had not courage enough to oppoſe them, but acquieſced in what they did; ſo that Felix attacked Phaſaelus on the one hand, whilſt Malichus's brother went and took Maſſada, and ſome other fortreſſes of Judæa. Herod was then laid up with ſickneſs at Damaſcus, and unable for a while to give his brother any aſſiſtance: but Phaſaelus, who had ſtill a conſiderable number of forces, found means to drive Felix and all his party out of Jeruſalem, and from thence into ſome fortreſs, out of which he did not ſuffer him to come but by capitulation. By this time Herod being recovered came to his aſſiſtance, and drove the remaining part of Malichus's faction out of their fortreſſes, and forced the brother to ſurrender Maſſada to him, and to capitulate for his life [i]. The two brothers returned to Jeruſalem, where they reproved Hyrcan's baſeneſs in the ſevereſt terms; but were ſoon after reconciled to him, by the marriage of Herod with Mariamne, the beautiful granddaughter of that pontiff.

New troubles in Judæa Year of the Flood 2961. Before Chriſt, 38.

Quelled

IN the interim another enemy ſtarted up on the ſudden, namely Antigonus, the younger ſon of Ariſtobulus, Hyrcan's brother. He was upheld by Ptolemy Mennæus, prince of Chalcis, to whom he was related, and on that account had been adopted by him (N). He had likewiſe gained Marion prince Antigonus invades Judæa.

[i] Id. ibid.

(N) The reader may remember, that after Pompey had cauſed his father and brother to be put to death, Mennæus invited Alexandra into Chalcis, where he afterwards married her beauteous daughter, and for her ſake took both the mother and her children into his protection (20).

As for that Marion, who joined with young Antigonus, he had been lately made prince of Tyre by Caſſius; for that general, being in great want of money for the carrying on the war againſt the triumvirs, had divided the country of Syria into ſmall diſtricts, and ſold them to the higheſt bidders, one of whom was this Marion, who had bought the principality of Tyre of him 21) Theſe petty tyrants, however, were afterwards turned out by Marc Antony, upon his coming into that province.

(20) Conf. Joſeph. Antiq. l. xiv. c. 13, & 21. (21 Id. ibid. & bell. Jud. c. 10.

of Tyre, and bribed Fabius governor of Damaſcus into his intereſt; ſo that having gained a ſufficient army, he put himſelf at the head of it, with an intent of reviving his father's pretenſions to the kingdom; but he had ſcarce entered the frontiers of it, before Herod met him with a powerful army, and totally defeated him. This prince acted with his uſual generoſity towards the Tyrians, who had aſſiſted his enemy, not only ſparing their lives, but ſending ſome of them home with rich preſents, by which he gained the affections of that city; after which he returned triumphant to Jeruſalem, where the people, and among the reſt Hyrcan, who now looked upon him as one of his family, came and offered him the uſual compliments of crowns and congratulations. His nuptials with Mariamne were not, however, celebrated till ſome years after, when he had by her three ſons and two daughters, beſides his eldeſt ſon Antipater, whom he had by a former wife of his own country, named Dores [k].

Marc Antony's edict in favour of the Jews.

Brutus and Caſſius having been defeated in the following year by Marc Antony and Octavius, the latter marched into Gaul, and the former into Syria, to ſettle the affairs of that province. Upon his arrival into Bithynia, where he was complimented by vaſt crouds of embaſſadors from all the neighbouring ſtates, the Jews came and preferred a ſevere accuſation againſt Phaſuelus and Herod, as having ingroſſed all the power and adminiſtration of Judæa, and left Hyrcan only the bare name of a prince. But Herod, who was there alſo, found in that general a ſtedfaſt friend, not only on account of former kindneſſes which he had received from Antipater, whilſt he ſerved under Gabinius in Judæa, but much more on that of a large ſum of money, with which he had taken care to bribe him, ſo that he would not ſo much as hear their accuſers. Upon his coming to Epheſus, an embaſſy came to him from Hyrcan, deſiring, that the Jewiſh priſoners, whom Caſſius had formerly ſold by auction, contrary to their alliance with Rome, might be reſtored to their liberty and lands. Antony readily granted their requeſt, and ſent an obliging letter to Hyrcan, which was ſoon followed with an edict to the Tyrians, and other neighbouring ſtates, enjoining them to reſtore all thoſe captives, according to Hyrcan's deſire and the purport of the edict, which the reader may ſee in the margin [l] (O).

But

[k] Ibid. cap. 21. [l] Ibid. c. 22.

(O) Marc Antony, emperor and triumvir, &c. to the magiſtrates, ſenate, and people, of Tyre, greeting:

Foraſmuch

BUT all these favours of the triumvir, though chiefly owing to his friendship to the sons of Antipater, were not able to reconcile them to the generality of the Jews. For as soon as Antony was come so near them as Daphne a city near Antioch †, he was accosted by a fresh embassy from Jerusalem, who preferred the old complaints to him against them. Messala undertook their defence, and was backed by Hyrcan, who, looking upon them now as part of his family, was come thither to second their defence. After a full hearing, Antony asked the pontiff, which of the two parties he thought best qualified for the government, and being answered in favour of the two brothers, he likewise declared for them; and, as a further mark of his friendship, made them both tetrarchs, put Judæa under their care, and wrote a letter to the sanhedrin in their favour. Fifteen of the most turbulent of their accusers were put into prison, and would have been put to death, had not Herod interceded for them. All this

New complaints against Herod rejected.

† De hac vid. Vol. VIII. p. 444, (E). Antiq. l. xiv. c. 25. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 11.

Forasmuch as the gods have declared themselves the dire revengers of the late Cæsar's death, by the total defeat of his most detestable assassins Brutus and Cassius, and by granting the triumvirate such a signal victory, as promised nothing less than a solid and lasting peace to the Roman empire; and forasmuch as the Jewish nation, notwithstanding their known and constant attachment to the Roman interest, has been greatly oppressed by Cassius, and great multitudes of them sold for slaves by him; we order the said Jews to be restored to their liberties, lands, and to all the privileges and immunities which had been granted to that allied nation by Dolabella, and charge all those cities, in which any such Jews are detained, whether bond or free, forthwith to discharge and restore them, pursuant to the strict tenor of this edict.

In another he writes to the Tyrians, that Hyrcan having complained to him, that they had in the late Cassius's time invaded some of his territories, he expected that they should be restored to him. Nevertheless, that if they had any reasons to offer against such a restitution, they should do it upon his coming into that province, when having heard the allegations of both parties, he should decree in favour of that which had right on their side.

These edicts he ordered to be copied out in Greek and Latin, and the original to be preserved in their archives, and the copies to be affixed in some public place, where they might be publicly read. He likewise sent some others to the same purport to the Sidonians, and to the cities of Antioch and Arad (22).

(22) Antiq. ubi supra, c. 23.

did only exasperate that faction the more, and produced a third embassy, which came to meet the triumvir at Tyre, and consisted of a thousand persons. But Antony, whom fresh presents, and large sums of money, had fastened still more to Herod's interest, sent orders to the magistracy of that place to assist him in the punishment of those factious mutineers, as he termed them; whereupon Herod met them out of the city, and advised them in a friendly manner not to push the matter further. Hyrcan likewise tried in vain to forewarn them of their danger, in case they persisted in their design. They refused all advice, till the Tyrians, rushing in upon them, made them repent of their rashness when it was too late. A great number were killed and wounded, and others taken prisoners, and the rest dispersed. This put an end indeed to the controversy, but not to the faction, which vented their resentment against Herod in such open manner, that Antony, in a fit of anger, caused all the prisoners to be put to death [m].

A third embassy sent, and severely punished.

Antigonus invades Judæa.

Herod had no sooner weathered this storm, but another was raised against him by Antigonus. Ptolemy, the son of Mennæus, had been succeeded by his son Lysanias, and this last had prevailed upon Pacorus, the son of the Parthian king, and his general Barzanes, who by this time had made themselves masters of Sidon and Ptolemais, to invade Judæa, depose Hyrcan, and set Antigonus on his throne; in consideration of which, the latter was to pay him a hundred talents, and five hundred women (P). Pacorus, pursuant to this agreement, sent his cup-bearer, named also Pacorus, with part of his cavalry, to invade Judæa. Antigonus, who had got together by that time a great number of discontented Jews, who joined him from mount Carmel, had made himself master of the canton of Dryma (Q), where a great number of other Jews coming still to him, persuaded him to march on to Jerusalem, and attack Phasaelus and his brother in the

And Jerusalem.

[m] Id. ibid.

(P) The fourth book of the Maccabees (23) says, eight hundred women, the fairest and best bred in all the country.

(Q) It is not easy to guess what canton this was, unless it be the same with the daroma of Eusebius and St. Jerom, by which they mean the southern part of the tribe of Judah, extending about twenty miles from east to west, from Beersheba to the dead sea, and is called in Hebrew Darom, which signifies south (24).

(23) Cap. xlix. (24) Vid. Reland. Palæst. illustrat. l. i. c 32, & Vol. III. p. 109.

royal

royal palace. He marched accordingly thitherward, attended with the Parthian cup-bearer; and these two, being met by the two tetrarchs, were so warmly repulsed by them, that they were forced to retire into the temple. Herod, for the better security of that place, clapped a guard of soldiers in all the adjacent houses; but these were soon set on fire, and the soldiers burnt in them before any help could be brought. Herod did not let this loss go long unrevenged, but gave them a sharp defeat, in which he made a great slaughter of their party. Thus they continued skirmishing one another till the feast of pentecost, which was impatiently wished for by Antigonus, in hopes that the great concourse of the Jews to that solemnity would join forces with him against the sons of Antipater. He judged rightly enough, for great numbers of them resorted unto Him; but as the greater part of them had neither arms nor experience, Herod, who, with his brother, had retired into the royal palace, and defended it, the former from within, and the other from without, made a vigorous sally upon those of the enemy, who had posted themselves in the suburbs, and drove several thousands of them before him, some into the city, and others into the temple.

THE two parties, being at length tired with shedding so much blood, came to an agreement, that Pacorus, who was by that time incamped without the walls of the city, should be admitted to mediate a peace between them. This project, though set on foot by Antigonus, who wholly relied on the friendship of the Parthian general, was yet agreed to by Phasaelus, who went out to meet him, and courteously lodged him in the royal palace. Here Pacorus, taking the advantage of the confidence his kind host put in him, persuaded him to go on an embassy to Barzapharnes, who was then governor of Syria under the Parthian king, assuring him, that it was the only means to settle his affair on a firm footing. Herod, who justly suspected the treachery of the Parthians, was intirely averse to the proposal; but Phasaelus, more credulous than he, consented to it; and, taking Hyrcan with him, set on the journey, attended with an escort of two hundred Parthian horse, and with Pacorus, who accompanied him all the way. Upon their arrival in Galilee (R), they were met with a guard of armed men, who were

(R) Josephus doth not tell us the place where Barzapharnes then was, but only that he was in Galilee, near the sea-side; but in were ſent to conduct them to Barzapharnes, and Pacorus returned to Jeruſalem. Their reception in all appearance was very courteous, and Barzapharnes lodged them in a houſe near the ſea-ſide, where Phaſaelus was ſoon after informed by ſome friends, of the contract which had paſſed between the Parthian king and Antigonus; it was then that he firſt became ſenſible of their treachery and of his danger. However, though he was earneſtly intreated to make his eſcape, and was offered tranſport-ſhips to convey him away, yet he could not be prevailed upon to forſake either Hyrcan's or his brother's intereſt; for here he was likewiſe told, that Pacorus was ſent back to Jeruſalem to ſurpriſe Herod alſo. The beſt expedient therefore he could think on was, to go to Barzapharnes, and to expoſtulate the matter with him; which he did in the ſevereſt terms, telling him at the ſame time, that if money was the motive of his treachery to him, he was able to bribe him higher to be honeſt, and come over to his intereſt. The Parthian had no other way to come off, but by forſwearing the charge, and aſſuring him, that nothing was falſer than ſuch a ſurmiſe; but as ſoon as he thought that Pacorus had made ſure of Herod, he marched directly towards him, and ordered Hyrcan and Phaſaelus to be ſeized, and clapt in priſon.

Phaſaelus betrayed.

Herod's eſcape.

Pacorus, however, had miſſed his aim, and Herod, having had timely notice of the treachery, had found means to convey himſelf out of Jeruſalem, together with his mother, his bethrothed Mariamne, her mother Alexandra, his brother Pheroras, with all his ſervants, friends, and valuable things, and a numerous eſcort of his own men of war, and made the beſt of his way towards Idumæa. He met with ſeveral ſtops in his journey (S), being forced to fight his way through the Parthians and Antigonians, who purſued him; but his ...

in his wars of the Jews he ſays (25), they met him at Ecdipon, which place was near the ſea-ſhore, and at a ſmall diſtance north of Ptolemais; but the fourth book of Maccabees ſays, it was at Damaſcus, the capital of Syria (26).

(S) One of them was the overturning of the chariot in which his mother ſat, by which ſhe was ſo terribly bruiſed, that her life was deſpaired of; which ſad accident went ſo near his heart, that he drew his ſword with full intent to kill himſelf, but was happily prevented by ſome of his retinue.

The fourth book of the Maccabees (27) ſays, that Herod ſent all his family and riches before him, but that himſelf ſtayed behind with his guards to prevent their being purſued.

(25) Ch. xi. (26) Ch. xlix. (27) Ibid.

lour

lour and that of his guards got him clear of all, and in memory of a ſignal defeat, which he gave them at a place about fifty ſtades, or ſeven miles, from Jeruſalem, he afterwards built a ſtately palace, and called it Herodion [n].

WHEN he was come to Threſſa, or, as Joſephus calls it elſewhere, Reſſa, a ſmall town in Idumea, his brother Joſeph met him at the head of a conſiderable reinforcement; but when they arrived at Maſſada, the place where he deſigned to retire, it being a very ſtrong and almoſt impregnable fortreſs, he found it too ſmall to contain all his men, ſo that he was forced to diſmiſs nine thouſand of them. Here he left his family and treaſure, under the care of his brother Joſeph, and of a gariſon of eight hundred men; and, having furniſhed it with all neceſſaries, he ſet out for Petra, the metropolis of Arabia,, where Malchus had ſucceded his father Aretas, a prince who had formerly been highly obliged to him. His deſign was to borrow as much money of him as would buy his brother Phaſaelus's freedom; and to that end he had brought his ſon with him, who was but ſeven years old, to leave him there as a pledge to the Arabian king. But that ungrateful prince ſent him expreſs orders to depart out of his territories, pretending, that he had been forbid by the Parthians to receive him; ſo that he was forced to diſmiſs ſome of his attendants, and to make the beſt of his way into Egypt.

Goes into Arabia.

And Egypt

IN the mean while, his flight out of Jeruſalem having been diſcovered by the very next morning, the firſt thing the Parthians did was, to plunder his palace, city, and all the country about it. They ſpared, however, Hyrcan's treaſure, which amounted to three hundred talents, and ſome of Herod's riches that were left behind; but they made themſelves amends by the plunder of Mariſſa, an opulent city, which they totally deſtroyed. Antigonus was next inſtalled on the Jewiſh throne, according to their agreement, and Phaſaelus and Hyrcan were ſoon after brought to him in chains. The new king, however, did not think proper to put the high-prieſt to death, but contented himſelf with incapacitating him for the pontifical function, by cauſing his ears to be cut off (T). As for Phaſaelus,

His palace plundered.

Hyrcan's ears cut off.

[n] Antiq. ubi ſupra. cap. 25. the reader may ſee that palace deſcribed by JOSEPH. bell. Jud. l.i. c. 16.

(T) The Moſaic law (28) required, that the high-prieſt ſhould (28) Vid. Levit. xxi. 16, & Vol. III. p. 235.

be:

Phasaelus, he easily foresaw that he could not escape some cruel death; but being bound with chains, and unable to kill himself by any other way, he knocked his brains out against a stone. Our historian adds, that there was a report that his wounds not being mortal, Antigonus sent some physicians to him, under pretence of trying to cure, but in reality to poison, them, and make sure of him. However, he had the pleasure before his death to hear that his brother was escaped, and got to Rhinocorura, and there it was that Herod heard of his death. The Parthians having thus far performed their contract with Antigonus, began their march homeward, and took the unfortunate high-priest with them, to prevent any fresh tumults being raised upon his account [o].

Phasaelus's death

By that time Herod was got from Rhinocorura to Pelusium, he received a message from the Arabian king, who was now ashamed of his baseness, with an apology and new offers of his service; but he rejected them, and would have imbarqued for Rome, but the sailors obstinately refused to take him in; whereupon he applied himself to the magistrates of the city, who received him with great honour, and provided him another ship. During his stay in Egypt, he was courted by Cleopatra to continue there longer; the Maccabitish book often quoted adds, that she offered to make him her prime minister, and general of all her forces; but he was fully bent upon going to Rome with all speed, and getting on board a vessel, which was bound to Pamphylia, a violent storm forced them to land at Rhodes, where he met with some friends and assistance, and passed thence to Brundusium, and came at length to Rome. Here he addressed himself first to Antony, and then to Octavianus, to whom he related all that had happened in Judæa, and the desperate condition his affairs were in; and partly by his intreaties, and reminding them of his father's friendship to Julius Cæsar, and partly by the promise of a large sum of money, did so work upon them, that they resolved to assist him to the utmost of their power. Antony, on the score of the old kindnesses of Antipater, did even perform more than Herod expected or even desired of them. The utmost of his aim was, to have had Aristobulus, the brother be perfect in all his limbs, &c. so that upon the loss of any of them, he was immediately divested of that office, and another was to be chosen in his room.

Herod's success at Rome.

[o] Antiq. l. xiv. c. 25. Bell. Jud. l. 1. c. 11.

Josephus adds, that Antigonus was not able to pay the Parthian king the five hundred women, because Herod had seized upon them, and carried them off into his place of retreat.

of

of his beloved Mariamne, ſettled on the throne (U); and himſelf to have been at the head of the Jewiſh affairs under him, as his father had been under Hyrcan; whereas the triumvirs did actually reſolve to procure him the crown, tho' this was contrary to the Roman method, who, in caſes of the like nature, did always pay ſuch a due regard to the royal line of their dependent kings, as not to ſet up a ſtranger over them; but our triumvirs intereſt eaſily over-ruled that good maxim.

THE ſenate was accordingly convened, and Herod introduced to them by Meſſala and Atratinus, two noble ſenators, who there ſet forth the merits of Antipater's family to the Roman nation, and repreſented Antigonus as a turbulent and ſeditious perſon, and a known enemy to their nation, who had not ſcrupled to accept of the Jewiſh crown from the hands of the Parthians. To this Antony added, how advantagious it would be to his expedition againſt Parthia, to have ſuch a ſtedfaſt friend as Herod to be king of Judæa; upon which he was unanimouſly choſen by the ſenate, and Antigonus voted an enemy to them. As ſoon as the decree was paſſed, Herod was conducted with great ceremony into the capitol, Octavianus and Antony marching on each ſide of him (W), accompanied by the conſuls and ſenators; where, after the uſual ſacrifices, the decree was depoſited among the archives, after which Antony gave them a magnificent entertainment. Thus Herod became king of Judæa, by the friendſhip and intereſt of Antony and Auguſtus, in the conſulſhip of Caius Domitius Calvinus and Caius Aſinius Pollio. The condition he had left his affairs in Judæa, and his family in Idumea, not permitting to ſtay longer than ſeven days after his inauguration, he ſet out again from Brunduſium, and ſailed from thence to Ptolemais, where he landed about the latter end of the ſum-

Created king of Judæa.

Year of the Flood, 2961. Before Chriſt, 38.

(U) This prince had certainly the beſt title to the crown, being the ſon of Alexandra the daughter of Hyrcan, by Alexander the ſon of Ariſtobulus, the brother of that pontiff; ſo that the right of thoſe two brothers were united in him.

(W) The fourth book of the Maccabees adds (29), that the ſenate ordered him a golden crown, and to be conducted to and from the capitol on horſeback, whilſt a herald marched before him, crying, Long live Herod, king of the Jews, and of the holy city.

Antony having afterwards given the company a ſumptuous feaſt, he and Herod imbarqued with a numerous army, and being arrived at Antioch, he ordered one half to go with him into Judæa, and with the other he marched into Parthia.

(29) Cap. I.

mer, so that he spent but three months in this expedition both by sea and land [p].

Massada besieged by Antigonus.

WHILE he was thus successful at Rome, Antigonus had so closely besieged the fortress of Massada, that though it was well provided with all other necessaries, yet they were much distressed for want of water, insomuch, that Joseph, who commanded there, was contriving means to make a desperate sally, and to break through the besiegers, in order to escape into Arabia and get some fresh succour from Malchus, who, as we hinted before, was highly ashamed of his late treatment of Herod. But, happily for him, the very night he intended to sally out, there fell such a heavy rain, as filled all their cisterns again; so that he thought on nothing now but how to make a brave defence, till his brother came and relieved him, whilst he still made some bold sallies, and killed not a few of the besiegers. In the mean time, Ventidius the Roman general in Syria, having driven the Parthians out of that province, came and encamped in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, under pretence of relieving Massada, but in reality to extort money from Antigonus: for as soon as this last had satisfied his greediness with a good round sum, he marched away, leaving, for formality's sake, some part of his men with Silo, a pensioner, whom Antigonus had been forced to make by dint of money, till he could get himself strengthened by the Parthians, whose assistanee he was still in hopes of.

Mariamne's character.

Herod on the other hand was not idle, his thoughts were wholly bent upon relieving his distressed family; but especially his beloved Mariamne, a princess, who was indeed very well worth all his care and concern, whether we consider her as descended from a long series of illustrious kings and high-priests, or a person of exalted virtue and merit, and adorned with the most endearing charms of body and mind. As soon therefore as he was arrived at Ptolemais, he got an army together of Jewish and other troops, which his generosity still increased as fast as he went, insomuch, that a very little time had brought almost the whole province of Galilee into his interest. At the same time his friend Antony sent orders by Dellius to Ventidius to assist him with all his forces; so that he was now strong enough to march against Antigonus and to relieve Massada. He stopped, however, to lay siege to Joppa, a place of too great importance to be left behind in the hands of the enemy. Silo took this opportunity to withdraw his forces from him, and was like to have paid dear for his desertion. For Antigonus fell upon him, and had infalli-

Joppa taken by Herod.

[p] Antiq. ibid c 26, 27. Bell. Jud ubi supra, c. 12.

bly

bly defeated him, had not Herod come to his relcue. Joppa being ſoon after ſurrendered, he marched directly to relieve his beſieged friends, and, in ſpight of the many ambuſhes which Antigonus did lay in his way, and the treachery of Silo, who extorted money from both ſides, and did all he could to obſtruct inſtead of aſſiſting him; he reached Maſſada, forced the enemy to raiſe the ſiege (X), and was joyfully received by all his family [q]. Maſſada relieved.

By this time Herod's army was greatly increaſed, not only by the gariſon of Maſſada, but by other reinforcements, which came voluntary from other parts, and enabled him to go and form the ſiege of Jeruſalem. He took Rheſſa in his way, and being come before the metropolis, he cauſed a general amneſty to be proclaimed, extending to all, none except- Herod marches againſt Jeruſalem.

[q] Id. ibid.

(X) The fourth book of Maccabees adds (30), that Herod ſurpriſed Antigonus before the place, and made a vigorous attack on one ſide of him, whilſt Joſeph ſallied out againſt him on the other; ſo that he was totally defeated, and forced to flee into Jeruſalem, whither Herod purſued him, and laid cloſe ſiege to him.

It will not be amiſs to cloſe this note with a hint on a more remarkable occurrence out of our learned Uſher (31), namely the birth of Salonimus, (ſo called by his father Aſinius Pollio, the then Roman conſul, in memory of his taking Salonæ, a city in Dalmatia) and which gave occaſion to the fourth eclogue of Virgil, in which that poet has given ſuch a noble deſcription of the golden age, which this child was to reſtore to the world, that he is juſtly ſuppoſed to have ſtolen it, not ſo much out of the pretended ſibylline oracles, as from the prophecies concerning the reign of the Meſſiah, the true prince of peace. For, as they were tranſlated by that time into Greek, they may be reaſonably ſuppoſed to have been read by him, and perhaps further explained to him by the Jews, who, if we may believe Cicero (32), were very numerous at that time at Rome.

That Virgil proved a falſe prophet with reſpect to his wonderful child, the event has ſhewn, ſince he lived but nine days. But that the more miraculous child Jeſus, who was born forty years after (33), has left us ſuch a divine ſet of laws, as fully anſwer the glorious deſcription which the prophets have given us of his reign; and which, duly and univerſally obſerved, would eaſily eclipſe all that the poets have ſung concerning their fabulous golden age, cannot be denied, our enemies themſelves being judges.

(30) Ibid (31) Annal. ſub. A. M. 3964. (32) Orat. pro Flacc (33) Prid Connect. ſub an. A. C. 40. Vid. & Arch. Chandler's defence of chriſtianity.

ed, that had joined with Antigonus, and came over to him within a limited time. To this Antigonus answered, addressing himself to Silo and the rest of the Roman soldiers, who were come to assist Herod in the siege; "that it was a shame-"ful injustice in the senate to set a private person on the "throne, who was an Idumean, or half Jew, contrary to "the Jewish laws and right of succession; that if they re-"sented his receiving the crown from the Parthians, there "were still enough left of the royal and sacerdotal race, who "had deserved, to the full, as well of the Romans as Herod, "and on whom they might more justly bestow it." The contest between the two rivals rose at length to such a height, that Antigonus caused some volleys of arrows to be shot upon the enemy, and forced them to retire. Here arose a fresh mutiny, supposed to have been underhand encouraged by Silo; his soldiers complaining aloud of the want of money, provisions, and better winter-quarters; Herod was forced to send out for fresh supplies for them, which came afterwards in such plenty, that there was not the least pretence left for a revolt. The city of Jericho did, however, fall a sacrifice to the Roman greediness; they plundered it of all its riches, which amounted to an immense value; after which Herod was forced to send them into winter-quarters in Samaria, Idumea, and Galilee, whilst Antigonus, to curry favour with Antony, obtained of Silo, as a great favour, that part of the Roman army might be sent into Lydda, which still held out for him.

THE season by this time being too far advanced to begin the siege of Jerusalem, Herod, having well glutted and quartered his Roman auxiliaries, sent his brother Joseph into Idumea, with a thousand foot and four hundred horse, whilst he went and secured his family in the city of Samaria; from thence he went and took some fortresses in Galilee from Antigonus, and among others that of Sephoris, which had been abandoned by the garison, and where he found great store of provisions. From thence he sent a detachment into the territories of Arbela, which was sadly infested with gangs of banditti; but as they could not ferret them out of their lurking-places, he marched against them with his whole army, and was as boldly encountered by their whole force. An obstinate fight ensued, in which his left wing began to give way; but he came so timely to their aid, that he gained a complete victory; by which he became master of all Galilee, except those rocky parts into which the defeated banditti retired. He rewarded his troops with a noble donative of a hundred and fifty drachms to each private man, and ſo proportionably to thoſe of a higher rank, and then ſent them into winter-quarters. Silo left him ſoon after to follow Ventidius into Parthia, and Herod, who could hardly ſtay for the return of the ſpring to put himſelf into action, reſolved, if poſſible, to rid himſelf and the country of the remaining gangs of banditti. The inacceſſibleneſs of their lurking-holes made it almoſt impracticable; but Herod having cauſed a number of iron cheſts to be made and filled with ſoldiers, which let them down with iron chains, he made great execution amongſt them, till night obliged them to withdraw, when he cauſed a general pardon to be proclaimed to all who ſhould come and ſurrender themſelves. But this having reduced but a few of them, his ſoldiers by next morning went and ſet ſome combuſtible matter on fire at the mouth of their caverns, put all within in a flame, and ſmothered thoſe it could not burn; and yet ſuch was their obſtinacy, that they choſe rather to periſh than accept of a pardon. A notable inſtance of which the reader may ſee in the margin (Y).

vate

Deſtroys the gangs of banditti

Herod, thinking by this time that he had pretty near reduced their gang, left the country under the command of Ptolemy, at the head of as many forces as he thought would ſuffice to keep it in awe; and took the road to Samaria, where he had left his family, with a deſign to go, and either begin the ſiege of Jeruſalem, or bring Antigonus to a battle. He was no ſooner gone, but thoſe whom he had lately drove over Jordan returned again, ſlew Ptolemy, and ravaged the country afreſh; ſo that he was forced to come back with freſh forces, with which he ſo effectually deſtroyed them and their lurking-places, and fined thoſe towns ſo ſeverely, which had given them either ſhelter or relief, that he quite rid the province of that deſtructive vermine [r].

[r] Id. ibid.

(Y) Our hiſtorian tells us (34), that an old man being hid in one of theſe caverns, his wife and ſeven ſons, who were with him, did earneſtly beſeech him to ſuffer them to ſurrender themſelves; but he, placing himſelf at the mouth of the cave, ſtabbed them one after another, as they attempted to paſs by him, and caſt them down the precipice, and himſelf next, after having vented ſome ſcandalous reflections on the meanneſs of Herod's extraction, who was at the ſame time making him all the ſigns of pardon and clemency.

(34) Antiq. ubi ſupra, cap. 28. ſub fin. bell. Jud. l. i. c. 13

THE

Antigonus's ill treatment of Machæras.

THE Parthians having been defeated soon after by Ventidius, as shall be seen in the next chapter, that general, by order of Antony, sent Machæras with two legions and a thousand horse to assist Herod in his war against Antigonus; but this last having gained him over by a large sum, Machæras would needs march towards him under pretence of examining the strength of the place. Herod, having tried in vain to dissuade him from it, began to suspect him of some treachery; but held his peace for the present. Not so did Antigonus, who seeing the Romans draw near the walls of Jerusalem, conceived such jealousy of them, that he caused his men to let fly some vollies of arrow and stones against them, which so exasperated him, that he returned to Emmaus, and turned his arms against the Jews there, slaying indiscriminately all that came in his way, and among them a number of Herod's friends. Herod, who was then on the point of going to pay his respects to Antony at the siege of Samosata, threatened to complain of it to him; but Machæras, hastening after, prevailed upon him to be reconciled, and to leave his brother Joseph, and a number of forces with him, to carry on the war during his absence; on this condition, however, that they should undertake nothing that was hazardous till his return. In his march to Antony's camp, he was forced to fight his way through some bands of free-booters, or, as the fourth of the Maccabees calls them [r], wild Arabs, who had attacked him in the rear, which would have been all cut off, if he had not come back to their assistance and defeated the thievish gang. At his arrival before Samosata, he was received with all the marks of honour and esteem by the Roman triumvir, and did him many gallant services at that siege. In requital of which, when the city was taken, Antony left Sosius governor of Syria with the command of the Roman forces, and orders to assist Herod with them whenever he required it.

Herod on his return found his affairs strangely altered for the worse; his brother Joseph, having forgot his orders, had made an incursion against Jericho, with his own troops, and five legions, which he received from Machæras; but the Roman horse being unfit for such rocky ground as he was then incamped upon, the enemy surprised and defeated him, after a noble defence, in which himself was killed by Pappus the Roman general. Antigonus caused his head to be cut off, and carried in triumph with him; but his brother Pheroras redeemed it soon after at the price of fifty talents. The consequence

Joseph defeated and killed.

[r] Cap. lii.

ſequence of this defeat was the total revolt of Galilee, where the wealthieſt of Herod's party were barbarouſly flung in great numbers into the lake of Tiberias. Idumea was alſo on the point of revolting, when Herod appeared at the head of a freſh army, and in a little time reduced thoſe two provinces again. At Jericho, where he gave an entertainment to his friends, he was twice in danger of his life, the firſt time by the fall of the banquetting-houſe, which the gueſts had but juſt quitted; and on the next day by a party of ſix thouſand Antigonians, who came and aſſaulted his vanguard, and where he received a wound. His army ſtill increaſing, and Machæras ſtoutly defending himſelf againſt Antigonus, a battle was ſoon fought between the two antagoniſts, wherein Herod gained a complete victory, and made a horrid ſlaughter of the enemy: Pappus being found among the dead, he ordered his head to be cut off, and ſent to Pheroras. His eagerneſs to revenge his brother's death, made him purſue his flying enemy with ſuch uncommon ſwiftneſs and cruelty, that, had he not been prevented, by a violent ſtorm, he might have gone ſtrait to Jeruſalem, and have taken it with eaſe; Antigonus being by that time ſo reduced, that he was upon the point of abandoning it; but by that time winter coming on, and the ſoldiers not being able to bear the fatigues of a ſiege, Herod put them into winter-quarters, and ſet about getting ready all things neceſſary for beginning it early the following ſpring [r].

WHILST theſe preparations were making, Herod went to Samaria, and there conſummated his marriage with Mariamne, whom he had betrothed four years before; but had been hindered from marrying through the many troubles he was intangled in, though he had an extreme deſire to ſee this union once happily accompliſhed (Z). By this time he had got a reinforcement of thirty thouſand men, and Soſius, who had been ſent to his aſſiſtance at the head of eleven legions and ſix thouſand horſe, beſides ſome auxiliary troops hired from

[r] Antiq. & bell. Jud. ubi ſupra.

(Z) We have already given the character and deſcent of this excellent princeſs, and Herod had great reaſon to hope that this marriage would effectually reconcile him to the Jewiſh nation, whom he knew to retain an affectionate zeal for the Aſmonean family, of which ſhe was deſcended by the two brothers, Hyrcan and Ariſtobulus, as we hinted in a former note. This he thought would likewiſe facilitate the ſurrender of Jeruſalem, by withdrawing numbers of the beſieged Jews from the faction of Antigonus.

Syria,

Jerusalem besieged by Herod.

Syria, was marching through Phœnice to join him, and with this numerous army they went and besieged Jerusalem (A). The besieged on the other hand were no less numerous and resolute for a vigorous defence, the city being filled with Jews, who flocked thither from all parts of the kingdom. But these wanted military experience, and trusted either to their strength and courage, or to the sacredness of the temple, which they seemed confident would be defended by some miraculous providence, against an Idumean usurper and an army of idolatrous Romans. They did likewise annoy the besiegers by frequent private sallies, in which they spoiled great quantities of their provisions and forage. But on the fortieth day of the siege, the Romans, in spite of the stout resistance from within, found means to scale the outward wall, and to make themselves masters of it; and on the fiftieth they got within the second, whem some of the galleries about the temple being set on fire, Herod threw all the odium of it on Antigonus. The lower city being taken, the besieged betook themselves to the higher and to the temple, where they suffered very much through famine, it being the sabbatic year *. However, they built a new wall instead of that which was beaten down, countermined the enemy, and fought sometimes above and sometimes under ground, and with more despair than true courage. At length, after a five months close siege, by so numerous an army (B), Herod, finding them as obstinate as ever, ordered a general assault to be made, which both his and the Roman troops performed with such vigour, that they forced them at length to surrender. Antigonus himself came down from a tower, where he had defended himself as long as he could, threw himself at Sosius's feet, and in the most

* De hoc vid. Vol. III. p. 190.

(A) Josephus tells us, that the Roman legions did not consist of a certain number, but amounted, some to four thousand, some to five thousand, and some to six thousand; but, however, if we take them at the lowest, and join to them the Jewish and Syrian forces, this army must have amounted to above sixty thousand men.

(B) All this while Herod still behaved with great moderation towards the Antigonians, not only promising them his pardon and kind reception, but, at their desire, supplying them with all necessary victims for their daily and other sacrifices, not doubting but that he might in time mollify them into a surrender, but all proved in vain (34).

(34) Antiq. ubi supra, cap. 28. sub fin. bell. Jud l. i. c. 13.

abject

abject and ſubmiſſive guiſe implored his mercy. But the elated Roman, inſtead of expreſſing the leaſt concern for that unfortunate prince, upbraided him with cowardice and effeminacy, calling him in the feminine gender Antigona, and ordered him to be put under a ſtrong guard. The Romans at the ſame time, having diſperſed themſelves through all the quarters of the upper city, made a terrible ſlaughter of the Jews, and plundered and ravaged every place they came near, to be revenged, as they expreſſed it, for the length and fatigue of the ſiege. The very ſanctuary was in danger of undergoing the ſame fate, had not Herod prevented it, partly by fair, partly by threatening words, and even by mere force. He ſent at the ſame time a ſevere meſſage to Soſius, complaining, that if this plunder and butchery were not ſtopped, the Romans would leave him king only of a bare wilderneſs; and that as for himſelf, he ſhould look upon his ſucceſs as the moſt unhappy thing that could befal him, if it muſt be attended with the profanation of that ſacred place, the acceſs to which was permitted to none but to the Jewiſh prieſts. To all this Soſius anſwered, that he did not well know how to forbid his troops the plundering of a place that had been taken by aſſault; ſo that Herod ſaw himſelf under a neceſſity of ſaving both temple and city from all further devaſtation, by a large donative out of his own coffers.

Taken by ſtorm.

Saved from deſtruction by

THUS was this city taken after a ſiege of near ſix months (C), and with its ſurrender ended the reign of the Aſmoneans, after it had continued a hundred and twenty nine years, from Judas Maccabeus taking the Jewiſh government upon him (D). Antigonus, the laſt male of that race that it Antigonus put to death.

Year of the Flood, 2962. Before Chriſt, 37.

(C) Reckoning from Herod's firſt ſetting down before it; for, was not till ſome time after that Soſius joined him with his troops and carried on the ſiege jointly with him.

(D) Joſephus reckons but a hundred and twenty ſix years (35); but he muſt be underſtood only from the time that Judas was eſtabliſhed in his government by his peace with Antiochus, three years after he had taken it into his hands.

It is true, however, his ſucceſſors did not take the title of kings, as we have ſeen in the courſe of this ſection, till Ariſtobulus, or rather till Alexander Jannæus; but that family ſtill enjoyed the peculiar privilege of joining the pontifical with the regal or ſupreme dignity.

(35) Ibid.

bore the regal title, was clapped in irons by Sosius, who, having presented a crown of gold to the temple, left Jerusalem, and took the unhappy prince with him, and delivered him to Antony; by whom he was, at the earnest solicitations of Herod, put to a shameful death (E), in the third year of his reign [u].

SECT. V.

The history of the Jews from Herod to the birth of Christ.

Herod's cruel beginning.

THE taking of Jerusalem and the death of Antigonus having now fixed Herod upon the Jewish throne, he was soon obliged to bend his thoughts on two important concerns; the one to replenish his coffers exhausted, [u] Antiq. l. xv. c. 1. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 13. Vid. & Usser. sub A. M. 3967.

(E) The Jewish historian observes, that Antony would willingly have reserved Antigonus for his future triumph, but that Herod, who feared every thing from his rival, if he should ever have an opportunity to plead his own cause before the senate, ceased not to importune that general to put him to death, and obtained it at last by a large sum of money. But he caused that unhappy prince to be executed in so shameful a manner, as has given just occasion to several antient authors to condemn it, as a piece of injustice and cruelty, never till then allowed of by the Romans (36).

For having caused him to be condemned as a private criminal, and without regard to his illustrious descent, the sentence was executed accordingly at Antioch, where, having been first tied and whipped at a stake, his head was cut off, after having been all along flattered with promises of life. This punishment, Strabo in the place above quoted observes, had never been inflicted on any crowned head; but Antony thought it necessary by such an ignominious death to render him contemptible to the Jews, to prevent their raising any new tumults against his generous friend Herod (37).

(36) Vid. int. al Plutarch. in Anton Dion lib xlix Strab. ap Joseph. Antiq l. xv c. 1. (37) Ibid

partly

partly by the large ſums with which he had been forced to buy the friendſhip of the Roman generals, and even Antony himſelf; and partly by the profuſeneſs with which he rewarded his own and the Roman troops for their paſt ſervices, and eſpecially for ſaving the city and temple from plunder and ruin: the other was to ſuppreſs the oppoſite Jewiſh faction, which, in ſpite of his rival's ignominious death, retained an invincible attachment to the Aſmonean family, and an irreconcileable hatred to his own. Theſe two points, which could not be gained, the one without a great deal of oppreſſion, and the other without much cruelty and blood-ſhed, we muſt look upon as the two main ſprings of all his actions, and the cauſes of his uneaſy reign. Accordingly, upon his having got poſſeſſion of that metropolis, he cauſed all the gold, ſilver, and other valuable things he found in it, to be carried into his own palace, by which he amaſſed immediately an immenſe treaſure; but as a great part of it had been already promiſed to the Romans, and was actually given to them, he reimburſed himſelf by the forfeiture of the eſtates of the Antigonian faction, cauſing the wealthieſt of them to be ſeized, and forty five of the principal of them to be put to death (A). And ſuch was his jealouſy in this reſpect, that

(A) We took notice in the laſt ſection, that Herod ſpared that very Sameas, who had appeared the moſt intrepid againſt him, at his tryal before the ſanhedrin; as well as Pollio, another learned and valuable Jew, who had been a great ſtickler for Hyrcan againſt him; and theſe were not the only two inſtances of Herod's clemency. We have elſewhere ſeen other marks of his generous forgiveneſs; and it is likely, that if he could have ſupported his new regal dignity without thoſe violent means, which the obſtinacy of the Jews and the emptineſs of his coffers forced him to, it would have been much more agreeable to his temper, which was really generous even to profuſeneſs.

However, we muſt own, that theſe two great men, whom he not only ſpared above all the reſt, but took into his ſpecial favour and confidence, had, notwithſtanding all the incenſe which the rabbies give them for their courage and intrepidity, taken care to make their peace with him during the ſiege, by exhorting the beſieged to open their gates to him.

For whilſt the Antigonian faction were encourageing the ſuperſtitious Jews with crying the temple of the Lord, and making them expect ſome miraculous deliverance, theſe two politicians, foreſeeing that the city could not hold out much longer againſt ſuch a vigorous ſiege, and under the exceſſive want of all proviſions, did with a kind of prophetic confidence aſſure them, that all reſiſtance was vain, ſince the thing was from the Lord, who for their ſins was now bringing them in ſubjection to this foreigner that he caused guards to be planted at their gates, to examine, as they were carrying them to their graves, whether they were really dead, and whether any riches were conveyed off with their bodies; in which case they were seized upon and sent into his treasury. Upon the whole, his necessities and profuseness were so great, that he spared no extortion to supply them; insomuch, that this being the sabbatic year, in which there was neither planting nor sowing, and all the country round about having been so terribly plundered and ravaged, both before and during the siege, nothing less than a grievous famine was expected to have filled the whole land [a].

Herod had still another rival left, who, though at a great distance from him, and kept as it were, a prisoner in Parthia, did

[a] Antiq. l. xv. c. 1. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 13.

(38). So that had Herod been of a more vindictive temper than he really was, yet this piece of service could not have failed of reconciling them to his favour.

There was indeed some ground for what they affirmed in favour of Herod, if what Josephus (39) says be true, that one Menahem, a cotemporary of theirs and an Essenian, endowed with the spirit of prophecy, had long before foretold his rise to the crown; the story runs thus:

Herod being met one day by this Menahem, then a boy, whilst himself was amongst his school-fellows, was accosted by him in a serious manner, with a Hail, king of the Jews; and was assured by him, that providence had determined to raise him from his Plebeian extraction to that supreme dignity. The young prophet at the same time bid him remember, when he was come to it, that it was his duty to govern with justice and equity, though, added he in the conclusion, I foresee, that you will take quite different methods, and thereby bring a miserable end upon your head.

Herod, however, did not think any more of it till he had got the crown; but then calling to mind his prediction, he sent for him, to inquire how long he should reign, not doubting but that he, who had foretold him the one, might as easily tell him the other. Menahem, not answering directly to the question, was asked again, whether he thought that he should reign ten years; Yes, yes, answered the Essene, twenty or thirty, and there he stopped; and Herod, being satisfied with that number, urged him no further.

(38) Id. ibid. Vid. & l. xiv. c. 17. (39) Antiq. l. xv. c. 13 did not ſuffer his mind to be at eaſe, till he had quite rid himſelf of him. This was Hyrcan, the depoſed king and high-prieſt, whom Pacorus had carried thither with him in chains. But when Phraartes came to be informed of his high birth and dignity, he generouſly took off his chains, and permitted him to live in Babylon, where he was highly reſpected, not only by the great numbers of Jews who dwelt in that city, but likewiſe by all thoſe that lived beyond the Euphrates, who all looked upon him as their rightful prince and high-prieſt. Their veneration for him was raiſed ſtill higher, when they underſtood, that Herod had filled the pontifical chair with an old acquaintance of his own, named Ananel, a deſcendant of one of thoſe prieſtly families that ſettled at Babylon after the captivity, and whom that politic prince cauſed to be fetched from thence, merely on the ſcore of his meanneſs and obſcurity; that being without friends or intereſt in Judæa, he might be contented with his ſacerdotal function, without interfering with the regal prerogative.

Menahem

Hyrcanus's baſpineſs in Parthia.

Hyrcan might then have thought himſelf happy in his exile, being thus reſpected by the Parthian king, and by all the Jews of the diſperſion: yet ſuch was his love for his country, or rather his fatal confidence in the new Jewiſh monarch, that, as ſoon as he heard of his being on the throne, he conceived a great deſire of ſpending the remainder of his life with him. His friends, to whom he communicated his thoughts, tried in vain to diſſuade him from it, by repreſenting to him the folly and hazard of putting himſelf in that monarch's power, eſpecially ſince he could hardly expect either greater honour or happineſs at Jeruſalem, than he enjoyed at Babylon. But could arguments have prevailed with him, Herod would have left no means untried to have fruſtrated them, and made ſure of him. He began, however, with ſending him a kind invitation to come and bear a partnerſhip with him of his power and grandeur, and reap Perſuaded to return into Judæa.

Menahem was then, it ſeems (40), vice preſident of the ſanhedrin, under Hillel, the ſame, as is ſuppoſed, whom Joſephus calls Pollio; but Herod, having drawn him into his ſervice, appointed Sameas, to ſucceed him in that office. From that time, not only Menahem, but his whole ſect, grew in great favour with that monarch. We ſhall find a proper place to ſpeak more fully of the Eſſenes, when we come to deſcribe the different ſects which reigned in our Saviour's time among the Jews.

(40) Vid. Prid Connect. part. 2. lib. viii ſub A. ant Chriſt. 37

the fruits of his gratitude to him for his former kindneſs. But leſt this invitation ſhould fail, he backed it with an embaſſy to Phraartes, in which he begged of him to give the pontiff leave to return to Judæa. Santacalla, who was charged with this embaſſy, was ordered to make ſome conſiderable preſents to the Parthian king and court, and ſucceeded ſo well in his negotiation, that Hyrcan, in ſpite of all the remonſtrances of his friends to the contrary, left his ſafe aſylum for Jeruſalem, where Herod at firſt received him with great friendſhip and magnificence, and forgot nothing that could poſſibly conceal the treacherous deſign he was hatching againſt his life [b].

Whilst this was doing, Herod was not a little diſturbed with domeſtic jars. Alexandra, the daughter of Hyrcan and mother of Ariſtobulus and Mariamne, a woman of a haughty ſpirit, could not bear, with any patience, to ſee an obſcure Babyloniſh prieſt preferred before her ſon to the pontifical dignity, from which Hyrcan was now diſabled by the loſs of his ears. She was ever expoſtulating with him the injury done to her ſon, and inſiſting, that the pontifical dignity belonging in right of ſucceſſion to him alone, as being deſcended by father and mother from Alexander Jannæus (B), none but he ought in juſtice to be inveſted with it. But Herod, who was conſcious that the young prince had an equal right likewiſe to the regal dignity, which he now uſurped from him, was afraid to grant her the one, leſt ſhe ſhould find ſome means in time of ſeizing upon the other. This obliged her to write to Cleopatra, not doubting but her intereſt with Antony might greatly influence that general in favour of her ſon. It was impoſſible for her to carry on that correſpondence ſo cloſely, but Herod had ſome intimation of it; and fearing the worſt from thoſe two intrigueing princeſſes, he was forc-

[b] Antiq. ubi ſupra, cap. 2.

(B) Ariſtobulus, as the ſon of Alexander, and grandſon of Hyrcan and of Ariſtobulus, the ſons of Alexander Jannæus, had the right both to the regal and pontifical dignity united in him For he was grandſon to the former by his mother Alexandra, who was his only child; and by his father Alexander, he was grandſon to Ariſtobulus. By his deſcent from the latter, he had a right to the high-prieſthood, which was fixed to the male line; and by his deſcent from both, he would have had the only title to the crown alſo, had not the Romans transferred it to Herod (41).

(41) Antiq. l. xv. cap. 2, & 3.

ed

ed for the preſent to conſent to have Ananel depoſed, and Ariſtobulus inveſted with that dignity, pretending, that he had only given it to the former, till the latter was come to be of an age fit for it (C).

THIS condeſcenſion of Herod, backed with ſo plauſible an excuſe, wrought a kind of reconciliation between them, but which was nothing leſs than ſincere on either ſide, eſpecially on Herod's, who ſtill ſuſpected the intrigues of the mother, and the merit of the ſon, whoſe high birth and blooming vir-

(C) This is the third perſon that had hitherto been depoſed from the pontifical dignity ſince the Jews return from the Babyloniſh captivity; and Herod was ſo ſenſible of the illegality of it, that wheu Antony ſent to deſire him to put Ariſtobulus into Ananel's room, he excuſed himſelf from it at firſt, by remonſtrating to him, that ſuch depoſitions were contrary to the Moſaic law; according to which, it is certain, that dignity could not end but with the death of its poſſeſſor, unleſs ſome illegal defect happened to diſqualify him †.

The firſt inſtance we read of this irregular proceeding is, that of Jaſon's or Jeſus's ſupplanting his brother Onias, and by a larger ſum of money buying that dignity from Antiochus, in prejudice of the incumbent (42). The other was that of Hyrcan by his nephew Ariſtobulus, who wreſted that dignity from him by main force. But theſe depoſitions became afterwards ſo frequent, that there was hardly any other way of coming into that office, but by the expulſion of the incumbent.

The fourth book of the Maccabees ſays, that Antony having ſent a preſſing command to Herod to ſend Ariſtobulus to him, Herod, not daring to venture that young prince out of his ſight, haſted to make him high-prieſt before he read that general's orders; and then ſent him word, that, he being now inveſted with the pontifical dignity, ir was unlawful for him to ſtir out of the Jewiſh dominions (43).

Joſephus agrees in part with that author (44), but adds, that Antony having received the pictures of Mariamne and Ariſtobulus, which their mother, by the advice of Cleopatra, had ſent to him, that their extreme beauty might make a favourable impreſſion on that effeminate general; Antony, not daring to ſend for Mariamne, deſired only Ariſtobulus to be ſent to him. But Herod, not daring to truſt ſo beautiful a young perſon, who was then but ſixteen years old, with one ſo infamous for his incontinency, was forced to excuſe his refuſal, with pretending, that the young prince was ſo great a darling of the Jewiſh nation, that it would infallibly involve it in a civil war, ſhould he comply with his requeſt.

† De hoc. vid. Vol. III p. 234, & ſeq. (42) See Vol. IX. p. 596. (43) Cap. lv. (44) ubi ſupra, cap. 2.

tues

tues, joined to a graceful person, attracted the eyes and hearts of the Jewish nation. Upon some pretence therefore or other, he quarrelled with Alexandra, forbad her to meddle with any public affairs, and at last caused her to be confined to her palace and to be closely watched. In the mean time, Cleopatra having sent her and her son an invitation to come to her, she was easily persuaded to accept it, since she could now only look upon herself as Herod's prisoner, from whose jealousy she had every thing to fear. The difficulty was how to conceal their flight from his watchful spies: she intrusted her design only to two faithful servants, one of whom was to procure her a ship to carry them off, and the other to provide two coffins, one for her son, and the other for herself, to convey them in that manner to the ship. But unfortunately one of the two servants inadvertently mentioned the matter to a third, whom he thought to have been in the secret, who immediately took hold of this opportunity to ingratiate himself to Herod, and made a full discovery of the design. Herod stayed only till the mother and son were conveyed some part of the way in their coffins, and then caused them to be arrested, and brought back. His fear, however, of Cleopatra's resentment, prevented his expressing his own against them; and since he found it unsafe to punish them, he put on the mask of clemency, and was outwardly reconciled to them, but from that moment resolved to get rid of the young prince.

Herod plagued with domestic cares.

An accident happened soon after, which determined him to hasten his death. The feast of the tabernacles, one of the three grand festivals, was come, which was usually solemnized with the greatest magnificence †; when the new high-priest, who was then about seventeen years of age, appeared at the altar in his pontifical ornaments, and officiated with such majesty and grace, that the people thought they beheld all the merit and grandeur of his ancestors revived in him. They could not forbear filling the temple and city with their praises, which raised the tyrant's jealousy to such a height, as made him resolve to put his murdering design in execution with utmost speed. Accordingly, as soon as the solemnity was over, he went with him to Jericho, where Alexandra had invited them to a sumptuous entertainment. The weather being hot, Aristobulus was invited to bathe in a fine fish-pond in that neighbourhood, where some of Herod's hired creatures were swimming; and where, as soon as they had him in their hands, they kept him still under water till he was dead.

† De hac vid. Vol III. p. 178, & seq.

This

This bloody deed was gloſſed over with the ſpecious pretence of its being done in ſport, by accident, and without any deſign on the pontiff's life; and Herod not only ſeemed to believe it, but took all the pains he could to have it thought ſo by the reſt, by putting himſelf into the deepeſt mourning for him, ordering a ſtately monument to be erected to his memory, and his funeral obſequies to be performed with utmoſt magnificence. This was the end of young Ariſtobulus, which filled the city and kingdom with inexpreſſible grief; he died in the eighteenth year of his age, having ſcarce enjoyed his dignity one whole year, which upon his death returned to Ananel[c].

ALL theſe grimaces of Herod to diſculpate himſelf of the murder were eaſily ſeen through by the people, and only rendered him more odious to them, and much more ſo to his own family. Alexandra, at the firſt news of her ſon's death, could ſcarcely be kept from laying violent hands on herſelf; but, upon cooler thoughts, ſhe prevailed on herſelf to conceal her reſentment againſt the tyrant, that ſhe might the more eaſily compaſs his ruin. She wrote to acquaint Cleopatra with his treachery, and that princeſs, moved rather by her ambition and avarice, than by a ſenſe of pity or of horror for the crime, ceaſed not to ſolicit Antony to puniſh the murderer, in hopes that, after his death, ſhe might eaſily obtain his kingdom for herſelf. Antony, being at length prevailed upon, ſent orders to Herod to come and clear himſelf before him at Laodicea, whither he was then coming, and Cleopatra along with him. Herod was obliged to obey, though much againſt his will; but took care to bribe his judge ſo high, that, upon his appearing before him, he was moſt baſely abſolved, and Cleopatra's avarice compenſated with the province of Cœle-Syria, inſtead of that of Judæa.

Alexandra plots a gainſt
him.

Summoned to appear before Antony.

Acquitted.

Herod, however, not knowing how it would go with him in Syria, had before his departure given expreſs orders to his uncle Joſeph, whom he left governor during his abſence, that in caſe he was caſt for his life, he ſhould put his beloved Mariamne to death. The violence of his paſſion for that princeſs extorted this inhuman command from him. He knew that the fame of her beauty had long ſince captivated the Roman triumvir, and the thoughts of leaving her in the poſſeſſion of ſuch a rival, even after his death, were more dreadful to him, than any death he could inflict on him; and his uncle was forced to rid him of that anguiſh by the promiſe of a punctual obedience. When he was gone, Joſeph, who waited daily on her, either on affairs of ſtate, or to pay his reſpects to her, took all opportunities of extolling Herod's extreme paſſion for her, and at length was indiſcreet enough to diſcloſe the fatal orders he had left with him, as an irrefragable proof of the greatneſs and ſincerity of it. But the queen, looking upon it rather as an argument of his jealouſy and inhumanity, conceived from it a more invincible hatred againſt him. In the mean time, there was a rumour ſpread through the city, whether by Herod's enemies, or by ſome of his ſubtil agents, that Antony had put him to a cruel death; which caſt the whole court, but eſpecially Alexandra and Mariamne, into a great conſternation. Alexandra had by this time been informed with the bloody orders left with Joſeph; to prevent the execution of which, ſhe went to him, and ſtrove with all her eloquence to perſuade him to leave Jeruſalem, and to go and put themſelves under the protection of the Roman eagles, that were planted in the neighbourhood of the city (D). Their deliberations were quickly broken off by letters from Herod, which informed her, that he had not only gained his cauſe, but that Antony was daily heaping freſh marks of his affection upon him, and that he ſhould ſoon return to Jeruſalem, more ſtrengthened than ever in his kingdom. This news made them lay aſide their deſign; but as they had not carried it on ſo cloſely, but Salome had received ſome intimation of it, ſhe failed not to inform her brother of it upon his arrival. Some injurious reflections, which Mariamne had caſt on the meanneſs of her birth, had exaſperated her ſo far, that ſhe had vowed a moſt dreadful revenge; and ſhe took this opportunity of compleating it, by accuſing her of having held too great a familiarity with Joſeph during his abſence, though he was both her own uncle and huſband (E).

[c] Antiq. ubi ſupra c. 3

Mariamne falſely accuſed.

Mariamne

(D) The eagles were the principal ſtandards of the Roman legions; they uſed to be ſet up in ſome eminent place of their camp to receive the adoration of the army, and to protect thoſe who took ſanctuary under them, they being allowed an inviolable aſylum to ſuch.

The Romans had left a legion in the neighbourhood of that metropolis, under the command of one Julius, and it was under his ſtandards that Alexandra propoſed to take refuge, when the news of her ſon in law's death came to her ears.

(E) We have had occaſion to ſhew in a former volume †,

† Vol. III. p. 321. Vid. & Lexit. xviii. 22, & ſeq xx. 19.

how

Mariamne did eaſily clear her innocence upon her firſt interview with the king; but whilſt he was entertaining her with the proteſtations of his love to her, ſhe could not forbear at length mentioning the orders he had left with his uncle, as rather a token of his barbarity to her. Theſe words, which ſtabbed that jealous monarch to the heart, made him conclude, that nothing leſs than the criminal converſation, with which Salome had accuſed her, could have induced his uncle to diſcloſe the fatal ſecret. In the firſt ſally of his fury, he was on the point of ſacrificing her with his own hand, had not his love prevailed over his reſentment. But Joſeph and Alexandra fell the unhappy victims of his rage; the firſt of whom he cauſed to be put to immediate death, refuſing even to ſee him, or hear what could be urged in his defence; the latter he cauſed to be put in chains, and confined to a cloſe priſon under a ſtrong guard, as the main cauſe of all this miſchief.

Joſeph put to death.

HIS fury was ſoon after diverted by the coming of Cleopatra into Judæa, in her return from the Euphrates, whither ſhe had accompanied Antony. That princeſs, whoſe avarice was as inſatiable as her luſt, had diſobliged him ſenſibly by both theſe paſſions. On the one hand, ſhe had obtained from her paramour all the fertile territories of Jericho, which were by far the richeſt and pleaſanteſt of all Judæa, eſpecially upon the ſcore of the balm (F) and the great quantity how far it was lawful, according to the law of Moſes, for an uncle to marry his niece, tho' not for an aunt to marry her nephew. We refer the reader to what has been further ſaid upon that head by a late learned writer (45).

Cleopatra comes to Jeruſalem.

(F) This precious plant, ſo famous for its balſam, the moſt valuable of all ointments, is affirmed by Pliny (46) to have grown only in two gardens belonging to the Jewiſh monarchs, one of them containing only twenty acres, and the other ſtill ſomewhat leſs. But Cleopatra cauſed a number of them to be carried into Egypt, where it is ſaid to grow in great quantity at this very day (47):

But it is plain beyond all controverſy, that this plant is the natural growth of Arabia, eſpecially in the neighbourhoods of Mecca and Medina, where it grows wild even in ſandy grounds, though that which is cultivated in gardens is reckoned the fineſt (48). We have taken notice in a former volume of ſome that grew near tity of palm-trees which grew in it, and brought Herod a conſiderable revenue [d]. On the other, ſhe was ſoliciting that monarch to an amour all the time ſhe ſtayed with him. Herod, who had conceived a great averſion to her, was conſulting, all the time he entertained her with utmoſt magnificence, of ſome means of putting her to death, whilſt he had her in his power; but his friends, dreading the conſequences of ſuch a fact, did not only diſſuade him from it, but prevailed on him to glut at leaſt her avarice with coſtly preſents, which he did with ſurprizing profuſeneſs. However, as he had refuſed to gratify her other predominant paſſion, he feared leſt her reſentment on that ſcore, joining with the invincible hatred which the Jews had conceived againſt him, ſhould one day prove fatal to him. To prevent which, after he had accompanied her as far as Peluſium, he went and fortified the caſtle of Maſſada, and furniſhed it with arms and proviſions for ten thouſand men, that at all events he might have a ſure place of refuge to flee to. At the ſame time he took conſtant care to ſend that princeſs the revenues of thoſe territories which Antony had given from him to her, that ſhe might have no pretence to fall out with him upon that ſcore [e].

(45) Prid. Connect. ſub. A. ant. Chriſt. 187. (46) Nat. Hiſt. l. xii. c. 15. (47) Vid. Dapper. Deſcr. of Egypt. (48) Id ibid.

But this was not ſufficient to prevent the effects of that baſe princeſs's reſentment; and ſhe ſoon after laid ſuch a [d] Ibid. c 4. Bell. Jud. lib. i. c. 13. & vii. c. 28. [e] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 5 Bell. Jud. lib. vii. c 28.

the lake Aſphaltites, and which brought a conſiderable revenue to the owners †.

The balm was gathered from the ſhrub in the months of July and Auguſt, and in ſome warmer grounds even in June. It either drops of itſelf, or is made to do ſo by inciſion, with a ſharp knife, made, not of iron or ſteel, which they ſay is death to the plant, but either of glaſs, flint, or ivory. The liquor that diſtils from the plant is whitiſh at the firſt, then by degrees turns greeniſh, yellowiſh, and when very old, almoſt of the colour of honey. It is at firſt thin, and by degrees contracts a denſity like our terebinth, and is of ſo light a body, that it ſwims on the ſurface of water, and when beaten with it, will turn white. There is ſo little that is brought genuine into England, that it is rarely uſed, though its virtues have been cried up by many antient and modern authors; but even that which is leaſt adulterated has a very ill quality amongſt its excellent ones, namely, that the frequent uſe of it will in time diſſolve the ſolid parts of the blood.

Beſides what comes from the countries abovementioned, there are ſome ſorts of it brought from America, the moſt eſteemed of which are thoſe of Peru and Tholu.

† Vol. VIII. p. 201.

plot

plot againſt him, that all his ſtrength and courage were hardly ſufficient to ſave him from ruin. We have elſewhere taken notice, that ſhe had obtained a great many provinces from Antony, in Syria, Phœnice, and Arabia. The latter of theſe had paid tribute to her conſtantly enough, whilſt Antony was in power; but after his defeat, at the battle of Actium, of which we ſhall ſpeak in a more proper place, Malchus, then king of that country, refuſed all further payment to her. Herod, who had got a complete army, with which he deſigned to aſſiſt his friend Antony againſt Octavianus, received orders from him to turn his forces againſt the Arabians. This was Cleopatra's plot; who, by bringing theſe two kings to a battle, propoſed to get the territories of the conquered, let the victory fall on which ſide it would. But as her ſpight againſt Herod was moſt prevailing, ſhe ſent one of her generals, named Athenion, who equally hated him, at the head of an army, under pretence of aſſiſting him, but in reality to betray and ruin him, becauſe ſhe foreſaw that he was like to have the better of his enemy. For Herod upon the firſt encounter had given them a great overthrow, and obliged them to get a freſh army together, which Malchus brought into Cœle-Syria. Here a ſecond battle was fought near Cana (G), in which Herod was on the point of getting a new victory; when Athenion, who had ſtood neuterall the time of the engagement, fell upon his troops, before they could rally themſelves, and, in ſpite of Herod's ſpeedy aſſiſtance and bravery, cut the greateſt part of the Jews in pieces, and plundered their camp, Herod himſelf eſcaping with great difficulty, with a ſmall number of his men [f]. The Maccabitiſh book adds, that Athenion was ordered to ſurround that monarch with his troops, as ſoon as he had engaged thoſe of the Arabians [g]. However that be, Herod from that time forbore coming to an engagement with them, and contented himſelf with making frequent incurſions againſt them, incamping always on the mountains; by which he got this double advantage, that he haraſſed the enemy, and inured his own troops to the trade of war.

Cleopatra's plot againſt Herod.

He is betray'd by Athenion.

Herod was by this time got into the ſeventh year of his reign [h], when Judæa was ſhaken with ſuch an earthquake, Judæa greatly damaged by an earthquake.

Year of the Flood. 2963 Before Chriſt.

[f] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 6. [g] Cap. lvi. [h] Vid USSER. Annal. ſub. A. M. 3973.

(G) Probably Canna in Syria, on the other ſide of the Libanus, or Cannath on the other ſide Jordan, in the neighbourhood of Bothra in Arabia [49].

(49) Euſeb. l. v. Hier. Vid. & Steph. Byz. ſub. voc. Cannath as had never been felt before, and which deſtroyed great numbers of cattle and many thouſand perſons, who periſhed under the ruins of their houſes (H). His troops indeed eſcaped the common ruin, becauſe he kept them incamped in the open field; nevertheleſs, the great loſs, which the kingdom ſuſtained by this calamity, obliged him to ſend an embaſſy to ſue to the Arabians for peace. But by this time the account of his loſs having been greatly magnified to them, they not only rejected his offers, but ſlew the embaſſadors that brought them, and invaded Judæa with utmoſt ſpeed, expecting to have found it deſtitute of defence. It was with the greateſt difficulty that Herod kept his men from abandoning him; but having at length diſpelled their fears, and offered the uſual ſacrifices, he went to meet the enemy on the other ſide of the Jordan, and there gave them two ſuch ſignal defeats, that he forced them in their turn to ſue for peace, and to accept it on his own conditions; after which he returned in triumph to Jeruſalem[1] (I).

Antony's defeat at Actium. Year of the Flood, 2969. Before Chriſt, 30.

But his happineſs was ſoon after troubled by the defeat of Antony by Auguſtus at the battle of Actium, by which he ſaw himſelf deprived of a moſt powerful, as well as ſteady, friend, and on the brink of falling a ſacrifice to the conqueror's reſentment. The beſt expedient he could think on, under this conſternation, was to ſend advice to Antony to put Cleopatra to death, and to ſeize on her kingdom and treaſures; by

[1] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 8, & 9. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 14.

(H) Our hiſtorian in one place mentions but ten thouſand ſlain (50), but in another he makes them to amount to three myriads, or thirty thouſand men (1); which laſt is the more likely of the two, and agrees much better with the deſcription he gives of that calamity.

(I) The firſt of theſe battles was fought near Philadelphia, in which five thouſand Arabians were either killed on the ſpot, or trod to death in their flight. Herod having afterwards cloſely beſieged them in their camp, where they were ready to periſh for want of water, they offered him at firſt fifty talents for their freedom, which being rejected, they in great numbers came to ſurrender themſelves till the fifth day, on which the reſt in deſpair, and without hopes or proſpect of ſucceſs, attacked him, and had ſeven thouſand killed. Upon which they ſubmitted to his conditions, one of which was, that he was declared by them governor or protector of their nation (2).

(50) Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 7. (1) Bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 14. (2) Ibid. ad fin. Antiq. ubi ſupra.

which

which he might be enabled to raiſe new forces, and either make a freſh puſh for the empire, or, at the worſt, obtain eaſier conditions of peace. He promiſed him on thoſe terms to ſtick faſt to his intereſt, and to furniſh him with money, troops, and ſtrong-holds, and all other aſſiſtance to carry on the war againſt his rival [k]. But Antony was ſtill too great a ſlave to that princeſs, to conſent to ſuch an expedient; which when Herod perceived, he thought no more but how to make his peace with the conqueror, on the beſt terms he could. He had ſtill another dread upon him, as great as the diſpleaſure of Cæſar. Hyrcan, the only ſurviving male of the Aſmonean race, had been formerly acknowledged king of Judæa, and, as ſuch had entered into alliances with the Roman ſenate. Herod, on the other hand, had been chiefly upheld in his throne by the intereſt of Antony; and Alexandra, ever watchful for all opportunities of being revenged on the uſurper, had begun to try to gain ſome advantage from the late change of affairs againſt him. Herod therefore, who had his ſpies about him, thought it unſafe to go to Auguſtus, till he had drawn the father and the daughter into a ſnare, which might afford him a pretence for putting the former to death, which he did, by cauſing him to be beheaded in the eighteenth year of his age (K).

[k] See his ſpeech to Auguſtus, Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, c. 15.

(K) So ſays the fourth book of the Maccabees (3). The trap into which he was drawn was a maſter-piece of his politic rival, who corrupted ſome of his and his daughter's confidents, to ſet on foot a kind of treaſonable correſpondence, whether real or counterfeited, with Malchus king of Arabia, wherein Hyrcan deſired to put himſelf again under his protection, and begged of him to ſend him ſome horſemen to conduct him from a private place near Jeruſalem, to the lake Aſphaltites, which was about ninety miles diſtant from that metropolis.

Doſitheus, the agent of this correſpondence, betrayed to Herod both this letter and the anſwer, in which the Arabian king promiſed him a ſafe eſcort to convey him away; Herod ſummoned the pontiff before his council, and having taxed him with it, and, upon his denial, ſhewed him the very letter, cauſed him to be condemned to die.

This laſt article Joſephus tells us (4), he took as he found it in the commentary which Herod left behind him; but at the ſame time he relates the matter ſomewhat differently from other hands. We refer the reader for it to the place laſt quoted.

(3) Cap. 54. (4) Antiq. ubi ſupra, cap. 9.

THE

This was the dismal end of that unfortunate prince, after a long series of unhappy vicissitudes. He was at first raised to the pontifical dignity by his mother Alexandra, and succeeded her soon after in the kingdom also; three months after which, he was deprived of both by his brother Aristobulus. He was restored to both by Pompey, and enjoyed them near forty years, till deposed again and disqualified by Antigonus, who cut off his ears, and sent him prisoner into Parthia, from whence he unfortunately returned at the pressing invitation of Herod, who owed his life, crown, and all his greatness to him, and who repaid all his kindnesses with a violent death [1].

Herod goes to Augustus.

Herod's next care, before he departed, was, to secure his family the best he could, in case he should miscarry in his address to Augustus. To that end he committed his mother Cypros and his sister Salome to the care of his brother Pheroras, whom he sent unto the castle of Alexandrion, with orders to this last to seize on the Jewish crown, and defend it to the last, in case he heard that it went ill with him. As for his wife Mariamne and her mother Alexandra, he sent them into the strong fortress of Massada, and put them under the care of his treasurer, named Joseph, and of Sohemus, one of his chief confidents, with express orders to put those two princesses to death, as soon as he received the news of his ill success at the emperor's court; and then to go and assist his brother with all his power. He imbarqued soon after for Rhodes, where Augustus then was; and having obtained an audience from him, appeared before that prince in all his royal ornaments, except his diadem, and spoke to him with such a seeming confidence, as if he was sure before-hand to obtain what he came for. He made no difficulty to own his former attachment to Antony's interest, his assisting him with men, arms, money, and other necessaries for the war; and even the counsel he had given him, after his defeat, of killing Cleopatra and seizing on her kingdom and immense treasure, in order to obtain a more advantageous peace. All this, said he, concluding his speech, I thought myself bound in honour, gratitude and friendship, to do for Antony; but since he has rejected my last advice, and left me at liberty to make your a tender of my future services, if you think them worth your acceptance, and can but forget what is past, you shall find me henceforth as sincere and stedfast a friend to you, as I have been hitherto to your rival. An earnest of which he had already given to the emperor in the timely succour he had sent

His speech to him.

[1] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 9.

to

to Q. Didius, his governor in Syria, againſt Antony's gladiators (L). Auguſtus was very much taken both with his ſpeech and gallant behaviour: he had likewiſe been acquainted with the ſuccour he had ſent to Didius, and thanked him for it, aſſuring him, that he readily accepted of his friendſhip, and confirmed the kingdom to him; in token of which, he ordered him to take up his diadem, and wear it before him. Herod, pleaſed with his good ſucceſs, made ſome preſents to Auguſtus and his favourites, according to his uſual profuſeneſs, and was from that time in greater eſteem with him than any other tributary prince; ſo that he returned to Jeruſalem highly ſatisfied with theſe additions of honour and power; but all this was ſoon ſoured by the ill reception he met with from his favourite Mariamne and her exaſperated mother [m].

Is well received by him.

FOR theſe two princeſſes, looking upon their confinement at Maſſada only as a more honourable impriſonment, and remembering with horror the bloody orders he had formerly left with his uncle Joſeph concerning them, did not doubt, but he had given the ſame to their two new guardians. To be ſatisfied of it, they ſpared neither preſents nor careſſes, till they got the fatal ſecret from Sohemus, ſo that when Herod came to Maſſada, and was going to embrace the queen with his uſual tenderneſs, and to acquaint her with his ſucceſs, he was ſurprized to find all his careſſes anſwered with ſighs, and tears, and all other marks of grief and diſdain. His reſentment roſe to ſuch a height, that it extorted from him the bittereſt reproaches, accompanied with ſuch threatenings, as would have alarmed any woman but her. But his love, which was no leſs violent, ſeldom ſuffered thoſe ſallies of anger to be long-lived; till his mother and ſiſter, tired and affrighted to ſee him ſtill floating between thoſe oppoſite paſſions, found out a way to work her effectual ruin, by raiſing the vileſt ſurmiſes and calumnies againſt her unſpotted character.

Troubles with domeſtic jars.

[m] Ibid c. 10.

(L) Theſe were an abject race, whom Antony had brought up at Cyzicum to exhibit triumphant ſports; and theſe, when they heard of his defeat, determined to go into Egypt to his aſſiſtance. They had fought their way through ſeveral provinces in their march thither, Didius was the firſt who put a ſtop to their progreſs, being privately aſſiſted by Herod with ſome troops; and at length prevailed upon them to quit their gladiatorical employment, after they had waited a long time in vain for Antony's joining them (5).

(5) Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 10

His magnificent reception of Augustus.

In the mean time, Augustus passing through Syria in his way to Egypt, Herod, who went to meet him as far as Ptolemais, entertained him and his army with incredible magnificence, and, besides a present that he made to him of eight hundred talents, took care to furnish his army with bread, wine, and other provisions, as they marched through some barren deserts, where they might have been otherwise in danger of wanting even bread and water. He accompanied him as far as Pelusium, and that emperor was so charmed with his politeness and generosity, that he made him ride by his side, whenever he went to review his troops, or upon any diversion. He gave him the same magnificent reception upon his return from Egypt, as he passed through Syria; in return of which, Augustus made him a present of the four thousand Gauls which had served as life-guards to Cleopatra, and restored to him the territories and revenues of Jericho, Gadara, Hippon, and Samaria, in the inlands, and those of Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and the tower of Straton on the seaside, which made a considerable inlargement both to his kingdom and revenues. But, upon his return to Jerusalem, he relapsed into his former discontent and jealousies, on account of his beloved queen, whose aversion to him did daily increase, insomuch, that she came at last to treat him with such contempt, and accompanied it with such bitter reflections, as easily convinced him, that she had conceived an irreconcilable hatred against him. She gave him a mortifying instance of it soon after, and such a one as hastened her death, by giving her enemies an opportunity of taking the blackest means for pushing his fury against her to the highest pitch.

Mariamne's aversion to him

Herod, who had by this time floated near a year between the most violent affection and resentment, had withdrawn himself into his chamber to rest himself during the heat of the day; he sent for her, and in the kindest manner invited her to lie down by him; but she, instead of complying with this last request, returned his caresses with invincible scorn, upbraided him with all the other wrongs he had done to her and her family, and particularly the death of her father and brother, which so exasperated that fierce monarch, that he was on the point of killing her with his own hands. Salome did not let this opportunity slip of putting her hellish engines at work against that unfortunate princess: she had corrupted the king's cup-bearer before-hand to be ready on the first call with one of the blackest accusations against her; and now she sent him to Herod, with a poisoned cup in one hand, and a sum of money in the other, to acquaint him, that Mariamne had bribed him with the one to administer the other to him.

She is falsly accused.

The

The rage this new accuſation threw him in, made him order one of her favourite eunuchs and confidents to be put to the rack; but all the confeſſion he could extort from him was, that he believed the cruel orders, he had lately left with Sohemus, had exaſperated that princeſs againſt him (M). Herod, inraged that a perſon, in whom he repoſed ſo great confidence, ſhould dare, in ſpite of his expreſs commands to the contrary, to diſcloſe ſo important a ſecret, was eaſily perſuaded that there muſt have been ſome criminal converſation between them, and therefore ordered that favourite to be put to immediate death. As for Mariamne, he reſolved to have her publicly tried, and having packed up a ſet of judges of his own creatures, he himſelf carried on the proſecution with ſuch violence, that they eaſily underſtood they muſt condemn her to death, though they all hoped and begged that he would not precipitate their ſentence, but confine her to ſome caſtle, till he had more maturely conſulted with his own heart. But Salome, who knew how apt her brother was to relapſe, and fearing ſome diſcovery might come out of her treachery to her, if her death ſhould be delayed, did at length obtain an order from him for her execution, under pretence, that the nation would riſe up in arms for her, if he ſuffered her to live any longer.

Tried and condemned to die.

Mariamne received the fatal ſummons with an heroic courage, becoming her exalted virtue and quality, and marched to the place of execution with incredible ſerenity, till an accident befel her, which put her conſtancy to the ſevereſt tryal. Her mother, the turbulent and intriguing Alexandra, who expected nothing but to follow her in a ſhort time, could think on no better expedient to avert the impending ſtorm, than by trying to ingratiate herſelf to Herod, by inſulting her unfortunate daughter all the way ſhe was led to

(M) The fourth book of the Maccabees (6) ſays, it was Joſeph, and not Sohemus that betrayed the ſecret, and that it was not the eunuch, but Mariamne herſelf, who in a fit of reſentment upbraided the brutal king with it. But it is hardly probable, conſidering the puniſhment that ſhe had ſeen inflicted on Herod's uncle for the like diſcovery, that Mariamne would have expoſed either of theſe to the effects of his fury.

Beſides, we cannot ſuppoſe, that either Joſeph or Sohemus would have ventured to diſclote the matter to her without ſome previous promiſe of ſecrecy, and Mariamne was a princeſs of too ſtrict virtue and honour to have broke it upon any account.

(6) Ubi ſupra.

the fatal place; and not contented to load her with the bittereſt of reproaches, for her ingratitude and faithleſsneſs to the beſt of husbands, ſhe made ſeveral offers to ſtrike her and pull her by her hair. Mariamne bore all her pretended reſentment without betraying any other change in her countenance, than an inward ſhame at ſo baſe an artifice, which proved, however, far enough from ſucceeding, as the ſequel will preſently ſhew. Mariamne ſubmitted to her death with the ſame conſtancy and intrepidity as ſhe had lived [n], and with her ended all the happineſs of her tyrannic husband.

Her death.

Herod's rage being ſoon quenched with the blood of that amiable princeſs, his love broke out the more fiercely, and filled him with ſuch pungent remorſe, that his life became a burthen to him. He tried in vain to divert his grief with feaſtings and other diverſions; Mariamne was ſtill uppermoſt in his thoughts, he called aloud after her, and ſometimes would order thoſe of his attendance to fetch her to him. A grievous peſtilence, which happened ſoon after and ſwept away multitudes of people of all ranks, added a freſh load to his miſery, becauſe it was univerſally looked upon as a juſt judgment on him for all the blood he had ſhed, and eſpecially that of his injured queen. At firſt he withdrew himſelf into ſome of the neighbouring deſerts, under pretence of hunting, but really to avoid the ſight of men. At length being ſeized with a violent diſtemper in his bowels, he returned to Samaria, where his phyſicians tried in vain to give him ſome eaſe; their medicines did but increaſe his pain, through his wilfulneſs and irregular living. His conſtitution did, however, get the better of his diſeaſe, but never could of his ſour and brutiſh humour, to which he abandoned himſelf more and more, as he recovered his health and ſtrength. He grew up at length to ſuch a height of cruelty, that he ſpared neither friend nor foe in his fits of rage, and went on ſacrificing numbers of his relations and beſt friends to his paſſion, even to the day of his death.

Herod's remorſe.

A grievous plague. Year of the Flood, 2971. Before Chriſt, 28.

Alexandra, the baſe and unnatural mother of the late virtuous Mariamne, was one of the very firſt that fell a victim to his rage after her injured daughter. The hopes of Herod's death, while he lay ſick at Samaria, had made her ſet her wits to work to corrupt the governors of the two principal fortreſſes of Judæa, the one called Antonia near the temple, and the other in the city of Jeruſalem, to deliver them up in-

[n] Ibid. c. 11.

to

to her hands (N), together with Herod's children, pretending thereby to ſecure the kingdom for his ſons by Mariamne in caſe of their father's death. But her reſtleſs and intriguing genius was ſo well known to thoſe governors, that inſtead of complying with her requeſt, they informed the king of it, who ſent orders back to have her immediately put to death, which was accordingly done without further trial. The next was his brother-in-law Coſtobares, who was an Idumæan and had married Salome, after Herod had put her firſt husband to death, as we have related above. This man, whom Herod had raiſed from an inferior rank (O) to the government of Idumæa, had juſtly incurred his diſpleaſure, by endeavouring to make himſelf and that province independent from him, and applying to Cleopatra for aſſiſtance. Herod would have put him to immediate death, had not Salome interpoſed; but ſhe, being ſince fallen out with, and willing to get rid of him, firſt ſent him a bill of divorce; and to juſtify that unlawful action to her brother (P), told him, that ſhe had diſcovered a treaſonable deſign, which was carried on by her husband in conjunction with Lyſimachus, Doſitheus, and Antipater; and, as a proof of it, told him, that he privately kept the ſons of Alexandra put to death.

Salome divorces her huſband.

Year of the Flood 2973. Before Chriſt, 26.

(N) Theſe two fortreſſes were juſtly looked upon as the two main keys of the kingdom, the one commanding the temple, and the other the city; ſo that it was of utmoſt conſequence to the candidates for the crown to be maſters of them, or at leaſt of the firſt of them; for the Jews had ſuch an invincible attachment to the worſhip of the temple, that there was ſcarce any thing, even life itſelf, which they would not ſacrifice to the liberty of coming to that ſacred place, at all proper times and ſolemnities.

(O) He was deſcended from the antient prieſts of Choſe a deity of the Idumeans, before they were forced by Hyrcan I. to embrace the Jewiſh religion.

This deity is not unrightly ſuppoſed to be the חוזה or ſeer, prophet or law-giver of the Hebrews (7); for if we may believe Epiphanius (8), both the Idumeans and Arabs of Arabia Petrea did worſhip Moſes, and paid divine honours to his ſtatue.

(P) According to the Moſaic law the huſbands alone were permitted to divorce their wives, but not the wife the huſband (9). However, Salome, relying on her brother's friendſhip and her own politic head, aſſumed that prerogative, which no Jewiſh woman, that we know of, had ever done before.

(7) Calmet. Hiſt. vet teſt. ſub A M 3976. (8) Hæreſ. 55. (9) Vid Deuter. xxiv. 1, & ſeq. Matt. xix. 3, & ſeq. Mark x. 2, & ſeq. Maimon de ripud.

Baba-

Babas (Q) under his protection, contrary to his expreſs commands; all which Herod having found true, he ordered them all to be put to death.

Herod, having by this time rid himſelf of the Aſmonean race, and of their moſt conſiderable partiſans, began now to ſhew a greater diſregard to the Jewiſh religion than he had hitherto ventured to do, by aboliſhing ſeveral of its ceremonies, and introducing ſome foreign cuſtoms, which were forbidden by it. He began with building a ſtately theatre in the city, and a ſpacious amphitheatre in its ſuburbs, and ordered public games to be celebrated in them every fifth year, in honour of Auguſtus; and, to draw the greater concourſe to them, he cauſed them to be proclaimed, not only in the neighbouring provinces, but in the moſt diſtant kingdoms, and promiſed magnificent prizes to thoſe that ſhould gain the victory. Beſides great numbers of the moſt expert muſicians, players, courſers, gladiators, &c. which he had ſent for thither, he cauſed alſo ſome of the fierceſt wild beaſts to be brought, and fought upon the ſtage; all which did not a little diſpleaſe the zealous Jews, who thought it unlawful and inhuman to expoſe men to the fury of wild beaſts. But what exaſperated them moſt were, the trophies with which he had cauſed thoſe ſumptuous places to be adorned, and which they, miſtaking for ſtatues, thought contrary to their law, which forbids all kinds of imagery, whether carved or even painted. They therefore cried out againſt him, that he had profaned their city, and that they would never tamely bear ſuch idolatrous monuments to be ſet up in it. Herod tried in vain to undeceive them by fair ſpeeches; he was forced at length to lead ſome of the principal of them to the place, and to order the armour of the trophies to be taken down, and thereby to convince them, that there was nothing under them but bare poſts. This demonſtration did indeed ſatisfy them as to this one point, and turned their outcries into laughter; but the generality of the nation retained ſuch an averſion againſt him, upon the account of his other heatheniſh

(Q) Theſe had been great ſticklers for the Aſmonean race, and, at the ſiege of Jeruſalem, had ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the opening of the gates to Herod for which that prince, upon his taking of the city, had given charge to Coſtobarus to ſecure them; but he had let them eſcape and had excuſed the matter to him; but Herod finding now that he had ſent them into an aſylum and maintained them there, he put their protector, and as many of them as he could find, to death.

novelties,

novelties, that they looked no longer upon him as a Jewish king, but as a heathen and a tyrant.

TEN of the boldeſt of them took it at laſt into their heads to enter the theatre with daggers hid under their cloaths, and either to ſtab the king or ſome of his retinue, not doubting but even their periſhing in the attempt would render the tyrant ſtill more odious. They were not miſtaken; for Herod being informed of their deſign by one of his ſpies, and cauſing the aſſaſſins to be put to a moſt excruciating death, the people were ſo exaſperated againſt the informer, that they cut and tore him to pieces, and caſt his fleſh to the dogs. Herod tried in vain to diſcover the authors of this affront; he was at laſt forced to order ſome women to be put to the rack; and to extort from them the names of the principal of them, whom he cauſed likewiſe to be hurried to death, together with their innocent families. This laſt act of cruelty drove the Jews into ſuch deſperate hatred againſt him, that he expected nothing leſs than a general revolt; to prevent which he ſet about fortifying Jeruſalem, rebuilding Samaria (R), and gariſoning ſeveral other fortreſſes in Judæa, whoſe ſituation Samaria rebuilt. Year of the flood, 2976. Before Chriſt, 23.

(R) We took notice in a former ſection, that this city, which had been deſtroyed by Hyrcan, had been in part rebuilt by Gabinius governor of Syria, and called from him Gabiniana; but, he being ſoon after turned out, it advanced no higher than a good large village. Herod therefore choſe to finiſh that work, and to reſtore that place to its pritiine ſplendor; becauſe, being but one day's journey, or thirty five miles diſtant from Jeruſalem, he could eaſily make it a place of retreat in caſe of neceſſity.

He adorned it with magnificent buildings, fortified it with walls and towers, and invited ſix thouſand foreigners to come and ſettle there, who, finding the ſoil very fertile, became very rich in a ſhort time. He gave it the name of Sebaſte, which ſignifies the ſame in Greek as doth Auguſtus in Latin

The other places which he fortified and gariſoned were, the tower of Straton, which he called Cæſarea, in honour of the emperor, and made it ſo ſtrong, that it ſeemed to command the whole country. He built likewiſe another ſtrong fortreſs in the midſt of a plain, and put in it a gariſon of horſe. A third he built in Galilee, named Gabala; and a fourth in Eſthmonitis in Perea; all which, being alſo well ſtored with arms and proviſions, were a great check to the whole kingdom (11).

But he beſtowed the moſt coſt on his new Sebaſte, to which he allowed a circuit of twenty ſtades, or two miles and a half. In the centre of it was a ſpacious ſquare of about a ſtade and a half, situation was most likely to keep the country in awe [n], and whose names the reader may find at the end of the last note.

(11) Ibid.

and

Judæa visited with famine and pestilence.

ABOUT the same time, which was the thirteenth year of his reign, Judæa was visited with a grievous drought, which brought on a famine, and ended in a raging pestilence, of which great multitudes died daily for want of proper help and sustenance. Herod, whose treasury was exhausted, by building so many cities and fortresses, and whose finances were reduced to the lowest ebb, through the famine and death of his subjects, was forced to melt down all his plate, and to send it down into Egypt, to procure a fresh supply of provisions, in order to stop the mouths of the people, who, as is usual in such calamities, threw all the odium of them upon him. The drought having likewise killed such numbers of their cattle, that they had not wool sufficient left to cloath themselves against the approaching winter, he took care also to procure a sufficient supply of it betimes; and Petronius, the Roman prefect then in Egypt, notwithstanding the multitudes of people who applied to him from other provinces for the same things, did so far befriend him, as to send him a sufficient quantity of them; which Herod caused to be immediately distributed among his subjects, but to the Jews preferably to any of the rest. This generosity did, for the present, change their hatred into admiration, and his praises were for a while the main subject of their discourse; but as he soon relapsed into his cruel and savage humour, so their love was soon turned into hatred again, which continued to his death. However, his prudent liberality having stored the country with plenty of corn, and the long drought being succeeded by more refreshing seasons, they began to cultivate their lands again, and found them, to their great comfort, restored to their former fecundity [o].

Relieved by Herod's generosity.

As soon as the land had recovered itself from the late calamity, Herod went on with his building (S), particularly his stately and magnificent palace in the middle a stately temple. In a word, he spared no cost to render it one of the richest and most beautiful cities of his realm, and looked upon it as his favourite master piece (12).

(S) Amongst them, that of Cæsarea mentioned in the last note, was the most magnificent next to Sebaste. He bestowed twelve years in the finishing and adorning of it. It stood on the coast of [n] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 11. [o] Ibid. c. 12.

(12) Antiq. l. xv. c. 13.

Phœnice,

ſtately palace near the temple of Jeruſalem, in which the gold, marble, cedar, and other precious materials, ſeemed to outvie one another. There were in it, among other apartments, two magnificent ones, to the one of which he gave the name of Auguſtus, and to the other that of Agrippa. At the ſame time he was not unmindful to ingratiate himſelf to the emperor, by more ſubſtantial ſervices than building of places to his honour; for Gellius having been ſent with an army to attempt the conqueſt of Arabia, Herod failed not to ſend him very conſiderable ſuccours, and, among the reſt, five hundred of the ſtouteſt of his guards; and though that enterprize proved unſucceſsful to the Romans, in a country where the air, water, and aliments were as contrary to them as the temper of the people *, yet Herod's aſſiſtance proved ſo uſeful and ſeaſonable to them, that Cæſar could not chuſe being highly pleaſed with it [P].

THIS very year alſo he married another Mariamne, who was the daughter of a Jewiſh prieſt of Alexandria, named Simon, the ſon of Boethus, and a woman of extraordinary beauty. To raiſe her father up to a condition fit for ſuch an alliance, he placed him upon the pontifical chair, after having diſpoſſeſſed Jeſus, the ſon of Phabæus, of that dignity. Soon after theſe nuptials he went and built the magnificent palace of Herodion, on the place where he had formerly defeated the Antigonians. The ſituation of it was ſo inviting (T), that the Jews and other people gladly came and built round it; ſo that from a palace it ſoon became a conſiderable

* De hoc bell. vide STRABO, l. xvi.

[P] Ant. ubi ſupra, & bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 16.

Phœnice, and was very convenient for trade, but had till then a very dangerous harbour, ſo that no ſhips could be ſafe in it when the wind was at ſouth-weſt. Herod remedied this inconveniency at an immenſe labour and charge, and made it one of the moſt convenient havens on that coaſt. He beautified alſo the place with ſtately buildings. The reader may ſee in Joſephus (13) a full account of this immenſe work, and of many others, in other places, erected by that prince; which, joined to his profuſe munificence, juſtly gained him the ſurname of Great.

(T) This ſtately building ſtood on a pleaſant hill, about ſeven miles from Jeruſalem, and had the proſpect as well as command of all the country round about. The gradual declivity of it was no leſs beautiful. The reader may ſee it deſcribed, as well as the city, by the authors quoted above.

(13) Idem, ibid

city [q]. In a word, he spared no cost to leave every-where some monuments of his unmeasured magnificence, as well in Judæa as out of it; but with this difference, that those in Judæa were not adorned, as the rest were, with temples and other buildings, with statues and other carvings, which he knew the Jews would never have borne with any patience; but as for those which he built out of it, he gave himself all the scope which either his pride, or desire of pleasing the Romans, could inspire him with; for all which he had a salvo ready, namely, that he did in all this only obey, and even much against his will, the orders of the emperor, who had a right to command him.

Herod sends his two sons to Rome.

BY this time Herod seemed to be at the height of all his wishes; his being in such high esteem with Augustus made him either loved or feared by his subjects and neighbours; and therefore, that he might cultivate that prince's favour still more, he sent his two favourite sons, whom he had by Mariamne, and who were grown up by this time, to be educated under his eye. Pollio, his intimate friend, was ordered to provide a stately house at Rome; but the emperor took that care off his hands, and assigned them apartments in his own palace; and so well pleased was he with the confidence which their father put in him, that he gave him full power to name which of them he pleased to be his successor. He likewise added several provinces to his kingdom, whose names, as well as the occasion of the gift, the reader will find in the margin (V). Zenodorus, from whom they had been taken, having Accused by Zenodorus.

[q] Antiq ubi supra, & l. xviii. c. 7. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 11, & 16. Vide & PLIN. hist. l. v. c. 14.

(V) These were the three districts of Trachonitis, Auranitis, or Iturea, and Batanea, which were situate between Libanus and Perea, on the other side Jordan (14).

They were given to him on this occasion; Zenodorus, tetrarch of a small toparchy, had farmed these from Varro the then president of Syria, and suffered the inhabitants of it, who lived chiefly in rocks and caves, to make excursions into all the neighbouring countries impunely. A complaint of this had been sent by Varro to Augustus; upon which orders were brought back to him at any rate to extirpate those robbers; and for the more effectual doing of it, the emperor commanded him to take those three toparchies from Zenodorus, and to put them under Herod, who with his usual success,

(14) De his conf Luc. iii. 1. Joseph. Antiq. l. xvii. c. 7. St. Jerom. & Eusch. loc. Hebr. & al.

having tried in vain ſeveral ways to regain them from him, took the opportunity of the emperor's coming into Syria, to bring a deputation from the Gadarenes with him to Antioch, there to renew their complaints againſt Herod, and to accuſe him of oppreſſion, tyranny, and other ſuch crimes; and Auguſtus did ſeem to comply ſo far with their requeſt, that he ſet a day for Herod, who was there alſo, to make his defence before them; but, when he came to do it, the emperor betrayed ſuch viſible favour and partiality towards him, that his accuſers, fearing to be delivered up to his reſentment, choſe to diſpatch themſelves out of the world that very night; which they did, ſome by drowning, ſome by hanging themſelves, and other ſuch deſperate ways. Zenodorus in particular was ſo terrified by it, that he took a ſtrong doſe of poiſon, which quite corroded his bowels, and ended his life by the next morning [r].

And acquitted. Year of the Flood, 2978. Before Chriſt, 21.

Auguſtus, however, ſtopped not his kindneſs here, but, looking upon the deſperate exit of Herod's accuſers, as a proof of his innocence and merit, appointed him his procurator in Syria, and forbid his governor there to undertake any thing without his knowledge and advice. At the ſame time ſucceſs, ſoon ferretted them out, and cleared the country of them.

[r] Antiq. l. xv. c. 13.

Zenodorus, however, went to Rome to complain of the injuſtice done him in taking thoſe diſtricts from him; but the emperor, who had reaſon to ſuſpect that he had made a gain by protecting a vermin which he ought to have ſuppreſſed, would not ſo much as hear him.

Agrippa being ſoon after ſent into Syria, Herod went to meet him at Mitylene; and, ſoon after his return, Zenodorus, in hopes of meeting with better ſucceſs with him, ſtirred up the Gadarenes to come and proffer ſundry grievous complaints againſt him. But he found the new governor too well rooted in Herod's intereſt to hear any accuſation againſt him; on the contrary, he ſent them bound to Jeruſalem, where Herod, hoping to gain them by fair uſage, ordered them to be ſet at liberty.

Zenodorus, thus diſappointed again, went and ſold the territories of Auranitis to the Arabs for fifty talents; ſo that a war was like to have enſued between Herod and them, they being deaf to all his offers for ending the diſpute in an amicable way (15), when Auguſtus's coming in a lucky time decided the controverſy in his favour as has been ſeen above.

(15) Vide Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 13.

Herod took this favourable opportunity to obtain a tetrachy for his brother Pheroras, that he might live according to his birth, and without depending on his ſucceſſor's favour after his death (W). In acknowledgment for all theſe gifts, Herod, having accompanied the emperor to the ſea-port, built a ſumptuous temple in honour of him, all of fine white marble, near the Panium, or place whence the Jordan has its origin †. The vaſt number of edifices he built, and adorned with carvings and other imagery, which the Jews looked upon as deſtructive of religion and good manners, did ſo exaſperate them againſt him, that he was forced to remit them a third part of their yearly tribute. His pretence indeed was, that the laſt grievous dearth, which had greatly impoveriſhed the land, required this largeſs from him; but, at the bottom, it was the murmurs and private meetings of the people, which were now more frequent than ever, that extorted it from him, in hopes that it would in ſome meaſure allay the ſourneſs of their ſpirits. However, to let them ſee, that he was neither inſenſible of their mutinous cabals, nor afraid to put a ſtop to them, he iſſued out an edict, expreſly forbidding all public and private aſſemblies, whether on account of feaſts, or any other pretence, under the ſevereſt penalties. But as he not only had his ſpies every-where, but did ſometimes mix himſelf among them in diſguiſe, he quickly found all theſe precautions were like to prove to little purpoſe to keep the people in obedience. This made him bethink himſelf of exacting an oath of fidelity from them; but this new impoſition was ſo ſtrenuouſly refuſed by Pollio, or Hillel, and Shamai, at the head of the whole ſect of Eſſenians, and by all the chiefs of the Phariſees, that he was forced to ſet it aſide, without venturing to ſhew any reſentment againſt thoſe that had oppoſed him in it, for fear of exaſperating the whole nation againſt him [r].

Propoſes the rebuilding of the temple

He fell ſoon after upon a much better expedient to quiet them, and at the ſame time to ſatisfy his invincible itch of eterniſing his memory, by the number and magnificence of his buildings. The great attachment which they had for their † De hoc vide ſupra, Vol. III. p. 115, (S), & 116. [r] Antiq ubi ſupra.

(W) Joſephus does not tell us where this tetrarchy was ſituate; but, by what we find in another place (16), it ſeems to have been beyond Jordan, and at ſome diſtance from Jeruſalem.

(16) Ibid. l. xvii. c. 5.

temple

temple made him conceive the hopes, that his rebuilding of it, in a more ſtately manner, would not fail to recommend him, not only to the preſent Jews, but alſo to poſterity. The difficulty was, to convince them of his being both willing and able to rear ſuch a coſtly edifice, after he had pulled down the old one; and this he did in a ſet ſpeech, which he made to their aſſembly, wherein, with his uſual eloquence, he failed not to diſplay his zeal for the glory of God and for the promoting of his religion. Among other things he reminded them how vaſtly inferior that ſacred place now was to that which had been formerly built by Solomon (X); but this, he told them, was rather to be imputed to the want of ability in thoſe that returned from Babylon, than to their want of zeal: but now that God was pleaſed not only to raiſe him to the Jewiſh throne, but to bleſs him with peace, plenty, and affluence, and with the friendſhip of the Romans, he thought himſelf bound to make ſome ſignal acknowledgment to him for all theſe bleſſings, and hoped, that the rebuilding of his temple in the manner he propoſed, could not but be acceptable both to him and them; but as he found them very much heſitating at the difficulty, length, and expenſiveneſs of ſuch a work, he was forced to engage not to move a ſtone from the old edifice, till he had prepared all the materials for the new. As ſoon as he had gained their conſent (Y), he ſet immediately ten thouſand workmen to work, under

(X) Joſephus makes him ſay here (17), that the preſent temple was lower by ſixty cubits than that of Solomon; which cannot be underſtood of the holy place, which we are told (18), was but thirty cubits high; whereas that built after the captivity, was by Cyrus's own grant, ſixty cubits high (19). If therefore there be no miſtake crept into the text both Herod and the Jewiſh hiſtorians muſt probably ſpeak of ſome of the galleries which might be ſo much higher in the firſt than in the ſecond temple. The reader may recur to what we have ſaid on the ſubject at the cloſe of the laſt †, and in the appendix to the third volume.

(Y) This aſſembly ſeems to have been held about the time of the Eaſter ſolemnity, when there was the greateſt concourſe of Jews at Jeruſalem; for Joſephus ſays it was in the eighteenth year of Herod's reign; that is, as the learned Uſher obſerves, reckoning from the death of Antigonus (20), which happened not till about the Midſummer after his impriſonment; according to which, reckon-

(17) Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 14. (18) 1 Kings vi. 2 (19) Ezra vi. 3. † p. 506. (K). (20) Annal. ſub. A. M. 3987

ing

under the direction of a thouſand prieſts, the beſt ſkilled in carving, maſonry, &c. all whom he kept under his pay. One thouſand carts were likewiſe employed in fetching all the materials; and, in a word, ſuch a number of hands was employed and ſuch expedition uſed, that he got every thing ready within the ſpace of two years, after which they ſet about pulling down the old building, and with the ſame diſpatch rearing the new one; ſo that the holy place, or temple properly ſo called, was finiſhed in a year and a half's time; during which, we are told [t], it never rained in the day-time, but only in the night. The remainder took up a little above eight years, by which time it was, if not wholly finiſhed (Z), yet made fit for divine ſervice, ing the nineteenth year of Herod not beginning till the nineteenth year before Chriſt, the ſix firſt months muſt have belonged to the eighteenth year of his reign, which brings it to the paſſover feaſt above-mentioned (21). We muſt not, however, look upon this building as a new temple, as diſtinct from that of Zerubbabel as that was from that of Solomon, but rather as the ſame rebuilt, inlarged, and adorned, upon the old foundation and with the ſame materials, as far as they could go. The very Jews themſelves ſtill looked upon it as the ſecond temple, and that which was to exceed that of Solomon in glory, by the preſence of the Meſſiah, according to the prophecy of Haggai; but, as we cannot inlarge on this ſubject, we ſhall refer the curious reader to the elaborate preface of Conſtantine l' Empereur, prefixed to his comment on the book of Middoth, where he will find that point diſcuſſed to his ſatisfaction.

The building finiſhed with wonderous ſpeed and magnificence.

[t] Ibid. c. ult.

(Z) Joſephus ſhews us in another place (22), that the whole was ſtill continued till the beginning of the Jewiſh war under Gellius Florus, when eighteen thouſand workmen being diſmiſſed and like to be idle, the Jews, unwilling their treaſure ſhould be laid up to become a prey to the Romans, petitioned the king (Agrippa) to build the eaſtern porch, which incloſed the moſt outward parts of the temple; but the king having refuſed their ſuit, thoſe men, for want of work, began to raiſe thoſe ſeditions which haſtened the deſtruction both of the city and temple; ſo that it is plain, ſome part of that building had been ſtill carried on till this time.

And hence that ſaying of the Jews to Chriſt, Forty and ſix years hath this temple been hitherto in building; for ſo the text ought to be read, according to the import of the aoriſt there uſed by the evangeliſt (23); and indeed ſo long a time had elapſed, from the beginning of the building to the firſt paſſover after Chriſt

(21) Vide Prid. connect. ſub. A.C. 19. (22) Vide Antiq. l. xx. c. 8. (23) John ii. 20.

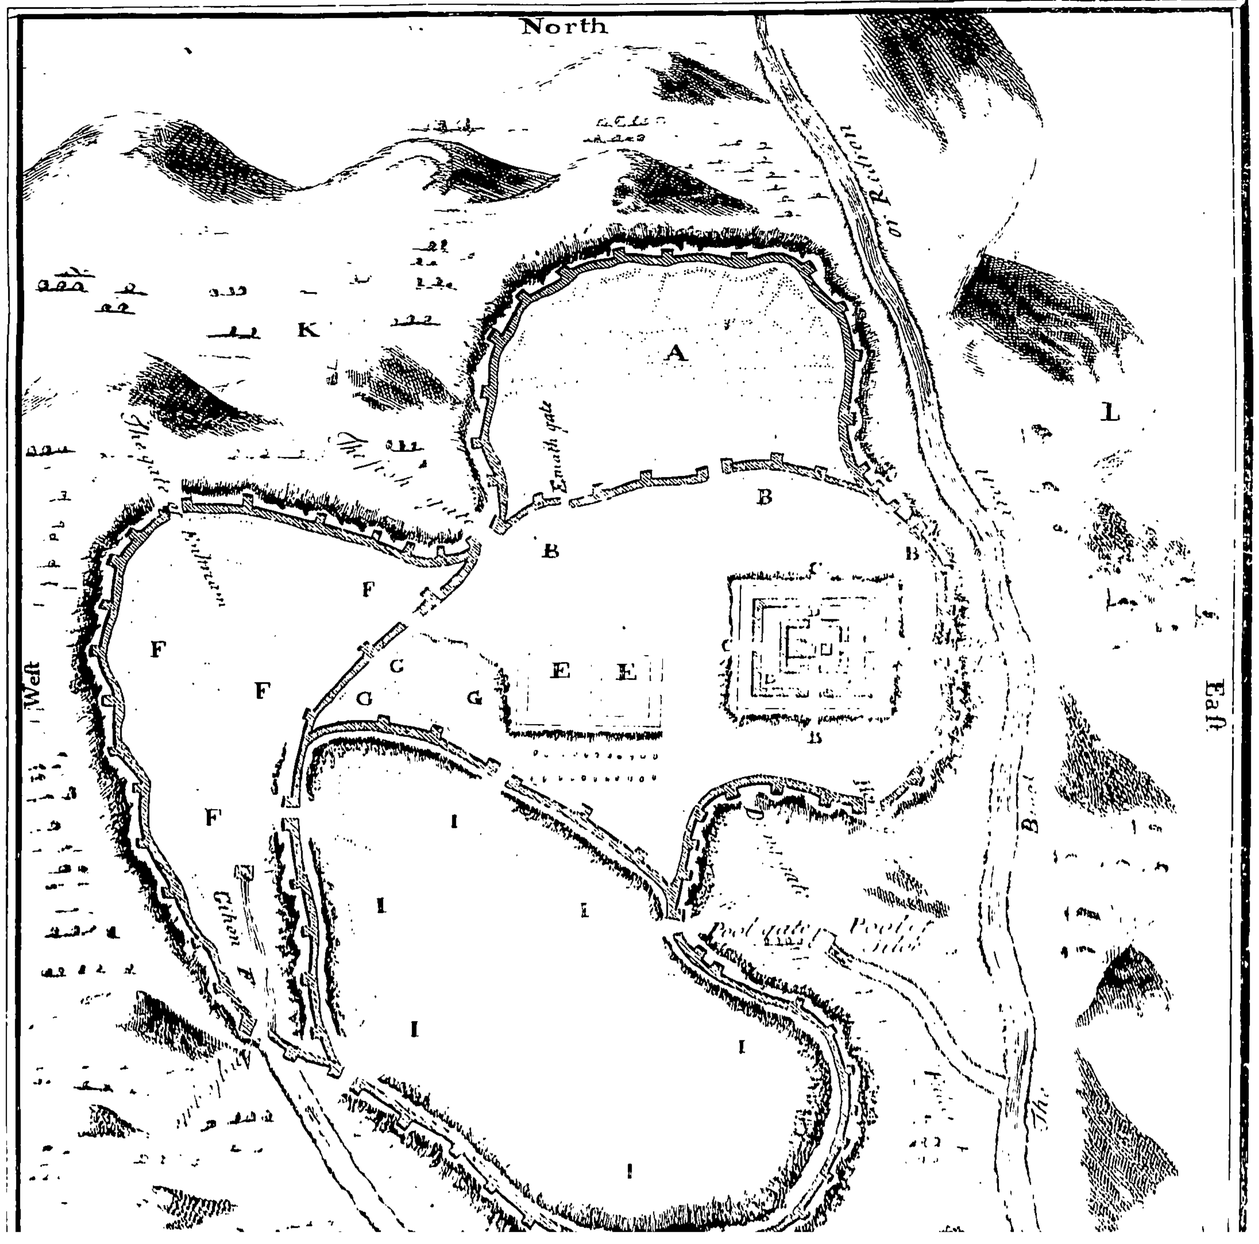
had

THE JEWISH PRIEST ON THE DAY OF EXPIATION.

THE ELEVATION OF THE TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM

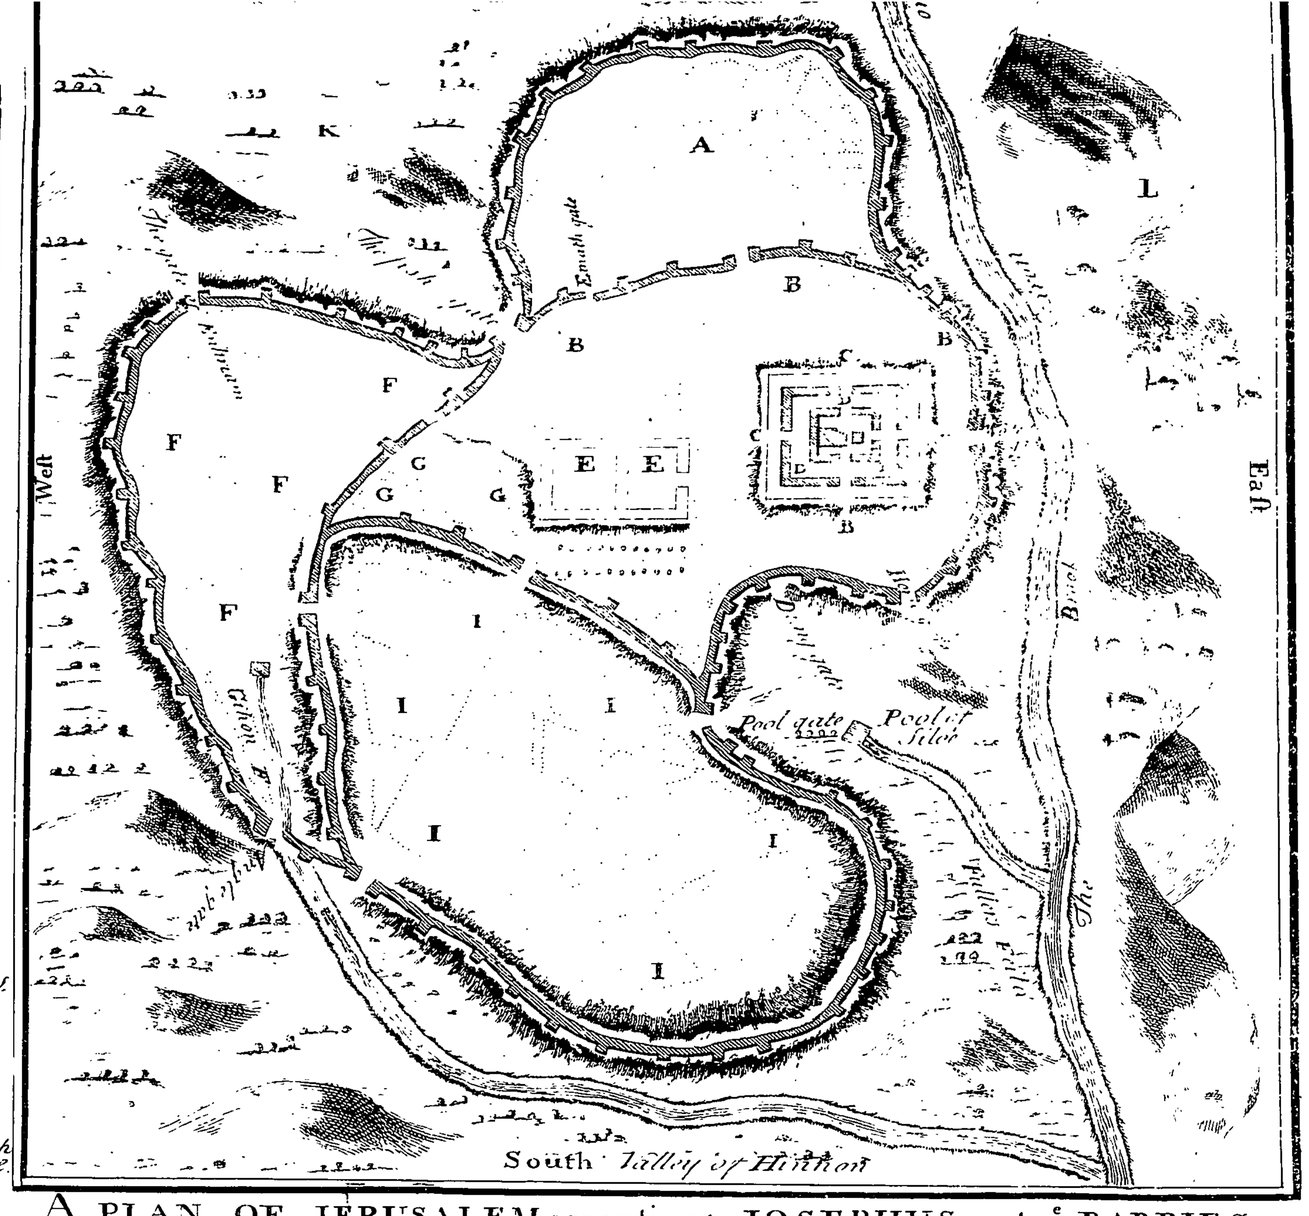


THE JEWISH HIGH PRIEST IN HIS PONTIFICAL HABIT.

THE GOLDEN CANDLESTIC

A. the new city built in the Wilderness

B. the City of David.



THE BRASEN LAVER

GG. The Entrance Hall

THE GOLDEN CANDLESTIC

A. The new City built by the Maccabees.
B. The City of David.
CC. Mount Moriah.
DD. The Temple.
EE. The royal Palace.
FF. A new part of ye City built since Manasseh

A PLAN OF JERUSALEM according to JOSEPHUS and ye RABBIES.

THE BRASEN LAVER.

GG. The Fortress Millo.
H. The old City anciently called Jebu
K. Mount Calvary.
L. The Mount of Olives.

D. Pomarede Sculp.

A VIEW OF THE INNER PORCH ALTER &c. ON THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES. de quo vid. pag. 90.

vice, according to the king's firſt deſign. The temple, properly ſo called, or holy place, was but ſixty cubits high, and as many in breadth; but in the front he added two wings or ſhoulders, which projected twenty cubits more on each ſide; which made a front of one hundred and twenty cubits in length, and as many in height, with a gate ſeventy cubits high and twenty in breadth, but open and without any doors [u]. The ſtones were white marble, twenty five cubits in length, twelve in height, and nine in breadth, all wrought and poliſhed with exquiſite beauty, the whole reſembling a ſtately palace, whoſe middle being conſiderably raiſed above the extremities of each face, made it afford a beautiful viſto at a great diſtance to thoſe that came to that metropolis (A). Inſtead of doors, the gates cloſed with very coſtly veils, inriched with variety of flowering of gold, ſilver, purple, and every thing that was rich and curious; and on each ſide of the gates were planted two ſtately columns, from whoſe corniſhes did hang gold feſtoons, and vines, with their cluſters of grapes, leaves, &c. curiouſly wrought. As for the galleries that ſurrounded this ſacred place, the porticoes, towers, courts, and other embelliſhments of it, we do not deſign to ſwell this ſection with them, but give a ſhort ſketch of them in the margin (B), and had entered into his miniſtry, at which time the Jews were objecting this to him (24).

[u] Bell. Judaic. l. vi. c. 6.

(A) This ſuperſtructure, which was probably reared on the old foundation without ſufficient additions to it, proved, as Joſephus tells us (25), too heavy for it, and ſunk down about twenty cubits; ſo that it was reduced to the height of one hundred. A project was ſet on foot for raiſing it again to its former height in Nero's time; but, upon ſome account or other, it was ſet aſide.

(B) We have already ſpoken in a former volume † of the foundations of this ſtupendous work, ſome of whoſe walls were raiſed from the deep valley beneath, to the height of three hundred cubits and upwards, and ſome of the ſtones of it forty cubits long, all faſtened to each other with lead and iron, to be proof againſt time, wind, and weather. The platform was a regular ſquare of a ſtade or furlong on each ſide; and in that deſcription we gave of the ſuperſtructure *, we confined ourſelves to what the ſacred writers had ſaid of it, without introducing the vaſt additions that had been made ſince by Herod and his ſucceſſors.

(24) Vide Uſſer. ſub. A. M. 3987. (25) Antiq. ubi ſupra.
† Vol. III. p. 557, (I). * Appen. to Vol. III. p. 560. &. ſeq.

Since

and refer our readers for a fuller account to Josephus, the Talmud, and to such other writers, as have been at the pains of compiling their several descriptions from them.

WHILST

Since then we have two accounts of Herod's temple, the one written by Josephus (26), who had been a curious viewer of it; the other by Jehudah Hakkodesh (27), the compiler of the Talmud, above one hundred and twenty years after its destruction by the Romans. From these the authors quoted in the margin (28) have reared each their separate edifices, disposed, beautified, and adorned them more by the strength of their imagination than by any superior knowledge they had of the authors they copied from; though, with respect to even these, whoever considers their swollen style, will be apt to look upon their accounts of that building, rather as panegyrics, than historical descriptions of it. However, if either is to be preferred to the other, Josephus, who had both seen it and described it soon after, if not before, its destruction, when he might have been contradicted by numbers, who had viewed it as well as he, is certainly more to be credited than the Talmudists, who wrote so long after, and when they were sure there was none left to gain-say them. From him therefore we shall endeavour to give the best and shortest sketch and plan of that stately work, which is as follows:

Each front of this square, which, as we hinted above, was a furlong long, had a spacious gate or entrance, inriched with suitable ornaments; but that on the west had four gates, the one of which led to the palace, the next to the city, and the two others to the suburbs and fields. This inclosure was surrounded on the outside with a strong and high wall of large stones, well cemented; and on the inside had, on each front, a stately piazza or gallery, supported by columns of such bigness, that three men could but just embrace them, their circumference being about twenty seven feet. There were in all, one hundred and sixty two of them, which supported a cedar ceiling of exquisite workmanship, and formed three galleries, the middlemost of which was the largest and highest, it being forty five feet in breadth and one hundred in height; whereas those on each side were but thirty feet wide and fifty in height.

The piazzas and court were paved with marble of various colours; and at a small distance from the galleries was a second inclosure, surrounded with a flight of beautiful marble rails, with stately columns at proper distances, on which were engraven certain admonitions in Greek and Latin, to forbid strangers, and those Jews that were not purified, to proceed further under pain of death. This inclosure had but one gate on the east side, none on the west, but on the north and south it had three, placed at equal distances from each other.

(26) Ibid & bell. Judaic. l. vi. c. 6 & alib. pass. (27) Megilla Jeph Middoth. (28) Villalpand Capell Lamy Prideaux Dissert. Le Clerc, Lamy, Prideaux, Whiston, Calmet & al. mult.

WHILST

WHILST the work of the temple was carrying on with such surprizing expedition, as raised the admiration of the Jews, Herod made a voyage to Rome, to pay his compliments Herod goes to Rome.

A third inclosure surrounded the temple, properly so called, and the altar of burnt offerings, and made what they called the court of the Hebrews or Israelites. It was square like the rest; but the wall on the outside was surrounded by a flight of fourteen steps. which hid a considerable part of it; and on the top was a terrace of about twelve cubits in breadth, which went quite round the whole cincture. The east side had but one gate, the west none, and the north and south four, at equal distances. Each gate was ascended to by five steps more before one could reach the level of the inward court; so that the wall which inclosed it appeared within to be but twenty five cubits high, tho' considerably higher on the outside. On the inside of each of those gates were raised a couple of spacious square chambers, in form of a pavilion, thirty cubits wide and forty in height, each supported by columns of twelve cubits circumference.

This inclosure had likewise a double flight of galleries on the inside, supported by a double row of columns; but the western side was only one continued wall, without gates or galleries. The women had likewise their particular courts separate from that of the men, and one of the gates on the north and south leading to it.

The altar of burnt-offerings was likewise high and spacious, being forty cubits in breadth and fifteen in heighth. The ascent to it was, according to the Mosaic law †, smooth and without steps, and the altar of unhewn stones. It was surrounded at a convenient distance round about with a low wall or rail, not above a cubit in heighth, which divided the court of the priests from that of the lay Israelites; so that these last were allowed to come thus far to bring their offerings and sacrifices; but none but the priests were allowed to come within that incloture. The reader will more easily understand this description by the plan here subjoined, to which we have referred all the particulars under each paragraph by proper references.

All that needs be added here is, that Herod caused a new dedication of the whole to be performed with the utmost magnificence, and presented to it many rich trophies of his former victories, after the custom of the Jewish monarchs (29).

† Exod. xx. 25, 26. (29) Antiq. l. xv. c. ult. B. J. l. i. c. 10. l. vi. c. 6. & pass. alib.

to the emperor, and a paternal visit to his two sons. Perhaps also he did chuse this time to be out of the hearing of some of the murmurings, which the Jews raised against a law which he had lately made, to suppress the frequent incursions and robberies which were committed in Judæa. By this law, it seems, he condemned every man that was found breaking through the walls of any house, to be sold for a slave into foreign countries; and this had greatly displeased the nation, because, contrary to that of Moses, it made their slavery perpetual; whereas, had they been only sold among their brethren, the sabbatic or the jubilee year would have put an end to it. Another objection raised against that law was, that those slaves would, in all likelihood, be tempted to forsake the Jewish religion and turn idolaters; upon which account it was still more universally exclaimed against [x]. It is therefore likely, that Herod, who resolved at any rate to suppress those robbers, got out of the way, that he might not be importuned to repeal it. On his arrival at Rome (C), Augustus received him with all the marks of friendship, entertained him in the most sumptuous manner, and delivered his sons to him. Herod could not but be highly pleased to behold them so greatly improved under the care of that emperor. He acknowledged the favour in terms, and by presents, answerable to the high sense he had of the obligation, and, after a short stay, took the two young princes with him back into Judæa. Here they were received with the loudest acclamations of the people, who could not forbear admiring their majestic port and behaviour, which, joined to the excellent education they had received in Italy, had rendered them in all respects truly accomplished princes. He married them soon after to suitable matches; Alexander to Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus

Makes a severe law against robbers.

Marries his two sons.

[x] Antiq. l. xvi. c. 1.

(C) Josephus adds, that, in his way to Rome, he had the curiosity to stop at Elis to see the solemnity of the CXCIst olympiad; and that the poverty of the Elians having sunk the pomp and splendor of those games, he settled a constant revenue on them, in order to restore them to their antient lustre (30).

The like piece of generosity he shewed to the Chians, for whom he paid a large sum, which they were indebted to Cæsar's receivers; after which he gave them another sum to rebuild their porticoes, which had been demolished in the wars (31).

(30) Antiq. l. xvi. c. 9. Bell. Judaic. l. i. c. 16. (31) Antiq. l. xvi. c. 3.

king

king of Cappadocia, and Ariſtobulus to Berenice, the daughter of his ſiſter Salome [y].

BUT the admiration and love which the people expreſſed for thoſe two excellent princes, failed not to raiſe the envy and jealouſy of the reſtleſs Salome, and of thoſe of her accomplices, who had forwarded the death of Mariamne, as they had reaſon more than enough to fear their avenging that princeſs's death. To prevent ſo juſt and ſad a cataſtrophe, they had recourſe to their vile artifices, which had ſucceeded ſo well againſt that innocent princeſs. They began with ſpreading reports abroad, that the two young princes could not endure their father, whom they looked upon as ſtill reeking with the blood of their mother; not doubting, but when the rumour reached that jealous monarch's ears, it would inevitably render them obnoxious to him, and haſten their ruin. In the mean time Agrippa being come to Aſia Proper, Herod went to invite him into Judæa, where having ſhewed him his new-built cities of Sebaſte, Alexandrion, Cæſarea, &c. he thence led him to Jeruſalem. There the people met them at ſome diſtance from that metropolis, in their feſtival dreſs, and conducted them with loud acclamations into the city, where his reception was ſuitable to the magnificence of his hoſt. Agrippa, having ſacrificed a whole hecatomb at the temple, was forced to depart ſooner than he would otherwiſe have done, by reaſon of the approaching winter, and Herod failed not to load him and his retinue with ſuitable preſents, whilſt the people accompanied him with loud huzzas, and ſtrewed the way with flowers and odoriferous herbs where-ever he paſſed; inſomuch, that that prince did ever after take a particular delight in expreſſing the pleaſure of that journey, and extolling the magnificence of the temple and royal palace, and of the prieſtly ornaments, the ſtately buildings, and generoſity of Herod. Philo adds, that he made the Jews ſome conſiderable preſents, and did every thing he could to oblige them, without hurting the intereſt of their king. On the ſpring following, Agrippa ſailing with his fleet to the Boſporus, was agreeably ſurprized with Herod's coming to meet him with another at Leſbos, wherein he had brought him ſome conſiderable reinforcements of men, arms, and proviſions; all which did ſo endear him to that prince, that he never undertook any thing without his knowledge and advice, nor ſcarce any party of pleaſure without his company [z].

Agrippa's reception in Judæa. Year of the Flood 2984. Before Chriſt 15.

[y] Ibid c 2. [z] Ibid. & c. 3. Vide & PHILO. legat. ad Cai. P 1033

On his return to Jeruſalem, he aſſembled the Jews, and acquainted them with the ſucceſs of his arms and thoſe of Agrippa againſt the Boſporans. He added, in order to leſſen their diſcontent, that he remitted the nation a fourth part of their tribute; which made them ſome ſatisfaction for the late murmurings, which his law againſt robbers had occaſioned [a]. But whilſt things went thus ſmoothly on in his kingdom, his family was plagued with inteſtine jars, occaſioned by the hatred which Salome bore to his two worthy ſons. The truth is, they ſpake both of her and of her brother Pheroras in ſuch reſenting terms, as made them dread ſomething worſe from them. They even ventured to complain ſometimes of the injuſtice done to their mother, and in their behaviour ſhewed ſo little tenderneſs towards their father, that Salome found it an eaſy matter to alienate his affection from them. To ſuppreſs in ſome meaſure the preſumption of the two brothers, Herod cauſed Antipater, another of his ſons (D), whom he had till then educated in a private manner, to be brought to court, where he heaped ſuch careſſes on him, as only rendered him more obnoxious to them, and them more indiſcreet in their ſpeeches againſt their father, all which were ſtill carried back to him, and very often aggravated; whilſt Antipater, wholly employed to cultivate a good underſtanding with him, was careful never to let a word ſlip even againſt his two brothers, tho' he had taken care to place ſuch about him as ſhould do it more effectually.

Among many other marks of Herod's affection to this new favourite ſon (E), he obtained of Agrippa the favour of his accompanying him to Rome, and of his being preſented by him to the emperor; ſo that by this time every one began to look upon him as his father's ſucceſſor. Antipater ſet out accordingly; but, to prevent his two rivals regaining their father's favour during his abſence, he ceaſed not, both by his letters and by his agents, to turn his heart againſt them, till at length he began to look upon them as his enemies, and re-

[a] Antiq. ibid. c. 5.

(D) This laſt ſon he had by another wife, whom Joſephus calls Doris (32), and the fourth book of Maccabees (33) Doſithea.

(E) One of which was, that he recalled his mother, whom he had repudiated to marry Mariamne, the high prieſt's daughter.

(32) Ibid. c. 4. (33) Cap ult.

ſolved

loved to take them with him to Rome, and there to try them at Cæsar's tribunal [b]. Cæsar being gone by that time to Aquileia, Herod came to him and there accused his two sons of high treason, and required justice against them in such strong terms, as extorted a flood of tears from them; after which Alexander pleaded his own and his brother's cause with such becoming modesty, as easily convinced both the emperor and the audience of their innocence. Augustus did, in a genteel manner, reprove Herod for his too rash belief, and reconciled them together; but it was not likely this peace should be long-lived. Herod was too jealous, his sons too indiscreet, and their enemies too cunning and indefatigable, not to give cause for fresh dissensions. Herod himself laid the foundation for a new and dangerous one, by a speech which he made to the Jewish assembly upon his being returned with his sons to Jerusalem; for there having acquainted them with his success at Rome, he declared to them that it was indeed his intention that his sons should reign after his death, and not till then, Antipater first, and then Alexander, and lastly Aristobulus (F); but that, whilst he lived, he did not think fit to part with the reins of government. This was indeed casting a bone of discord among his sons, and so it proved in the sequel [c].

Herod accuses his two sons of high treason before Augustus.

Returns to Jerusalem.

By this time the city of Cæsarea, which had been twelve years in building, being finished, Herod caused the dedication of it to be performed with the greatest pomp and splendor, and appointed games to be performed in it with the utmost solemnity every fifth year. Julia, the emperor's wife, or as the Jewish historian always calls her, Livia, contributed towards the splendidness of those sports five hundred talents out of her own coffers; and Herod entertained his guests

Cæsarea finished. Year of the Flood, 2989. Before Christ, 10.

[b] Ibid. c. 6 & 7. [c] Ibid. c. 8.

(F) During his stay at Rome, Augustus had, it seems, not only renewed his former grant to him of appointing any of his sons to be his successor, but had likewise given him the further liberty of dividing the kingdom amongst them in what proportion he should think fit.

He had likewise granted him one half of the revenue of the mines of Cyprus, and had appointed him his overseer of the other half. Several other rich presents were also interchanged between those two monarchs, which shewed their great intimacy to each other (34).

(34) Antiq. ubi supra, c. 8.

there,

there, who were very conſiderable both in quality and number, with ſurpriſing magnificence; inſomuch, that Auguſtus ſaid of him, That his ſoul was too great for his kingdom; and that he deſerved to have been king of all Syria and Egypt. Beſides the city of Cæſarea, which, by reaſon of its beauty, pleaſant ſituation, and commodious harbour, became in time the reſidence of the Roman procurators, he built alſo thoſe of Antipatris, in honour of his father; of Cypron, in honour of his mother, and Phaſaelis, in honour of his brother: beſides ſeveral other towers and caſtles of prodigious ſize and ſtrength [d]. On the next year the Jews of Aſia and Cyrene, having been greatly oppreſſed by the Greeks, eſpecially on account of their religion and cuſtoms, ſent a deputation to Auguſtus, and obtained an effectual redreſs from that emperor. The purport of his decree in their favour the reader may ſee in the margin (G).

Herod might have viewed, with no ſmall pleaſure, both himſelf and the whole Jewiſh nation reſpected and protected by the emperor and ſenate on the one hand, and by his friend Agrippa on the other; but his domeſtic jars, which daily increaſed by the helliſh machinations of his brother and ſiſter, and the emptineſs of his coffers, which he had exhauſted by his profuſeneſs in buildings and feaſts, made him too wretched to taſte any pleaſure in other things. To remove theſe two

[d] Antiq. ibid. c. 9. & ſeq.

(G) That they ſhould be allowed to live according to their laws; and with the ſame privileges as they had enjoyed under the late Cæſar and Hyrcan; that their temple at Jeruſalem ſhould ſtill receive their yearly tribute towards the repairs and worſhip of it; that the Jews ſhould not be obliged to appear at the courts of judicature on the eve of the ſabbath after the ninth hour, (anſwering to three after noon) nor on the ſabbath; laſtly, that whoſoever ſhould lay hands either on the temple tribute, or on any of the ſacred books of the Jews, ſhould be puniſhed as a ſacrilege, and all his goods, ſhould be confiſcated to the Roman commonwealth.

This decree was ordered to be ſet up in a public place at Ancyra, which had been dedicated by the whole people of Aſia to the honour of that monarch (35).

King Agrippa made much ſuch another decree in their favour, and ordered, that whoever ſtole any of the ſacred treaſure, or Jewiſh books, and took ſanctuary in any temple or aſylum, ſhould be torn thence, and delivered up to the Jews, to be puniſhed by them (36).

(35) Ibid. c. 10. (36) Idem ibid.

corroding

corroding ſores, he betook himſelf to remedies more deſperate than the diſeaſe. To ſupply his preſent neceſſities, he caſt his eyes on the tombs of David and Solomon, out of which he had heard, or pretended to have heard, that Hyrcan had formerly drawn ſome large ſums; and thoſe places, he thought, would prove a laſting fund for his extravagant expences. We ſhall not repeat what we have obſerved heretofore concerning this pretended theft of the Maccabitiſh pontiff †. All we ſhall add with reſpect to Herod is, that he executed his deſign with the utmoſt privacy, and went to the place in the night, accompanied only with ſome few confidents, where, inſtead of the coined gold and ſilver he expected, he found only ſome quantity of rich veſſels, curiouſly wrought, which he cauſed to be carried off. Not content with theſe, he ventured farther, to ſearch into the very coffins of the dead monarchs; but ſome ſudden damp, or, as Joſephus calls it, a miraculous flame, which conſumed two of his guards, having ſcared him and his retinue, put a ſtop to his further ſearch. Herod, to make ſome ſatisfaction for his ſacrilege, cauſed a ſtately monument of white marble to be erected at the entrance of the ſepulchre[e]; but this was looked upon by the Jews rather as a monument of his crime, than an expiation of it.

Herod plunders David's ſepulchre.

BUT his cruelty to his ſons and their friends rendered him ſtill more abhorred. His vile ſiſter (H) had raiſed his jealouſy

His cruelty to his ſons.

† Vide ſupra, p. 72, (M).

[e] Antiq. ibid. c. 11.

(H) One of her helliſh projects, and which coſt her dear, was, to get Pheroras to tell young Alexander, that the king was become ſo deſperately in love with his wife Glaphyra, that nothing but his forcing her from him could ſatisfy his unruly paſſion. Alexander taking it for granted, went to his father, and, in the humbleſt manner, mixed with a flood of tears, expoſtulated the matter with him. Herod, ſurprized at ſuch a black accuſation, of which he was wholly innocent, ſent for his brother, and aſked him, How he could lay ſuch a black perfidy to his charge?

Pheroras threw all the blame on his ſiſter, and pretended ſhe was the perſon who had whiſpered the thing to him. Salome, being ſent for, denied the whole with her uſual aſſurance; but the king reading her guilt in her looks, in ſpite of her proteſtations to the contrary, cauſed her and her brother to be baniſhed the court, and highly commended his ſon's moderation; but all this good underſtanding was ſoon after daſhed by a more helliſh accuſation, which they brought againſt that young prince, and which we are going to relate.

againſt

againſt them to ſuch a height, that he acted more like a furious tyrant, than a father or king, filling the city with blood, and turning his own palace into a ſlaughter-houſe. Alexander had been accuſed to him of having corrupted, by dint of preſents and promiſes, two of his favourite confidents, namely, his high-ſteward and cup-bearer. Herod ordered them immediately to be put to the rack; whereon they confeſſed their having indeed received ſome preſents from that prince; but denied his having betrayed to them any ill deſign againſt the king. This confeſſion not ſatisfying his jealouſy, they were tortured afreſh, and again, till he had extorted enough from them to juſtify his ſending his ſon to priſon and loading him with irons. Here the young prince being grown deſperate, ſent his father four different confeſſions, in which he owned all, and more, than the torture had extorted from the other two, and at the ſame time accuſed Salome and Pheroras, with two of the king's prime miniſters and favourites, of being all alike concerned in the plot; and particularly that Salome had even ventured to come to him in the dead of night, and, lying down by him, had uſed many cogent arguments to convince him, that they muſt expect neither peace nor happineſs, till they had rid themſelves of the tyrant [f].

Alexander's deſperate confeſſion.

THIS accuſation, which was only calculated to ſet all on fire, had the deſired effect; and the jealous king, not knowing whom to truſt to, flew into the greateſt exceſſes of cruelty. There was now nothing to be heard of but racks, impriſonments, and dreadful executions abroad, whilſt the tyrant was ſo tormented with fears at home, that he often ſtarted out of his bed, as if purſued ſword in hand by his ſons and their accomplices. Thus it was hourly expected, when theſe fits of rage and dread would have run him mad, or haſtened his ſon's execution, when Archelaus king of Cappadocia came in a lucky minute (I), and, by his interpoſition, ſettled a

[f] Ibid. c. 12.

(I) We have already taken notice, that he was the father of Glaphyra, whom Alexander had married. This prince, who was of a prudent and cool temper had received Herod and his ſons in their return from Rome, where they had been acquitted by the emperor, and, by his wiſe counſels, had finiſhed that reconciliation which Auguſtus had begun

But being now informed to what height of cruelty things were carried at Jeruſalem, he thought himſelf obliged to come thither, and to uſe his beſt endeavours to ſettle peace in that monarch's family.

calm-

calm again, at leaſt for a time. This diſcreet prince, who knew the violence of Herod's temper, began at firſt with pitying his ſad condition, and condemning the unnatural perfidy of his ſon, threatening to take his daughter from him, and to leave him to his father's juſt reſentment; but, in the end, he had the addreſs, by degrees, to explode all theſe malicious accuſations and extorted confeſſions, and not only to perſuade him that his ſon was innocent of any deſign upon his life or kingdom, but even to make him turn interceſſor in his behalf. Pheroras, hearing of this reconciliation, found no better expedient to obtain Herod's pardon, than by coming in a mourning dreſs, and, at his feet, confeſſing himſelf the author of all the ſlanders raiſed againſt the two princes. Herod, thus reconciled to his ſons, ſet out with them for Rome, to acquaint the emperor with the whole affair, after having accompanied Archelaus as far as Antioch in his way homewards[g]. He was indeed under an obligation to go and clear his ſon at the Roman court, becauſe he had, after their ſecond falling out, exhibited ſeveral grievous complaints againſt him to the emperor.

Reconciled to Herod. Year of the Flood, 2991. Before Chriſt, 8.

DURING this and his laſt journey to Rome, the bands of robbers, whom he had driven out of Trachonitis, having taken ſhelter in Arabia Petrea, under the protection of Obodas the king of it (K), had made ſuch terrible inroads into Judæa, that Herod, on his return, not being able to come at them there, put all their relations and friends to death which he could lay his hands on; which made them more cruel and deſperate than ever. By this time the temple being finiſhed, as was hinted above, Herod cauſed the dedication of it to be performed with his uſual magnificence, and, on the following ſpring, ſet about the ſuppreſſing of the Trachonitiſh robbers. He began with a law-ſuit againſt Syllæus for ſixty [g] Ibid. c. 13.

(K) This prince had a favourite miniſter named Syllæus, who had formerly made his addreſſes to Salome; but Herod refuſing to give her to him, unleſs he turned Jew, and Syllæus not daring to conſent to it, ſhe had been given to Alexas, one of Herod's confidents. Hence aroſe a mutual hatred between them, which Syllæus improved, by perſuading Obodas to protect thoſe banditti, who did accordingly aſſign them the fortreſs of Repta for a place of retreat, from which they ſallied out, and committed innumerable outrages and cruelties, both in Paleſtine and in Cœle Syria (37).

(37) Antiq. ibid. c. 11, & 13.

talents which he had lent him; and having gained his cauſe before the prefects of Syria, Saturnius and Volumnius, Syllæus, inſtead of paying the money, ſlipped away to Rome; whereupon Herod, having got leave of thoſe two governors to right himſelf by arms, marched into Arabia, and there defeated the robbers, demoliſhed their caſtle, and returned to Jeruſalem, without taking any further revenge. But this expedition was like to have coſt him dear, through the treachery of Syllæus, who, upon the firſt hearing of it, went and complained to the emperor, and aggravated the wrongs done to the Arabians to ſuch a degree, that Auguſtus ſent him a very ſharp reproof, and would have wholly caſt him off, had not he been better informed ſoon after. Herod had ſent two embaſſies to that prince, and neither of them had been able to get an audience. At length he ſent Nicolas Damaſcen thither, who, finding how prejudiced the emperor was againſt his maſter, bethought himſelf of an happy expedient to explode all the accuſations of Syllæus, by means of the embaſſadors of the Nabathean Arabs, without diſcovering his errand, till they had cleared the way for him (L). Auguſtus, being now ſatisfied of Herod's innocence and of his own too great credulity, was thinking to have taken the Nabathean kingdom from Aretas, and to have made him a preſent of it; but whilſt he was deliberating about it, freſh complaints came to him from that unhappy monarch againſt his ſons, which diverted the emperor from purſuing his deſign.

Herod out of favour with Auguſtus.

Reconciled to him.

FOR whilſt theſe things had been agitating, Salome and Pheroras had again filled Herod's head with new plots and aſſaſſinations intended againſt him by his ſons; and tho', upon inquiry, nothing could be proved againſt them, but a deſign

(L) Theſe were come to demand juſtice againſt Syllæus, who had by that time cauſed Obodas to be poiſoned, and was there ſoliciting the emperor for that kingdom; but the Nabatheans, having ſet up a king of their own, ſent this embaſſy to Rome, to have him confirmed there, and to have the aſſaſſin puniſhed.

Damaſcen therefore having privately gained them, directed them how to manage their audience in ſuch a manner, as to clear Herod of all that was laid to his charge, without betraying any other deſign than that of accuſing Syllæus. The thing ſucceeded to his wiſh, and Damaſcen putting himſelf at the head of their embaſſy, managed his accuſation with ſuch addreſs, backing it with the ſuffrages of his Nabathean collegues, that Syllæus, who was then preſent, could not diſprove one ſingle point; but was condemned to pay Herod's debt, and then to loſe his head (38).

(38) Conf. Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 13. & l. xvii. c. 4. Strab. c. 16.

of

of retiring into ſome other country, where they might peaceably outlive their father's tyranny; yet the jealous king took all the reſt for granted upon this ſingle evidence, and ſent two of his miniſters to Rome, with orders, that, if they found the emperor reconciled to him, they ſhould deliver his letter to him, and obtain juſtice againſt the two young princes. Auguſtus having read the letter, and finding Herod deſperately bent upon the ruin of his unfortunate ſons, ſent immediately orders to have them tried at Berytus, before the governors of Syria and other neighbouring provinces, and in particular before Archelaus; and, if they were found guilty, he gave their father leave to puniſh them as he ſhould think fit. Herod convened them all accordingly, except the Cappadocian king, whom he ſuſpected of too great partiality to his ſons; and having left theſe two unfortunate princes under a ſtrong guard at Platone, a ſmall town of the Sidonians, under pretence that they might be eaſily brought thence, if the judges did think it neceſſary, he pleaded his own cauſe before an aſſembly of above five hundred perſons; but with ſuch violence and brutiſh reſentment, as rather raiſed their indignation againſt, than pity for, him. He ſpared for neither evidence nor arguments to have them condemned to die, and concluded with telling them, that being a king, he might have done it by his own authority, according to the laws of Judæa; but that he rather choſe to have them tried before ſuch an aſſembly, to avoid the imputation of injuſtice or cruelty. After a full hearing, Saturnius, who had been formerly conſul, voted, that they ſhould be puniſhed indeed, but not with death, and was ſeconded by his three ſons, who were then his lieutenants; but they were over-ruled by Volumnius, who condemned them to death, and drew the reſt of the judges after him. Only they left it to Herod to execute the ſentence, when and how he thought fit.

Prefers new complaints againſt his ſons.

Gets them condemned.

Damaſcen, on his return from Rome, did try in vain to diſſuade him from too raſhly depriving himſelf of two ſuch ſons, and leaving himſelf in his old age to the mercy of the ambitious Antipater. Tyro, another old experienced ſoldier, came likewiſe to beg of him, that he might be admitted to ſpeak to him on the ſame ſubject; and, upon his permiſſion, freely told him the danger he was in from that young prince, who, he aſſured him, entertained ſome treaſonable deſigns againſt him, whilſt the chiefs of the Jewiſh nation, to whom he was grown odious on that account, did highly pity his two condemned ſons, as leſs guilty than that brother. Herod ſtopped him ſhort there, to make him name thoſe that and, upon his so doing, caused them to be imprisoned. Tyro himself was, by the subtlety of Salome, accused by Herod's barber, of having hired him to cut his throat. Herod had recourse to the rack, which he caused to be given to the accuser, and to Tyro and his son, a youth of about the age of Alexander; and the latter, to save his father from the torture, confessed that himself alone, without his father's privity, had resolved to kill him, and to save Alexander. Scarce any body believed his confession but Herod, who thereupon caused his two sons to be conveyed to Sebaste, and there strangled, or, as the fourth book of the Maccabees has it, hanged on a post or gallows. Their bodies were afterwards buried at Alexandrion, among their Asmonean ancestors [h].

Puts them to death.

Antipater having now no rival left, but his father, and Pheroras, though highly obliged to his brother, having lately fallen out with him (M), these two entered into a plot to take him off as soon as possible. Herod had about this time sent Glaphyra, Alexander's widow, back into Cappadocia, and returned her dowry out of his own coffers. There were still two sons left of hers, and two which Aristobulus had had by Berenice, all whom the king had caused to be carefully educated. He had likewise expressed an uncommon concern for them, as well as a remorse for the untimely death of their fathers; and, as he found himself upon the decline, he was contriving how to have those young princes so advantageously matched, that he might see them safely and happily settled before he died. But Antipater, who looked upon them in another view, found means to break all his measures, and to persuade him to change the disposition of his family, contrary to his first design [i]. It will not be amiss here to give an account of that monarch's wives, and of

Year of the Flood, 2994. Before Christ, 5.

[h] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 17, & 4 Maccab. c. ult. [i] Antiq. l. xvii c. 2, & 3.

(M) The occasion of this rupture, Josephus tells us (39), was, that Herod had formerly offered his brother his daughter in marriage, whom he had refused for the sake of a favourite servant, with whom he was deeply in love, and did soon after marry. Herod hereupon insisted upon his divorcing her, and marrying another of his daughters. Pheroras bound himself in the most solemn manner to perform it within a month; but when the time came, he absolutely refused; and Antipater, taking the advantage of this breach, easily drew him into his treasonable design.

(39) Antiq. l. xvi. c. 11, & l. xvii. c. 3.

their

their iſſue, in order to underſtand the ſequel of this hiſtory. The reader will find both in the margin (N).

IN the mean time another thing happened, which rendered Herod more odious to the Jews, and more irreconcileable to his brother. An edict lately iſſued out, commanding the (N) Herod had nine wives, the firſt of whom, named Doris, was the mother of Antipater. The ſecond was Mariamne, the daughter of Simon the high-prieſt, by whom he had a ſon named Herod, called alſo Philip, who had married Herodias, on whoſe account the baptiſt was afterwards beheaded. The third was his brother's daughter. The fourth his firſt couſin. He had no children by theſe two laſt.

The fifth was called Martac, a Samaritan, by whom he had Archelaus and Antipas, the former of whom ſucceeded him in the half of the kingdom under the name of Tetrarch, and the latter, called alſo Philip, married Salome, the dancing daughter of Herodias abovementioned.

The ſixth, named Cleopatra, was a native of Jeruſalem, by whom he had two ſons, Herod, called alſo Antipas, and Philip. Herod having married Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, during his life, was reproved for it by John the baptiſt, and cauſed him to be put to death.

Pallas was his ſeventh wife, by whom he had a ſon named Phaſaelus. The eighth was Phædra, by whom he had only one daughter, named Roxana; and by the laſt, called Elpis, he had another daughter called Salome (40).

As to his grandſons, by his beloved Mariamne, mother of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, lately put to death, they make likewiſe a conſiderable figure in hiſtory, and eſpecially thoſe of the latter in the goſpel, and deſerve here a particular mention.

Ariſtobulus left two ſons and a daughter, whom he had by Berenice his wife, as we have ſeen a little higher, namely Agrippa, Herod, and Herodias. Agrippa, at firſt clapt into priſon by Tiberius, and afterwards made king of Judæa by Caligula (41), was he who put James the brother of John to death, impriſoned Peter, and was ſmitten with death at Cæſarea (42). Herod was made king of Chalcis, and is only known in St. Luke for his marriage with the dancing daughter of Herodias, as we hinted above.

As for Agrippa, he left a ſon of the ſame name, before whom and his ſiſter Berenice St. Paul was admitted to plead his cauſe at Cæſarea (43), and another daughter, named Druſilla, married to Felix, governor of Judæa (44).

(40) De his vide bell. Jud. l. i c. 18. Antiq. l. xviii. c. 7. Vid. & Matth. xiv. 1, & ſeq. Mark vi. 14, & ſeq. Luke ix. 7, & ſeq. (41) Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 8. (42) Acts xii. 1, & ſeq. ad fin. (43) Acts xxv. in fin. xxvi. Ptol. (44) Ibid. xxiv. 24.

Jewiſh

Jewish nation to swear allegiance to Augustus and to the king, had been strenuously opposed by the Pharisees, to the number of seven thousand, as contrary to the Mosaic law [k]; for which contumacy Herod had condemned them to a severe fine, which had been paid by Pheroras's new wife. This generous deed of hers had therefore so ingratiated her to that sect, that they scrupled not to persuade the people, from a pretended prophetic spirit, that God was going to transfer the crown from the line of Herod to the posterity of his brother's wife. Salome failed not to acquaint Herod with it, who, having put several of the ring-leaders to death, commanded his brother to put his wife away, as the cause of this new sedition. Pheroras, upon his obstinate refusal to comply with his command, was forbid the court, and the rest of Herod's family to have any further conversation with him. Pheroras was glad to take this opportunity of retiring into his tetrarchy, and took an oath never to return to court again whilst Herod lived. His being at that distance from the metropolis was indeed a likely expedient to prevent his being suspected of having a hand in what he was then hatching against the king's life; and for the same reason Antipater procured himself to be sent for to Rome to attend upon Augustus. Thus had these two politic persons contrived to screen themselves from discovery, whilst their instruments were on work to bring about their treacherous design; but an accident soon after happened, which brought their whole treason to light.

New troubles in Judæa.

Herod falls sick.

Herod, who was fallen sick, and still retained a great love for his brother, had sent for him to communicate some private orders to him, and Pheroras had refused it, on pretence that he dared not violate his oath. He fell sick soon after, and Herod recovered, and was so far from resenting his late refusal, that he paid him an affectionate visit, without staying for an invitation from him. Pheroras dying two days after his arrival, he caused him to be magnificently buried at Jerusalem. But his death proved the beginning of Antipater's disgrace: for two of the deceased's freed-men came and demanded justice against his wife, whom they accused of having dispatched him with some poison, which she had given him on that very evening on which he was taken ill. Herod had recourse to his old way of extorting the truth by the rack; in particular, the women of Pheroras's family suffered it at first with a surprising constancy; but one of them was at length forced, by the excess of the torture, to cry out, that the [k] Vid. Deut. xvii, 15.

prayed

prayed to God, that Doris, Antipater's mother, might bear her ſhare of the torments, which ſhe had been the cauſe of. At theſe words Herod having cauſed them to be more cruelly tortured, as well as one Antipater, an officer under his treacherous ſon, the whole plot was unravelled; and, upon comparing their ſeveral depoſitions, and the intelligence which Salome had already given to the king, it was found, that the poiſon, of which Pheroras died, had been procured from Alexandria by a friend of Antipater, from whom it was conveyed by Antipater's mother to Pheroras, in order to be given to the king upon the firſt opportunity. All which was upon further examination acknowledged by Pheroras's wife, who added, that ſhe would go and fetch it to him; and, inſtead of doing ſo, flung herſelf down from a high gallery; but her fall not proving mortal, ſhe, upon Herod's promiſe of a general pardon, depoſed further, that her huſband, being ſtung with remorſe at his receiving this laſt viſit from him, had ordered her to fetch the poiſon, and to burn it before his face, which ſhe had accordingly done, except a ſmall doſe that ſhe had reſerved for herſelf in caſe of neceſſity. The box, and reſt of the poiſon, being produced and acknowledged by other witneſſes, convinced Herod of his ſon's perfidy, not only to himſelf, but to the two ſons of his favourite Mariamne. His other wife of that name was likewiſe accuſed of being in the ſame plot, and though nothing was proved againſt her, yet was ſhe baniſhed, her ſon Herod diſinherited, and her father depoſed from the high prieſthood (O). Doris was likewiſe ſtript of all her coſtly ornaments, which amounted to a large ſum, and baniſhed the court [1].

Antipater's plot againſt him diſcovered.

BUT it is now time to leave for a while Herod in his ſad diſtracted condition, and the nation in their feuds and reſentments againſt him, and turn our eyes on more important matters; thoſe great and ineſtimable bleſſings which heaven

John the baptiſt born.

[1] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 4, 5, & 6.

(O) Simon was ſucceeded in that dignity by one Matthias the ſon of Theophilus, a native of Jeruſalem. But this pontiff having, on the following expiation-eve, contracted ſome pollution †, which incapacitated him from officiating on that grand ſolemnity, a near relation of his, named Joſeph, the ſon of Ellemus, was ſubſtituted in his room. Matthias enjoyed his dignity but one year, after which he was depoſed for being privy to an inſurrection raiſed at Jeruſalem, and ſucceeded by Joazar his brother-in-law (45).

† Antiq l xvii. c. 6. Vid. & Vol III. p. 201, 235, & ſeq.
(45) Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 8.

was

was then ready to ſhower down, not only on the Jews, had they not rendered themſelves unworthy of them, but on the whole world, who, we are told, were then in an univerſal expectation of them under the promiſed Meſſiah. For about this time the angel Gabriel, who had been formerly ſent to manifeſt to Daniel the preciſe time of his coming, by a determinate number of weeks [m] (P), was again ſent to Zacha- ry,

[m] Dan. ix. 24, & ſeq.

(P) This is juſtly allowed one of the nobleſt prophecies in the whole Old Teſtament, and one of the ſtrongeſt proofs of chriſtianity againſt the Jews, ſince it determines the very time on which Chriſt was to come into the world, enter into his miniſtry, and be cut off for the ſins of the people; ſoon after which was to follow the deſtruction of the Jews, or, as the prophet words it, their ceaſing to be a nation or people, and the promulgation of the goſpel, or of the new covenant, in and by that Meſſiah.

The whole prophecy runs as follows (46): Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy holy city to finiſh (or reſtrain) the tranſgreſſion, and make an end of ſins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlaſting righteouſneſs, and to ſeal up the viſion and prophecy, and to anoint the moſt holy one. Know therefore, and underſtand, that from the going forth of the commandment to reſtore and to build Jeruſalem unto the Meſſiah, the prince, ſhall be ſeven weeks; and threeſcore and two weeks the ſtreets ſhall be built again, and the wall, even in anxious or (perilous) times; and after threeſcore and two weeks ſhall Meſſiah be cut off, but not for himſelf; and the people of the prince that ſhall come, ſhall deſtroy the city and the ſanctuary, and the end of it ſhall be with (or like) an inundation, and unto the end of the war deſolation is determined; and he ſhall confirm the covenant with many during one week, and in the midſt of the week he ſhall cauſe the ſacrifice and the oblation to ceaſe; and he ſhall make it deſolate on account of the over ſpreading of abominations, until the determined extermination be poured on the land, or people, that is become liable to that deſolation.

It will not be expected, that we ſhould here enter into a comment on this prophecy, much leſs into a diſſertation on the various ways of computing the ſeventy weeks here mentioned, and the various times which interpreters, both Jewiſh and chriſtians, have aſſigned for the beginning and ending of that prophetic epocha. And yet, as the ſubject is of no ſmall moment, the reader will doubtleſs be glad to hear at leaſt, how it is beſt calculated and made

(49) Dan. ix. 24. & ſeq.

out

ry, a pious and upright prieſt of the courſe of Abiah, whilſt he ſtood offering the ſacred incenſe in the temple, according to the prieſtly office [n], to foretel him the birth of a ſon, the miraculous out by the latter, and by what ſubterfuges the former endeavour to evade the force of it.

[n] Vid. EXOD. xxx. 7, 8, & Vol. III. p. 224, & ſeq.

The generality of the Jews do agree with us, that thoſe prophetic weeks are weeks of years, or of a day for a year, according to the prophetic ſtyle. Though ſome of them, in order to puzzle the cauſe, have pretended to underſtand them of weeks of jubilees, or of ſeven ſabbatic *, that is, forty nine weeks each, amounting in all to 3430 years (47). A good long epoch, and very proper to keep up the drooping hopes of the Jews about the Meſſiah's coming. Others ſtretch it ſtill farther, to ſeven thouſand years, that is, by allowing a hundred years to every week; but the generality underſtand thoſe weeks of ſeven lunar or Jewiſh years, as we do, according to which ſeventy weeks will make four hundred and ninety years. But here they finding themſelves cloſely pinched by that computation, have had recourſe to various pitiful ſhifts to explode it. We ſhall give our readers a ſketch of ſome of the beſt of them, by which he may gueſs at the reſt.

Some of them pretend, that the words of the prophet, from the going forth of the command to reſtore and to build, are not to be underſtood from the iſſuing out of Cyrus or Darius's decree; but from the time of thoſe words being prophetically pronounced by Jeremiah to Zedekiah king of Judah (48) ſome years before the captivity (49); and to ſhew their wretched ſkill in chronology, conclude the epocha with us at the deſtruction of the temple. Others, St Jerom tells us (50), began at Darius the Mede, and ended it with thoſe above-mentioned at the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; only they allowed the eight remaining weeks for the total diſperſion of the Jewiſh nation completed under the emperor Adrian.

A third ſort begin the ſeventy weeks at the deſtruction of the firſt temple by Nebuchadnezzar, and end it at the deſtruction of the ſecond by Titus Veſpaſian (1). Shrinking thereby an epoch of ſix hundred and ſixty years into this of four hundred and ninety, to make it agree with the ſeventy weeks, and thereby betraying ſtill more their ignorance of chronology. This devaſtation of the miraculous child of old age and barrenneſs; a ſon whom he ſhould ſhortly have by his virtuous wife Elizabeth, and who ſhould be a Nazarite, and the fore-runner and great harbinger of the world's redeemer o. Here the good old prieſt, ſurprized at the viſion, and conſcious of his and his ſpouſe's extreme old age, could not forbear deſiring to have his faith confirmed by ſome further miraculous token; and the angel granted his requeſt, and in ſuch a manner, as might at once

* Concerning thoſe jubilees and ſabbatic years, ſee before Vol. II. p. 195, & ſeq. 190, & (L). (47) Vid. N. De Lyra in Dan. ix. (48) Jerom. xxiv. 8. & ſeq. [illegible] & ſeq. paſſ. (49) Vid. Munſter in Dan. ix. Nor. & [illegible] Daniel. ix. (1) Rabbin. plurim. Vid. int. al. Aben Ezram, Jarchi, & de Lyra in loc. ſup. citat.

o Luke i. 5, & ſeq.

city and temple, and the diſperſion of the Jews, is according to this latter ſyſtem to laſt till the overthrow of Gog and Magog by the Meſſiah; but when that will happen, they do not pretend to gueſs. For theſe reaſons they are altogether at a loſs how to explain this prophecy, ſo as to evade the conſequences drawn from it by the chriſtians againſt them, and have fallen into various hypotheſes, equally abſurd and ridiculous, about the Meſſiah. Some think, that the ſins of the nation have retarded his coming; others, that he came at the appointed time, but did not appear publicly; others, that he is ſtill hid in ſome obſcure part of the world, waiting till they are fit to receive him; others have imagined two Meſſiahs, one humble, obſcure, and rejected; and another as yet to come, glorious, warlike, victorious, and univerſally acknowledged. Laſtly, and to name no more, from a ſenſe of the manifeſt deficiency of all theſe evaſory ſhifts, they have agreed to leave the diſpute about the Meſſiah in ſuſpendio till better times, and have prohibited all further enquiries and calculations about it under a ſevere anathema (2).

The chriſtians are not exactly agreed either in the placing the beginning and end of theſe weeks, or in the calculations of thoſe lunar or Jewiſh years. Both differences, however, are inconſiderable, if duly attended to; the former is intirely owing to our imperfect knowledge of the chronology of thoſe times. Had we a ſure guide in it, the point would not be long unſettled. But whilſt in this uncertainty one author will place the beginning at the decree of Cyrus, another at that of Darius, a third at that of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and each of them endeavours to ſtretch or ſhorten the chronology of each interval, as beſt ſuits with his hypotheſis; it is no wonder there is ſo little agreement among them, and ſo little certainty to be gathered from the whole diſpute.

The difference ariſing from the various computations of the Jewiſh years is ſtill more inconſiderable, ſince it can amount at moſt but to nine or ten years between thoſe who make it longeſt, and thoſe who make it ſhorteſt; and who can wonder at it, or urge it as an objection againſt this prophecy, that conſiders the variety of computations,

(2) Vid. ant. al. Baſnag. Diſſert. de 70 hebdomad.

once be a reproof to his diffidence, and a confirmation of the meſſage he had delivered to him. Zacharias was accordingly ſtruck dumb on that inſtant, and continued ſo, till the promiſed child was actually born. Six computations, of either the Jews, of which we have formerly ſpoken more fully *, or of other nations, from which this epoch is to be calculated and rectified? Upon the whole then, theſe difficulties duly conſidered, an impartial reader will doubtleſs reſt ſatisfied with that ſyſtem, which beſt adjuſts the ſeventy weeks, or four hundred and ninety years, of the prophecy to the chronology of that epoch, according to the beſt light that can be had of it from the ſacred and profane hiſtorians.

Waving therefore ſome minute differences between the authors that have written on that ſubject, the ſyſtem moſt univerſally received by proteſtants, as well as Roman catholics, is that of Julius Africanus (3), as it has been amended by ſome late eminent chronologers (4), who place the beginning of it, expreſſed in the words of the prophecy, From the going forth of the commandment to rebuild, &c. at the beginning of its execution, which was not done till Nehemiah's coming to Jeruſalem to ſee it punctually performed, and the end of it at the death of the Meſſiah; which interval makes up the four hundred and ninetieth year here foretold. For as to the firſt, it is plain, that Nehemiah found the work quite obſtructed and ſet aſide, at his firſt arrival there, and that he ſat immediately about and finiſhed it (5). This command, which was given in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (6), is not, however, to be underſtood, according to them, of the twentieth year of his reigning alone, which would make the whole period too long by ten years; but of the twentieth of his reigning in partnerſhip with his father (on a ſuppoſition that he was admitted into it by him ten years before his death) which will be the tenth of his reigning alone.

This ſyſtem, which ſeems clearly to remove all difficulties, is attended with only one, viz. the ſilence of hiſtorians and the unlikelihood of Artaxerxes being admitted ſo early into partnerſhip with his father; and this objection, ſmall as it is, has been, however, thought weighty enough to oblige the learned Prideaux (7) to ſteer a new courſe, which our readers will perhaps better approve than the former. But as he has treated the ſubject in ſuch a full and prolix manner, as would ſwell this note beyond due bounds, and the book itſelf is in every body's hands, and in our

* See. Vol. I. p. 250, (N), & Vol. III. p. 189, & (K), & alib. (3) Apud Hieron. in Daniel. ubi ſupra. (4) Petav. de Doctr. Temp. lib. xii. cap. 32, & ſeq. Ration. Tempor. part. 2. l. iii. c. 10. Uſſer. ſub A. M. 3550. (5) Conf. Nehem. i, ii, & iii. paſſ. See alſo Vol. IX. p. 540, & ſeq. (6) Nehem. i. 1. (7) Connect. part 1 Book 5. ſub an. 458.

Six months after this viſion, the ſame heavenly meſſenger was ſent to an obſcure young virgin, named Mary, who dwelt then at Nazareth, with, and under the guardianſhip of, her eſpouſed huſband Joſeph, both of them of the houſe and lineage of own language, we ſhall refer the readers to it for the further clearing of this noble prophecy.

In the concluſion the prophet is told, that after the cutting off of the Meſſiah, the temple and city ſhall be deſtroyed by a ſtrange nation, that ſhall come like an inundation againſt it, and that the deſolation of the land ſhall be preceded by an overflowing of abominations; all which ſufficiently prefigures the Roman eagles ſet up in the temple, prophetically alſo alluded to by Chriſt himſelf (8), followed by the prophanation, plundering, and firing of that holy place. In the middle of the week, the ſacrifices, oblations, &c. were to ceaſe, not actually, for they did not do ſo till the deſtruction of the city, about forty years after; but they loſt their efficacy, and became uſeleſs and inſignificant after the grand ſacrifice of the Saviour of the world, which they were to prefigure, and from which alone they received their efficacy. Laſtly, thoſe who had thus rejected and put to death the Meſſiah, were to ceaſe to be a people, be diſperſed, deſolate, &c. all which the Jews have ſufficiently felt to their coſt.

The deſtruction and laſting deſolation of the city, but more particularly of the temple, was indeed to be the finiſhing ſtroke of the chriſtian evidence againſt the Jews. We have ſhewn in a former volume †, how theſe evade the pregnant prophecies of Jacob, that the ſceptre ſhould not depart from Judah, &c. (9), and the reader has now ſeen what wretched ſhifts they make to elude this of Daniel's week, at the expence of ſenſe and chronology. There ſeemed therefore ſtill wanting a more irrefragable proof, if not to convince, at leaſt to ſilence, that infatuated nation, with reſpect to this important article of the Meſſiah's being come at the appointed time, and of the vanity of thoſe that ſtill expect him; and this was the prophecy of his coming during the ſtanding of the ſecond temple. and rendering it more glorious by his preſence than that of Solomon, notwithſtanding its great diſparity in other reſpects, concerning which the reader may look back to what has been ſaid at the beginning of this chapter *. When therefore this temple was deſtroyed, it ought to have convinced them that he was really come, as his apoſtles and diſciples affirmed, though there had been a new one immediately built; how much more when all attempts for the rebuilding it have been hitherto fruſtrated? But of this we ſhall have a proper occaſion to ſpeak more fully in the ſequel.

We beg leave here only to obſerve further, that if the total de-

(8) Matth. xxiv. 15, & alib. † Vol. II. p. 441, G (9) Geneſis xlix. 10. * See Vol. IX p. 506, & K.

ſtruction of David [P] (Q), with the glad tidings, that she was chosen, by the special favour of heaven, to be the happy mother of the struction of the city and temple, and the dispersion of the Jews, did not immediately follow the crucifixion of the Messiah, they became obnoxious to it from that time; and God seems only to have protracted the sentence during those forty years, to give them time to repent of that atrocious fact, which, as St. Peter observes (10), they had committed through ignorance. Accordingly we find, that vast numbers of them prevented it by a timely conversion (11), whilst the more obdurate sort, refusing to acknowledge that crime (12), and embrace the proffered mercy, were thereupon dispersed throughout the world, to be, against their will, a standing evidence of the truth of the scriptures and prophecies, and of their own judicial blindness and punishment.

[P] MATTH. i. 18. LUKE i. 26, & seq. iii. 23, & seq.

(Q) We have taken notice in a former volume, that the Jews had a law which expressly forbad heiresses to marry out of their own tribes (13). It is true, the virgin Mary seems to have been far enough from being one of that sort, at least in possession, whatever she might be in reversion, or by virtue of the jubilee laws, according to which all lands and inheritances were to revolve to the original owner, or his next heir or heiress †. But there was still a much greater tie, which kept the virgins of the tribe of Judah, but especially those of the house of David, from marrying into another tribe or family, namely, the sure expectation they had, that the Messiah was to be of that lineage, and to be born in Bethlehem, the city and patrimony of that monarch; and how careful every family was to preserve their genealogy, needs not be repeated.

It is therefore in vain, that the Jews exclaim against the uncertainty of Christ's being of the seed of David, because Joseph's and not Mary's genealogy is deduced from him by the two evangelists, who is yet affirmed by them to have had no share in his conception. The certainty of the virgin's descent from that house is rendered evident enough by what we observed above, especially if we add the testimony of the evangelists themselves, who call her miraculous child the son or descendant of David. If it be asked, why they chose rather to give us that of her husband? it may be answered, that they conformed in it to the custom of the Hebrews, and even of the sacred writers, who deduce their genealogies from the male rather than the female line; for if Christ the son of Mary was the son or descendant of David, it must follow that his mother must be so too.

(10) Acts iii. 17. (11) Ibid. ii. 38, & seq. iii. pass. (12) Ibid. v. 28. (13) De hæreditatibus Numb. xxxvi. pass. & Vol. III. p. 20. † De hæreditatibus ibid. p. 191, & seq. & 200.

But

the promiſed ſaviour of the world, to whom ſhe ſhould therefore give the ſignificant name of Jeſus or Saviour, according to

But the greater difficulty is, to reconcile the variations of the two genealogies of St. Mathew and St. Luke, and we much queſtion whether the greater part of our readers would care to have all repeated that has been ſaid on that ſubject, tho' in ever ſo ſuccinct an epitome, eſpecially conſidering that the point has not been ſo ſufficiently cleared hitherto, as to leave no room for freſh cavils and objections. Yet that our ſilence might not be interpreted for a giving up of the cauſe, we ſhall ſubjoin a few obſervations we have been able to make, ſome of which, tho' intirely new, may yet furniſh the curious inquirers into theſe abſtruſe matters, with a better key to reconcile thoſe two genealogies, if not to clear and confirm the one by the help of the other, than they have as yet met with; and as we deſign the following remarks chiefly for ſuch of our ſtudious readers, we ſhall content ourſelves with giving them as hints for them to exert their talents upon, without confining ourſelves ſo much to method, as we do in other notes.

Firſt, then, we beg leave to obſerve, that the titles of father and ſon, as well as the terms to beget and be begotten, in the language of ſcripture, do not always imply an immediate, but frequently a remote ſucceſſion. Hence the phraſe often uſed by Moſes, when thou ſhalt hereafter beget children and childrens children (14) and the name of father or ſon given to a predeceſſor or ſucceſſor at the diſtance of two, three, or more generations, as will more fully appear by the ſequel. This being premiſed will ſerve as a baſis to the following remarks on the ſubject of thoſe two goſpel genealogies.

1ſt, St. Matthew gives one genealogy, and St. Luke another, and both in ſome names vary from the Old Teſtament.

2dly, St. Matthew, who begins his from Abraham, divides it into forty two ſucceſſions, called by him generations; that is, fourteen before fourteen under fourteen after } the regal government.

3dly, The firſt fourteen are the ſame with thoſe in the Old Teſtament, and in St. Luke.

4thly, The next fourteen in St. Matthew contain the legal ſucceſſion of the line of Solomon, untill its extinction in Jechoniah, al. Coniah and Jehoiachim (15) when the line of Nathan, the ſon of David and brother of Solomon, took place.

5thly, The inheritance in the Jewiſh polity being unalienable farther than the jubilee, as was before hinted, and then revolving to the next ſurviving heir, the latter, tho' at ſome diſtance from the former, was called the ſon, that is, properly the ſucceſſor of the former. Thus Salathiel, who by St. Luke's genealogy appears

(14) Deut. paſſ. (15) Conf. Jerem. xxii. 24. ad fin. 2 Kings xxiv. 8. & ſeq. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, & ſeq.

to

to the prophecies long ſince written of him. Thoſe that relate to this particular head, are as follow: Behold a virgin ſhall to have been the deſcendant of Nathan the ſon of David, is by St. Matthew ſaid to be begotten by Jechoniah (16), the laſt of the Solomonic line, becauſe he was the next ſurviving heir of the houſe of David after Jechoniah's death. Had not therefore Solomon's line been ſet down, and the end thereof noted, it could not have appeared from St. Luke, how Salathiel came by his title of ſucceſſion; for the line of Nathan could not have any claim to it, whilſt that of Solomon ſubſiſted, unleſs in an uncertain reverſion; and this will account for the difference between St Luke and St. Matthew, in theſe middle fourteen generations.

6thly, But there is likewiſe in this latter ſucceſſion a manifeſt variation as to the number from the books of the Old Teſtament. It has indeed been ſolved by ſaying that the evangeliſt aiming only at the three round numbers of fourteen generations abovementioned, had overlooked or purpoſely paſt by ſome of the redundant ones; and this anſwer has hitherto paſt for current.

But the difference ſeems to ariſe from ſomething more material, than the bare aim at an equality of numbers. The hiſtorical books ſet down all the kings in general that had reigned from David to Jechoniah; but St. Matthew, as a genealogiſt, ſeems to take notice only of thoſe who had a legal title, and to omit the others. Of this latter ſort we take Ahaziah the ſon of Jehoram by Athaliah to have been, who is ſaid to have been made king by the inhabitants of Jeruſalem upon his father's death, becauſe his elder brother had been killed by Philiſtines (17), which ſeems to intimate, that they had choſen him in lieu of ſome infant ſon of his deceaſed brother. For had not this been the caſe, he would have ſucceeded of courſe without the people's choice. In the ſame claſs we may put Joaſh, who ſucceeded his father Ahaziah, and Amaziah the ſon of Joaſh, all who might ſucceed each other in prejudice of the elder branch, till this being extinct, made way for the younger in Uſiah or Oſias, the ſon of Amaziah, who is therefore called by the evangeliſt, the ſon (18), that is, as we have hinted above, the ſucceſſor of Jehoram, though at the diſtance of three generations above-mentioned.

Thus again Zedekiah, who was ſet up by the king of Babylon, in prejudice of his elder brother Jechoniah, is likewiſe omitted by the evangeliſt. Now when theſe irregular ſucceſſions are taken away, there will remain but the ſame fourteen which are mentioned in his genealogy.

7thly, The next variation between the two evangeliſts is in the laſt fourteen generations, and ariſes from the one's conſtant

(16) Conf. Luke iii. 27, ad 31, & Matth. i. 12. (17) Vid. 2 Chron. xxii. 1. & 2 Kings viii. 24, & ſeq. (18) Matth. ubi ſupra, ver. 8.

care

ſhall conceive, and bear a ſon, and ſhall call his name Emanuel, &c.

care of pointing out the paſſing of the inheritance as far as it goes in the elder branch. They both agree as far as Zerubbabel, after which St. Matthew goes on with Abiud and his heirs, down to Eleazar, where the line of Abiud ends; and then hefets down as his ſon and ſucceſſor Matthan (19), who is by St. Luke mentioned under the name of Matthat, and was of the line of Rheſa (20) the ſon of Zerubbabel. So that he entered into the regular ſucceſſion after the extinction of that of Abiud.

Thus again Matthat or Matthan dying childleſs, Eli was obliged, according to the Moſaic law, to take his wife, and raiſe up ſeed to him, and by him begot Joſeph the huſband of Mary, who, according to the ſame law, was ſtill reputed as the ſon of the dead elder brother. For this reaſon St Matthew rightly calls him the ſon of Jacob; whereas St. Luke, who did not proceed on the ſame method, calls him the ſon of Eli. The firſt gives us the name of his legal, the other of his natural father.

St Matthew might in all probability have fetched his genealogy from the records of Bethlehem, the patrimony of David, and wherein therefore none were entered, but ſuch as by a regular lineal deſcent were in actual poſſeſſion of it, and where the younger branch, though in actual poſſeſſion of the crown, could not be regularly inrolled, as long as there was any heir of the elder left alive, or till ſuch a time as this latter failed. St. Luke, on the other hand, who, as he tells us in the preface to his goſpel, propoſed to ſupply ſuch defects as he found in thoſe who had writ the hiſtory of Jeſus Chriſt before him, fearing leſt theſe omiſſions ſhould cauſe ſome confuſion, for want of pointing out when the younger ſucceeded the elder branch, had recourſe to the book of chronicles, where the ſeries of the ſucceſſions, both regular and irregular, legal and illegal, are exhibited. So that both had their genealogies from the moſt authentic, though different, records, and ſcrupulouſly adhered each to his own, according to the ſcheme they had in view, and conſequently, inſtead of claſhing, do more probably clear and confirm each other.

There is ſtill one difficulty left with reſpect to St Luke's genealogy, viz. his introducing of Cainan in the line of Shem, adding thereto one generation, contrary to the Hebrew text in Geneſis and the Chronicles, and all the verſions of it, except the ſeptuagint, contrary to the concurring teſtimony of Joſephus, Philo, and other Jewiſh doctors, as well as to that of the antient fathers; all who not only omit Cainan's name, but reckon only ten generations from Noah to Abraham, whereas with this there would be eleven.

This difference has given commentators more pains to reconcile than we think it deſerved, conſidering the likelihood there is of it

(19) Ubi ſupra, ver. 15. (20) Ubi ſupra, ver. 27.

&c. [q] (R). ----- Unto us a child is born; unto us a ſon is given; and the government ſhall be upon his ſhoulder; and his

[q] ISAIAH vii. 14.

having been jumbled into St. Luke's text by the careleſſneſs of the tranſcribers, there being another Cainan mentioned in the verſe immediately following, which might be alſo, according to the old cloſe way of writing, in the very next line. But allowing it to have been originally in St Luke, it is plain, he muſt have had it out of the ſeptuagint, which verſion both he and the other ſacred writers his cotemporaries uſed, and the copy which he then had might have been corrupted after the ſame careleſs manner; for it doth not appear that all the copies of that verſion had this name, elſe it would be found in all the Latin verſions of it, as well as in Joſephus, Philo, and the fathers; and then they muſt have reckoned eleven inſtead of ten generations.

The ſame may be ſaid even on the ſuppoſition, that it was originally put in by the ſeventy interpreters; for as neither they, nor the tranſcribers of the Hebrew copy, which they took with them into Egypt, were infallible (at leaſt we think we have made it appear they were not, when we ſpoke of their verſion) how eaſily might that word have crept into the text by their inadvertency!

But if all this will not ſatisfy the ſcrupulous, what we have obſerved above of the diſtinction of natural and legal parents, will eaſily remove the difficulty; ſo that Arphaxad might be the natural father of Sala, and the legal one of Cainan, or vice verſâ There is therefore no need of having recourſe, as ſome have done, to injurious ſuppoſitions againſt the Jews, as if they had purpoſely ſcratched out the name of Cainan in their Hebrew copies, that they might take occaſion to cry down the ſeptuagint verſion; much leſs to other more violent means, to account for ſo ſmall a variation, which, for ought appears to the contrary, was occaſioned by the mere overſight of a tranſcriber, and the more probably, of St. Luke's own copy, than of either original or Greek verſion

(R) This prophecy has been very much canvaſſed of late by our modern ſceptics, and as learnedly anſwered by ſeveral eminent hands. Thoſe diſputes are ſo recent, that we need not refer our readers to the authors who have wrote on either ſide. As for the difficulty that is raiſed, how the prophecy of a child thus miraculouſly born, could be a ſatisfaction to Ahaz, to whom it was addreſſed, unleſs it was fulfilled in his time, we have anſwered it in a former volume, to which the reader may, if he pleaſes, have recourſe †.

† Vol IV. p. 70, & (K).

name ſhall be called Wonderful, Counſellor, the mighty God, the everlaſting Father, the Prince of Peace[r] (S); with ſome others of the ſame nature, which are not quite ſo manifeſt, [r] Ibid. ix. 6.

(S) Our readers may perhaps be willing to know what anſwer or evaſion the Jews make uſe of againſt ſuch pregnant prophecies; and it will not be amiſs here to give them a ſpecimen of them out of one of their ſubtileſt and boldeſt champions (z1), by which he may gueſs at the reſt.

Firſt then, to the former of theſe prophecies, where the miraculous child is called Jeſus or Saviour, becauſe he was to ſave his people from their ſins, they in general, and this in particular, anſwer to this effect: Who has told you that the ſin of Adam has intailed any guilt on his poſterity? Was not that of his ſon Cain, who murdered his brother, a thouſand times greater than the biting of an apple? and yet no ſuch thing is ſaid of his poſterity being tainted with it. Beſides, where is there any mention made that the Meſſiah was to ſave his people from their ſins? and if there was, how did Jeſus ſave us from them, when you own he made us commit one infinitely heavier in crucifying him? In vain do you tell us of a redeemer of ſouls, we expect none but a redeemer of bodies, a Meſſiah that ſhall deliver us from ſlavery, and make us again a flouriſhing victorious nation and kingdom.

To the ſecond prophecy, the ſarcaſtic author above quoted gives the following anſwer in a kind of triumphing tone. We will join iſſue with you, tho' according to your interpretation, it ſhould have been written his names inſtead of his name ſhall be called) but waving that, how can his (Jeſus's) name be called wonderful, Counſellor? Did not Judas rather defeat his counſel, when he betrayed him unknown to him? He could not be the gibbor, or mighty one, ſeeing he was put to death: He could not be the Abbi, the everlaſting father, or father of eternity, becauſe he was cut off in the midſt of his days Laſtly, he could not be called the prince of peace, becauſe he enjoyed none himſelf, neither have wars ever ceaſed ſince his time; yea, himſelf ſays, that he did not come to bring peace, but war upon earth.

Others endeavour to elude the force of the prophecy, by pretending that the impersonal ויקרא vajicra, he ſhall call, refers to God; and conſequently that all thoſe titles there mentioned refer to him, and not to the child there ſpoken of. But this evaſion is ſo ungrammatical and contrary to the plain import, in a vaſt number of parallel places, that others of them have diſowned it.

(z1) Auctor. libr Nitzahon vid. Munſter. in loc. & not. in verſ. Hebr. Evang. S. Matth. c. i.

nor nor ſo univerſally agreed on (T). But the ſurpriſed virgin was ſo far from calling to mind thoſe prophecies, that ſhe looked on her virginity, which it is moſt likely ſhe had reſolved to preſerve under the guardianſhip of an aged religious huſband, as an obſtacle to the accompliſhment of the angel's word, till, aſſured at length by him of the miraculous conception of that divine child, with an humble confidence ſhe wholly ſubmitted herſelf to the will of heaven. The angel having at the ſame time acquainted her with the pregnancy of her couſin Elizabeth in her old age, ſhe went up into the mountainous country to congratulate her and her huſband upon it. At the firſt embracing of theſe three holy perſons, whoſe ecſtatic joy can only be gueſſed from the pathetic account which the evangeliſt has left us of it [f]; Elizabeth, who was far advanced in her pregnancy, felt her child give a leap in her womb, from which ſhe began to conceive a higher notion of her viſitor, and which ſhe expreſſed in terms of the [f] LUKE i. 43, & ſeq.

(T) Of this kind is that of Jeremiah (22); The Lord will create a new thing upon the earth, a female (or woman ſhall incompaſs a man; which the context plainly ſhews to allude to the days of the Meſſiah, and moſt probably, from the natural ſenſe of the words, to the miraculous pregnancy of this virgin. However, the Jews not only take them in a very different ſenſe, but exclaim againſt us for urging this text to them.

Eſpecially the Jewiſh author above quoted, who here, as everywhere elſe, rather expoſes his inveterate rancour againſt the Chriſtians, than his ſkill in the prophetic writings. It would doubtleſs offend our reader's ears, to tell him what a filthy word this vile wretch has found for the bleſſed mother of Chriſt, by the alteration of the firſt letter of her name, or the blaſphemies which moſt of their other writers vent againſt him and his religion. It ſhall ſuffice to have given this hint of it once for all. We ſhall ſpare them for the future, ſince their diſtorting the obvious ſenſe of the ſacred writings, whilſt they acknowledge the divine authority of them, doth but the more evince the truth of the one, and the invincible obſtinacy of the other.

Another text hitherto miſunderſtood and worſe tranſlated, and which we think to be prophetical of the birth of Chriſt of a virgin, is that of the Proverbs, chap. xxx. verſe 19 The way of the man, not with the maid, as our verſion renders it, but in the virgin; but this we have had occaſion to explain in a former volume, to which we refer the reader *.

(22) Cap. xxxi. 22. * Vol III p. 325, (P).

deepeſt reſpect and gratitude. Mary, on her part, being filled with rapturous joy at what ſhe had heard, teſtified her humble ſenſe for all the divine favours ſhe ſaw herſelf bleſt with, in that moſt heavenly canticle, which the ſame evangeliſt has preſerved to us; and, after three months abode, returned to her homely habitation at Nazareth. During her ſtay there, Elizabeth being delivered of the promiſed ſon, gave him the name of John (U), as his father had been commanded by the angel; and Zacharias, having teſtified his conſent to it in writing, found his tongue immediately looſed, and his heart filled with the Holy Ghoſt; and broke out into an euchariſtic and prophetic hymn, which inſpired the wondering byſtanders with ſingular hopes concerning this new-born child [t].

The Trachonitiſh robbers ſuppreſſed.

DURING this time, that part of Judæa, which is called Trachonitis (W), and which was very rocky and mountainous, had been the receptacle of a great number of banditti and free-booters, who, as we have already hinted, lived chiefly upon the plunder which they got by their conſtant excurſions, ſometimes towards Judæa, ſometimes towards Arabia. What was ſtill worſe, they infeſted the roads that led from the Babyloniſh territories to Jeruſalem, and hindered the concourſe of the Jews of thoſe quarters to the annual feaſts. Herod, who had already been at a vaſt deal of pains to ferret them out of their dens and lurking-holes, bethought himſelf at length of a way of ſuppreſſing them effectually. He began with enlarging and fortifying a village, which was conveniently ſituated in the heart of the country, and became

[t] Ibid. v. 67 ad fin.

(U) In the Hebrew יוחנן jochanan, a name very expreſſive of that gracious diſpenſation, which heaven was going to diſplay by the goſpel, of which this child was appointed the harbinger.

(W) This region, which had Arabia Deſerta on the eaſt, Batanea on the weſt, the land of Damaſcus on the north, and Iturea on the ſouth, ſeems to have had its name from two famous mountains, which an antient geographer calls Trachones (23). The greateſt part indeed of it, according to Joſephus, who places it between Paleſtine and Cœle Syria, had ſuch ridges of rocks and mountains, eſpecially on the ſides of Arabia and Iturea, that ſome of them had caverns large enough to lodge a thouſand men (24).

(23) Strab Geogr. l. xvi (24) Vid Joſeph ubi ſupra, l. c. 7. Euſeb. in loc jab voc. Hanath. Hieron loc. Hebr.

in

in time a conſiderable town. Hither he invited a certain Jewiſh captain, named Zamaris, who was gone at the head of five hundred well-armed men to ſettle in a caſtle in the neighbourhood of Antioch; and gave him and his men ſo many encouragements and immunities, that they came and fixed their abode there, and ſoon cleared all that country of that plundering vermin [w]. Zamaris, who was both valiant and religious, did not only ſignalize himſelf in this province, but left a noble off-ſpring like himſelf, whoſe very names were ſufficient to deter the reſt of that gang from ſettling there any more.

Chriſt the ſaviour of the world born.

THE virgin Mary, who was returned, from her viſit to Zacharias, to Nazareth the place of her abode, began now to give ſuch ſigns of her pregnancy, as made her aged ſpouſe, who had wholly abſtained from matrimonial converſe with her, to conceive ſome ſtrong ſuſpicion of her incontinency. He was thereupon contriving ſome means to give her a private divorce, without expoſing her to the rigour of the law; when he was appriſed by an angel, that her conception was altogether miraculous, and that he ought not to heſitate one moment to take her and her child under his patronage, ſince that miraculous ſon was appointed by heaven to be the ſaviour of his people. Joſeph immediately obeyed, and took her to his home, but lived in perfect continence with her till the time of her delivery [w], if not of his death (X). In the mean time, [u] Antiq l. xvii. c. 2. [w] MATT. i. 18, & ſeq.

(X) This laſt is the moſt received opinion, and it is certain that the particle till, eſpecially according to the genius of the Hebrew tongue, doth not always imply the duration of a thing to ſuch a time, but often carries a continuation unto the end; otherwiſe Chriſt would have his ſeſſion at the right hand of God no longer than till his enemies were made his foot ſtool (25). Timothy would have been obliged, according to St Paul's exhortation (26), to have vacated to the ſcriptures and other epiſcopal duties, no longer than till the coming of that apoſtle to him; and Jacob would have been no longer intitled to the divine protection, than till God had performed the promiſe of bringing him ſafe to his own home again (27). The reader may ſee many more inſtances of the like nature in the famous concordance of indeclinables printed by Froben (28).

(25) Pſalm. cx 1. (26 1 Timoth iv. 13. (27) Genes. xxviii. 15. (28) Sub voc. Donec.

time, Bethlehem, the city of David, and not the obscure city of Nazareth, being the place pointed at by the prophet for the birth of the Messiah *, the divine wisdom so ordered it, that the decree of Augustus for taking a fresh survey of the Roman empire, and the number and estimate of all persons, estates, riches, &c. (Y) should reach Judæa about this Augustus's decree.

* Mic v. 2.

If it be objected, why Joseph, who is by St. Matthew called a righteous man, should scruple to expose his wife to the rigour of the Mosaic law, which condemns all such to death; it is answered, that the word righteous is here used by the evangelist in opposition to one of a severe and rigorous disposition, and rather means a charitable person, who, though he abhors the crime, yet thinks there is a debt of mercy and compassion due to the offender; and who could have a greater claim to it, than a young and unexperienced virgin?

(Y) When this way of surveying came in vogue in the Roman empire, how, and by whom, it was performed, shall be shewn in the Roman history We need only take notice, that Augustus called three of these to be made in his time, of which this was the second; it had been began somewhat above seven years before the vulgar or christian æra, that is, above three years before the birth of Christ; and it might be well all that time going through the provinces of Cœle Syria, Phœnice, and part of Judæa, before it came to Bethlehem (29), since that which had been made by David, of the single province of Judæa, (though it doth not appear that the commissioners were to take an estimate of the estates, but only the number of fighting men) had taken up three whole years, though they were recalled before they had gone through with it (30).

It may not be amiss to observe further concerning this decree of Augustus, that there is a kind of dissonance between St Luke and Josephus, the former calling it a decree for taxing the empire, and the other affirming, that no tax was paid in Judæa during Herod and his son Archelaus's reign, and that it did not begin till the deposition of the latter, when that province was put under a Roman governor or president. This was not till twelve years after, when Cyrenius, as he is called by the Greeks and the evangelists, or, in the Roman style, Pub. Sulp. Quirinius, was sent president of Syria (31)

The difference is easily reconciled; the decree issued out by Augustus was in order to have the empire taxed according to the estimate

(29) Conf. Sueton in Octavio, & Luc. ii 1, & seq. (30) 2 Sam xxiv 1, & seq. See also Vol. III. p. 543, & not R. (31) Antiq l xviii. c. 1.

this time, which obliged the pregnant virgin and her huſband to repair thither, to be inrolled with all thoſe that were of the houſe and lineage of David. The great concourſe of people coming to that place, put this poor little family under two inconveniencies, viz. a long ſtay, and the want of a lodging and proper entertainment; yet was this alſo conducted by a ſpecial providence, that he, who was to be the pattern of humility, ſhould begin and end his race in the ſame low and dejected path. Accordingly when the pregnant virgin found herſelf near the time of her delivery, ſhe was forced to take up with the mean accommodation of a ſtable, where having brought forth her god-like ſon, ſhe wrapped him up in ſwaddling-cloaths, and, for want of a better, made the poor manger ſerve him for a cradle.

Chriſt's birth proclaimed by angels.

BUT this humble riſing of the ſun of righteouſneſs did ſoon break out into its peculiar luſtre, when an angel, at the head of an heavenly hoſt, proclaimed his wondrous birth to the watching ſhepherds, and celebrated it with that noble hymn, Glory be to God on high, on earth peace, good will towards men; and here began the firſt part of the character of that divine child, hinted above out of the prophet, to be diſplayed, And he ſhall be called Wonderful; wonderfully conceived, wonderfully born, and as wonderfully manifeſted. Accordingly the angel, having declared to the ſhepherds, that on that day was born in the city of David a Saviour, which is Chriſt the Lord, gives them theſe wonderful ſigns to diſcover him by: Ye ſhall find the babe wrapped up in ſwaddling cloaths, and lying in a manger [y]; and the ſhepherds going to the place, and finding all things as had been told to them, became themſelves the publiſhers of the joyful news, and began to fill the neighbourhood with hopes of their long-expected and now aſſured deliverance. The child's parents, according to the Moſaic law, circumciſed him on the eighth day, and gave him the name of Jeſus, as they had been directed by the angel [z] (Z).

ANOTHER

[y] LUKE ii. 8, & 12. [z] Ibid. ver. 21. MATTH. i. 21.

mate made by this ſurvey. Judæa, though then ſubject to Rome, was excepted by the favour of the emperor, till the depoſition of Archelaus, when it began to take place there under that new preſident. This ſenſe, which ſeems the obvious one of the evangeliſt, doth in no way really cloth with the Jewiſh hiſtorian (32).

(Z) This wonderful advent of the Saviour of the world happened, according to the beſt computation we have, that of our

(32) De hoc vid Uſſer. Prid Calmet & al

moſt

The temple of Janus ſhut.

ANOTHER remarkable occurrence, and very proper to uſher in both this character of Wonderful, as well as the other moſt excellent Uſher, in the four thouſand year of the world; and falls in exactly with an old tradition of the Jews mentioned in a former vo ume, that the world ſhould laſt two thouſand years before the law, two thouſand under the law, and two thouſand under the Meſſiah, according to the ſix days of the Moſaic creation; after which was to follow the ſeventh, or millennium †.

Accordingly we find that there was, about this time, an univerſal expectation of him among all the Jews, and even among the Heathens, who might have it probably from them; the ſacred books having by this time been a conſiderable while tranſlated into Greek, as we have ſeen in a former ſection. Neither is it improbab e, they might ſtill retain a kind of traditionary notion of him from the prophecy of Balaam, concerning the wonderful ſtar that was to riſe out of Jacob (33); and this may be the reaſon why theſe ſo readily embraced chriſtianity, whilſt the Jews, blinded with prejudice, and ſoothed into the hopes of a conquering deliverer, rejected both him aud his doctrine. But of this hereafter.

We have ſeen a little h'gher, how the Jews evade thoſe prophecies, which fixed the coming of Chriſt to this time by ſeveral manifeſt indices; and need we wonder they ſhould do the ſame thing by this tradition? Their common ſalvo, that the ſins of the nation have retarded his coming, is a plain acknowledgment, that they look upon the time as long ſince expired, though they will hardly own it in ſo many words. But here they go from a received notion of their doctors, that though God may protract, or even remit the evils he denounces againſt men, as he did in the caſe of the Ninevites, yet he never doth ſo with his promiſes, but punctually performs them in due time According to which notion they uſed to try a true from a falſe prophet; that is, they did not condemn him, if his threatning did not come to paſs, but only when his promiſes failed.

This notion of the Meſſiah's coming being retarded on account of the ſins of the nation, is indeed the natural offſpring of a much greater error; their expecting him to have appeared in the pomp and grandeur of a conquering and victorious monarch, who was to free them from the Roman yoke, and bring this and all other nations under that of the Jews; for this is the ſenſe they put on all thoſe prophecies which ſet forth the glories of his kingdom; and theſe being the chief bleſſings they expected from him, and on which they ſet the higheſt value, what more likely cauſe could be aſſigned for his delay than that of their ſins?

† Vol. III. p. 193. (33) Numb. xxiv. 17.

But

ther of Prince of Peace, was, that the temple of Janus was then ſhut, which was never done, but when the empire enjoyed a profound peace [t], as it did at this time, and continued to do twelve whole years (A). But the moſt ſignal manifeſtation of this new-born Saviour, and which put the whole city of Jeruſalem into an uproar, was the arrival of the Magi, or Wiſe-men from the eaſt (B), to that metropolis, under

[t] See the authors quoted under the following note.

But could they have opened their eyes to the oppoſite part of his character, which is there as plainly and expreſsly foretold, and in the very ſame chapter of the ſame prophet (34), namely, that of his humiliation and ſufferings, of his being rejected, reproached, blaſphemed, and perſecuted, even to death; they muſt have concluded, that nothing leſs than their ſins could be the cauſe of his coming being ſo long ſuſpended. On the contrary, they would have ſeen, that ſince a perſon of his glorious, beneficent, and irreproachable character was to be ſo cruelly treated, ſo unjuſtly and ſo inhumanly butchered by his own people, no time could be fitter for his coming, than when their nation was come up to the height of ingratitude and injuſtice, of infatuation and inhumanity, as it really was, when thoſe prophecies were fulfilled in him.

(A) This was the fifth time of its being ſhut ſince the foundation of Rome; the firſt time was under Numa; the ſecond at the end of the Punic war; the third under Cæſar Auguſtus, after the defeat of Marc Antony and death of Cleopatra, twenty nine years before the birth of Chriſt; the fourth four years after, or twenty five years before Chriſt, on the reduction of the Cantiberians or Cantabrians in Spain; and the fifth at this time of our Saviour's birth and under the ſame emperor (35).

(B) It would doubtleſs prove an inquiry worth making, could we come at any tolerable certainty concerning theſe wiſe men, who they were? what part of the world they came from? what time of the year they arrived at Jeruſalem? how many they were? and many more ſuch queſtions, which have been ſtarted to little purpoſe, and to which no ſatisfactory light can be given. However, to ſpare our curious readers the trouble of conſulting the various accounts that have been given of them, we ſhall here ſubjoin the moſt that can be found concerning them.

1ſt, It is generally agreed, that they were of the ſect of the Mages, of whom we have given an account in a former volume †, persons wholly addicted to the study of philosophy, astronomy, and divination; and are supposed by some to have been the disciples or descendants of Balaam, whom we have mentioned a little higher, on account of his notable prophecy of the Messiah. This will not appear improbable, if we consider, that both they and their supposed master are said to have come from the east (36). Now the latter is said to have been sent for from the city of Pethor (37), which is there affirmed to have been situate on the banks of the river of the land of the children of his people, or, as the targum of Onkelos renders the place, on the river Euphrates, and elsewhere is said by Moses to have been a city of Mesopotamia (38). So that this country of Arabia Deserta seems most probably to be the place they came from; for they generally bear the name of eastern in the sacred writings. Another antient author, whom we shall have occasion to mention under the next note, tells us, that they were Chaldeans by birth, and by profession great astronomers; and that it was by the help of this art that they understood what this new risen star pre signified, which made them take their journey into Judæa, where the new Jewish king was born. Now Chaldea, properly so called, being situate along the river Euphrates, was still nearer Judæa than the other two above-mentioned.

(34) Iſaiah liii. paſſ vid. & Pſ. xxii. paſſ & alib. plur.
(35) De his vid Plutarch in Numa. Liv. lib. i. Flor. lib. ii. Dio Caſſ. l ii. & al. Oroſ. l. vi, c 20, & ſeq. † Vol. IV. p. 501, & ſeq. & V. p. 115. & not. R.

This will also give us some light into another question concerning them, viz. How long they were in coming from their country to Jerusalem? for if they came from the latter, they might easily reach it on their camels or dromedaries, the usual, but expeditious, carriage of those parts, in and about a fourteenth night; and if from the former, through the latter, one week or ten days more might suffice. For upon the supposition above mentioned, of their coming from Mesopotamia and the banks of the Euphrates, the greatest distance from that river to Jerusalem will not much exceed six hundred miles. What further seems to confirm this conjecture is, the prophecy of the kings of Sheba and Saba, or Arabia, bringing their gifts to the king Messiah. For of him is this psalm (29) allowed by Jews and Christians to have been writ.

Some ancient authors indeed, who have fetched them from the remotest parts of Persia, have allowed them a two years travel, and found their supposition on the inquiry which Herod made of the exact time of the star's appearing to them, and his destroying all the male infants from two years and under (30); but what quite overturns this conjecture, and proves that they must have been at Bethlehem within less than forty days after his birth, is, that this was the place where they found him; whereas after his parents had presented him to the Lord at Jerusalem, which was to be done at the end of forty days, they are ſaid to have gone and dwelt at Nazareth, their uſual habitation (31).

(36) Conf. Numb. xxiii. 7. & Matth. ii. 1. (37) Numb. xxii. 5 (38) Deut. xxiii. 4. (29) Psalm. lxxii. 10. (30) De his vid. Calmet. Comment. in Matth.

done

Beſides, if they had been two years in coming, the ſtar muſt be alſo ſuppoſed to have appeared to them ſo long before, and to have directed them all that time, which is abſurd, as we ſhall further ſhew under the next note Herod therefore, by ſlaying all the males under two years, might only do it for his greater ſecurity, and from ſome doubt. either that the Magi might not have obſerved the firſt appearance of the ſtar, or that they had purpoſely concealed it from him, out of a forecaſt they had of his bloody deſign againſt the child. We have ſeen already through his hiſtory, that he was never ſparing of the lives of his ſubjects, whenever his jealouſy or reſentment rendered them obnoxious to him.

Neither ſacred nor ancient eccleſiaſtical writers tell us, how many in number, or of what quality, they were; but this has not hindered thoſe more recent fixing theſe and many more minute circumſtances, even as far as their names, age, complexion, dreſs, retinue, and ſuch like. As for their number, the moſt received opinion is, that they were but three, and this notion ſeems founded on the three kinds of preſents they brought with them, as if each of them had preſented a different one. But this is ſaid without foundation. An old apocryphal book has multiplied them to twelve; and adds, that they were choſen from their whole nation, and went every night on the high mountains to watch the appearance of the ſtar (32).

Thoſe that give them the title of kings, found their opinion partly on the text above-quoted out of the pſalmiſt, and partly on a notion, which Tertullian had taken (33), on what ground is hard to gueſs, that all thoſe eaſtern nations were governed by kings choſen out of the ſect of the Mages. To the royal crown the Armenians (34) have added to them that of martyrdom, which they pretend they ſuffered in that country The great conſtable of Armenia, in his letter to the king of France, (St. Lewis) adds, that they came thither from the province of Tangut (35). All this is ſaid on the authority of a tradition they have among them, and not from any authentic records; ſo that we may oppoſe to it that of the city of Cologne, which pretends that they died there in their way home, and ſhews not only their tomb, but their three heads, in the cathedral of that city. Their epitaph, which is in Latin verſe, gives them the names of Gaſpar, Melchiar, and Balthazar.

We ſhall add one tradition more concerning them, which is, it ſeems, as ſtifly believed in ſome parts of the Indies, as the two der the guidance of a miraculous ſtar (C), which ceaſed not to go before them, till it had brought them to the place and perſon laſt are in Armenia and Germany. We have it on the credit of Jerom Oſorius, biſhop of Algarba in Portugal, who aſſures us he had it from perſons of undoubted credit, well verſed in the ancient monuments of thoſe countries, and is to this effect:

(31) Luke 11. 39. (32) Auth. ap. imperf in Math. homil. 2. (33) Cont. Marcion l iii. & lib. cont. Judæos. (34) Vid. Chardin's travels into Perſia, tom. 3. (35) Spicileg. ap Calmet. ubi ſupra.

Chiperimal, king of Cranganor, in the kingdom of Calecut, having undertaken ſome long voyage by way of expiation for an inceſt he had committed, came into Carmania, where he met with two Mages, going into Judæa to pay their homage to a miraculous child newly born of a virgin. The king begged leave to accompany them, and on his return cauſed a ſtately church to be built in honour of the virgin and her ſon, and in which he cauſed her image to be ſet up, holding the child in her arms. We ſhall ſtop here, ſeeing there is no going further in ſearch of them, without danger of being ſtill more bewildered.

However, before we diſmiſs this note, it will be very proper to take notice, once for all, that from the very earlieſt times of chriſtianity, there ſtarted up a number of heretics, who, the better to colour their impious tenets, trumped up divers falſe goſpels and writings, under the names of ſome of the apoſtles or moſt famous diſciples of Chriſt, and ſtuffed them with ſuch variety of miraculous circumſtances and ſtories, as obliged the heads of the church to condemn and explode them, as they juſtly deſerved. But though the books vaniſhed, except their names and ſome few fragments of them, yet the memory of thoſe addititious ſtories and miracles was not ſo eaſily extinguiſhed among the vulgar, who were ignorant of their foul origin; but was propagated by a kind of popular tradition, which was afterwards too indiſcriminatively received by the writers of the fourth, fifth, &c. centuries, eſpecially where they thought it ſerved to clear a text, or ſupplied thoſe circumſtances of men and things, which had been omitted by the ſacred writers.

Thus the various notions about the wiſe men, mentioned above, of the miraculous ſtar, we ſhall ſpeak of in the next note, and many more of the like kind, too groſs to deſerve a place here, ſeem to have flowed from the pſeudo-goſpels of Joſeph the carpenter, of Joſeph of Arimathea, of the infancy of Jeſus, and ſome others, falſely attributed to one or other of the apoſtles; but in time their origin being forgot, they were received as common traditions, and quoted as ſuch by ſome of the latter fathers. So that it would be unjuſt to charge thoſe great and good men, with either forgery, or even with a fondneſs for what we call pious frauds, ſeeing the perſecuted ſtate of the church during ſo many centuries made their miſtake almoſt unavoidable, which was in better times happily diſcovered and rectified.

(C) We have likewiſe a great variety of conjectures concerning this perſon they were in ſearch of. However, as they looked upon him as the king of the Jews, they firſt repaired to the this wonderful ſtar, according as men are inclined either to leſſen or to multiply miracles. Of this ſecond ſort are thoſe who think it to have been a mere comet, only with ſome peculiar luſtre, or ſome other index, well underſtood by the wiſe men (36); and others, who make no more of it than a meteor, vaſtly below the orb of the moon †; though either of theſe can hardly be admitted without the interpoſition of a miracle, ſince the ſuppoſition of an extraordinary luſtre in the former, and the long and regular motion of the latter, contrary to all that we underſtand of meteors, ſeems to have required a ſupernatural hand. Since therefore a miracle muſt be admitted, and it is plain God was never leſs ſparing of them than upon this glorious juncture; others have with greater probability believed it to have been a luminous body created on purpoſe; others, that it was the very light which had appeared to the ſhepherds, which having been ſeen at a diſtance to the wiſe men like a ſtar, came laſtly to appear to thoſe in a more refulgent manner (37). Some think it was an angel in that figure (38); others have run ſtill greater lengths, making it to have been the Holy Ghoſt, appearing in that viſible ſhape, and have attributed ſuch an unuſual brightneſs to it, as even eclipſed the ſun; if ſo, 'tis a wonder no cotemporary authors, either ſacred or profane, ſhould have ſaid ſomething of it.

And this will in a great meaſure explode the notion of thoſe we mentioned in the laſt note, who make the wiſe men to have been two years in coming to Jeruſalem, and the ſtar to have gone all that time before them; ſince its long continuance and irregular motion, with reſpect to other heavenly bodies could not but awaken the attention and wonder of all thoſe countries, in which it muſt have been ſeen. But this difficulty has been removed, by pretending that it appeared either to none but to the Magi, or only two or three times, enough for thoſe who were watchful obſervers of it, but overlooked by all the reſt But this is ſaid without foundation, or even ſhadow of probability; and the queſtion of the Magi at Jeruſalem ſeems much rather to imply, that it had been ſeen at leaſt in all the countries between Judæa and their own.

We will not take upon us to ſay which of all theſe hypotheſes is the moſt probable, ſince the ſacred hiſtorian has left us in the dark, and the reſt of ancient hiſtorians are quite ſilent about it. We ſhall only ſubjoin here what the Platonic philoſopher Chalcidius ſays of it (39):

(36) Orig. Maldon. Grot. Le Clerc in Matt ii. Whiſton, & al. † Calmet, ubi ſupra. (37) Leo Mag. in Matt. Lightfoot, & al. (38) Chryſoſt. Theophylact. & al. (39) Comm. in Timæum Platon. p. 19.

It

Wise men come from the east to Bethlehem.

the metropolis, where he was most likely to be either born or heard of. Upon their first inquiry after him, Herod and the whole city was moved, and the grand sanhedrin, being consulted about the place of his birth, directed them to Bethlehem, the place mentioned by the prophet above quoted. Whatever hopes the rest of the Jews might conceive from this wonderful phænomenon and the tidings of the new-born Messiah, Herod, who dreamt of nothing but of an earthly kingdom, began to look upon that wonderful child as a dangerous rival, and resolved from that instant to nip him in the bud. To this end, he caused the Magi to be privately brought to him, and having carefully sifted them concerning the time of the star's appearance, and other circumstances which might serve his bloody design, he dismissed them with these words; Go and search diligently for the child; and when you have found him, bring me word, that I may go lik-wise and pay my homage to him. They set out accordingly, and were not a little overjoyed, when, upon their leaving Jerusalem, they beheld the same star still going before them, till it stood and shot its rays perpendicular upon the house where the child and his parents were. Here they approached the divine babe with suitable reverence, and having laid open their treasures, they offered him the presents of gold, frankincense, and myrrh (D); and being warned not to go back to Jerusalem, they

It is not easy indeed to guess at the time in which he lived; but that he was a christian, the very passage itself plainly shews: "Let us "now turn our thoughts (says he) to another, and more holy "history, and such a one as is more worthy of our admiration. "I mean that which mentions the appearance of a star, not of the "nature of those which portended either a sickness or mortality, "but which manifested the descent of God upon earth, to dwell "among men, and to bless them with his choicest favours. Some "of the Magi, or wise men of Chaldæa, having observed this "star in the night, and being thoroughly versed in astronomy, "went immediately in search of this new-born God, and having "found him, presented him with gifts suitable to his divine cha-"racter." The reader will find in the next note, what may have been probably the meaning of this last expression.

(D) The piety of some ancient times, when allegory was in greatest vogue, and mysteries were diligently looked for in every part of holy writ, hath led men into such lengths, as it would be dangerous to follow in these days. Particularly in these presents, which the wise men offered the holy Jesus, they have pretended to find out, either his three distinct offices of king, priest, and prophet they returned home by another way [b]. As soon as the child was forty days old, the time prescribed for the purification of women after the birth of a son [c], his parents brought him to Jerusalem to be presented to the Lord in the temple, and to be redeemed according to the law concerning the first-born [d]; with the price of five shekels, or of a lamb, or a pair of doves; or young pigeons; which last was the price appointed for the meaner sort. And into such low condition was the family of David reduced (by this time), and so poor were the parents of the world's inestimable redeemer, that they were fain to redeem him at the lowest price. Here they were met by a venerable old man, named Simeon (E), a person of consummate prophet, or his divinity, royalty, and manhood (40); or, lastly, the divine virtues he was endowed with, and was to communicate to his true followers, viz purity by the myrrh, which is an excellent ingredient to preserve from corruption; incense, the smoke or perfume of which is said to be the prayers of the faithful (41); and charity or beneficence, the most acceptable perfume that can be offered to the deity, and implied in the gold.

[b] MATTH. ii. 1, & seq. [c] LEVIT. xii. 2, & 6. [d] EXOD. xiii. 2. NUMB. xviii. 15. See 219, & (F).

Others, grieving to see their fellow-christians feed their piety with such far-fetched notions, have sought a nearer meaning by running into another extreme, and concluded, that nothing else seems intended by those gifts, than the supplying the present and future indigencies of the child and his parents, who were shortly to be forced to take a long journey into Egypt. So that the gold was to defray their expences, the myrrh to preserve the babe's tender limbs in his travels, and the incense to dispel the common damps and ill smell, either of his stable, or of those caravanzeras or inns, in which they would be obliged to lodge.

But there is a middle way between those extremes, which is, that the Magi offered these presents to this new-born monarch, as they looked on him merely as the future king of the Jews, and without any regard to his divinity, of which it does not sufficiently appear that they were apprised. Only they supposed, by the wonderful phænomena that preceded and accompanied his birth, that he was likely to prove such a glorious monarch, as that his reign would eclipse those of all his ancestors; but whether on account of his greater power, conquests, or for what other reason, it is not likely they could know without a particular revelation.

(E) The shortness of the evangelist's account concerning this ve-

(40) Ambrose in Luke ii. 6. Leo Serm de Epiphan Theoph in Matth. 2. Bern & al mult. (41) De his Vid Baron sub A. C. 1. sect. 40. & Calmet. sub Simeon IV.

ner's

mate piety, and endowed with the ſpirit of prophecy; to whom it had been revealed, that he ſhould not ſee death before he had beheld the promiſed Meſſiah. Being therefore directed by the Holy Ghoſt to the temple at the ſame time, he took the babe in his arms, and having foretold to his mother the ſorrows with which her pious ſoul would in time be pierced, on account of the many blaſphemies and perſecutions which this divine ſon was to be expoſed to; and being now aſſured that nothing could add to his happineſs but the joys of a future life, ſung his own requiem in a ſhort ecſtatic hymn, and reſtored the babe to his parents. His teſtimony was accompanied with that of a venerable old propheteſs, named nerable perſon, has been abundantly ſupplied by the pious and fruitful fancies of later writers, who have each contributed their mite towards the raiſing of his character. He has been by many (42) affirmed to have been a prieſt, and to have been then performing his function in receiving the child in his arms, according to the cuſtom of redeeming the firſt-born. There is indeed nothing can make this incredible or improbable, if we except the ſilence of St. Luke, who, it is not likely, would have over looked his being a prieſt, if he had been really ſuch.

Some have affirmed him to have been the ſame with Simon, ſurnamed The Juſt, diſciple of the famous Hillel, often mentioned in this hiſtory, who was alſo the maſter of that Gamaliel, at whoſe feet St. Paul had been brought up 43), and that whilſt he was endeavouring after an expoſition of the prophecy, quoted a little higher, A virgin ſhall conceive, and bear a ſon, this revelation was made to him, that he ſhould not die before he had ſeen it fulfilled. So that when he came to ſee the miraculous mother and child, he broke out into that divine and prophetic ecſtaſy mentioned by the evangeliſt, and died ſoon after. Epiphanius adds (44), that the noble teſtimony he gave to this new born Saviour did ſo exaſperate the ſtubborn Jews, that they denied him common burial.

Another ſet, which makes him one of the ſeventy interpreters of the Greek verſion mentioned in a former ſection †, tell us, that when he came to tranſlate the prophecy juſt now mentioned, he found his faith ſtagger; but that his doubts were happily diſpelled by this revelation, that he ſhould ſee the accompliſhment of it before he died (45). So that at that rate he muſt have lived to a good old age, ſince at the loweſt that verſion was made above two hundred years before Chriſt, and thoſe interpreters were ſcarcely choſen out of the youngeſt tribe.

(42) Allat. Diſſert. de Script. Simeon ſub. init. (43) Acts xxii. 3. (44) De vit. & mort. prophet. † Vid. Vol. IX. p. 576, & note. (45) De his vid. Allat. ubi ſupra.

Anna,

Anna, who had dedicated the remainder of her life from her widowhood to the ſervice of God and of his temple; and coming at that inſtant to the place, began likewiſe from thenceforth to publiſh this new-born Saviour to all the faithful Iſraelites [e].

WHAT bloody expedient the jealous Herod pitched upon to fruſtrate all theſe predictions, by ridding himſelf of this ſo dreadful child, and how he was diſappointed in it by a peculiar providence, will be ſeen in the next ſection; and we ſhall cloſe this, according to our promiſe, with a ſhort view of the ſects at this time reigning in Judæa, that the reader may ſee how it came to paſs, that a Meſſiah, ſo plainly and frequently foretold from the beginning, ſo miraculouſly conceived and born, proclaimed by angels, atteſted by prophets, and confirmed by innumerable miracles, the infallible ſeals of heaven, came yet to be rejected and perſecuted even to death, and beyond, by thoſe who were the keepers and expounders of thoſe oracles, which foretold and typified him, and eye-witneſſes of all his ſtupendous works. For though we are writing the hiſtory of the Jews, and not of the chriſtians, yet, for as much as the deſtruction of their temple, city, and common-wealth, was owing to their refuſing to acknowledge the Meſſiah, after he had fulfilled in his own perſon all that the prophets had written of him [f]; it will be neceſſary to examine by what prejudices and infatuation they brought this total and laſting deſolation upon their country and nation; and, upon a review of the doctrines peculiar to each ſect, it will be found, that their invincible attachment, each to their own tenets, were the main cauſes and haſteners of it. For, on the one hand, that erroneous and pernicious opinion, which every one of them obſtinately held of a temporal Meſſiah and conquering deliverer, was attended with two very fatal conſequences, namely, the rejecting the Meſſiah, whom they ſaw appear in a quite oppoſite character; and their ſeeking him in thoſe impoſtors, who flattered them in their deluſion, and ripened them into an open rebellion. Such was Judas Galileus, the head of the Gaulonitiſh ſect or faction, which proved the mother of infinite miſchiefs to that infatuated nation, and haſtened their total ruin; to ſay nothing of ſeveral other pretenders to the character, either of the Meſſiah, or of his forerunner, which drew ſtill vaſt multitudes after them. On the other hand, the irreconcileable hatred which every ſect bore, either to each other on account of their different tenets, or againſt chriſtianity, which was ſtill more oppoſite to their own, did ſo weaken and diſtract the whole body, that, inſtead of joining their united counſel and ſtrength againſt their oppreſſors, they did as much ſtrengthen them by their mutual feuds and perſecutions, as they did exaſperate them by their ſeditious and hoſtile behaviour, and made their own ruin ſo much the eaſier to complete. All which will be better ſeen by the ſequel, eſpecially by a ſhort view of each of thoſe ſects.

Cauſes of the Jews incredulity.

[e] LUKE ii. 22. ad 38.

[f] Ibid. & ult. ver. 27, & ſeq. ACTS iii. 12 ad 22, & alibi paſſim.

Joſephus reckons four principal ones among the Jews; 1. The Phariſees; 2. Sadducees; 3. Eſſenians; and, 4. the Galileans, or the faction of Judas Galileus [a]. The Evangeliſts add that of the Herodians to the two former, and mention nothing of the two laſt, probably becauſe they did not oppoſe the goſpel with that inveteracy which the others did. How powerful and numerous the Phariſaic ſect was among the meaner, and what ſway that of the Sadducees did bear among the opulent, and what perpetual wars each waged againſt the other, has been already frequently hinted, and will now be better underſtood by a ſhort review of their different tenets.

Phariſees. I. The riſe of the Phariſees is very much unknown; they claim indeed their famous doctor Hillel, often mentioned in this chapter, for their father, as he is ſuppoſed by ſome to have lived during the pontificate of Jonathan, about a hundred and fifty years before the birth of Chriſt, but by others later; and more juſtly too, ſince if he be the Pollio mentioned by Joſephus along with the famous Sameas, he muſt have lived about the time of Herod, long before whom the Phariſaic ſect was in high repute. 'Tis therefore likely, they claim him rather as an ornament, than as the author, of their ſect. The reader may ſee what we have already hinted concerning thoſe too great men in a former ſection †. As to the Phariſees, it is probable, they did not begin to diſtinguiſh themſelves, till the oppoſite ſect of the Sadducees ſtarted up, and made them by degrees run into the other extreme. This ſeems evident from the etymon of their name, whether we derive it with the generality of critics from the Hebrew פרשׁ, to divide or ſeparate, or with others [b], from another ſenſe of that word, ſignifying recompenſe, or retribution, in oppoſition to their antagoniſts, who denied and derided it, at leaſt as to a future life.

[a] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 1, & ſeq Bell Jud. l. ii c. 7. & alib paſſ.
† Before Page 131, note. [b] Vid. Basnage hiſt des Juifs, tom. 2. l. ii. ch. 18. ſect 2.

their

WE have formerly had occaſion to mention one of their favourite tenets, namely that of an oral tradition conveyed down from Moſes, and to which they attributed the ſame divine authority as to the ſacred books *. This being ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the Sadducees, as well as the Samaritans, and the Caraites (a ſect of which we ſhall give ſome account at the cloſe of this ſection) made them equally deteſted by them. But none more incurred their hatred and reſentment than our Saviour, who took all proper occaſions of reproving them for the unjuſtifiable preference which they gave to this pretended tradition to the written word of God, and for condemning thoſe as apoſtates worthy of death, who paid not the ſame, or even a greater, regard to the former, than to the latter.

ANOTHER tenet of theirs, in oppoſition to the Sadducees, was, that of the being of angels, the immortality of the ſoul, reſurrection, and future rewards. But as to this laſt, they firſt excluded all that were notoriouſly wicked from having any ſhare in it, and ſent them immediately after their death into everlaſting puniſhment. Joſephus, who was himſelf a ſtrict as well as learned Phariſee, affirms, that thoſe ſpirits, which they called devils, were no other than the ſouls of ſuch wicked men, who, ſtill retaining their miſchievous propenſity, were ever ſeeking to annoy thoſe of the living by obſeſſions, &c. In the next place, this reſurrection, in thoſe that were admitted to it, was no more than a tranſmigration from one body to another, more or leſs happy, according to their behaviour in their former ſtate. Thus the diſciples aſked our Saviour, who had ſinned, the blind man before them, or his parents, that he ſhould be puniſhed with blindneſs [c]; and thus Herod and the multitude ſuppoſed Chriſt to be either John the baptiſt, Elias, or ſome other prophet riſen from the dead [d]. When therefore that divine maſter came to preach to them a more glorious reſurrection, this proud ſect could not but look upon it as a derogation to what they thought their ſuperior authority and judgment, which was therefore the more offenſive to them, as coming from ſo mean, illiterate, and contemptible a perſon.

A THIRD tenet was, that all things were ſubject to fate, or, as ſome expreſſed it, to the heavens, except the fear of God. It is not eaſy to gueſs what they meant by it: Joſe- phus [e] indeed will have it, that they designed to reconcile, by this unaccountable jumble, the fatality or predestination of the Essenes with the free-will of the Sadducees. If so, this is not the only absurdity, or even contradiction, which they held; but our learned bishop Bull seems to have proved, that they attributed all to fate, or to that chain of causes, to which the creator had subjected all things from the beginning [f]; among which the influence of the heavenly bodies was looked upon to be one of the principal. This seems hinted at by St. James in the beginning of his epistle to his new converts, where he explodes that pharisaical leaven by the most beautiful opposition of the immutability of God, the giver of all good, to the mutability of the planets, which, according to that notion, must necessarily vary their aspects from a benign to a malevolent one, and, vice versa, even by the natural change of their courses [g].

* See Vol. III. p. 156, & IX. p. 524. (Z). & alib. [c] JOHN ix. 2. [d] MATT. xiv. 2 xvi. 14 & alib

HERE was then a new source of dislike to Christ's doctrine, which affirms men to be the authors of their own unbelief, disobedience, obstinacy, and so answerable for that and all the train of evils which it brings after it [h]. It must be owned, however, that some critics have given a different sense to Josephus's words, and whilst one makes the Jews from it to fall into the worship of angels, as having the government of those heavenly bodies [i], others have endeavoured to disculpate them even from their known attachment to astrology, by pretending that by the heavens is meant no more than the eternal decrees of God, which are yet supposed very consistent with the notion of a freedom of will [k]. Both sides had an end to serve, and seem to argue according to their different notions, which it is not our business to enter further into, much less to reconcile the notion of the Pharisees, if it was really theirs, of a freedom of will, with the absolute and eternal decree of the supreme Being. Sure, it seems, from the address of the proud Pharisee with, God, I I thank thee [l], that he looked up n him as the original source of all those fansied virtues he there boasts of, whatever channel he might suppose they flowed to him from; and doth not this at least intimate that he looked upon the want of those virtues in the despised Publican to be owing to his being deprived,

[e] JOSEPH ubi supra. Vid & Antiq. l. xiii. c. 9. & xviii. c. 1, 2. [f] HAIMON. Apost differt poster c 15. [g] JAMES c i ver. 13, 16, 17. Vid. & BLACK. vindication of of the sacred classics. [h] Vid int. al MATT. xxiii 37. [i] BARONIUS ap. BASNAG ubi supra, sect. 7. [k] BASNAG. ibid. & seq. [l] LUKE xviii. 11.

prived, by the ſame arbitrary divine will or decree, of that ſuperior grace which produced them in him? All which is contrary likewiſe to the doctrine of Chriſt, which teaches us, that God diſtributes to every man a ſufficient ſhare of it to profit withal, and increaſes it according to the improvement they make of it.

BUT their moſt diſtinguiſhing character, and that which rendered them moſt obnoxious to the juſt cenſures of Chriſt, was, their ſuperogatory attachment to the ceremonial law, their frequent waſhings, faſtings, and prayings, their public alms-deeds, hunting after proſelytes, ſcrupulous tithings, affected gravity of dreſs, geſture, and mortified looks; their building the tombs of the prophets, to tell the world that they were more righteous than their anceſtors who murdered them, though themſelves were then plotting the death of the beſt and greateſt of all the prophets; their over-ſcrupulous obſervance of the ſabbath to the excluſion of works of the greateſt charity, and many more of the like nature; whilſt they were wholly negligent of the moral and eternal law of mercy and juſtice, of charity, humility, and the like indiſpenſable virtues. The beſt of them, contenting themſelves with abſtaining from the finiſhing act of any ſin, indulged themſelves in all the thoughts, deſires, and complacencies which came ſhort of it; whilſt others, more hardened in their vices, made no ſcruple, not only to covet, but to devour, poor widows houſes, to commit the vileſt of oppreſſions, injuſtices, and cruelties, and to encourage it in their own diſciples, under the ſpecious cloak of religion and ſanctity. Well might Chriſt then compare them to whited ſepulchres, beautiful indeed without, but within full of rottenneſs and corruption [m].

HENCE that fatal and judicial infatuation, which made them overlook all the miracles which he wrought before their eyes, becauſe he choſe to do ſome of them on the ſabbath; as if healing the ſick, giving ears to the deaf, eyes to the blind, life to the dead, &c. was a violation, inſtead of a hallowing, of that day, and muſt denominate him a profane perſon, a ſabbath-breaker, a falſe prophet and ſeducer, or any other odious name, rather than what thoſe miraculous works, long before foretold by the prophets, demonſtrated him to be, the Meſſiah and redeemer of mankind.

THE laſt erroneous notion we ſhall mention of theirs, which was indeed common to the other ſects, but did more exactly tally with the haughty, rapacious, and cruel temper

[m] MATT. xxiii. 27, & alib.

of

of the Phariſees, was their expectation of a glorious conquering Meſſiah, who was to bring the whole world under the Jewiſh yoke. Inſomuch that there was ſcarce a kennel-raker among them, that did not expect to be made preſident of ſome opulent province under him. How unlikely then was it, that a meek and humble Jeſus, whoſe doctrine breathed nothing but humility, peace, diſintereſtedneſs, ſincerity, contempt of the world and worldly things, and univerſal love and beneficence, ſhould ever be reliſhed by that proud, covetous, and hypocritical ſect; or even by the reſt of the populace, as long as theſe their demagogues ſo ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it! But we ſhall inlarge no further upon them, thoſe who are deſirous to know more, may conſult the authors quoted in the margin [n].

Sadducees. II. The Sadducean ſect was no leſs oppoſite to the doctrine of Chriſt. We have already given ſome account in a former ſection † of their riſe, and of their favourite tenet, that there was neither reſurrection, reward, or puniſhment, nor even life after this. They added, that God was the only immaterial being, in conſequence of which they admitted neither angels, nor any ſpiritual ſubſtances, but him. Whether this was the original doctrine of Saddoc their founder, as the Talmudiſts and Joſephus affirm, or whether theſe, and ſome of their other epicurean principles, were afterwards gradually introduced by his looſe diſciples, in order to rid themſelves of the dread of a ſad hereafter, as ſome moderns think; 'tis plain this tenet was very rife with them in our Saviour's time, which made them take ſeveral opportunities of oppoſing and ridiculing this doctrine of the reſurrection [o].

Another of their tenets, equally oppoſite to the Phariſees and to the doctrine of Chriſt, was, that man was made abſolute maſter of all his actions, and ſtood in no need of any aſſiſtance to chuſe or act [p]. For this reaſon they were always moſt ſevere in their ſentences, whenever they ſat as judges. Joſephus adds in another place [q], that they looked upon the deity as above intermeddling with human affairs, which is in effect denying a providence, and conſequently all religion. But this favours too much of the phariſaical ſcandal, and it can hardly be ſuppoſed, that men of ſuch principles ſhould not only continue uncenſured and uncondemned

[n] Lightfoot, Druſius, Serrarius, Calmet, Præf. in comm. in Marc. & Prid. Connect. ſub. A. C. 107. † Before, Page 80. 81, & (W)

[o] Matt. xxii. 23, & ſeq. & alib. plur.

[p] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 9.

[q] Bell. Jud l. ii. c 7, & alib.

by

by the ſanhedrin, but be permitted to have acceſs to the temple, to propoſe their queſtions and objections, and perform their devotions there as freely as any Phariſee; and, which is ſtill more ſurpriſing, ſhould be ſuffered to fill the higheſt dignities in church and ſtate. Beſides, ſuch principles ſeem altogether incompatible with their allowed belief of the Moſaic books, though they had rejected all the reſt, as they are by ſome ſuppoſed to have done [r]; but Scaliger, we think, has ſufficiently cleared them of even this laſt imputation [s], which has no other foundation, than that of our Saviour's chuſing to confute them only from the pentateuch.

IT is true, they rejected all the pretended oral traditions of the Phariſees, and ſtuck cloſe to the text of the ſacred books; perhaps they might alſo give the preference to thoſe of Moſes above all the reſt. All the other Jews did ſo, and do to this day; but had they abſolutely denied the authority of the latter, it is not likely they could have eſcaped being ſeverely reproved for it either by our ſaviour and his apoſtles, or even by Joſephus, who gives them ſuch a foul character in other points; and yet he owns [t], that they received τα γεγραμμενα, the written books; which expreſſion is too general, and too much in their favour to have flowed from his pen, could he have charged them with rejecting any of them [u]. Thoſe who will have them to receive only the pentateuch, add another argument to that abovementioned, and equally inconcluſive, viz. that the other ſacred books did too plainly impugn their particular doctrines; but muſt not they for the ſame reaſon have rejected thoſe of Moſes? Are there not numberleſs inſtances of angels and ſpirits? and are there not likewiſe ſeveral pregnant proofs in them, if not of a reſurrection, at leaſt of the rewards and puniſhments of a future life [w]? The very Phariſees themſelves laid down as a fundamental principle, that it was not enough to believe the reſurrection, unleſs one believed alſo that it was contained in the law, ſo they call the pentateuch.

ADD to all this, that the reading of all the other books in the temple and ſynagogues having been introduced long before, as we have elſewhere obſerved †, it is not likely they would have aſſiſted at it; and yet we do not find, that they abſented themſelves from it, either upon that or any other account.

[r] HIERON. in Matth. ORIG. cont. Celſ. l i. SERRAR, trihæreſ. l. ii. PRID ubi ſupra. [s] Elench trihæreſ. cont. Serrar. c. 16. [t] Antiq. l. xiii. c. 18. [u] Vid. LE CLERC hiſtor. eccleſ. proleg. ſect. 1. ſect. 3. [w] Vid. SCALIGER. ubi ſupra. † Vol. IX. p. 525, not.

account. What therefore the learned rabbi last-quoted says of them, seems most probably to have been their case, namely, that they did not reject them, but only expounded them in a different sense from the other Jews.

Some other pretended erroneous tenets they are charged, by Josephus and the Talmudists [x], to have held, particularly that of condemning polygamy, as forbid by the Mosaic law; but as they were not opposite to the christian doctrine, nor an obstacle to their receiving it, we shall pass them by. Those we have already mentioned were more than sufficient to frighten them from it. The notion of a future life, universal judgment, eternal rewards and punishments to men, whom a contrary doctrine had long soothed into luxury, and an overgrown fondness for all earthly happiness, which they looked upon as the only reward they were to expect for their obedience, must of necessity appear strange and frightful; and, as such, could not chuse but meet with the strongest opposition from them; especially if we add what Josephus observes, that they were, for the generality, men of the greatest quality and opulence, and consequently too apt to prefer the pleasures and grandeur of this life to those of another. The Jewish historian concludes their character, in opposition to those of his own sect, with telling us, that they were a set of men, churlish and morose towards each other, and cruel and savage to all besides [y].

Some have looked upon this sect to have been quite cut off at the total destruction of Jerusalem [z]. It is true, indeed, that they were very much weakened and thinned by the Romans on account of their riches and credit; but their doctrines, so pleasing to flesh and blood, were not likely to continue long without fresh advocates. Accordingly, we find them so well revived and numerous in Egypt, even from the middle of the third, or beginning of the fourth, century, that Ammonius, Origen's master, thought it high time to write against them, or rather against the Jews, for suffering them to propagate their irreligious principles. Some, we are told, are still to be met with in Africa and elsewhere, who still deny a future life, and hold all the other tenets of that sect [a]. Perhaps were they less odious to the sober part of mankind, we should

[x] Glossar. in sanhedr. Vid & Menass. Ben. Israel. lib. i. de resurrect mort. c 6. [y] Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 7. in fin. [z] Vid. Simon hist crit. V. T. Prid. connect. ubi supra [a] Vid. Basnag. ubi supra. l ii. c. 15. pass. Carpzov. dissert. de sect. Jud. in prol. in evang Marc. & al. sup. citat.

ſhould find them more numerous than they appear. However, bad as they are, we are told by a Jewiſh chronologer [b] of a learned Spaniſh rabbi, named Alpharag, who in the twelfth century wrote a book in defence of that ſect, wherein he affirmed, that the purity of the Jewiſh religion was only to be found among them; whilſt the Phariſees clogged it with an infinity of needleſs and intolerable ceremonies.

III. THE Herodians are ſo little known, that we need not wonder at the vaſt variety of opinions, which both the antient fathers and the moderns have entertained concerning them, and of which the bare mention would ſwell us beyond our bounds. Joſephus, as we hinted above, makes no mention of them; and if the moſt general notion be right, that they were a ſet of men who cried up Herod as the Meſſiah, we need not be ſurprized, that this flattering hiſtorian ſhould paſs by a ſect which applied thoſe prophecies to that Jewiſh monarch, with which himſelf was complimenting his favourite emperor Titus Veſpaſian, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel. How Philo comes likewiſe to be ſilent of them, is paſt our finding out. Herodians

FOR it is plain from the evangeliſts, that they made a conſiderable ſect or party in our Saviour's time; that they differed from thoſe of the Phariſees, Sadducees, and Eſſenians; and that they held ſome particular tenets of a dangerous nature, ſince Chriſt thought fit to forewarn his diſciples againſt their leaven [c]. It is true, ſome have confounded them with the Sadducees [d], becauſe St. Matthew in a parallel place [e], mentions them inſtead of the Herodians. But as they are often mentioned elſewhere, in contradiſtinction to them [f], it is likely, that one evangeliſt only ſupplies what the other has omitted. Hence it follows likewiſe, that they were not a kind of Jewiſh confraternity inſtituted in honour of Herod, and like unto the Roman ſodales, auguſtales, &c. (which were not inſtituted in that empire till a long time after Herod's death) as ſome have imagined [g], but a real ſect, diſtinct from the reſt in their principles and intereſts.

[b] GANTZ. Tzemach David. [c] MARC. viii. 15. [d] HAMM. LE CLERC. & al. in loc. ſup. citat. HARDUIN. num. [e] MATT. xvi. 6. [f] Conf. loc. ſup. citat. cum MATT xxii 16. & alib [g] SCALIG anim. in chron. EUSEB. 1882. CAUSABON. proleg. in exercit. Baronian.

There is likewiſe a different opinion concerning them, among thoſe who affirm them to have believed Herod to be the Meſſiah, namely which of the kings of that name they gave that title to [h]. Some thought it was to Herod I. ſurnamed the great, on account of his ſuperior prowels, riches, magnificence, and of his kingdom's extending even beyond Paleſtine, which was more than any of his ſucceſſors could boaſt of. They add, that he cauſed all the genealogies and records concerning the family of David to be deſtroyed, to prevent their being urged in oppoſition to his own lineage. But all this is eaſily confuted by the ſingle conſideration, that if he had been the perſon whom they took for the Meſſiah, his dreadful death, which was looked upon as a judgment from heaven, to ſay nothing of his wicked and hateful reign, would long before have convinced them of their error. Whereas we find them ſtill very numerous, famed, and zealous for their ſect in our Saviour's time, above thirty years after that monarch's death. Thoſe therefore, who think that his ſon Herod, ſurnamed Antipas, the ſame who took the infamous Herodias from his brother Philip, and cauſed John the Baptiſt to be beheaded on her account, to have been the Meſſiah cried up by this ſect, ſeem to judge with more probability. It is true, his dominion was confined within much narrower bounds than his father's; but then it is as plain, notwithſtanding all Joſephus's panegyrics on him, that his ambition was as unlimited; witneſs his joining in the conſpiracy with Sejanus, and the vaſt magazines he had filled with arms, and of which we ſhall ſpeak in its proper place. It is not therefore improbable, that this prince, no leſs politic than ambitious, who is on that account called a Fox by a more impartial judge [i], might take the advantage of the univerſal expectation which the Jews were then in of the Meſſiah, to form a party or ſect of paraſites, who ſhould give it out that he was the glorious perſon they looked for; and that nation did not want for men at this time, baſe enough to flatter his ambition with that ſacred title.

However, other critics have with greater probability reduced that ſect into a kind of Herodian faction, ſet up in oppoſition to the Phariſees and Zealots; and that the Herodians maintained the lawfulneſs of acknowledging and paying tribute to the kings that were ſet over them by the Romans,

[h] Vid. Prid. connect. in fin. part ii. l. v. Calmet. diſſert. de ſect. Judæor. & al. [i] Vid Basnag. hiſt. des Juifs, tom 2 part. 2. ch. xxiv

which

which was absolutely denied by the latter. The former likewise excused several unlawful innovations, which had been made by Herod the Great and his successors, as the effects of necessity rather than choice; whereas the latter cried them down as heathenish, idolatrous, and the effects of a base complaisance for the Roman emperors. Another critic, often quoted in this chapter [k] for his new genealogies of the Herodian family, pretends, that they were a sect of platonic philosophers, whom Antipater had brought from Athens; and adds, that they held pretty much the same doctrines with the Sadducees, or rather that those in Judæa were the same with them. The reader may see that sanguine author sufficiently confuted by Basnage in the place above-quoted. Beza on the contrary infers, that they agreed with the Pharisees in denying the lawfulness of the tribute, from the insnaring question they came to put to our Saviour [l]. But it is rather plain, that their design, and more especially, that of the Pharisees, who sent them to him, was of another nature. These had been just before determining at any rate to intangle him in his answers, that they might find some matter to accuse him, because he had been setting forth a parable that touched them to the quick. They therefore sent their own disciples in company with the Herodians to intrap him with the question in dispute between them, Is it lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar [m]? If he answered in the affirmative, they could object against him that he was an impostor, and not what he pretended, the Messiah, who was to free them from all foreign yoke and impost; and upon this they could intent a criminal process against him, which would make them amends for his having given the preference to their antagonists. And if he answered in the negative, they gained a victory over them, and at the same time exposed him to their resentment, or rather to that of the civil power, which, they knew, would not fail to crush both the doctrine and its divine preacher, especially at such a juncture, when there was another new faction started up into a sect, which began to appear somewhat dangerous.

IV. THIS was that of the Gaulonites, so named from Judas the Gaulonite [n], or Galilean, as he is called by St. Luke [o]. It began to appear soon after the banishment of Archelaus, when his territories were made a Roman province, Gaulonites.

[k] HIERON. cont Lucifer. TERTUL. de præscript. EPIPHAN. hæres. Herodian. [l] In MATTH xxii 16. [m] Vid. MATTH. ubi supra, a ver. 2. ad 17. [n] Vid. Antiq. l. xviii. c. 1, 2. [o] ACTS v. 37.

and the government given to Cuponius. For the Jews looking upon this as an open attempt to reduce them into slavery; Judas took the advantage of their discontent to put himself at their head, and to ripen them for an insurrection. Augustus furnished him with a plausible pretence for it, by issuing out his edict to have the whole province of Syria new surveyed and taxed about this time. Judas therefore who was a man of uncommon ambition, took occasion from it to display all his eloquence, to convince the Jews, that such a submission was no less than base idolatry, and setting up men upon the level with God, who was the only Lord and Sovereign that could challenge their obedience and subjection. The party which he drew after him became in a little time so considerable, that they put every thing into confusion, and laid the foundation for those great mischiefs which ensued, and which will be seen in the sequel.

This sect, as well as that of the Herodians, lasted no longer than till the destruction of Jerusalem; a learned author lately quoted thinks them to have been the same sect, only called by different names, by Josephus and the evangelists †; but what has been said above concerning that of the Herodians, we think, sufficiently shews the contrary. Had their sect been the same, they ought to have been more properly called Anti-Herodians, since that monarch's authority was equally exclaimed against by their chief, as that of the Romans; and if their doctrine, against which our Saviour forewarns his disciples, had been the same with that of the Gaulonites, would it not have been equally absurd to have called it the leaven of Herod? Josephus tells us, that it differed in no point but this from that of the Pharisees; and the evangelists introduce the Pharisees and Herodians as coming by one consent to enquire of Christ concerning the lawfulness of the tribute, from all which it seems at least very probable, that they were only two different parties, who split themselves into two extremes from the Pharisaic sect; whilst these last kept, as it were, in a medium between the base complaisance of the Herodians, and the seditious spirit of the Gaulonites, not perhaps so much out of a conscientious principle, much less out of any love, either to Herod, or to the Romans, as from a fear of their power and resentment.

Essenians. V. The Essenians, though not taken notice of by the writers of the New Testament, did yet make a considerable sect among the Jews, and are very much celebrated by Jo- sephus,

† Vid. Prid. & Basnag. ubi supra.

ſephus [p], Philo [q], by Pliny [r], and by ſome of the fathers and other chriſtian writers, both ancient and modern [s]; and if they were the ſame with the Haſſidim or Hardanim, as ſome have thought, we may add alſo, by the books of the Maccabees and other Jewiſh writers. But this laſt is a mere conjecture, founded only on a fancied conformity between ſome of their principles, and auſtere way of living. The far greateſt part of the Eſſenian ſect was chiefly in Egypt; there was but a ſmall number of them in Judæa, probably by reaſon of the grievous perſecutions and inteſtine broils, that raged almoſt perpetually in it. And this may be one reaſon, why the evangeliſts make no mention of it; to which we may add another, namely, that their eremitic life, which ſecluded them from places of great reſort, and their over-weaning pretence to a ſuperior ſanctity, which inſpired them with a contempt for the reſt of the world, might make them leſs curious about Chriſt's perſon and doctrine. They might think, that if he was really the Meſſiah, he would not fail to come to ſeek them; and if he was not, he had already enemies enough to oppoſe him; and it was beneath them to leave their beloved ſolitude and contemplative life, merely to declare themſelves againſt him. What wonder then, that the ſacred writers ſhould overlook a proud, recluſe, and remote ſect, which neither embraced nor oppoſed the goſpel, and whoſe affectation to a greater and ſupererogatory degree of holineſs ſtood condemned by the frequent cenſures which Chriſt pronounced againſt that of the Phariſees?

IT would be next to impoſſible to trace out their origin, or even the etymology of their name, with any certainty (A).

Pliny

[p] Antiq. l. iii c. 9. xviii. 12. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 7. & alib. paſſ. [q] Tract. quod omnis probus liber. [r] Hiſt lib. v. c. 17. [s] EPIPH. hæreſ. 29. de Nazar c. 4. SUID. ſub. voc. προγονοι SERRAR. trihæreſ. l. iii c. 1. & al. inf. citat.

(A) Joſephus has evaded giving us the etymology of that name, moſt probably, becauſe he knew not well where to fetch it from; and Philo, who derives it from the Greek Οσιος, holy, owns it to be ungrammatical; but this has not hindered other critics from aiming at it. Epiphanius (1) has gone the fartheſt for it of any, when he derives it from Jeſſe the father of David, or, as it is to be read, according to the Hebrew, ישי, jiſai or jiſhai. Salmaſius derives it from the city of Eſſa, mentioned by Joſephus, as the place where Zeno had repoſited his treaſure (2).

(1) Hæreſ 29. de Nazar. c. 4. (2) Antiq. l. xiii. c. 23.

Pliny, in the place above-quoted, tells us, from what authority is not eaſy to gueſs,, that they were of ſeveral thouſand years ſtanding; and, what increaſed his wonder, that they had ſubſiſted ſo long without procreation. But he was in part miſtaken, becauſe, though one branch of them condemned all intercourſe with the women, as apt to extinguiſh devotion; there was another ſort who declared as much againſt celibacy, as tending to extinguiſh the race of mankind, as we we ſhall ſee in the ſequel. But to come to more authentic evidence, the firſt Eſſenians we read of are in the fourth book of Maccabees, under the name of Haſdanim [t], and in Joſephus [u], where both agree that they were already ſettled in Judæa in the time of Jonathan, the brother and ſucceſſor of Judas Maccabæus, about a hundred and fifty years before Chriſt. We have had occaſion to mention, out of theſe two authors, one Judas a prophet of that ſect, who foretold the death of Antigonus, brother to Ariſtobulus, then king of the Jews, and which came to paſs accordingly, though to the great ſurprize of even the prophet himſelf *. And it is not improbable, that this anchoretic ſect took its riſe a little while before the time of the Maccabees, when the faithful Jews were forced to live in deſerts and caves, to avoid perſecution. As for thoſe who ſuppoſe them to have been a branch of the Rhecabites, who flouriſhed ſo long before the Babyloniſh captavity [w], and of whom we have ſpoken largely in our fourth volume †; we can only ſay they gueſs very much in the dark.

We have already hinted their different opinions concerning marriage and celibacy. Thoſe, who allowed the former, were yet very ſparing of matrimonial intercourſe, and wholly abſtained from it on the night before the ſabbath and other feſtivals, on faſt-days, and the like; and, at other times, they were no leſs careful to waſh, and uſe other purifications after it. The other branch, who condemned it, did likewiſe diſallow all ſervitude, and thought the diſtinction [t] Cap. 6. [u] Antiq. l. xiii. c 9, & 19. Bell. Jud. l. i. c. 3, & 7. * See before ſect. 3. p 86, (C). [w] Vid. Suid, ubi ſupra. † p. 48, & ſeq. & (Γ).

If the reader be curious about ſuch things, he need but read Serrarius (3), where he will find at leaſt a dozen different opinions concerning the derivation of that word, enough, we think, to give him a diſguſt to etymological conjectures.

(3) Tribæreſ. l. iii. c. 1. Vid. & Calmet. diſſert. de ſect. Jud.

of

of maſter and ſervant to be againſt the law of nature, for which reaſon they never indulged themſelves the uſe of the latter; and when any of them was, either through old age, ſickneſs, or other accident, rendered incapable of helping himſelf, he received all proper aſſiſtance from the younger, who all expreſſed an uncommon readineſs, or even emulation to perform that duty to him. But the other ſort allowed themſelves ſervants for all inferior offices.

THEY likewiſe diſtinguiſhed themſelves, in their rules and manner of life, into laborious and contemplative, otherwiſe called Therapeutes, the firſt ſort of them divided their time between prayer and labour, ſuch as the exerciſe of ſome handicraft, or the cultivation of ſome ſpot of ground, where they ſowed and planted ſuch roots, herbs, corn, &c. as ſerved for their food; and the latter between prayer and contemplation, or ſtudy. In this laſt, they confined themſelves to that of the ſacred books and morality, without troubling themſelves with any other branch of philoſophy. A late learned author, has indeed ranked them among the Pyrrhonian or Sceptic philoſophers [x]; and it is true, they were very modeſt in their affirmations in point of divinity, and condemned the dogmatic aſſurance of the other ſects; but that they ever deigned to dive into the writings of the academy or other philoſophers, ſeems improbable, from the ſingular contempt they ſhewed of all the other Jewiſh ſects; how much more, of thoſe of the heathens?

FOR with reſpect even to the former, they refuſed to converſe with them, for fear of contracting ſome pollution; and this notion they carried ſo far, as even to abſent themſelves from going to the temple, and contented themſelves with ſending their offerings to it by other hands.

BOTH the contemplative and laborious had their ſynagogues, their ſtated hours for prayer, for reading, and expounding the ſacred books. This latter province was always performed by the elder ſort, who were ſeated at the upper end, according to their ſeniority, whilſt the younger, who were admitted to read the proper paraſhas or leſſons, were placed at the lower end. Their expoſitions were generally of the allegorical kind, in which they ſeemed to have out-vied all their Jewiſh brethren. But they paid the greateſt regard to the five books of Moſes, and looked upon that lawgiver as the head of all the inſpired penmen; inſomuch, that they condemned to immediate death whoſoever ſpoke diſreſpectfully either

[x] HUET. foibleſſe de l' entendement, & l. i. c. 14. ſect 61.

either of him or of his writings. Upon this account they ſtudied, read, and expounded him more than all the reſt, and ſeem to have chiefly drawn all their divinity from the pentateuch. The doctrines and expoſitions of the elders were received with implicit faith, and in their practice they conformed with an intire ſubmiſſion to all the rules of their ſect. To give a full account of them, were to copy out Joſephus and Philo, who have writ more copiouſly about them, and to whom we chuſe rather to refer our readers, who want a fuller detail. As for us, we ſhall content ourſelves with giving them a ſhort ſketch, out of thoſe two authors (B), of their faith and practice, as far as they differed from the other Jewiſh ſects.

With reſpect to their faith, they believed the being of angels, the immortality of the ſoul, a future ſtate of rewards and puniſhments, like the Phariſees, but ſeem to have had no notion of the reſurrection. They looked upon the ſouls of men as compoſed of a moſt ſubtile æther, which immediately after their ſeparation from the body, or from their cage or priſon, as they affected to call it, were adjudged to a place of endleſs happineſs or miſery: that thoſe of the good took their flight over the ocean into ſome warm and delightful regions prepared for them, whilſt thoſe of the wicked were conveyed into ſome cold and intemperate climates, where they were left to groan under an inexpreſſible endleſs weight of miſery. Some other Pythagorean notions are likewiſe attributed to them[y], neither with certainty, nor of great moment. One thing, however, is remarkable, that among their offerings, which they made to the temple, they never ſent any living creatures to be ſacrificed there. But whether they did it with any regard to the Pythagorean doctrine of tranſmigration, or from any other motive, we will not de-

[y] Vid. Antiq. ubi ſupra, & l. xv. c. 13, ad fin.

(B) It will not be amiſs to obſerve to our readers, that their accounts of this ſect differ in ſome particulars, which may be probably owing to the difference there was between thoſe of Judæa and thoſe of Egypt. Joſephus, we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, was better acquainted with the former, and Philo, who was of Alexandria, with the latter; and both may have deſcribed them according to the particular informations they had received concerning each.

However, Philo agrees with Joſephus, that thoſe of Judæa amounted to but about four thouſand, but he makes thoſe of Egypt to have been vaſtly more numerous.

termine

termine; much leſs pretend to reconcile this abſtinence from bloody ſacrifices with their pretended regard to the Moſaic law and writings, where they are abſolutely injoined.

THEY were likewiſe intirely oppoſed to the Sadducean doctrine of free-will, and attributed all to an eternal fatality or chain of cauſes, little ſhort of that of Spinoſa; ſo that they ſeem to have run into the other extreme, whilſt the Phariſees appear to have kept a kind of medium between them. The Eſſenians were averſe to all kinds of oaths, and affirmed, that a good man's life ought to be ſuch, as that he may be credited in every thing without them (C). The Therapeutic ſort placed the excellency of their contemplative life in raiſing their minds ſo far above the earth, as to be able to ſee from thence what was done in heaven (D). When they had attained to this degree, they could dive into the nature of angels, give them proper names, or rightly interpret thoſe already given, and pry ſo far into futurity, as to acquire the character of prophets. We have had occaſion to mention ſome of them already at the beginning of this article, and in the courſe of this chapter. All we need to add is, that when they had once gained this name, they failed

(C) And yet they ſeem to have injoined ſomething like them on their novices, before they were admitted profeſſed members of their ſociety; from which ſome conclude, that they did not wholly condemn them, but only ſuch as were tendered or taken without manifeſt and abſolute neceſſity (4).

(D) We need not remind our readers, that every nation and religion, not to ſay every age, has produced men of this ſublime mould, who have trampled all ſublunary things under-foot, to raiſe themſelves up to a more intimate acquaintance with the deity. We read among the heathen of Plotinus, a Platonic philoſopher, who pretended to be aſhamed to have a ſoul ſo refined as his, confined into a lump of matter, and of a Porphyry, who boaſted of a viſion and divine intercourſe, even before he was got into his dotage 5.

The Perſes, Mohammedans, and almoſt all the nations of India, have had their Therapeutes and viſionmongers; and it would be difficult to name one church or ſect of chriſtians, that has not abounded with ſuch myſtical and ſuper rigid enthuſiaſts; but, in ſpight of all their auſterities and pretences to greater degrees of ſanctity and mortification, the uncharitable contempt they have expreſſed for the reſt of the world has eaſily diſcovered what ſpirit they were of.

(4) Vid int al. Le Clerc, eccleſ. hiſt prolog. ſect. 5. Calmet. ubi ſupra & al. (5) De his vid. Bayl. Dict. ſub voc.

not to be highly reſpected, not only by their own fraternity, but by both kings and people. We have ſeen in a former ſection even a Herod ſhew a more than ordinary regard to the whole ſect, for the ſake of one of them, who had foretold his acceſſion to the Jewiſh crown; and at a time when they were ſtrenuouſly oppoſing his favourite ſcheme, of obliging the whole nation to ſwear allegiance to him.

In their practice they outdid all the other ſects in auſterity. If we may credit Philo, it was a fundamental maxim with them, upon their entrance into the Therapeutic life, to renounce the world and all their worldly properties, which they, it ſeems, generouſly divided among their friends and relations, whom they left behind them in it (E). They never eat till after ſun-ſet, and the beſt of their fare was coarſe bread, with ſome ſalt and hyſſop, or ſome ſuch ſtomachic herbs. Some of them, if we may believe Philo, would eat but every third, and others every ſixth, day; and all of them very ſparingly, even of that poor chear they were allowed. Their cloathing was made of coarſe wool, plain, but white. They condemned all ſorts of unctions and perfumes as luxurious and effeminate. Their beds were hard, and their ſleep ſhort. In a word, as they looked upon all theſe auſterities as the moſt effectual means to procure the favour of heaven and the eſteem of the brotherhood, to ſay nothing of that of the world, they never thought they could carry them to exceſs. Their heads or ſuperiors were generally choſen according to ſeniority, unleſs there ſtarted up ſome of the brotherhood, more conſpicuous for learning, piety, prophetic ſpirit, or any other diſtinguiſhing merit. But ſome there were ſo very contemplative, that they never ſtirred out of their cell, nor even looked out at a window during the whole week. Theſe ſpent their time in reading the ſacred books and writing comments upon them.

On the ſabbath they repaired to their ſynagogues early in the morning, and continued the whole day there in prayers, ſinging of pſalms, reading, or in expounding the ſacred books;

(E) Our authors have forgot to tell us, how this ſet of men liv d after their admiſſion into that ſect, if they left all their world'y ſubſtance behind; ſince they were not, like the other branch, allowed to follow any trade, or to cultivate any land, but di. vided their time between prayer and ſtudy, or contemplation; and had neither wives nor ſervants to provide food for them, nor any other viſible means, that we can find, to ſubſiſt (6).

(6) Vid. Le Clerc ubi ſupra.

books; at which time they kept themſelves in the profoundeſt ſilence. The feaſt of pentecoſt was obſerved by them with greater ſolemnity than other feſtivals, and in memory, it ſeems, of the Iſraelites paſſing the Red-Sea, and of that ſolemn euchariſtical hymn, which was alternately ſung by the choirs of men and women, with Aaron and Miriam at their head. In imitation of which, both ſexes, during this feaſt, went early to the ſynagogue in their white habit, newly waſhed; and after the uſual prayers, reading, &c. the men and the women, each in their ſeparate choir, ſet themſelves a ſinging and dancing, moving regularly backwards and forwards, to the right and left, to and from each other, till at length their devotion was raiſed to ſuch a pitch, that they forgot the difference of ſexes, and both choirs intermingled, and continued dancing and ſinging the whole night. On the next morning they faced about towards the ſun riſing, their uſual poſition at prayers, paid their adoration to the Supreme Being, wiſhed each other a good day, and retired each to their reſpective cells. To all this we may add, that they had ſome other more ſecret rites or myſteries relating to their ſect, which, like the Pythagoreans, they were bound never to divulge, and which it were therefore in vain to inquire after.

THOSE of Judæa did live, according to Pliny [z], in a deſert in the neighbourhood of Hebron, about twenty miles ſouth of Jeruſalem.

THIS city which we have ſpoken of in a former volume †, being generally ſuppoſed the place of John the Baptiſt's birth, it is not improbable, that he was ſent thither to be brought up among them, and lived with them till the time of his manifeſting himſelf to the Jewiſh nation [a]. But as for thoſe who have imagined that Chriſt and his diſciples had alſo been of that ſect, becauſe they pretend to ſee ſome conformity between ſome of his precepts, and way of living, and thoſe of the Eſſenians, they are not worth confuting, ſince there runs rather a manifeſt oppoſition almoſt through the whole. However, thoſe who will not be at the trouble to compare them, may ſee that wild notion fully confuted by the authors quoted in the margin [b], as well as another, no leſs improbable, though leſs abſurd; that the Egyptian Therapeutes were a ſociety of chriſtian hermits inſtituted by St. Mark, when he founded the church of Alexandria [c]. For Philo, who was at leaſt contemporary with the evangeliſt, if not older, ſpeaks of them [d] as a fraternity of a much longer ſtanding, and as of Jews and zealous diſciples of Moſes, and ſtricter obſervers of the ſabbath, than any other Jewiſh ſect; having amongſt them hymns and writings compoſed in former times, by thoſe who had been the principal leaders and heads of their ſect; diſperſed not only through Egypt, but among the Greeks and Barbarians, &c. Nothing of all which could have been ſaid of ſuch a ſociety of chriſtian hermits, ſuppoſing St. Mark had really inſtituted any thing like it. But we find no traces of any ſuch inſtitution till the beginning of the ſecond century, when thoſe aſcetics, who had formerly fled from perſecution, finding the ſweets of their ſolitude, began to erect themſelves into bodies, the earlieſt of which, that we read of, was, according to the two learned authors above-quoted, in or about the year of Chriſt 113 [e].

[z] Vid. Antiq, ubi ſupra, & l. xv. c. 13. ad fin. † Vol. II. p. 147, 360, G). [a] Vid. LUKE i. ver ult. [b] Ubi ſupra. [c] BASNAG hiſt des Juifs, tom. 4 l. ii. c 22, & ſeq. PRID. Connect. part. 2. ſub fin. l v

OTHERS have believed, that the Eſſenians and Therapeutes did afterwards renounce judaiſm, and convert to chriſtianity; and it is not improbable, that many of them did ſo; but that the bulk of the ſect embraced chriſtianity, and became, as it were, abſorbed into the ſocieties of the chriſtian aſcetics, is hard to affirm. If it be aſked, What became of them, and of all their boaſted writings and comments, if this was not the caſe? it may be anſwered, that thoſe who perſevered in their old ſect, underwent the ſame fate with the reſt of the Jews, and in a much greater number, as being become more odious to the Romans on account of their extreme conſtancy, under thoſe grievous perſecutions which they raiſed againſt them. This might probably be alſo the cauſe why their books were more univerſally deſtroyed than thoſe of the other Jews; though even of theſe we have nothing left but the Chaldee paraphraſe, of which we ſhall ſpeak in a more proper place. We ſhall have occaſion in the ſequel to ſhew, that the Eſſenians flouriſhed ſtill under the emperor Trajan, though much degenerated from their primitive purity of life and doctrine, under their new demagogue Elxai. Under Juſtinian they were ſtill known by the pompous title of angels, or angelics, and inhabitants of heaven; but as their lives were found to fall infinitely ſhort of thoſe beings, whoſe names they aſſumed, the people ſaw through the cheat,

[d] EUSEB. Eccl. Hiſt. l. iii. c. 17. BELLARM. BARON. Vid. & MONTFAUC. diſſert. de Chriſt. Terapeut. ap. BASNAG. ubi ſupra. [e] Lib. ſup. citat. [f] DRUS. TRIGLAND. BASNAG. PRID. CALMET. & al. ubi ſupra.

and

and this was in all likelihood their laſt blaſt upon their going out, for we hear no more of them from that time.

WE have now gone through all the Jewiſh ſects that made any figure in our Saviour's time, and might here put an end to this digreſſion, if it may be called ſuch; but foraſmuch as there is ſtill one in being, and very conſiderable, as we have hinted in a former volume †, who derive their origin from the famous Ezra and the great ſynagogue, and are oppoſed to the reſt in ſome of their fundamentals, it will not be amiſs to ſpeak ſomething of them, before we conclude this ſection. They are called Caraim, or Karraites (F); that is, Scripturiſts, or perſons wholly addicted to the reading, and thoroughly verſed in the ſacred writings.

IT is not eaſy to determine when this ſect firſt began. We have hinted above what claim they lay to antiquity and authority. They boaſt even a catalogue or regiſter of all the learned who have written or taught either for or againſt their ſect from the time of Eſdras ‡. Some of thoſe that are diſperſed in Poland, pretend to carry it ſtill higher, and that they were deſcended from the ten tribes carried away by Shalmanezer. The Rabbiniſts ſeem, however, to allow them to have been a ſect at leaſt as old as the time of Alexander the Great, when they tell us that Jaddua the then high-prieſt wrought a miracle before that prince, which the two chiefs of the Caraites could not imitate; but this may be put in the number of their fabulous miracles, of which they are never ſparing, whenever any competition between the other ſects and their own is in queſtion; witneſs thoſe which they urge againſt the Samaritans, of which we have ſpoken in a former ſection *. We ſhall give in the margin ſome of the different opinions concerning their origin (G), whilſt we ſtick here to the moſt probable;

† Vol III p. 155. ‡ BASNAG ubi ſupra, Tom. II. part. 2. c. 16. * See Vol. IX p. 564. E).

(F) קראים from the verb kara, to read (7). As they rejected all the other writings but thoſe of the Jewiſh canon, and the pretended oral tradition ſo much cried up by the Phariſees; it is perhaps upon this account, that the Rabbiniſts, their bittereſt enemies, have imputed moſt of the Sadducean errors to them (8, tho' this be the only point in which they agreed with them

(G) The learned Wolf of Hamburg has given us the origin of the Caraites, written from the memoirs of one of that ſect, named

(7) Vide Buxtorf. lexic. ſub voce קרא. (8) Vide Abraban. append. in Hacoſri. edit. a Buxtorf.

Mordecai;

probable; which is, that they were the ſucceſſors of the Scribes ſo often mentioned by the evangeliſts (H), ſuch as were thoſe whom Mordecai; in which this laſt affirms, that Alexander Jannæus having put to death all the learned Jews of his time, Simeon, the ſon of Seta, and brother of the queen, was privately conveyed into Egypt, where he invented the ſyſtem of the pretended Jewiſh oral tradition, and being returned to Jeruſalem, began to teach it publicly, pretending that he was intruſted with all thoſe diſcoveries which God had made to Moſes, and were from him conveyed through a ſeries of hands and ages down to his time. This ſyſtem was embraced by ſome, and as ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by others, who affirmed, that the whole will of God to their lawgiver was contained in the ſacred writings. From theſe laſt came the ſect of the Caraites, as that of the Rabbiniſts or Traditioniſts did from the former. The ſame author adds, that Judas the ſon of Sabbai became eminent among the former, and Hillel famous among the latter (9).

Another author (10) thinks, that thoſe two ſects ſplit themſelves ſoon after the death of the prophets, upon a diſpute about works of ſupererogation; one ſort maintaining the neceſſity of them from tradition, and the other denying it on the authority of the ſacred writings. Theſe were the Caraites, who thereupon pretended to be deſcended from the prophets Haggai, Malachi, &c. But whatever was the occaſion of their diviſion, they conceived ſuch an irreconcileable hatred againſt each other, that they think no name or language bad enough. Among other epithets, the Rabbiniſts call their opponents mamzerim, or baſtards, a term of the greateſt reproach among the Jews †; and the Caraites, in return, give them the title of bridled aſſes, on account of their broad phylacteries and other ſuperſtitious trinkets, which theſe place a great deal of religion in, and the others deteſt. The former interpret the words of Moſes (11), Thou ſhalt bind them (the divine precepts) for a ſign upon thine hand, and they ſhall be as frontlets between thine eyes, &c. literally; and the others only as a precept injoining them to have a conſtant regard to, and remembrance of, them. We have obſerved in a former volume, that their mutual hatred is ſuch, that no conſideration can move them to intermarry *. A modern Rabbiniſt adds, that if a Caraite had a mind to turn Traditioniſt, theſe would even refuſe to admit him (12); and it is a common ſaying among the latter, that before a Caraite be admitted among them, he ſhould have firſt turned Jew, and then chriſtian, elſe they could not believe his converſion ſincere.

(H) The ſcribes, in Hebrew סופרים ſopherim, or writers, are

(9) Voſſ. notit. Carræorum (10) Trigland diſſertat. de Carait Delph 1703. Vide Calmet. ſub voce Caraite † De his vid. Vol III p 295, (N). (11) Deut vi. 8. * Vol. III. p 155. (12) Vide Leo de modern cerem Jud. part. 5. c. 1.

mentioned

whom Herod the Great conſulted about the place where the Meſmentioned for the firſt time in the ſong of Deborah (13), tho' ſome have put Moſes at the head of that tribe. They are often ſpoken of in the books of Kings, Chronicles, and Ezra, as perſons in the higheſt dignities of the Jewiſh commonwealth. It is not unlikely, that David did appoint ſome ſuch order, when he regulated the claſſes of the prieſts, levites, &c. (14). Since there muſt have been proper ſecretaries, which is the right meaning of ſopherim, in church, in ſtate, in the army, revenues, &c. And as writing was not ſo univerſally practiſed in thoſe days, thoſe who excelled in it had a fair claim for ſuch an office; but theſe being manifeſtly different from thoſe mentioned in the goſpel, we ſhall puſh our inquiry about them no further.

After the return from the captivity, when the canon of the ſcripture was reviſed by Ezra and his inſpired aſſociates, mentioned in a former ſection ‡, it is very probable, the multiplying and propagating, as well as the reviſing, the copies of it, which were then very ſcarce, was committed to thoſe ſopherim or ſcribes, who, by a conſtant converſe with thoſe writings, attained to a ſtill greater knowledge of them, and ſo came at length to ſet up for teachers and expounders of them, and to the name of ſcribe had that likewiſe added of doctor or teacher of the law. Accordingly we find one of them called by the former name in one evangeliſt (15), and by the latter in another (16); and both they and the Phariſees are ſaid by our Saviour to ſit in Moſes's ſeat (17).

Theſe therefore cannot be ſaid to have made a ſeparate ſect, as ſome antients have imagined (18, but to have been ſome of one, ſome of another; ſince it is obvious, that every one of them muſt have had their doctors and expounders, and all juſtly enough liable to thoſe ſevere cenſures which our Saviour pronounced againſt them, for putting each their ſeveral gloſſes on the text, inferring new and detrimental doctrines from it, and impoſing them on their diſciples, with as much arrogance as if they had been all infallible or inſpired. However, ſince we find theſe ſcribes and lawyers or doctors of the law, to be often mentioned with the Phariſees (19), it is likely, they were more numerous in that ſect than in any other; or rather perhaps, if we conſider how neceſſary ſuch men were in church and ſtate, of how long a ſtanding they muſt conſequently have been, they may be looked upon as the root or trunk from which all the others ſprang and divided themſelves, according as their reſpective views, intereſt, education, pride, and ſuch like motives led them.

(13) Judg iv. 14. (14) Vide int. al. 1 Chron. xxiv. 6. xxvii. 32. ‡ Vol. IX. p. 523, (T). (15) Mark xii. 28. (16) Matth. xxii. 35. (17) Ibid xviii. 2. (18) Epiph. hæreſ. Auth. of the recognit. &c. (19) Vide Matth. ubi ſupra, & alib. paſſ. Acts xxiii. 9.

ſiah

siah was to be born [g]. These therefore, it is very likely, after the Pharisaic sect came to have clogged the Jewish religion with such a vast number of traditions, as rendered it wholly burdensome, if not intolerable, became so out of conceit with them, that they resolved to throw them all off, and to stick close to the text; for which they had the name of Caraites or Scripturists, either given them out of contempt, or took it by way of distinction from the Traditionists. The difficulty is to find out the time when, and the persons by whom, this breach was at first made, and doubtless the testimony of the Caraites themselves, who go either as far back as Ezra, or, at the latest, as the times of Hyrcan or Alexander Jannæus, will appear too suspicious. But that of the Talmudists, who allow them, some as antient as Sadduc, or at least as Herod the Great, may be less liable to suspicion; and where is the difficulty of supposing, that whilst the Sadducees distinguished themselves from the rest, as well by their Epicurean doctrines, as by their rejection of the Pharisaic traditions, another more moderate sect might close in with them in this last, without running into those other extremes of the Sadducean leaven, which, they saw, were manifestly destructive of all religion, and so compose a new sect, differing from them in all points but that, and from the Pharisees in that only one (I)? However, they [g] Matth. ii. 4. Vide Basnag ubi supra.

(I) The Rabbinic writers do accordingly accuse the Caraites for having been more favourable to Jesus Christ than any other sect, and the evangelist seems to confirm it, when he introduces a scribe (20) applauding our Saviour's answer concerning the first and chief command, and agreeing with him, that the love of God, above all things, and of our neighbour as ourselves, was of more worth than all burnt-offerings, &c

It is true, he seems to be called a Pharisee in a parallel place (21); but Basnage has judiciously observed (22), that the pronoun them did not refer to the Pharisees mentioned in the foregoing verse, who, being confuted just before, were then gone to take counsel together, but to the multitude in the verse before that, who gladly heard Christ's nervous answers to these ensnaring sectaries. We may add, that the answer there given by the scribe, was more like that of a sober Caraite, than of a superstitious, hypocritical Pharisee.

That there seems to have been a manifest difference between these last and the scribes and lawyers, the above-quoted author (20) Mark xii. 28. (21) Matth. xxii. 35, & seq. (22) Ubi supra, c. 1. sect 10.

shews

they ſeem to have been more moderate, than to have abſolutely rejected all traditions and writings. They, on the contrary, uſed them as helps, whenever they found them judicious and well founded, and only denied them that blind and implicit obedience which the Phariſees inſiſted on; but whether thoſe ſects divided themſelves ſo early as the reign of Hyrcan or Alexander Jannæus, or whether in that famous rupture between Shammai and Hillel, about one hundred years before Chriſt, or about what time after (K); whether firſt in Judæa or Egypt (L), is at beſt but conjecture; and we hope we have given it the beſt light we are able to get.

WE

ſhews from another evangeliſt, who introduces the laſt of theſe hearing patiently the woes which Chriſt pronounced againſt the Phariſees; but when he came to join the ſcribes with them, he complained loudly of it (23). Our Saviour's anſwer to him confirms it ſtill more, when he added, Woe alſo unto you lawyers, and laid a new charge againſt them, different from that of the Phariſees.

(K) Morinus places the riſe of the Caraites about the year after Chriſt 740 or 750, about which time, and not before, he ſuppoſes the Talmud to have been compleated, and to have given occaſion to their ſeparation (24). He adds, upon the authority of a good number of Rabbies, that one Ananus, vexed to ſee his brother preferred before him to the dignity of chief of the captivity, began to declare himſelf againſt the compilers and defenders of that work, as giving a divine authority to a book, which was moſtly ſtuffed with fables, and drew a party after him. We ſhall have a more proper opportunity in the ſequel to fix the time in which it was compleated, and ſhall only obſerve here, that the authority of theſe Rabbies is not only very ſuſpicious in a caſe of this nature, but is contradicted by others of older date, whom we have mentioned at the head of this article. Beſides, what we have ſaid hitherto makes it more probable, that they were of much earlier date, and that the rupture which the publication of the Talmud occaſioned, might be only a revival of their old diſpute, and the giving of a new life to the ſect. Sure it is, that ſome of the fathers, who are of much greater authority, have mentioned them long before (25), if not by the name of Caraites, at leaſt by that of ſcribes, who rejected all oral traditions, and ſtuck cloſe to the letter of the ſacred books. The reader may ſee another proof of it in the next note.

(L) Euſebius tells us (26), that in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor, the Jews in Egypt were divided into two parties, the one of

(23) Luke xi. 44, & ſeq. (24) Exercit. bibl. l. ii. Exercit. vi. c 2. vii. c. 1. Vide Baſnag. ubi ſupra, ſect. 14. (25) Orig. in Matth. xiii. 52. Epiphan hæreſ. xv. Hieron. in Iſai. viii. 14. (26) Præp. evangel. l. viii c. 10.

We ſhall now give a ſhort ſummary of their particular tenets, as they are oppoſed to thoſe of the other ſects.

1. They look upon the canonical books of the old teſtament as the only rule of their faith, and reject the apocryphal as of no authority, together with the pretended oral tradition of the Phariſees, as the wicked inventions of an incroaching and deſigning ſet of men; for which reaſon they have the utmoſt abhorrence for the Talmud.

2. They expound ſcripture by ſcripture; and, where that cannot be done, they call in the aſſiſtance of reaſon, and the writings and comments of other doctors, tho' without paying too implicit a regard to the latter.

3. They commonly read the ſcriptures in their ſynawhich expounded the Moſaic law allegorically, and the other literally; which latter was part of the Caraites character. We might further alledge, the book Hachoſri, to which the Rabbies give a very great antiquity, and which introduces the king Coſroes as a great admirer of the Caraitic ſect, becauſe they were more zealous for the law, till his Rabbinic teachers acquainted him with the vaſt variety of opinions that were among them, for want of admitting the oral tradition, which fixed the ſenſe of the ſacred writings. We have elſewhere indeed had occaſion to ſhew, that this book is far enough from being ſo antient as they make it †; but it ſhews, however, how little reaſon Morinus had to make them ſo recent as the eighth century, upon the teſtimony of ſome partial Rabbins, againſt that of a number of others of more antient date, ſome of whom own them to have appeared even in the time of the Aſmoneans, others of the Sadducees, and others of Herod (27), to ſay nothing of that of the fathers above quoted.

If it be objected, that Joſephus has ſaid nothing of them when he ſpoke of the other ſects which reigned in his time, the argument will equally hold againſt the Herodians, which yet ſeem to have been very conſiderable. That hiſtorian might have his reaſons for paſſing them by in ſilence. Had he ſpoke well of them, he would have diſobliged his own ſect, ſeeing he was a Phariſee; had he ſpoke ill of them, the Herodians might have expoſed him to the reſentment of that family, and even of the Romans, in whoſe behalf we have ſeen they divided themſelves from the Phariſees and Gaulonites; and as to the Caraites, they might not be ſo guilty in his eyes as they appeared to the oppoſite ſects. Joſephus had too much ſenſe to run all the lengths, and ſwallow all the fabulous ſtories of the Traditioniſts, tho', like a thorough-paced ſtateſman, he outwardly joined with the moſt prevailing ſide.

† Vide Vol. III. p. 416, note. (27) Vide Trigland. de Carait. c. 3. Druſ. tribær. Baſnag. Calmet, Prid. &c. ubi ſupra.

gogues

gogues in the original, esteeming it next to impossible to come at their true meaning from any translation of them; for this reason they are careful to instruct their children betimes in that sacred tongue; and if they suffer any version of them, it is only for the use of those of the meaner sort, who are not acquainted with the Hebrew.

4. THEIR prayers are likewise in that tongue, as being the most holy and energic, and the only one in which the incommunicable name of God can be properly pronounced; for they are not so scrupulous in this respect as the other Jews, who always read it Adonai, but pronounce it Jehovah, as we do. Only in their writings, prayer-books, &c. they chuse to write it only with a vau between two jods. In their prayers, wherein they express a much greater fervency and devotion than the rest, they always turn their faces towards Jerusalem.

5. THEY expect, like the rest of the Jews, the reign of the Messiah to be a temporal and glorious one, and attribute his long delay, partly to the slowness of Saturn's motion, which they make the ruling planet of the sabbath †, and of the Jewish nation, and partly to their sins, which have provoked God to suspend the sending of him at the promised time (M); for this reason they forbid the calculating the time of his coming under the severest anathemas.

6. THEY entertain the highest and justest notions of the Deity, and of his perfections and attributes. They affirm his providence to be as extensive and unlimited as his knowledge; and at the same time allow, that mankind has a freedom to determine himself; but that God gave unto every man a portion of his universal grace to assist him in his right choice; and that our wills being influenced by our tempers and constitutions, but chiefly by the stars, makes that grace very necessary. They have a four-fold distinction of this disposition of the soul, the one of sickness, the other of health, the third of life, the fourth of death. This distinction seems to have been alluded to by our Saviour in several places of † De hoc vide Vol. III. p. 427, (L).

(M) The reader may remember, that we have lately had occasion to confute this ridiculous pretence, and the cause from which it sprung (28), which, it seems by this, was not so confined to the carnal Pharisees and Sadducees, but their more sober and mortified sects gave into it.

(28) See before p. 216, in fin. not. (Z).

the gospel; as where he speaks of the dead burying the dead; that not the whole, but the sick, have need of a physician, and some others of the like nature.

7. THEIR morality was not inferior to their divinity. It kept a kind of medium between the austere Essenian and the Epicurean Sadducee. Of the two they rather inclined to the former in point of abstemiousness, whether of eating, drinking, or any other lawful pleasures.

8. THEY believe a future life of rewards and punishments, according to mens good or bad actions in this (N); that the souls come from heaven; that the future life was made for them, and that they will subsist there as the angels do.

9. WE have already hinted, that they condemned the phylacteries of the Pharisees. They had no less an abhorrence for all kind of pictures, that were used either by heathens, or afterwards by christians, for a religious use, or, as they term it, to be worshipped; and condemned the other sects for being remiss enough in that point, to make a traffic of them for gain.

10. THEY rejected the astronomical calculations as introduced after the captivity for settling the new moons and other festivals of the year; such as we have had occasion to mention more than once in the course of this chapter †. Whereas the Traditionists denied their being an innovation, and, pretended, that they had been invented by Moses, and had been as much in vogue before, as since their return from Babylon.

UPON all these, and some other less material differences, there was such an irreconcileable hatred intailed between those two sects, as came little short of persecution. They not only charge each other with heresy, with perverting the scriptures, and corrupting religion; but pronounce the bitterest anathemas they can meet with in the sacred books against each other, and that publicly and solemnly; so that where either of them, especially the Pharisees, are most numerous or powerful, the others must bear themselves cursed, without † Vide int. al. p. 32, not. (K).

(N) Tho' they held this in opposition to the Sadducees, whom they therefore accused of maintaining the annihilation of the soul; yet we do not find that they believed the resurrection with the Pharisees.

daring

daring to resist or complain (O). The late Mr. Ludolph; who had been much conversant among them; told several of his acquaintance both in England and Holland, that he saved the life of a poor Caraite at Frankfort, who, if he had not protected him, took him home, and sent him away privately; had been in danger of being either torn into pieces, or of being starved there [h]: This mutual hatred and contempt is carefully propagated both by the parents to the children; and much more by the masters to the disciples, over whom they usurp such an uncontroulable authority, that it is next to blasphemy and rebellion to contradict or disobey them.

AMONG the Caraites, above all other sects, the disciples have such profound respect for their doctors, that they neither sit down before them till they are bid, nor go from them without their leave; and then they go backwards, keeping still their faces turned towards them. They never speak to or of them, without the title of lord, master, or some such like term of submission. The doctors, on the other hand, who are averse to the Pharisaic pride, treat them with great gentleness and humanity, and, for the generality, teach their scholars gratis; so that one may say, upon the whole, the Caraites are by far the most religious, rational, and, bating their carnal notion of the Messiah's reign, the best disposed to embrace the gospel of any other sect; and we may reasonably suppose, that among the many thousands of that stubborn nation, whom the apostles converted to christianity, the far greater number of them flocked to it from that quarter, whilst the proud Pharisees, full of their own supersufficient

[h] BASNAG. ubi supra, c. 7, sect. 25.

(O) This we are told (29), is practised in Palestine, where the Rabbinists, by far the more numerous and wealthy, assemble themselves on mount Olivet on the feast of tabernacles, and there pronounce all the curses of the law against the Caraites who are often within the hearing of them; for tho' we find their sect dispersed through many of the northern regions, such as Poland, Lithuania, Muscovy, &c. besides those that are to be met with in great numbers in Turky, where they enjoy much greater liberty; yet they prefer Judæa to all other countries, and would gladly live there rather than at Constantinople, Cairo, and other great cities, were they permitted to live peaceably, and free from the curses and other ill offices of their inveterate enemies.

(29) Basnag. ubi supra, sect. ult.

knowledge

knowledge and righteouſneſs, and intoxicated with an invincible fondneſs for their own traditions; and the carnal Sadducees, contented with the enjoyments of this life, and regardleſs, if not averſe, to the thoughts of a future, ſpared no pains or artifice, cruelty or injuſtice to oppoſe a doctrine ſo grating and contrary to theirs. This being therefore the ſtate of the Jews at the coming of the Meſſiah, we need not wonder at the reception which both he and his doctrine met with from them; eſpecially when, inſtead of that glorious, warlike, conqueror they had been made to expect, they ſaw him in the humble guiſe of the poor, illiterate, ſon of an obſcure carpenter.

SECT. VI.

The History of the Jews from the birth to the death of CHRIST.

Herod's diſtracted ſtate reſumed.

THE reader may remember, that we left Herod in the moſt diſtracted ſtate that can be well imagined; his conſcience ſtung with the moſt lively grief for the murder of his beloved and virtuous Mariamne and of her two worthy ſons; his life and crown in imminent danger from the rebellious Antipater and ungrateful Pheroras; his reign ſtained with rivers of innocent blood; his latter days imbittered by the treacherous intrigues of a helliſh ſiſter; his perſon and family hated by the whole Jewiſh nation; and laſt of all his crown and all his glories on the eve of being obſcured by the birth of a miraculous child, who is proclaimed by heaven and earth to be the promiſed and long expected Meſſiah and Saviour of the world. To all theſe plagues we muſt add ſome freſh intelligences which came tumbling in upon that wretched monarch; and which, by aſſuring him ſtill more, not only of the treaſonable deſigns of the unnatural Antipater, but alſo of the bitter complaints which his other two ſons, then at the Roman court, did vent againſt them both, rendered him more than ever completely miſerable. Had theſe two princes continued in their duty to him, they would have been a ſupport and comfort, tho' his favourite one had proved the traitor they had repreſented him; but whom could he truſt to, when there was not one of his family left, that did not in ſome meaſure declare himſelf an enemy to him?

Thi

This was the dreadful view in which he beheld himself and his unnatural off-spring; not that those two young princes were really so divested of all filial affection, as they were represented to him by Antipater and his instruments; but it had been his and their constant care and study by such vile misrepresentations, to render them more and more suspected to the jealous king. Their letters were generally filled with the pretended injurious reflections which those two sons whispered against him; such as his having unjustly murdered those of Mariamne, and their dread of being recalled into Judæa to be made to undergo the same fate. Antipater indeed acted under closer covert, and whilst he seemed, as it were, unwillingly to confirm all these accusations, pretended to excuse them as the effects of rashness and youth, which time and consideration would soon rectify; and indeed so taken up was he, either in cultivating these discords, or in procuring himself friends at Rome and Jerusalem by his profuse liberality, that he seems to have been wholly ignorant of the discoveries which the rack had extorted from his agents in Judæa, especially upon the death of Pheroras, of which we gave an account in the last section.

Antipater's cabals against his two brothers.

IT is indeed surprising, that none of his friends in Judæa should have sent him some private intelligence of what had passed at that dreadful scene, and warned him to secure himself betimes from his father's resentment; but so intent was he on the means of ridding himself of him, and seizing on his crown, that he even furnished him with fresh proofs against himself, by sending a fresh supply of poison to his mother, by means of a freed-man of his, in case the old one should in any ways have miscarried. Batillus, that was the servant's name, was no sooner arrived at Jerusalem, than Herod, who by this time had unravelled the whole plot, caused him to be apprehended and put to the rack; upon which he confessed the purport of his errand from Rome. Herod, the better to conceal his resentment against his treacherous son, sent him immediately a letter, in which he seemed to complain only of some ill treatment from his mother, and charged him at the same time to make what haste he could to Jerusalem, that his absence might no longer give his enemies a handle to obstruct his interest in the succession. He concluded with a promise, that immediately upon his arrival he would obliterate all past miscarriages, and give him all the marks of paternal affection that he should desire [a].

Batillus's confession on the rack.

[a] Antiq. l. xvii. c. 6.

Antipater

Antipater comes back to Jerusalem.

Antipater, still ignorant of what had passed in Judæa, and thinking his father by this time poisoned and in his grave, was set out for Judæa, being as eager to reach Jerusalem, as his father to get him thither; but when he was come to Tarentum, he received a dispatch from some of his friends, which acquainted him with the particulars of Pheroras's death. The news gave him a terrible shock, not indeed so much out of love to the deceased, as because he found by it, that he had missed his aim of poisoning the king. He pursued, however, his journey as far as Celenderis, a city in Sicily, where being taken with a qualm at the thoughts of the affront put upon his mother, who, as we observed in the last section, had been banished the court, and stripped of all her riches, which he looked upon as an ill omen; he stopped some time there, to consult with his friends, whether he had best proceed, or go back. At length some of them having flushed him with the sanguine hopes, that his appearance at court would dispel all his father's suspicions, he got on board again, and in a little while landed at Sebaste. Here he met with a more mortifying omen, than that of his mother's disgrace; and, instead of those acclamations and good wishes with which numerous crouds had followed him to the ship, he heard nothing but the bittereſt curses from the Jews against himself, as the bloody murderer of Mariamne's two brave sons [b].

The children at Bethlehem massacred

Whilst Herod was impatiently waiting his arrival, he had not been negligent of what he thought perhaps a more important care, namely, the destroying of his new-born rival at Bethlehem, whom he supposed to be still there. Finding himself therefore disappointed by the wise men, from whom he expected a more particular information concerning him, that he might be sure of not missing his victim, he issued forth an order to have all the male infants massacred, not only in that city, but in all the coasts round about, from two years old and under (F); and by that horrid slaughter, verified

[b] Ibid. c. 7. sub. init.

(F) An author of the fifth century tells us (36), that Herod had also a son there at nurse, who was massacred among the rest; and that it was upon this occasion, that Augustus made that reflection upon him, that it was better be Herod's hog, than his son But it is more likely, that that emperor, hearing about the same time of the death verified the oracle long before delivered by one of the prophets, which the reader will find in the margin [c] (G). But providence [c] MATTH. ii. 16, & seq.

(36) Macrob. Saturn. l. ii. c. 4

of Antipater, which happened about six weeks after this horrid slaughter, and recollecting that also of his other two sons, might make him break out into that bitter sarcasm against such an unnatural father; besides, it is hardly probable that Herod, old, crazed, and distracted as he was, could have any children so young.

It is something surprising, that Josephus, who was in no case sparing of Herod's character, should yet have omitted such a material occurrence. The christians have taxed him, and justly too, with partiality, as having concealed it, to avoid giving such a countenance to the evangelist, and such an ample testimony to the Messiah, as might offend his whole nation, and more particularly the Pharisaic brotherhood, who had been his most inveterate enemies.

On the other hand, there have not been wanting those, who, preferring the authority of the Jewish historian to that of St. Matthew, have made use of the one, among many other topics, to cry down the other The controversy is so recent in every body's memory, that we need not here repeat it; especially considering, that it is out of our province to enter into a dispute, which, we think, has been so sufficiently decided in favour of the latter.

As to what may be objected, that Josephus has not scrupled in another place to give Jesus Christ a most noble character; we shall only say here, that that passage has been shrewdly suspected of forgery, as this in all likelihood would have been, were it to be found in that historian. However, we shall have a fitter opportunity of speaking of that pretended interpolation in the sequel of this section.

(G) The whole passage runs thus (37), tho' the evangelist has only quoted the first part, as enough to direct his readers to the rest, as was the custom before the bible was divided into chapters and verses

Thus says the Lord, a voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation and bitter weeping; Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they were not Thus saith the Lord, refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears: for thy labour shall be rewarded, or, as the original has it there is a reward (laid up) for thy labour, and they shall come again from the land of the enemy. For there is hope, saith the Lord, that, in thy latter end, thy children shall come again to their own border. I have heard Ephraim complain, saying, Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised, &c

Here was a necessity for taking the whole text thus far, in order to shew how this prophecy or promise of God was verified in the providence had already taken care to convey the child far enough out of the reach of his butchers; and his parents, having been timely forewarned of his bloody design, had withdrawn themselves into Egypt, whence he was not recalled till after the death of the tyrant; when, upon their return, fearing still some further attempt from his successor Archelaus, they were directed by the same heavenly monitor to turn off into Galilee, and to betake themselves to their old habitation at Nazareth. Here was likewise another prophecy fulfilled in the name of Nazarite or Nazarene, which was given him from his long abode in that obscure place [d] (H).

(37) Jerem xxxi. 15, & seq.

Soon

[d] Ibid. ver. 19. ad fin.

slaughter of these babes; and it is for want of attending to the whole, that some commentators have been forced to have recourse to a primitive or historica meaning, in the carrying away of the ten tribes, and a secondary in this more cruel bereaving of Rachel, or the Jewish state, of her beloved children; whilst others, not satisfied with the solution, have run into downright scepticism. Whereas the whole, thus connected, implies no more than this, that no affliction or suffering, either wrongfully, or for a good cause, shall miss of its sure reward at the latter end.

The words therefore of the evangelist (38 may, and, we think, justly too, be thus paraphrased and expounded: Then, or in that bitter weeping and lamentation of those doleful mothers, was fulfilled, or truly verified, that saying of the prophet Jeremiah; In Ramah, which, in the original, signifies a high place, was heard bitter lamentation, &c. the mournful mothers refusing to be comforted for their lost children, because they were now no more But what says the Lord? Refrain your cryings and tears; for there is a recompence reserved for all your labours at your latter end; and the children you count for lost shall surely return again. And when could such a comfortable promise be more truely verified, than when he, who brought life and immortality to light, came to assure us of it by so many irrefragable arguments, as well as by his own infallible word?

The Jews themselves, especially those who believed the resurrection, might easily have understood this to have been the meaning both of the prophet and evangelist, since they tell us (39), that the reason why God did not double the number of Job's children, as he did that of his cattle, &c when he restored him to his prosperous state, was, because those children, though dead, were not lost, as his other possessions were, but lived still with God, and would be raised up at the latter end.

(H) This prophecy has likewise been very much canvassed, and

(38) Matth. ii 17, & seq. (39) Rabb. Plur. comm in Job. c. ult. Drig. de Stunica, & al. ibid.

hitherto

SOON after this maſſacre at Bethlehem, arrived Antipater at Sebaſte, and from thence went directly to Jeruſalem, where he was Herod Antipater's arrival.

hitherto in vain ſought after, tho', by the evangeliſt's words, it ſhou'd be in more places than one, ſince he doth not there quote any one in particular, but the prophets in general. The queſtion therefore is, whether it is ſaid any where, that the Meſſiah ſhould be called Nazarite? The anſwer is, not in any verſion, (except perhaps the Chaldee and the Syriac) but in the original Hebrew, where we ſhall find him called נוֹצְרִי Notzer; not indeed on account of his having received that appellation from any particular city, but by reaſon of his high character, office, and deſcent We ſhall content ourſelves with giving two inſtances of it, which will, however, ſuffice as a clew to the reſt.

The firſt is in Exodus 40, where the Lord is ſaid to deſcend in the cloud, and to proclaim the name or attributes of the Lord, in the following words: The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long ſuffering, and abundant in mercy and truth; keeping mercy for thouſands, forgiving iniquity, &c. Where it is obſervable, that the firſt letter in the word נוֹצֵר notzer, keeping, is one of thoſe which the Jews call majuſcula, or large letters, ſuch as occur only about thirty times in the whole old teſtament †, and are, according to them, never uſed by the ſacred writers, but to imply ſome great myſtery to be contained in the word

We ſhall not here diſpute, whether the words in the paſſage above-quoted are thoſe of God there appearing, as our, and moſt verſions underſtand it, or of Moſes calling upon him there, though the latter ſeems to us moſt probable, from thoſe that go immediately before, Vajicra beſhem Jehovah, And he called on the name of the Lord. It is ſufficient, that the name of Notzer is given to the divine perſon there appearing, which could not be that of God the Father, whom no man hath ſeen at any time; but of the Son, in that human appearance he often took both before and under the Moſaic diſpenſation; and for further proof of which we ſhall refer our readers to what has been ſaid in a former volume *, and all we ſhall add is, that none could have a better claim to this title of Notzer cheſſed, keeping or preſerving mercy, than he that came to obtain it for us at no leſs a price than his own ineſtimable life

The other place we ſhall mention is in Iſaiah (41), where the ſame Meſſiah is called a Netzer, or a branch out of the old ſtem of Jeſſe, &c. where the word נֵצֶר or מִנֵּצֶר which we tranſlate ſtem, ſignifies the old ſtump of a tree, after the main body has been cut off; and the netzer, the ſpontaneous ſhoot which ſprings from it; and ſuch was indeed the houſe of David at the time of Chriſt's birth, (40) c. xxxiv. 5, & ſeq. † Vid. int. al. Vol II. p. 371. 467. S), & Vol III p. 411, & (Z) * De his vid Vol, II p. 414, (Z). (41) c. xi. 1.

Herod had ſo cloſely concealed his deſigns concerning him, that he made no heſitation to go and offer himſelf at the gates of the palace. They were immediately opened to him; but reduced to the loweſt degree of poverty and obſcurity, though at but fourteen generations diſtance from Zerubbabel; but we muſt remember, that the prieſts, the Aſmoneans, and afterwards Herod, had held the kingdom and government of Judæa; whoſe intereſt therefore it was to ſuppreſs that family, leſt ſome of them ſhould in time wrench it out of their hands. Neither was this done without the particular conduct of providence, and in purſuance of thoſe prophecies in which the low and humble ſtate of the world's Redeemer is ſo lively deſcribed; and accordingly we find, that when his parents came to Bethlehem, they were ſo poor, that his mother could not purchaſe a room in that city, where ſhe might be decent y delivered of him, but was forced to make uſe of a ſtable for herſelf, and of a manger for her child; or, which is indeed more likely from a cloſer examination of the text, was delivered in the open fields, and laid the divine babe, εν τη φατνη, in a crib; for in that ſenſe the ſeptuagint commonly uſe that word.

If then the Meſſiah is in Geneſis and Iſaiah emphatically called Notzer or Netzer, and that name is given him by the Jews, in their doing ſo, though by way of contempt, they did but fulfil thoſe prophecies of him, though unwittingly, unwillingly, and in deriſion; and it is ſtill more to his glory, that it was completed in him in that ſublime ſenſe in which he is called by that name in the law and the prophets. The Jews had two falſe notions concerning Chriſt, the one that he was born at Nazareth, and conſequently that he was a Galilean; and the ſecond, that out of Galilee there never aroſe any prophet (42). Since then he ſet up both for a prophet and for the Meſſiah, they thought that the name of Nazarene was ſufficient to confute both thoſe claims, and therefore gave it both to him and to his followers; and theſe gladly embraced it, on account of its true and genuine ſignification, as he is called in Moſes's writings the notzer, or keeper, or depoſitory of mercy, and by Iſaiah, the ſprout out of the old withered ſtock of the houſe of David

Some interpreters have imagined, that the evangeliſt alluded to the Nazarites among the Jews, of whom we have ſpoken more fully in our third volume *, or to Joſeph, who is emphatically called by his father Nazir Acheuf (43), ſeparate from his brethren; or, as we have formerly explained that place †, crowned above his brethren, and whom they look upon as a type of the Meſſiah. But all this is ſuppoſed, for want of attending to the different ſpelling of theſe two words, viz. the firſt with a ס, and ſignifies to keep, and the (42) Vide John i. 46 vii. 41, & 52.

(43) Gen. xlix. 26.

* p. 229, & ſeq.
† Vol II. p. 448, R.

other

but, upon his being entered, they were ſhut up again to all his retinue. Upon his being introduced to the king, he went to throw himſelf at his feet, and to embrace his knees, but met with a ſtern repulſe, and was immediately arreſted; and when he aſked the reaſon of it, he was upbraided with the death of his brothers, and referred over to Varus, by whom he ſhould be judged on the very next day. Quintilius Varus had ſucceeded Sextu Saturninus in the government of Syria, and, being arrived at that province, was juſt then come to Jeruſalem, to pay a viſit to Herod, and was thereupon deſired by that monarch, that he would preſide as judge at the tryal of his rebellious and unnatural ſon. Antipater was accordingly brought the next morning before him, and a numerous aſſembly, whom Herod had convened for that purpoſe. Upon his firſt appearing, he threw himſelf upon his knees, and begged they would have pity on him, and not condemn him unheard. Herod, who was alſo preſent, only bid him ſtand up, that he might the better level his reſentments at him. He upbraided him with his ſecret deſigns of poiſoning him, and unravelled the whole conſpiracy lately diſcovered, appealing for the truth of it to his relations and friends, and other evidences, whom he had alſo poſted there to prove all his accuſations; the laſt of which, and that which he vented with greateſt vehemence, was the death of his two brave ſons, Of whom, ſaid he, addreſſing himſelf to Antipater, thou haſt been but the too unnatural follower, if they were guilty, and the baſe murderer, if they were innocent. His exceſſive grief, followed with a flood of tears, which he could not refrain at the naming of thoſe two unhappy princes, obliged him to ſtop ſhort, and to beckon to Nicolas Damaſcen to go on and open the reſt of the accuſation, and then proceed to the proofs of it.

His tryal for treaſon.

Antipater, who knew but too well his own guilt, and the undoubted evidence which was there ready to prove it againſt him, prevented Damaſcen's going on, and began to plead his own cauſe; the ſum of which was, the unlikelihood of his ever entertaining any thoughts of ſuch a horrid parricide, eſpecially after the dreadful puniſhment of his two brothers for the like attempt. He loudly complained againſt the baſeneſs of his accuſers; but Damaſcen, being at length permitted to ſpeak, gave ſuch ſatisfactory evidence to the court, that other with ץ, and ſignifies to crown, ſeparate, &c. Now the former can be the only right one here, it being given him on account of his living at Nazareth; which word is written with the tzade, and not with the zain.

His defence

there

there could be no room left to doubt of his being really guilty. Varus, however, told him for the last time, that if he had any thing to reply to invalidate the proofs alledged against him, he might now freely do it, seeing it was Herod's and his own earnest desire, that he might prove himself innocent. Antipater, for want of better evidence, had recourse to oaths and bitter curses, which he plentifully wished on himself if he was guilty; but this being the usual refuge of the blackest criminal, the president, to stop his mouth at once, and bring the trial to a fair issue, ordered some of the poison, which had been mentioned in the evidence, to be brought, and given to a condemned person before the court; which being done accordingly, the man died almost as soon as he had taken it.

He is cast.

Varus immediately left the court and Judæa to return to Antioch, without declaring his opinion to any but to Herod, who ordered his son to be shut up in a prison, and sent letters to Augustus to acquaint him with the whole trial, charging at the same time the messenger to give that emperor all the further particulars of it by word of mouth [e].

PRESENTLY after, there was another discovery made by an intercepted letter from Antiphilus, who was then in Egypt, and directed to Antipater; the purport of which was as follows: "I have sent you Achme's letter (I): you know "what risque I run by so doing, since I should lay myself at "the mercy of two most potent families, and my inveterate "enemies. It concerns you therefore to look to it, that "nothing miscarry." The business was to find this letter of Achme, and the messenger pretended to be ignorant of any other, except that abovementioned. At length, upon closer search, another was found sewed in the lining of his waistcoat, which, upon their reading of it, was to this effect: Achme to Antipater: I have written to your father, according to your direction, and have inclosed in the packet the forged letter from Salome to the queen my mistress; and I doubt not but the king, upon his reading of it, will put her to death as a traitress. This pretended letter of Salome was contrived by Antipater.

[e] Antiq. ubi supra.

(I) This Achme was by nation a Jewess, in the service of Julia Augustus's wife; but had been bought over by Antipater with large sums, to contrive this plot against his father and his aunt Salome (44).

(44) Joseph Antiq. l. xvii. c. 7. a fin.

tipater, and dreſſed up by Achme, who wrote to the king as follows. Achme to king Herod: Out of a deſire I have to ſerve you, by acquainting you with any thing that concerns your ſafety, I have herewith ſent you a letter of Salome to the empreſs my miſtreſs, in which ſhe deſires her leave to marry Syllæus (K). Pray tear it as ſoon as read, ſince the diſcovery of it would coſt me my head. Herod, upon reading and comparing the whole, cauſed his ſon to be brought before him, bound as he was, and ſhewed him the letters, and at the ſame time aſked him, what he had to anſwer for himſelf? Antipater, at the ſight of them, was thunderſtruck, and could not utter a word; and upon its being inſiſted on, that he ſhould name his accomplices, he only mentioned Antiphilus. Salome, who was touched to the quick at this attempt againſt her, after having expreſſed her innocence by many antick geſtures and dire imprecations, ſtrenuouſly inſiſted to have the traitor executed out of hand. Herod, on the other ſide, was thinking at firſt to have ſent him to Rome to have been tried before Cæſar; but fearing, upon ſecond thoughts, leſt he ſhould either be reſcued by the way, or acquitted by his friends there, contented himſelf with ſending a full account to the emperor, together with the intercepted letters; and remanded his ſon to his priſon [f].

Herod's laſt illneſs and will.

WHILST his embaſſadors were haſtening to Rome, Herod, worn out with age, ſickneſs, and numberleſs cares and inquietudes, fell into a violent diſeaſe, which added to all his other misfortunes, made him ſo morroſe and choleric, that he became a burden to himſelf, and to every one about him. Finding his end approaching, he ſet about making his will, by which he appointed his youngeſt ſon his heir and ſucceſſor, the miſrepreſentations and calumnies of Antipater having rendered his other two ſons, Archelaus and Philip, obnoxious to him. He bequeathed in legacies, a thouſand talents to Auguſtus; five hundred to his empreſs, and left a conſiderable fortune to the unworthy Salome. The reſt of his eſtate, lands, revenues, and money, he ordered to be divided between his children and grand-children.

[f] Idem ibid ad fin.

(K) Syllæus was a Nabathean and Herod's ſworn enemy, and was ſoon after beheaded at Rome for betraying Ælius Gallus into the Arabian expedition, and for ſome other crimes (45).

(45) De hoc vide Strab. l. xvi.

A tumult in the city.

But if he was capable of receiving any real satisfaction from this diſpoſal of his crown and wealth according to his inclination, it was ſoon after ſoured by a ſeditious tumult, which was raiſed about this time by Judas, the ſon of Sariphæus and Matthias, the ſon of Margolothus, two Jewiſh doctors, equally eminent for their learning and piety. Theſe men, at the pleaſing news of his being given over, unhappily took it into their heads to ſtir up a good number of their diſciples, at the head of the city youth, to go and pull down all the ſtructures which that monarch had built contrary to their laws. Theſe, with their two maſters at their head, having heard a report about the middle of the day that Herod was expired, went immediately to the temple-gate, over which he had ſet up a golden eagle of extraordinary bigneſs and exquiſite workmanſhip, and began their pious work with pulling it down, and breaking it into pieces with axes and hammers, as the greateſt eye-ſore of all. The king's commander in chief, expecting it to be the beginning of a ſedition, ran immediately to the place with a body of his troops, and was agreeably ſurpriſed to find it only a mob of youths, who immediately diſperſed themſelves at his arrival. Forty only of them, with their two chiefs, proving intrepid enough to ſtand their ground, were immediately ſeized, and brought to the dying king; and upon their being aſked what motive had induced them to ſuch an attempt on the temple? boldly anſwered him, that they had long ſince reſolved upon it; and that it was their only grief, that they had deferred it ſo long. They added, that they neither feared his anger, nor any puniſhment he could inflict on them, ſince what they had done was in obedience to their law, and from a pure zeal for the glory of God.

Herod's ſpeech to the aſſembly.

This affront having raiſed in ſome meaſure his drooping ſpirits, he ordered them to be ſent in chains to Jericho, whither he alſo cauſed himſelf to be conveyed in a litter, by reaſon of his extreme weakneſs. Here he aſſembled the heads of the Jews, and, in a ſet ſpeech, reminded them of the great and glorious things he had done for them, and of the ſumptuous edifices he had reared to the glory of God, during his whole reign, and for which he expected to have deſerved better returns, and to have endeared both his perſon and memory to the whole nation; but that, to his great grief, he found it quite the reverſe, ſince they had dared, even during his life, and in the face of the ſun, to offer ſuch an affront to him; and not to him only, but much more to God, to whom that golden ornament had been dedicated; ſo that they had even turned turned their malice into an open ſacrilege. The aſſembly could eaſily have told him, that his pretended dedication of a figure forbidden by the ſecond commandment, was no other than a piece of idolatrous complaiſance to the Romans; but being afraid to rouſe his cruelty too far, they contented themſelves with diſclaiming the fact, and allowing it to deſerve an exemplary puniſhment. Herod, ſomewhat ſoftened by this anſwer, contented himſelf with depoſing the high-prieſt (L), whom he ſuſpected to have been a private encourager of the tumult, and giving that dignity to his brother Joazar; after which he cauſed Mattathias the ringleader and the reſt of the priſoners to be burnt alive, and forgave all the reſt [g]. The zealots burnt alive.

THIS indignity, however, gave him reaſon enough to think what mourning the Jewiſh nation was like to make for him; and as his diſeaſe became more and more loathſome and intolerable (M), and made him ſtill more deſperate and inhuman, he bethought himſelf of ſuch a horrid expedient to prevent their rejoicing at his death, as [g] Antiq ubi ſupra, c 9.

(L) This was that Mattathias, of whom we have had occaſion to ſpeak heretofore, who having contracted ſome pollution in a dream on the eve of the expiation day, was forced to ſubſtitute another to perform the ceremonies of that ſolemnity Joſephus adds, that the moon ſuffered an eclipſe on the night following that pontiff's depoſition (46).

(M) This diſeaſe which Joſephus (47) doth not ſcruple to call a judicial one, was ſo complicated, and attended with ſuch nauſeous and frightful ſymptoms, that we believe our readers will gladly ſpare us the repetition of them here. However, the king, ſtill flattering himſelf with the hopes of a cure, ſent for phyſicians from all parts, who, having tried their art in vain, adviſed him at length to the hot waters of Callirhoe, on the other ſide Jordan, which empty themſelves in the lake Aſphaltites. Upon his coming thither, he was ordered to be ſet in a veſſel of oil up to the neck, which inſtead of relieving him, threw him into a fainting fit, out of which he was with difficulty brought by the outcries of his attendants. It was then that he firſt began to think his diſeaſe incurable; upon which he ordered a donative of fifty drachms per head to all his ſoldiers, and proportionably to his officers, and ordered himſelf to be conveyed to Jericho, where he ſoon after iſſued out that bloody edict we are going to mention in the text.

(46) Antiq. ubi ſupra. c. 8. (47) Idem ibid.

Herod's last legacy to the Jews.

ſcarcely ever entered into the heart of any tyrant. He iſſued out his ſummons for the heads of all the Jews to repair to Jericho on a ſet day, under pain of death; and, upon their arrival, ordered them all to be ſhut up in the Circus: and having ſent for his ſiſter Salome and her huſband Alexas, gave them ſtrict charge to have them all butchered as ſoon as his breath was gone. By this means, added he, I ſhall not only damp the people's joy, but ſecure a real mourning at my death. About this time came back his meſſengers from Rome, with Auguſtus's approbation of Antipater's ſentence, and the news that Achme had been there put to death for her treachery. Herod could not but feel a ſenſible joy at it, in ſpite of all his tortures; and finding himſelf at that time very hungry, he called for an apple and a knife; but his pains increaſing at that inſtant, and he eſſaying to put an end to them with the knife, made a grandſon of his, who tried to ſtop his hand, give a great ſhriek, which alarmed the court, and made every body without believe that he was dead. The report of it ſoon reached Antipater's priſon, who expreſſed ſuch lively joys and hopes at the news, as haſtened his execution; for his gaoler having acquainted the king with it, threw him into ſuch a rage, that he diſpatched one of his guards on the very inſtant to put him to death [h]. He outlived his ſon but five days, during which he altered his will afreſh, left his kingdom to Archelaus, made Antipas tetrarch of Galilee and Perea; and left to Philip the regions of Trachonitis, Gaulon, Batanea, and Panias, which he erected likewiſe into a tetrarchy. To Salome, beſides fifty thouſand pieces in money, he gave the cities of Jamnia, Azotus, and Phaſaelis, with ſome conſiderable legacies to his other relations. He died in the ſeventieth year of his age, and the thirty ſeventh after his advancement to the Jewiſh crown, and the thirty-fourth year after the expulſion and death of Antigonus [i] (N), and to the no ſmall joy of all the Jews.

Antipater put to death.

Herod's death.

For

[h] Ibid. ad fin. [i] Ibid. c. 10. ſub init.

(N) Archbiſhop Uſher dates his death on the 25th of November, the ſeventh month, called Ciſleu (48). Another learned chronologer obſerves, that it gave the Jewiſh nation a joyful occaſion for a feſtival, as he died hated of all wiſe men (49).

(48) Sub A. M. 4001. (49) Vide Megillath Tahanith ſub men. Ciſlez.

Our

FOR Salome and Alexas, bad as they were, and in ſpite of all the oaths and proteſtations their tyrannic brother had extorted from them at his death, were ſo far from executing his laſt inhuman orders, that they even ſtrove to ſmother the ſhameful ſecret from the nation. To this end they went immediately after his being expired to the hippodrome, where the heads of the Jews were detained, cauſed the gates to be flung open, and declared to them, that it was the king's order they ſhould all depart to their reſpective homes, he having no further occaſion for their preſence; which they accordingly did; ſoon after which, and not 'till then, they publiſhed the news of Herod's death (O). They then ſummon-

The impriſoned chiefs releaſed by Salome.

Year of the Flood 3000. After Chriſt 1. Before the vulgar æra, 5. Archelaus proclaimed.

Our learned prelate has therein followed the Jewiſh book laſt quoted, which places his death on the ſeventh day of that month, according to the Hebrew computation; but a late critic has ſince pretended that the old Megillah had been long ſince loſt, and this new one foiſted into the world inſtead of it, and is therefore of no authority (50). We ſhall content ourſelves with referring our readers to another learned man (1), who has fully confuted this aſſumption, it being quite out of our province to enter further into that diſpute.

The Jewiſh hiſtorian ſums up Herod's character in theſe remarkable words (2); He was a man inexorably cruel, and a ſlave to his paſſions. His will was his law; and yet no man, in the general, more fortunate than he. He mounted the throne from the condition of a private man, fell into many difficulties, but ſurmounted them all, and lived at laſt to a great age. As to his domeſtic broils with his children and family, how unhappy ſoever he may have been in my opinion, yet was he fortunate in his own; for he got ſtill the better of his enemies.

(O) Whether this unexpected releaſe of the Jewiſh heads was really owing to the leſs brutiſh temper of Salome and her huſband, or whether it might not, as they gave it out, have been ordered by the relenting tyrant at his laſt agonies, and ſuppreſſed by the Jewiſh hiſtorian out of hatred to that monarch; ſure it is, that the very deſign, much more the proſecuting it ſo far, muſt argue him to have been a monſter of cruelty, and capable of the moſt horrid butcheries, to ſatiate either his ambition or reſentment.

This will ſufficiently take off the objection againſt the probability of his murdering ſo many infants in and about Bethlehem, drawn from the horridneſs of the act; and we have had occaſion already to ſhew, that Joſephus's ſilence of it can much leſs invalidate the authority of the evangeliſt, who affirms it as a fact well known to the Jewiſh nation.

(50) Bern. Lamy, appar. chronol. p. 1. c. 9 ſect. 5. (1) Joh. Meyer. annot. in Megill. Taban. p. 62. & ſeq. (2) Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 10.

ed the chief officers and ſoldiery to the amphitheatre at Jericho, and read to them a letter from the deceaſed king, in which he thanked them for their paſt ſervices and fidelity to him, and deſired them to ſhew it now to his ſon Archelaus, whom he had appointed his ſucceſſor. His laſt will was read to them at the ſame time by Ptolemy, the then keeper of the royal ſeal, in which there was this remarkable clauſe, That it was to be of no force till ratified by Cæſar. The audience, however, taking it for granted, that that emperor would not fail to confirm it, ſent out an univerſal ſhout, Long live king Archelaus; and both officers and ſoldiers promiſed him the ſame allegiance and attachment which they had ſhewn to his father.

Herod's ſtately funeral.

The new king, to ſhew his gratitude to him, began with preparing him a funeral anſwerable to his greatneſs and dignity. His body was laid on a ſumptuous golden litter, inriched with variety of precious ſtones, wearing the royal crown on his head, and holding the ſceptre in his hand. His ſons and grandſons, of whom we have ſpoken in a former ſection, his ſiſter and her huſband, accompanied with the reſt of his relations, marched by his ſide, and were followed by all his officers, both civil and military, according to their rank. Among the latter his guards led the van; then came the Thracians, next the Germans, and laſt of all the Gauls or Galatians; all of them armed and in order of battle. The proceſſion was cloſed with five hundred of the king's domeſtics with aromatic perfumes, and proceeded to his caſtle of Herodion mentioned in the laſt ſection, which was about eight ſtades, or a thouſand paces, diſtant from Jericho (P), and

(P) Or rather, as Joſephus has it in another place (3), two hundred ſtades or furlongs; for leſs than that could hardly be, conſidering that it was but ſixty from Jeruſalem. Our learned Uſher therefore ſuppoſes ſome error crept in the former, and that the hiſtorian there meant, that the cavalcade marched but eight ſtades a day (4).

Mention being alſo made of an Herodion upon one of the mountains of Arabia (5), Mr. Reland juſtly concludes, that there muſt have been two caſtles of that name built by that monarch, the former in the neighbourhood of Jeruſalem and Tekoah, viz. this where he was buried; and the other at a greater diſtance, and on the other ſide Jordan (6).

(3) Bell. Jud. l. i. c ult in fin. (4) Sub A M. 4002. (5) Bell. Jud. ibid. c. 16, & alib. (6) Palæſt. illuſtr. ſub Herodion.

where where they depoſited his remains, according to his will[k]. They returned from thence to Jeruſalem, where Archelaus, having finiſhed the ſeven days mourning for his father, according to the Jewiſh cuſtom, gave the people a magnificent feaſt. He went next to the temple cloathed in white, and in the Archelamidſt of their loud acclamations; and, being there ſeated on us's ſpeech his golden throne, gave the people thanks for the zeal they to the Jews expreſſed for him; but added, that he would not aſſume the title of king, till it had been confirmed to him by Auguſtus, tho' that, as well as the royal diadem, had been offered to him at Jericho by the ſuffrages of the whole army. He concluded with aſſuring them, that, as ſoon as he was confirmed by the emperor, his chief care and ſtudy ſhould be to deſerve that love they ſo unanimouſly teſtified for him, and to make his reign more eaſy and happy, than that of his father had proved to the Jewiſh nation. This ſpeech was followed with ſuch vollies of huzzas; after which they began to try the ſincerity of it, by a number of petitions ſuitable to their different exigencies. Some begged for an alleviation of their tribute, others for the total abolition of the cuſtoms, others again for the releaſe of priſoners; all which were readily granted at this lucky juncture, Archelaus not thinking it adviſeable to exaſperate them by a denial. The whole ceremony was concluded with ſuitable ſacrifices, and a ſumptuous entertainment, which he gave there to his friends.

THE Jews, however, ſoon reſumed their rebellious courſe A new tu- in ſpite of all theſe grants. That afternoon was ſcarcely over, mult raiſed before a number of malecontents, who had been for ſome time holding ſecret cabals for raiſing new mutinies, broke looſe in a body, and, for want of a more plauſible pretence, came beating their breaſts, bewailing the deaths of Mattathias and others of his accomplices, who had been burnt for pulling down the golden eagle; and demanded juſtice againſt thoſe friends of the deceaſed king, who had had a hand in their deaths; particularly they deſired, that the high-prieſthood might be taken from Joazar, to whom it had been given upon that occaſion. This unexpected indignity failed not to exaſperate the new king; but as he was upon the point of departing for Rome, and was unwilling either to have his journey ſtopped by this tumult, or to go away before it was quelled; he ſent his maſter of the horſe to appeaſe them by fair words, and to remind them, that the king would do nothing till he was confirmed by the emperor; but, before he could utter a word to them, they fell a pelting him with vollies of [k] Idem ibid. & Bell. Jud. l. i. c. ult.

ſtones,

ſtones, ſo that he was forced to withdraw. He ſent ſome freſh officers on the ſame errand, and they met with the ſame reception; inſomuch, that they wanted but number to have raiſed themſelves into open rebellion. By this time the feaſt of the paſſover was come, which brought a great concourſe of people from all parts to Jeruſalem; during which ſolemnity the malecontents never ſtirred from the temple, but choſe to beg for ſubſiſtence of the comers, rather than leave the place, or intermit their godly work, till they were drove from it by main force [l].

The mutineers diſperſed.

Archelaus, who juſtly feared, leſt theſe mutineers ſhould ſpread the infection among the multitudes that repaired to the feaſt, ſent an officer at the head of ſome troops, with expreſs orders either to diſperſe them, or to ſeize on ſuch as ſtood their ground. They were ſcarcely come in ſight of the revolters, before they found themſelves briſkly attacked by them, and by a greater number of ſtrangers, whom their outcries had inſpired with the ſame rebellious ſpirit; a bloody encounter followed, in which moſt of the ſoldiers were killed upon the ſpot, and the officer terribly wounded and narrowly eſcaped with his life. This freſh indignity obliged at length Archelaus to ſend his whole army againſt them, with orders to his cavalry to kill all that came out of the temple, and to hinder the ſtrangers from aſſiſting them. After another obſtinate fight, in which three thouſand of the rebels were killed, the reſt were ſoon put to flight, and betook themſelves to the mountains; upon which the king publiſhed an order for all ſtrangers to depart to their own homes, by which an end was put to the paſchal ſolemnity for that year, the rebellion ſuſpended for ſome time, and Archelaus was left at liberty to prepare for his journey to Rome [m]. He ſet out ſoon after accordingly, leaving the government of the kingdom to his brother Philip, and took with him his mother Mattace, by nation a Samaritan, Nicholas Damaſcen, an old friend and counſellor of his late father, and a great number of other friends. He was likewiſe accompanied by his aunt Salome, with her children and ſome other near relations, who pretended to aſſiſt him with their intereſt at the Auguſtan court, when their real deſign was to obſtruct his confirmation, and to accuſe him to the emperor of the maſſacre of his ſubjects lately committed in the temple.

[l] Antiq. ubi ſupra. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 1. [m] Antiq. ibid. c. 11. Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra.

When

WHEN Archelaus was come to Cæſarea, he was met there by Sabinus, Auguſtus's intendant of Syria, who was haſtening into Judæa, to take care of the rich legacies which Herod had bequeathed to that emperor. He had, however, been diſſuaded by Varus, in his way thither, from undertaking any thing further, till the emperor's will was known, and Archelaus confirmed in his kingdom; ſo that he had been prevailed upon by that Syrian governor to ſtay in that city till he had received further orders from Rome. He ſtayed, however, no longer there than till Varus was returned to Antioch, his capital; after which he went immediately to Jeruſalem, lodged himſelf at the royal palace, and ſummoned the king's treaſurers to give him an account, and to put him in poſſeſſion of thoſe treaſures; but as theſe had orders from Archelaus not to part with them till his return, they refuſed to deliver them to Sabinus, alledging they would preſerve them for Auguſtus, till they received further directions from him. By this time Archelaus and his retinue were arrived at Rome; and among thoſe whom the ſubtle Salome had brought with her to oppoſe his election, was Antipas, another of Herod's ſons, whom that monarch had appointed his ſucceſſor by his firſt will, and whom ſhe deſigned to ſet up againſt his brother, under pretence that that was of greater validity than his ſecond. Antipas had been perſuaded to take this ſtep, not only by Salome, but much more by one Ireneus, an eloquent orator, and one that was perfectly verſed in all the affairs of ſtate, had been admitted into the inmoſt ſecrets of Herod's court; and, being come with him to Rome, was moſt likely to repreſent that young prince's claim to the beſt advantage. With that orator was alſo another great ſtateſman, named Ptolemy, the brother of Nicolas Damaſcen, and one of the late king's counſellors. Antipas had likewiſe brought his mother Cleopatra, born at Jeruſalem, with ſome other relations and friends; and theſe were ſcarcely come to Rome with him, before they found means to draw the greateſt part of Archelaus's relations and partiſans over to their ſide [n] (Q).

Archelaus goes to Rome. Year of the Flood, 3000. Of Chriſt, 1. Before the vulgar æra, 5.

Antipas oppoſes him.

THERE

[n] Idem, ibid.

(Q) It ſeems by Joſephus's account, as if Archelaus's party had taken ſome diſguſt at him, either from his ſevere manner of quelling the late tumult in Judæa, or on ſome other pretence; whilſt Antipas and his friends took care to inſpire them with hopes of a milder government under him. But there was ſtill a third party, who

THERE was still another thing which very much weakened the interest of Archelaus, namely, his officers at Jerusalem refusing to deliver up Herod's legacies to Sabinus; of which both he and Varus had taken care to inform the Roman court. Archelaus was therefore forced, in his own vindication, to present a memorial to the emperor, in which he exhibited his title to the crown, the particulars of Herod's last will, together with an inventory of the treasure which that monarch had left behind him, to which he likewise added his royal signet with which that will was sealed. This memorial was soon followed by another from Antipas, in which were displayed such allegations as were most likely to invalidate Herod's last will, and his brother's title. Augustus, having perused the writings on both sides, summoned a council of his friends to examine their respective claims, and made Caius, the son of Agrippa by his adopted daughter Julia, president of it. Antipater, the son of Salome, an eloquent speaker and sworn enemy to Archelaus, opened with a speech full of the bittercst invectives against him; such as his having assumed the royal title and authority, without staying for the emperor's consent; his having caused three thousand Jews to be massacred in the temple by his own troops at the late passover-festival; his having turned out several eminent officers, and put others in their room; his having presumed to sit on the royal throne, heard and adjudged causes, and granted considerable immunities, released all the prisoners whom his father had caused to be shut up in the Circus; all this by his own assumed authority, and in the quality of a Jewish monarch. He likewise accused him of unnatural contempt to the memory of his deceased father, from whom he had received such signal tokens of paternal love, and of his having spent the night, which followed that monarch's death, in such feasting and jollity, as was like to have raised a sedition among the people, who could not behold such a flagrant instance of ingratitude without the utmost detestation. He concluded with telling the court, that Herod, who best knew the opposite tempers of the two brothers, had not so much as dreamt of appointing him his successor, whilst he enjoyed his health and senses; but had expressly named Antipas to that dignity; but supposing that he had conceived a better opinion of Archelaus during his last sickness, he has shewn you now what a who, liking neither of the brothers, nor indeed any of Herod's family, did what they could to make them both miscarry in their pretensions, in hopes of living solely and more quietly under the dominion of the Romans.

Antipater's speech against Archelaus.

king

king he is like to prove; what uſe he is like to make of his power, ſince, even whilſt in the condition of a private man, he could ſend his troops into the very temple to cut the throats of his ſubjects.

Damaſcen ſpoke next, and anſwered the greateſt part of Antipater's accuſations, by ſhewing, firſt, that, with reſpect to the pretended maſſacre in the temple, nothing leſs than ſuch a ſeverity could quell the ſedition then kindled; that thoſe men were only a band of rebellious fellows, and the firſt agreſſors, not only in raiſing the tumult, but in murdering thoſe officers whom the king had ſent to appeaſe them by the mildeſt means; and that he had acted nothing in this, or in any other inſtance, but by the advice of thoſe who were now turned his accuſers: that, as to the alteration which Herod made in his will about the ſucceſſion, he, being in his perfect ſenſes at that time, had doubtleſs very good reaſons for what he did, and might probably have obſerved ſomething in Antipas's behaviour or character, which obliged him to prefer his brother to him; and as a further proof that he had altered it upon cooler thoughts, he urged his ſubmitting the validity of it to the emperor, without whoſe approbation it was to be of no force. As ſoon as he had made an end of ſpeaking, Archelaus went and threw himſelf at Auguſtus's feet in ſuch humble guiſe, as moved his compaſſion towards him. Cæſar raiſed him up, pronounced him worthy of the Jewiſh crown, and promiſed to do nothing contrary to his father's will; after which he diſmiſſed the aſſembly without any further deciſion, being deſirous to take ſome time to conſider, whether he ſhould beſtow the kingdom ſolely upon him, or divide it among Herod's children, ſeeing they all applied themſelves alike to him for redreſs [o].

WHILE theſe things were tranſacting at Rome, the reſtleſs Jews had raiſed a new inſurrection in Jeruſalem, which was, however, ſuppreſſed by Varus's ſpeedy arrival from Antioch, and the puniſhment of the ringleaders; but, upon his return to Antioch, having left Sabinus with a Roman legion to keep that metropolis in awe, this general, ſeeing himſelf ſuperior to the Jews, made a bold puſh upon the fortreſſes of the city, and the treaſures of the Herodian family, with a deſign to convert them to his own uſe. He choſe, however, a wrong time for ſuch an attempt; and the Jews, who came flocking thither to the approaching feaſt of pentecoſt, not perhaps ſo much out of devotion as to oppoſe his deſigns, did quickly divide themſelves into three bodies, one of which besieged him and his troops in the royal palace, whilst the other two went and possessed themselves, the one of the Hippodrome, and the other of the temple on the east and north sides of it; so that he was inclosed on every side, and in danger of being overpowered by the Jews. These were the more exasperated against him, because he had forced his way into the treasury of the temple, and brought away four hundred talents out of it, besides other rich plunder, which his soldiers had carried off, in spite of all their opposition. This desperate attempt had happened as follows: the Roman general, seeing himself hemmed in on all sides, and on the brink of being assaulted by the resolute Jews, sent an express to desire Varus to come immediately to his assistance; whilst himself getting up on the top of one of the towers of the castle, named Phasael, from thence beckoned to his troops to make a sally on the enemy. They did so, and had an obstinate skirmish with them, in which they killed a number of Jews. The rest, not at all discouraged at this loss, got up on the outer galleries of the temple, from which they galled the Romans with stones and arrows, whilst those of the enemy from below had quite lost their strength before they could reach them. Tired at length, and ashamed to see the advantage the Jews had over them, they brought vast quantities of wood, and other combustible matter, to the foot of the wall, and setting it on fire, plied it so briskly with fresh fuel, that the flame reached at length to the cornishes of the gallery; which, being of timber, and covered with paint and wax, on which the gilding was laid, were easily set on a blaze. A great number of the Jews on the battlements perished in the flames, whilst the rest, casting themselves down headlong, either died by the fall, or by the enemy's sword; so that not one of all those brave men was left alive, the Romans giving no quarter to any of them. As soon therefore as the flames were so far abated, that these could wade through them, they broke into the sacred treasury, from which they carried off the plunder above-mentioned.

[o] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 11, Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra.

Sabinus besieged.

Some Jews burnt and killed.

THESE two actions therefore could not but highly exasperate the Jewish nation, and make them double their vigour against him. Accordingly whilst one part was taken up in undermining the palace, another was endeavouring to cause a defection from the Roman general, by promising an amnesty and free leave to march off unmolested to as many as should leave the place. They added the like promise to Sabinus upon the same conditions, and assured the Roman troops, that they had no other design in taking up arms, but to free themselves themſelves from the tyrannic yoke of the Herodian family. Sabinus would have gladly embraced the offer; but the injuries he had done the Jews would not permit him to rely on their promiſe, ſo that he choſe rather to wait for the reinforcement he expected from Varus. During this time new troubles were raiſed in other parts of Judæa; among others two thouſand valiant veterans of the late king, who had been diſcharged from the ſervice, aſſembled themſelves in a body, and fell upon Archelaus's forces commanded by his nephew Archiabus; but this young general, not daring to face them upon equal terms, knowing them to be old experienced ſoldiers, went and ſecured himſelf as well as he could in ſome fortreſſes, and other places of difficult acceſs [P].

A ſedition raiſed by Judas.

WE have heretofore had occaſion to mention one Ezechias, a captain of a gang of banditti, whom Herod had with much difficulty caught and put to death, with about forty of his troops. This man left a ſon named Judas, who, ſeeing now the country labouring under a kind of civil war, took this opportunity to revenge his father's death; and having got together a band of moſt deſperate fellows at Sephoris, a city in Galilee (R), after ſeveral incurſions into the king's dominions, forced at length into the royal armory, where he equipped his men cap-a-peé, and from thence into the treaſury of all the places where he came, and being thus furniſhed with men, arms, and money, injected terror into the

[P] Antiq. ubi ſupra. Bell. Judaic. l. ii. c. 2.

(R) This city, tho' not to be met with in Joſhua or any of the ſacred writers, at leaſt by any thing like that name, is frequently mentioned by Joſephus; and we have had occaſion to ſpeak of it in a former ſection, as one of the five places in which Gabinius ſettled his independent tribunals. It was in the tribe of Zebulun, not far from the mountain and plains of Thabor, and was one of the firſt cities in Galilee on the road to Ptolemais. It became afterwards the metropolis of that province in Nero's time, when that emperor gave it to young Agrippa.

It has been ſince known by the name of Diocæſarea. It is placed at about twelve miles more or leſs, for authors are not agreed about it) from Tiberias, and near the famed mount Aſhmon, or Acmon, which was looked upon as the center or navel of Galilee, 7).

[7] De hac vide Joſeph. Antiq l. xiv. c. 10. xvii. c. 12. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 2. & alib paſſ.

whole province, and plundered all he could come at; and so successful was he for some time, that he began to aim at the supreme power; whence he is thought, not without good grounds, to have been the same which is mentioned by St. Luke [q] under the name of Theudas (S).

A second by Simeon.

HE was not the only one that aimed at the crown, during these troublesome times. There started up another, named Simeon, a person of comely stature, strongly built, and well esteemed by the Jews, and sufficiently conceited to think himself worthy of it. He had been employed by Herod in affairs of great importance with credit. As soon therefore as he appeared at the head of a party, the people saluted him king of the Jews; and he, to shew his zeal against the two rival sons of his late master, led his men directly to Jericho, where they set the royal palace, a rich and stately building, in flames. He proceeded to do the like to several others, giving his men the whole plunder of them. What further mischiefs such a leader, at the head of such resolute fellows, might have done, if their career had not been timely stopped, is easy to guess; but happily for that country, Gratus, Archelaus's general, or, according to Tacitus [r], Varus, the Syrian governor, fell suddenly upon them, and, whilst they fought with more courage than skill, gave them a total overthrow. Simeon was caught in his flight in some narrow defile, and, being brought to the general, had his head immediately struck off [s]. Whilst these were plundering and burning the royal palaces in one part of the country, another gang was doing the same in another; particularly that of Amatha on the Jordan, built probably by Herod for the benefit of the hot waters, which that city was famed for [t], and took its name from (T).

[q] Acts. v. 36. [r] Hist. l. v. [s] JOSEPH ubi supra. Euseb. Onomast. sub voce.

(S) This seems more than probable, not only from what each historian says of him, the one, that he aimed at the crown, and the other, that he gave himself out to be some eminent person, or great deliverer; such as the Jews were in more than ordinary expectation of at this time; but likewise from the affinity of their name תודה Thoudah in the Syriac, answering to the Hebrew יהודה Jehudah, and to the Greek Ιουδας (8).

(T) From the Hebrew חמה or חמת Chamah, or Chamath, in the regimen, signifying hot. Mr. Reland thinks it to the same with Ramoth-Gilead.

(8) Vide ann. Usser. sub. A. M. 4003.

BUT

BUT the moſt deſperate and dangerous of all thoſe ſeditious gangs, for they raged in every place like an epidemic diſeaſe, was that of one Athronges, heretofore an obſcure ſhepherd, of no merit or worth, but what he challenged from his gigantic ſtature and brutiſh ſtoutneſs. This fellow ſet up likewiſe for the royal authority. He had four brothers of the ſame monſtrous ſize, whom he made his lieutenants over the multitudes that came flocking to him, for the honour of fighting under his banner. He took upon him the royal diadem, and tho' he often conſulted his council, yet acted according to his arbitrary will. He hated the Romans and Herodians alike; but the former felt oftener the effects of his cruelty. He gave no quarter to either ſide, when they fell into his hands; but he ſeemed rather to bend his force againſt the Romans, becauſe their late plunders and cruelties were freſher in every body's memory. He laid an ambuſh againſt one of their convoys of corn near Emmaus, and fell upon them ſo ſuddenly, that he left their commanding officer and forty of his men dead on the ſpot, and would in all likelihood have cut them all off, had not Gratus come in good time to their aſſiſtance. At length, after many ſuch exploits, the mock monarch fell into the hands of Archelaus, after his return into Judæa. One of his brothers was taken by Gratus, and another by Ptolemy. The laſt of them ſurrendered himſelf upon good conditions; and ſo the whole gang was diſperſed. But all this while the whole country was ſtill in a flame from freſh inſurrections, as well as from that of the Jews againſt Sabinus, whilſt the Herodian competitors were waiting at Rome for the emperor's deciſion.

A third by Athronges.

His gang defeated.

BY this time Varus, being appriſed of the danger Sabinus and his legion were in, took the road to Judæa, at the head of his other two, which was all that he had then in Syria, and with four troops of horſe and ſome foot, which he had got from the neighbouring tetrarchs. He ordered their rendezvous at Ptolemais, where he received ſome freſh auxiliaries, beſides fifteen hundred more, which the king of Arabia ſent him to Berytus, more out of hatred to the Herodian family, than love to the Romans. With part of his army Varus marched towards Samaria, whilſt the reſt, under the command of his ſon, made an inroad into that part of Galilee which was neareſt to Ptolemais. This laſt, having put to flight all that oppoſed him, went and took Sephoris, ſold all the inhabitants by auction, ſet fire to that noble city, and reduced it into a heap of rubbiſh. His father, on the other Varus marches against the beſiegers.

other hand, paſſed by Samaria, becauſe he heard that it had had no hand in the Jewiſh inſurrections, and marched ſtraight to Jeruſalem. In his way he ſuffered his Arabian troops to plunder and burn ſeveral villages and towns; ſuch as Arus, becauſe it belonged to Ptolemy, a friend of Herod; Sampho, and Emmaus; this laſt in revenge of the ſlaughter which Athronges had made of the Romans near that place; but the inhabitants of it, foreſeeing the ſtorm, had timely for-ſook it. Whilſt this was doing without the city, the beſiegers, who were juſt going to ſtorm the palace, having heard of Varus coming with ſuch a force, raiſed the ſiege and marched off in a fright; upon which the beſieged came forth, with the grandchildren of Herod, to compliment him on his arrival, and to thank him for his timely help. Sabinus was the only one who did not follow their example; but ſtole away privately towards the ſea. Varus gave a very ſevere reprimand to the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, for the late hoſtilities againſt the Roman legion; but was ſoon appeaſed, when he was apprifed, that they neither had a hand in it, nor were able to hinder it, being themſelves pent up by thoſe foreign Jews, who were come to the feaſt and had begun the tumult. However, as he thought it expedient to make a ſevere example of the ringleaders of it, he ſent ſome of his troops through the whole kingdom, with orders to make a ſtrict ſearch after them, and bring them priſoners to him. Upon their return they brought a vaſt number of thoſe wretches, two thouſand of whom he cauſed to be crucified, and releaſed the reſt. This ſeverity did not hinder another body of ten thouſand from taking up arms againſt him, which prevented his diſbanding his auxiliaries, as he had deſigned, and obliged him to ſend them to quell this new revolt. They eaſily compaſſed it, becauſe the enemy, inſtead of ſtanding the brunt, ſurrendered themſelves at diſcretion. Varus forgave the common people, and contented himſelf with ſending the chiefs of them bound to Auguſtus [u].

Raiſes the ſiege.

A new inſurrection quelled.

ALL this while Archelaus was ſoliciting the emperor to ratify his father's will, and to name him king of Judæa. About this time Martace his mother died; ſoon after which there arrived a deputation from Judæa, conſiſting of fifty of the heads of that nation, who were ſent to oppoſe his election, and to beg of the emperor, that their country might be made part of the province of Syria, and ſubject

[u] Antiq. & bell. Jud. ubi ſupra.

to

to the governors of it, without kingly government. They were ſeconded by above eight thouſand Jews then ſettled at Rome; who all profeſſed an averſion to a kingly government, and a deſire of living under that of the Romans, provided they might be allowed the free exerciſe of their religion and laws. Auguſtus referred the matter to a council of his own friends, whom he convened at the temple of Apollo, which he had lately built, and where both ſides were to be heard in their turn. Here the Jewiſh embaſſadors began with inveighing againſt Herod, who, they affirmed, had governed their nation not like a monarch, but like a tyrant, violating all their laws both ſacred and civil; impoveriſhing a nation, whom, at his firſt acceſſion to the crown, he had found rich and opulent; ſacrificing an infinite number of his ſubjects either to his ambition, jealouſy, or reſentment, not ſparing even the matrons and virgins of diſtinction, either in his fury or his luſt; notwithſtanding all which they would gladly have accepted of his ſon Archelaus for their prince, had he not given them ſo many convincing proofs of his tyrannic diſpoſition, an inſtance of which they urged in the maſſacre of the three thouſand mutineers in the temple, before he had received the imperial confirmation. They concluded with a petition to Auguſtus, that he would put their nation under the Syrian governors, and then he would ſoon be convinced, whether the Jews were really ſuch rebellious people as they had been repreſented to him; and not, on the contrary, men of the moſt ſteady loyalty to the ſuperior powers. All this was immediately anſwered by Damaſcen, who took upon him to vindicate the deceaſed, as well as the new, king, from the charge of tyranny and cruelty. And Auguſtus, having heard both ſides thus far, diſmiſſed the aſſembly, without declaring his reſolution, till further conſideration.

Cæſar's diviſion of the Jewiſh kingdom.

HE was not long, however, before he decided the controverſy in ſuch a manner, as convinced the world of his friendſhip both to Herod and to his offſpring. He beſtowed the half of the kingdom on Archelaus, under the title of Ethnarch, or governor of a nation, and backed it with a promiſe that he would give him that of king, as ſoon as he heard that he had rendered himſelf worthy of it. This part or ethnarchy contained Judæa Propria, Idumæa, and Samaria, but he exempted this laſt of one fourth part of their taxes, in conſideration of their peaceable behaviour during the late troubles in Judæa and Galilee. However, this partition, as well as change of title from a king to an ethnarch, plainly ſhews, that that he was nothing less than satisfied at his proceedings; and indeed, whatever Damascen might urge to colour his too speedy assumption of the regal power, it is plain, he had not paid that regard to the emperor which he ought to have done; all which was sufficiently aggravated by the opposite party. And as he looked upon that young prince as too likely to follow his father's violent measures, nothing could be more prudently thought on to keep him within due bounds, than such a conditional promise. He likewise dismembered from Judæa the cities of Gaza, Gadara, and Hippon, because they followed the customs of the Greeks; and joined them to the province of Syria. Josephus reckons the whole yearly revenue of this new ethnarchy to have amounted to six hundred talents. The remainder of Herod's kingdom was divided between his other two sons, Philip and Antipas; the former of whom had the regions of Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, to which Cæsar added that part of Galilee which had formerly belonged to Zenodorus, mentioned a little higher, and which alone amounted to about one hundred talents per year. The latter had the greatest part of Galilee, and the countries beyond Jordan, amounting to two hundred talents a year. Salome had for her share, besides half a million of silver, the cities of Jamnia, Azotus, and Phasaelis, to which Augustus added that of Ascalon. The rest of Herod's legacies, particularly the fifteen hundred talents which he had bequeathed to him, he generously distributed between his other relations, his grandsons, and two virgin-daughters, whom he married to Pheroras's sons, reserving for himself only a few of his moveables, not so much for their value, as out of regard to the memory of his deceased friend [w].

A pseudo Alexander sets up for the crown.

This new division of the Jewish kingdom was scarce settled, before there started up a new pretender, who quickly drew a numerous party after him. He was a Jew brought up at Sidon, and so like the late Alexander the son of Herod by Mariamne, formerly put to death, that, when he came to give himself out to be the same, and to have been preserved alive, he easily deceived, not only the bulk of the Jews, but even those who had been acquainted with that unfortunate prince. He was assisted in this imposture by a cunning fellow, who had formerly gone through all the intrigues of Herod's court, and who finding the young man capable of carrying it on with great likelihood of success, advised him to set about it immediately. These two accordingly began with giving out, that the two young princes, Alexander and Ariſtobulus, whom the Jews ſuppoſed to have been put to death purſuant to their father's order, had been preſerved by a faithful friend, and two other perſons ſubſtituted in their ſtead. Theſe two went firſt to Crete, thence to Melos, where they raiſed conſiderable ſums of money from the Jews that were ſettled in thoſe iſlands. Having ſucceeded ſo well at their firſt ſetting out, they reſolved to ſail for Rome; and being arrived at Puteoli, were met by all the heads of the Jews, eſpecially by thoſe who were in the intereſt either of the Herodian, or of the Aſmonean, families, of both which they looked upon him as the immediate heir, and conſequently as the only rightful king of the Jews. Upon this ſuppoſition, they ſpared neither pains, coſt, nor acclamations, to render his entry into Rome as ſplendid as poſſible. The litter or chair of ſtate in which he was carried, the vaſt crouds that accompanied him, and the reception he met with at every place he came to, were all anſwerable to the high notion they had conceived of him.

[w] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 13. Vide & Strab. & Tacit. ubi supra.

with

As ſoon as they were come to Rome, whither the reſt of the Jews flocked in crouds, to pay their homage to this new-riſen offſpring of the Aſmonean race, Auguſtus, who knew Herod too well to believe that he could be impoſed upon in a matter of ſuch importance, ſent one of his freedmen, named Celadus, formerly a companion of the two brothers, to bring this new Alexander to him. Celadus, was as eaſily impoſed upon as the reſt; but Cæſar, who examined him with a more curious and unerring eye, ſoon diſcovered a manifeſt deficiency in the port and majeſty of this upſtart, from what he had obſerved in that young prince, beſides a certain callo-ſity in the hands of the former, which convinced him of the cheat. He therefore aſked him and his inſtrument, What was become of his brother? and why he did not likewiſe come and make out his claim to the Jewiſh crown? and was readily anſwered by both, that Ariſtobulus had ſtaid at Cyprus to wait the iſſue of this journey, that if one of the ſons of Marianne miſcarried, the other might be preſerved to keep up the Aſmonean race and title. Their mutual agreement, which ſtill helped to confirm the reſt, ſerved only to make the emperor look upon the whole as a forged ſtory; and, to be further convinced of it, having taken the young man aſide, he, partly by threats, and partly by a promiſe of ſparing his life, extorted a full confeſſion of the whole impoſture, the conſequence of which was, that the young man was ſent to the gallies, and the other, who had been the contriver of it, was condemned to be hanged. As for the Jews who had aſsisted them with money, Cæsar thought their loss and disappointment a sufficient punishment [x].

Diſcovered by Auguſtus

Puniſhed.

But neither the dislike which the Jews had shewn upon this occasion to the Herodian family, nor the prudent caution on which Cæsar had given Archelaus, proved sufficient to keep him within due bounds. He was no sooner returned into Judæa, than he began to betray some marks of his arbitrary and resenting temper. He began with the deposition of Joazar from the high-priesthood, on pretence, that he had sided with some of the late mutineers; and bestowed that dignity on Eleazar the brother of the deposed pontiff. He next repudiated his wife Mariamne, and married Glaphyra, the widow of his brother Alexander, contrary to the Mosaic law, because she had had several children by him, and had been married, since her first husband's death, to Juba king of Mauritania. He deposed soon after the new-installed pontiff upon some disgust, and raised Jesus the son of Sias to that dignity. He bestowed an immense deal of cost in rebuilding and beautifying the royal palace at Jericho, and bringing down one half of the stream, which watered the village of Nerea, into the grove of palm-trees which he had planted in the neighbouring fields [y]. About this time Caius, coming from Egypt [z] into Judæa, expressed his contempt of the Jewish religion, by refusing to offer up sacrifices at Jerusalem, for which he is said to have been commended by Cæsar [a].

Year of the Flood, 3001. Of Christ 2. Before the vulgar æra 2. Archelaus's tyranny.

The first years of Archelaus proved peaceable enough; but the people at length, both Jews and Samaritans, being tired with his tyrannical reign, joined in a petition to Augustus against him; which had no sooner reached him, than he sent an agent of his into Judæa, without any other letter, to fetch the Jewish ethnarch to him. Archelaus, tho' warned, as well as the incestuous Glaphyra, by some portending dreams (V), had given so little heed to them, that Cæsar's messenger

[x] Antiq. ubi supra, c. ult. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 5. [y] Antiq. ibid. Bell. Jud. ubi supra, c. 6. [z] Oros. l. vii. c. 3. [a] Suetон. in Octav. c. 93.

(V) These dreams, which, whether true or false, shew how much the Jewish nation was addicted to them, our author gives us the following account of:

Archelaus saw ten ears of corn full ripe, and ten oxen devouring them; which vision made such an impression on him, that he consulted the wisest and most expert magicians and Chaldeans about ger found him in the height of his mirth, when he came to acquaint him with his orders, and obliged him to haſten with him to Rome. Upon their arrival there, Auguſtus, with his uſual equanimity, heard both the charge and the defence; after which he condemned Archelaus to be baniſhed to the city of Vienna, in Gaul or Dauphiné, and all his goods to be confiſcated. Judæa, by this ſentence, being reduced into a province of the empire, was ordered to be taxed, and Cyrenius, the then governor of Syria and a man of conſular dignity, was ſent thither to ſee it executed (as we have lately hinted upon another occaſion); after which having ſold Archelaus's palaces, and ſeized upon all his treaſure, he returned to Antioch, leaving the Jews in no ſmall ferment upon the account of this new tax [b]. Baniſhed. Year of the flood, 3005. Of Chriſt 6.

Coponius, the Roman general of horſe and governor of Judæa under Cyrenius, had accompanied him in that expedition; and his preſence, as well as the good offices of Joazar the then high-prieſt (W), had, for a while, kept the nation under ſome The cauſe of their future wars and total deſtruction.

[b] JOSEPH. Antiq. ubi ſupra, Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 6.

it (9); but they differing in their opinion, one Simon an Eſſenian interpreted the ten ears of the ten years of Archelaus's reign, which, he ſaid, was to have a ſpeedy end, ſignified by their being devoured by the oxen. The event verified his interpretation, as appears by the ſequel.

That of his wife needed not, it ſeems, a conjurer to expound it. She dreamt, that her firſt huſband, the unfortunate Alexander, came to her; and, whilſt ſhe was preparing to receive him with open arms, upbraided her with her faithleſs incontinency, in marrying Juba, and then his brother Archelaus, after ſhe had had ſo many children by him; but, added he, I ſhall ſoon rid thee of this reproach. The conſequence was, that ſhe juſt lived long enough to tell her dream, and died within two days after it (10).

(W) Joſephus has forgot to tell us how he was reinſtalled into this dignity, of which he had been deprived by Archelaus ſome years before, to make room for the ſon of Sias, hinted a little higher; but it is probable, that, after that prince's baniſhment, Joazar found means to recover that dignity under the Syrian governor; and this might be the motive of that zeal which he ſhewed in appeaſing the diſcontented Jews (10).

But this laſt action, inſtead of confirming him in his pontificate, proved the cauſe of his ſecond depoſition, it having rendered him ſo obnoxious to the Jewiſh nation, that Cyrenius was forced, for ſome reſtraint, till Judas the Gaulonite, of whom we have ſpoken in the laſt ſection, and one Saducus, a turbulent Phariſee, ſet it again into a flame. We hinted before, that this bouteſeu took upon him to condemn this taxing as ſlaviſh, idolatrous, and inconſiſtent with their duty to God, the only ſovereign who could claim any homage or allegiance from the children of Abraham. This topic ſeldom failed to make an impreſſion on a people, who were taught to look upon themſelves as the only favourites of heaven, and upon the reſt of the world as deſigned to be their ſlaves; but it wrought much more effectually at this time, when their hopes of the Meſſiah or temporal deliverer inſpired them with a tenfold diſdain againſt the yoke, which their conquerors were then laying upon them. Judas therefore could not have wiſhed for a more favourable juncture, to make himſelf the head of a numerous and powerful party; And therefore, added he, it is high time, that you ſhould make a ſtrenuous puſh for your country's freedom, and, without expecting new miracles to be wrought for you, do but depend on the favour of providence, and you need not doubt of coming off conquerors. There wanted but this laſt incentive to ſet them a madding after the promiſed liberty. Accordingly, we find that his ſpeech worked them into a kind of furious phrenſy, which quickly vented itſelf into the moſt horrid butcheries and cruelties; his party plundering, burning, deſtroying, and murdering every-where, indiſcriminately Jews as well as Gentiles; and, in a word, all that oppoſed his ſpecious pretence of religion and liberty. The war, being thus kindled within and without, brought on a grievous famine, and next a peſtilence; all which did end at length in the total ruin of that rebellious and unhappy nation [c]. All this was owing to the ambition of this new upſtart ſect or faction, of whom we have already given an account in the cloſe of the laſt ſection; to which we ſhall only add, that, after the death of their chief, they diſtinguiſhed themſelves by the godly name of zealots, and under that ſpecious title committed the moſt unheard-of cruelties, and carried their violence even into the very temple.

(9) Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 6.

(10) Ibid. & antiq. ubi ſupra.

All this while the Samaritans had not forgot their old grudge againſt the Jews, tho' they had been ſo long quiet.

[c] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 1, & ſeq. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 8, & ſeq.

quietneſs ſake, to turn him out of it, and to put Ananus in his place (11).

(11) Antiq. l. xviii. c. 3.

Cyrenius

Cyrenius was scarce gone out of Judæa before they began to hatch new mischiefs against them; they waited till the next approaching feast of the passover, when, on the eve of it, a number of them having by private means slipt into the temple, strewed the galleries and other places of resort with dead mens bones, so that the priests on the next morning, finding that sacred place polluted, were forced to put a stop to the solemnity. How they afterwards purified it, and what other remedy they took to renew the festival, Josephus doth not tell us; he only adds, that it made them more cautious for the future to guard the avenues from all such insults. However, the ceremony was soon resumed, and it was on this festival that Christ, being then twelve years of age, came with his parents to that solemnity, according to the Jewish custom, which obliged all the males that have attained to that age, to repair to the temple on the three grand festivals †. Here the holy child chose to stay unknown to his parents, who were departed with the rest of the company. They did not miss him till night, when having in vain sought him among their relations and acquaintance, among whom they supposed him to have been, they returned immediately to Jerusalem. Here, after a three days sorrowful search, they found him at length in the temple, sitting among the Jewish doctors, and surprizing them with the wisdom of his questions and answers, so far beyond his mean education and tender years. His pious mother, tho' ravished at so pleasing a scene, could not forbear expressing some tender resentment at the solicitude which his absence had given her. The short answer he returned was not presently understood by them, but yet was a lecture full of excellent wisdom: Wist ye not, said he, that I must be about my father's business? and so he really was; for as he had been sent to be a teacher of the world, and as he now commenced what the Jews called a son or disciple of the law, it became him, who was to be our pattern, to make his first accesses to his future office of instructor, by coming to learn of those whom God had appointed to preserve and teach the knowledge of his laws. His mother suffered none of these sayings to slip out of her memory, and she and her husband gladly returned with him to their mean habitation, where he continued in a dutiful subjection to them. In this humble privacy, his wisdom increasing with his stature, he attracted the eyes and hearts of all that beheld him, and continued exercising the trade of a car-

The temple polluted by the Samaritans.

Jesus Christ stays after the feast.

† See before Vol III p 169, (O,. Conf. & Exod. xxiii. 14. & xxiv. 23. Deut. xvi. 16. & Luke ii. 41, & seq.

penter

penter (X) till the thirtieth year of his age, when he began to make a more glorious appearance into the world.

Cauponius was ſoon after this feaſt ſucceeded by Ambivius, in whoſe governorſhip Salome died, and bequeathed her three cities, mentioned a little higher, together with the fine grove of palm-trees planted by Archelaus, and all her vaſt treaſure, not to either of her nephews, who ſtill held their ſmall toparchies, but to the empreſs Julia, or, as Joſephus affects to call her, Livia. Ambivius after a ſhort time was ſucceeded by Annius Rufus, and Auguſtus died at Nola in Campania, as ſhall be ſeen in the Roman hiſtory, and was ſucceeded by Tiberius, after this latter had been ſomewhat above two years admitted into the copartnerſhip of the empire. From this latter muſt the fifteenth year of Tiberius, mentioned by the evangeliſt [d], be taken. Tiberius, upon his coming to the empire, recalled Rufus, and ſent Valerius Gratus into Judæa, who was the fourth Roman governor or procurator of it, and continued in that government eleven years [e]. About five years after his being entered into it, he depoſed the high-prieſt Ananus or Annas in the fifteenth year of his pontificate, and raiſed Iſhmael the ſon of Fabus to that dignity. Being ſoon after diſpleaſed with his choice, he took it from Iſhmael on Various changes of governors and high-prieſts.

Year of the Flood, 3014
Of Chriſt, 15.

[d] Luke iii 1. Vid. Usser. ſub A.M. 4017. Prid. ſub An. C. 12. [e] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 3.

(X) This is the common received opinion, founded on an antient tradition, that Joſeph dying ſoon after this feaſt, he being by that time very old, the child Jeſus was obliged to work at that trade, to maintain himſelf and his mother; and is further confirmed by the Jews calling him ſometimes the carpenter, and ſometimes the carpenter's ſon (12).

We beg leave to take notice here alſo, that this increaſe of knowledge which the evangeliſt attributes to him, is very inconſiſtent with Arius's notion of the λόγος or word ſupplying the place of the ſoul in him; neither has any of his followers, either antient or modern, been as yet able to take off the difficulty. The Socinian ſyſtem would indeed more effectually do it, were it not in too many caſes diametrically oppoſite to the doctrine of the goſpel. There remains therefore no other way to remove it, than by owning that Chriſt had a human ſoul as well as a human body, and that the former, notwithſtanding its union with his divine nature, was as capable of improvement in wiſdom, as the latter was of increaſe in ſtrength and ſtature; which is undoubtedly the antient doctrine of the chriſtian church.

(12) Conf. Marc. vi. 3. & Matth. xiii. 55. John iv. 44.

the

the next year, and gave it to Eleazar the ſon of Ananus, whom he had lately depoſed. Eleazar in a year's time was forced to reſign, and was ſucceeded by Simon the ſon of Camith, who, within the compaſs of another year, was turned out, and Joſeph, ſurnamed Caiphas, and ſon-in-law to Annas above-mentioned, was put in his room [f]; ſo uncertain and venal was that dignity become by this time (Y).

Gratus himſelf was ſoon after recalled, and ſucceeded by Pontius Pilate, a perſon who exceeded all his predeceſſors in injuſtice, extortion, and cruelty, and ſo thoroughly wedded to his own intereſt, that he was capable of the vileſt actions to promote that favourite end. Joſephus has been ſomewhat ſparing of his character; but Philo [g] has left us a lively draught of it, a ſhort ſketch of which the reader may ſee in the margin (Z); by which he may judge how qualified he was for the part he was ſhortly to act, in paſſing the moſt unjuſt ſentence on the moſt innocent of men. Year of the Flood, 025. Of Chriſt, 26.

WE hinted a little higher, that the other ſons of Herod had ſtill kept poſſeſſion of their toparchies, notwithſtanding Archelaus's depoſition and baniſhment; it will be therefore very proper here to give ſome further account of them, before we enter into a new and different ſcene. They had each of them ſettled themſelves the beſt they could in their ſmall territories. Antipas, better known by the name of Herod, who had the country of Galilee, began with rebuilding the city of Sephoris, which had but a little before been reduced into aſhes by the ſon of Varus, and ſurrounded it with a ſtrong wall and towers, ſo that it became the bulwark, and one of the beſt cities, of that canton; and as he had been ſucceſsful enough to ingratiate himſelf with the new emperor, he built another, a fine city, on the northern banks of the lake of Genezareth, and called it Tiberias, in honour f Comp. Joſeph. ubi ſupra, & Luke iii. 2. John xviii. 13. Acts iv. 6. g Legat. ad Caium.

Herod and Philip in their toparchies.

Build Sephoris and other cities.

(Y) Theſe are the two high-prieſts that are mentioned in the goſpel to have proſecuted and condemned Jeſus Chriſt to death; and Caiphas, or, as he is there called Caiaphas (13), was the perſon who adjudged it neceſſary that he ſhould be cut off to ſave the nation from ruin.

(Z) His whole adminiſtration, according to this author, was one continued ſcene of venal juſtice, rapine, tyranny, and every wicked action; of racking and putting innocent men to death, untried, and uncondemned, and of every kind of ſavage cruelty.

(13) John xi. 49, & ſeq.

of

of him (A); and from thence that lake came to be called the sea of Tiberias. This city he was forced to people mostly with Galileans and strangers, because it being built on a ground which was full of sepulchres, the going over which pollutes the Jews seven whole days, he could hardly get any of that nation to settle there, though he endowed it with considerable privileges, and gave its inhabitants the greatest encouragement, viz. land to some, houses to others, to take off their qualms of conscience about treading on dead bodies. Another city, formerly called Betaramphtha, he rebuilt, and called by the empress's name, Julias. His brother Philip followed his example, and built the village of Bethsaida, on the opposite end of the same lake, into a magnificent city, and called it likewise Julias, and gave the name of Cæsarea to Paneas, the place where the Jordan has its spring-head, after he had greatly inlarged and beautified it [h]. During this time came out that edict of Tiberius, which obliged all Jews and Egyptians to depart from the city of Rome [i], or, according to another, out of the territories of Italy [k]. The cause of this edict, being some vile practises, which a few mean persons of each of those nations had been acting in the imperial city, is foreign to our present subject; we refer our readers for a further account to Josephus [l] and the two authors last quoted. All that we need add to it is, what Philo has observed more than once [m], that this severity against the Jews, whatever pretence it might be coloured with, was hatched underhand by Sejanus. That wicked minister, who knew how opposite his plots and designs were to the known loyalty of the Jews, could not but conceive some dreadful jealou-

Jews banished Rome.

Year of the flood, 3028. Of Christ, 29.

[h] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 3. [i] TACIT. an. l. ii. c. 85. [k] SUETON. in Tiber. c. 36. [l] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 4. [m] Legat. ad Caium.

(A) Josephus adds, that it was not far from the hot baths of Emmaus; for which reason we think it necessary to remind our reader of what we observed in a former note, that the Jews gave the name of Hamah and Hammath to all places that had any such waters; that of Emmaus is the same, only softened and grecified. We must therefore not confound this last with another in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (14), which bears the same name, and most likely upon the same account.

(14) Vid. int. al. Luc. xxiv. 13. Vid. & Reland. Palest. illustr. l. i. c. 46.

Jews

ſies from them, which obliged him at length to rid himſelf of them (B).

HITHERTO Judæa, though in a violent ferment, on account of the late tax, and ſome other tumults which the Romans had appeaſed by main force, had not, however, broke out into ſuch a violent and univerſal flame, as it did after the coming of Pilate. It was this governor, whoſe fierce, obſtinate, and cruel temper, haſtened on thoſe ſeditions and revolts, which did not end but with the total extirpation of the Jewiſh ſtate. His predeceſſors had hitherto wiſely forbore to bring the Roman ſtandards into the city, becauſe their bearing the images of men and living creatures made them to be had in abomination by the Jews. But Pilate, who thought it beneath him to ſhew them the ſame complaiſance, ordered his troops, which were to winter in that metropolis, to enter it in the night, with thoſe ſtandards covered, and cauſed them on the next morning to be diſplayed. This new and ſhocking ſight put the whole city into an uproar; they went to him in a body to Cæſarea, where he then was, and begged of him that they might be removed to ſome other place; but were anſwered, that he could not comply with their requeſt, without glancing an affront on the emperor. As they ſtood ſtiff in their petition, and he in his denial, ſix whole days, five of which the former had continued proſtrate on the ground before his palace, night and day [n], he at length came out to them, as with deſign to give them audience; and, being mounted on his tribunal, which he had reared in the circus, gave the ſignal to ſome of his troops, whom he had conveniently poſted, to fall on them, and to murder all that ſhould not immediately depart, and who inſtantly came out, and ſurrounded them. The Jews, however, far from being terrified at ſo horrid a perfidy, did meekly hold out their necks to thoſe butchers, telling them and the governor, that the loſs of their lives was nothing ſo terrible to them as the violation of their laws: and Pilate, who expected nothing leſs than ſuch a paſſive conſtancy in that turbulent nation, was ſo moved at it, that he at length granted their requeſt, and ordered the ſtandards to be removed out of their metropolis [o].

Pilate cauſes new troubles in Judæa.

Sets up ſtandards at Jeruſalem.

[n] Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 8. [o] Id. ibid. & antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 4.

(B What ſeems to confirm what our author ſays on that ſubject is, that after the death of that faithleſs miniſter, the emperor expreſſed himſelf more favourably with reſpect to the Jews, in the orders he ſent to the ſeveral governors of his provinces, as ſhall be ſeen in the ſequel.

Shields consecrated to Tiberius hung up in the royal palace.

But as he ſeems to have been wholly bent upon mortifying and ſpighting the Jewiſh nation, he ſoon reſumed his uſual courſe. A project came next into his head to ſet up a number of ſhields in the royal palace of Jeruſalem in honour of Tiberius (C); but which the Jews failed not to reſent, as an indignity offered to them, rather than a compliment to that emperor. He had, it is true, taken care that there ſhould be no carved images upon them that might give them offence; but the very inſcription of them was, they thought, contrary to their law; otherwiſe there was nothing more common, both before and after the Jewiſh captivity, than for the Jewiſh monarchs to cover even the front of the temple with ſuch ornaments, as the reader muſt have often obſerved through the courſe of their hiſtory. The magiſtrates therefore of that metropolis, with the ſons of Herod (D) at their head, went to repreſent to him in the moſt civil terms, that ſuch a conſecration was contrary to their laws, and to beg of him that he would pay a greater regard to them. Pilate repulſed them with his uſual ſcorn and obſtinacy, till they ventured at length to adviſe him, not to puſh things ſo far as to exaſperate the nation into an open revolt. They added, that if he had received any ſuch command from Cæſar, he need but ſhew it to them, and they would immediately diſpatch a deputation to Rome to petition the emperor againſt it. Theſe laſt words threw the governor into a ſtrange dilemma: on the one hand, he dreaded nothing ſo much as ſuch a deputation, which would in all likelihood lay open all the iniquities of his adminiſtration: on the other, if he complied with their requeſt, in removing the ſhields, he not only gave an advantage to a people he hated and deſpiſed, but expoſed himſelf to the reſentment of the emperor, who might probably look upon ſuch a compliance as an affront to himſelf, and a compliment to the Jews. The magiſtrates, perceiving the trouble he was in, immediately withdrew, and ſent ſoon after a very preſſing, but ſubmiſſive letter to Rome, which had the deſired effect. Tiberius immediately diſpatched another to Pilate, wherein he highly blamed him

(C) This tranſaction we have from Philo (15); Joſephus makes no mention of it

(D) Meaning probably of the late Herod the Great; who thoſe ſons were, our author doth not tell us; but we may reaſonably ſuppoſe two of them to have been Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, and Philip his brother, mentioned a little higher, both willing enough at that time to oblige the Jews. The other two muſt have been probably ſome of his grand-children.

(15) Legat p 1033, & ſeq.

for

for what he had done, and ordered him to remove the ſhields into ſome other place; which he accordingly did, and ſent them to be hung up at Cæſarea [p].

HIS next project to vex the Jews was, to find out ſome ſpecious pretence for drawing money out of the ſacred treaſury. This was indeed the moſt effectual way to touch them to the quick, next to the rifling of the temple; for he knew but too well their invincible attachment to thoſe two places. The plauſible pretext he choſe for it was, the bringing of an aqueduct, about two hundred furlongs off, into Jeruſalem; the expence of which he expected ſhould be ſupplied out of the ſacred depoſitory, and demanded accordingly of them, that a tax ſhould be levied upon it. However, as he knew that this would not fail to provoke the people into a mutiny, ſo he took care to provide againſt it, by cauſing a number of his ſoldiers to mix themſelves with the croud, with clubs hid under their coats, to be ready upon a ſignal to fall upon the mutineers. He was hardly ſeated on his tribunal, before it was ſurrounded accordingly by a vaſt concourſe of Jews, who came exclaiming againſt his project, and where ſome of the meaner ſort, as is uſual in ſuch mobs, accompanied their clamour with bitter invectives againſt him. Pilate had not heard them long, before he gave his men the ſignal, who immediately fell on the Jews pelmel with their clubs, wounded, lamed, and even killed many of them indiſcriminately, and diſperſed the reſt [q]. Joſephus doth not tell us, whether Pilate went on with his deſign, neither is it eaſy to gueſs, either from him or from Philo, at what year of his government the three laſt-mentioned tranſactions happened. All that can be gathered from the whole is, that he took all the pains he could to make it uneaſy to them, from the beginning to the end of it, and that the Jews were not behindhand with him, either in oppoſing his deſigns, oppreſſions, and cruelties, or in giving him freſh troubles by their tumults and ſeditions, in which every ſect joined to give a helping hand, though at ever ſo great variance in other points. This was the diſmal ſtate of Judæa, when the Saviour of the world made his firſt public appearance into his miniſtry: miſerably torn by their inteſtine broils: oppreſſed with the heavy yoke of the Roman emperors, and of their more rapacious ſubſtitutes: divided into factions and ſects, which treated each other with greater rancour and inhumanity than their very oppreſſors: deceived, and often led to their ruin by upſtart demagogues, falſe prophets, and pretended Meſ-

Another tumult cauſed by Pilate.

The cauſes of the low infidelity and deception

[q] Legat. ad Caium. [q] Antiq. ubi ſupra.

ſiahs;

siahs; and soothed and flattered, to a degree of judicial infatuation, into the mistaken notion of a speedy temporal deliverer, and of a glorious and lasting scene of conquests, triumphs, and other earthly happiness, under his auspicious reign. All which proved so many invincible obstacles to their embracing that salvation, which Christ the true Messiah came to offer them, and made them run into the very jaws of that destruction, which their rejection of him and his doctrine, joined to all their other impieties, did shortly bring upon them. All which will be best seen by a short view of the three last years of his life: of the irrefragable credentials he brought with him, and the obstinate and unreasonable opposition they made against him: of his love and tenderness towards them, and of their malice and ingratitude to him: of his irreproachable innocence, and of their injustice in condemning him to death: and, lastly, of the innumerable evidences given to them after his resurrection, of his being the true promised Messiah, and of their invincible hardness and obstinacy in rejecting him to the last. We shall therefore close the present section with a short account of those three last signal years of his life, and his doleful exit on the cross; confining ourselves chiefly to such particulars as have an immediate connection with the two main points in our view; the divinity of his mission, and the justice of the Jews punishment in the destruction of their city, temple, and commonwealth, and total dispersion of their nation, for their obstinate rejection of him and his doctrine (E).

It

(E) It will be perhaps objected, that, in entering thus far into those two religious points, we go out of our limits as historians, and that, instead of writing a continuation of the history of the Jews, we are going to prove the truth of christianity against them. But let it, we pray, be considered, that though this were the real case, the harm would not be great; and that, provided both points are kept going still hand in hand, and we do not so fix our eye upon one, as to lose sight of the other, we still answer the two main ends of history, to make men wiser and better.

We should moreover be guilty of a flagrant injustice to the infatuated Jews, if we should neglect so fair an opportunity of reminding them of the source of all their misfortunes, and pointing out to them their only remedy. We have heretofore taken notice of a promise made to them by God, that though their sins had caused them to be dispersed through the four quarters of the world, yet, as soon as they were brought to an humble acknowledgment

and

IT was now the thirtieth and laſt jubilee ſince its firſt celebration in the land of Canaan †, when Chriſt, in the thirtieth Chriſt enters into his miniſtry.

† See before Vol. III. p. 196. USSER. ann. ſub A. M. 4030.

and confeſſion of them, he would gather them home again into their own land.

Accordingly before their total diſperſion, the longeſt captivity they underwent was but of ſeventy years, though it was brought upon them by the horrideſt crimes, ſuch as idolatry, murders without number, ſacrileges of the blackeſt nature committed by Manaſſes, and his wicked ſucceſſors; and yet they had this comfort in the midſt of their puniſhment, that the ſame prophets who had foretold their captivity, had likewiſe ſet a period to it; and were ſtill encouraging them to bear their chaſtiſement patiently, ſince God would certainly put a happy end to it at the time prefixed.

What crime can they then charge themſelves with of ſo atrocious a nature, as to bring this more dreadful captivity of ſeventeen hundred years upon them, without one prophecy, or even comfortable glimpſe when they ſhall ſee an end to it? If they know of any ſuch ſin, why do they not confeſs and acknowledge it, and thereby put a period to their miſery? for God's promiſe ſtands as ſure now, as it did three thouſand years ago.

Since then they are ignorant of this grievous crime; why ſhould we make a difficulty to point it out to them, when we have ſo fair an occaſion offered? why ſhould we not tell them, that it was their putting the Meſſiah to an unjuſt and ignominious death? and which they are ſo far from acknowledging, that they juſtify and glory in it, and by ſo doing murder him ſtill in their hearts, as often as they think or ſpeak of him, and ſo become partakers of their anceſtors guilt, as well as puniſhment.

Again, The ſcripture doth in ſeveral places, but more expreſsly St. Paul (16), aſſure us, that there will be a time when they ſhall be all recalled; and their having continued ſo long unblended with other nations, notwithſtanding their diſperſion through every part of the habitable globe, is a ſtrong proof of it, For whatever ſuperficial heads may imagine, an impartial thinker will eaſily obſerve, that nothing but a particular providence could have kept them in that unmixed ſtate, as they have continued in theſe ſeventeen centuries, when he ſees even in our own land a multitude of nations, in a much leſs time, as much blended and abſorbed into one common name, as their bodies are into one common earth. Eſpecially when we conſider by what weak ſupports, or rather poor mean evaſions, their faith and hopes have been kept up, ever ſince they have ſeen all ſcripture calculations concerning the time of the tieth year of his age, came to preach a more glorious and acceptable one, not to the Jewiſh nation only, but to the whole world. The Jewiſh was uſually uſhered in by the ſound of the trumpets, the new chriſtian one by the voice of one crying in the wilderneſs, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, and ſo on [r]. This was the miraculous ſon of Zacharias, a prieſt, prophet, and fore-runner of the Meſſiah, who having left the wilderneſs, where he had ſpent his younger days, came now to preach repentance and the kingdom of the Meſſiah, in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, and the high-prieſthood of Joſeph, ſurnamed Caiaphas, mentioned a little higher. The auſterity of his life (F) and the newneſs of his doctrine drew daily

(1) Rom. xi paſſ.

Year of the Flood, 3029. Of Chriſt, 30.

[r] Conf. Isaiah xl. 1, 2, 3. lx. 1, & ſeq. Luc. vii, 2, & ſeq. iv 19.

Meſſiah ſo long elapſed; to ſay nothing of the many diſcouragements they have at one time or other met with from every nation under heaven.

We are aſſured by the ſame apoſtle (17), that this recall of the Jews will not be till after the fulneſs, or total converſion of the Gentiles. Were the former once rightly appriſed of this, it is likely their zeal in obſtructing the one would inſenſibly abate, when they ſaw that it was the fatal means of retarding the other.

We may add, that ſince the beſt hiſtorians have not thought it out of their province to plunge into the deep abyſs of obſcurity, to find out the cauſes of the decadence and fall of kingdoms and empires but have even endeavoured to diſcover them in certain aſpects of the heavenly bodies, tranſits of comets, and ſuch-like amuſing dreams; may we not much more be allowed to venture to trace this remarkable one of the Jews, under the conduct of ſuch infallible guides as the ſcripture and hiſtory afford us? All which will be beſt ſeen, when we come to compare Chriſt's prophecies againſt that unhappy people, and the wonderful accompliſhment of them, as we have it related by one of the beſt hiſtorians of their own nation.

(F) His dreſs and manner of living ſeems to have been the ſame with the ancient prophets, of whom we have ſpoken in a former volume *. His food was wild honey and locuſts, which a modern traveller tells us are very common in thoſe parts, and good for food; from whence he concludes, that they were the creatures which the Iſraelites fed ſo plentifully upon in the wilderneſs, and which all the verſions have miſrendered quails. We have had occaſion heretofore † to confute the latter part of this aſſertion.

(17) Ibid. ver. 25, 26. * Vol III. p. 430, 431. Com with Matth. iii 4. † Vol. II. p. 540, 2.

As

daily great numbers of Jews to be baptized by him in the Jordan, ſuppoſing him to be the Meſſiah; but he quickly diſclaimed that glorious title, aſſuring them, that he was only ſent as his precurſor, and to point him out to them, as the perſon who was to baptize them with the Holy Ghoſt. Jeſus came accordingly to the place ſoon after to be baptized among the reſt, and John in an humble guiſe excuſed himſelf from that high office; but being at length prevailed upon to go into the river with him, upon their coming out of the water, the Holy Ghoſt viſibly deſcended and lighted upon him, whilſt a voice was heard from heaven, ſaying, This is my beloved ſon, in whom I am well pleaſed [r]. Whereupon the baptiſt took that opportunity to manifeſt him to all that were there preſent, and to bear this ample teſtimony of him, that he was the very Chriſt, and the lamb of God, who was to take away the ſin of the world [s]. Baptized and manifeſted by John.

As John continued baptizing and preaching in the neighbour[r] MATTH. iii. 13, & ſeq LUC. iii. 21, & ſeq. [s] Ibid. ibid. Vid. & JOHN i. 29, & ſeq.

As for the locuſt, which the baptiſt fed upon, the generality of interpreters underſtand it of a real inſect ſo called, whence ſome eaſtern nations have been called Acridophagi or locuſt eaters (18). Others underſtand it of a kind of bean or pulſe ſo called; the reader may conſult interpreters about it, if he pleaſes; but the other notion is much more probable, that inſect being common, cheap, and particularly permitted in the Levitical law to be eaten by the Iſraelites (19).

Archbiſhop Uſher ſuppoſes, with great probability, that this preacher of repentance began his miniſtry on the grand faſt or expiation day, of which frequent mention has been made in this hiſtory, it being enjoined to every Iſraelite to faſt, and afflict their ſouls on that day, under the penalty of being cut off from his people This day fell, as we elſewere obſerved §, on the tenth day of the ſeventh month, called Tiſri, anſwering to about the nineteenth of our October; and on that ſolemnity the jubilee was to be proclaimed through all the land. (20) Upon both which accounts no time could be more proper to begin the work of proclaiming the more ſpiritual and univerſal jubilee, which was now at hand.

(18) Vid. Euſtath in Od 9. Plin. nat hiſt. l xix. c. 29. Moſ. Levit & al. (19) Levit xi. 21, & ſeq. § See Vol. III p 193, & 190, (L). (20) Ibid. xxv 9. Vid Uſſer. Jub. A. M. 4030.

hood

hood of Bethabara (G), a great concourſe of people flocked to him from all parts, eſpecially in their return homewards from Jeruſalem, where they had been celebrating the feaſt of tabernacles, which fell out about the beginning of November †. Among them was a great number of the Phariſaic ſect, whom he ſeverely rebuked upon ſeveral accounts, particularly on their pretended privilege of being Abraham's poſterity; aſſuring them at the ſame time, that as long as their lives were ſo oppoſite to that of that glorious progenitor, they muſt expect to be caſt, like the chaff, into the fire, whilſt God could raiſe a poſterity to the father of the faithful out of the very ſtones they were trampling upon. On this year was born to Herod Agrippa, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, a ſon named alſo Agrippa, who was the laſt king of the Jews, and before whom St. Paul was allowed to plead his cauſe; and on the next year was his ſiſter Berenice born, who was alſo preſent at the trial [u], ſhe being ſixteen, and her brother ſeventeen years of age, when their father died [x].

John the Baptiſt having given ſuch an ample teſtimony to the Saviour of the world, the two firſt that became his fol-† Vid. Vol. III. p. 178, 179. a & (B). [u] ACTS xxv, 13, & ſeq. [x] Vid. Antiq. l. xviii c. 7. xix. c. ult. USSER. ſub A. M. 4030, & ſeq. See alſo before p. 197, ſub fin not.

(G) So called from the Hebrew בֵּיתעִבְרָה beth-habarah, the houſe of paſſing over, or ferry-houſe, ſuppoſed by ſome to have had that name from the paſſage of the Iſraelites over Jordan ‖; but whether ſo or not, its name ſhews it to have been probably ſome great ferry, and ſo very convenient, not only for baptizing, but on account of the concourſe of people at ſuch places.

But the word beth habarah may be alſo, and perhaps more properly, tranſlated a cuſtom-houſe, as the officers of it, whom we render publicans, were called בַּעֲלֵי הָעִבְרָה, babale hababarah, maſters or overſeers of the cuſtoms; a great many of whom came accordingly to the baptiſt, to enquire what kind of repentance was proper for men of their profeſſion; and were anſwered, that they ſhould exact no more than their due (21); to the ſoldiers, which are uſually ſet to guard ſuch avenues, he forbid uſing violence, falſe accuſations, extortion, &c. to the reſt, who, on the ſame ſuppoſition, dealt in the mercantile way, he injoined likewiſe a practice oppoſite to their common one; that is, liberality, hoſpitality, charity, &c. inſtead of covetouſneſs, fraud, &c. Thus was he fulfilling what was foretold of old (22), Every valley ſhall be filled, every mountain levelled, &c.

‖ See Vol III, p 63. (Y). (21) Luke iii. 13 .(22) Ibid. verſ. 5. Conf. cum, Iſai. xl. 4. & ſeq.

lowers, lowers, were two of his own disciples, viz. Andrew, the son of Jonah and Simon his brother, to whom he gave the surname of Cephas, or Stone. On the next day, as he was returning to Nazareth, he called Philip to follow him; and this went and gave notice of him to an honest Israelite, named Nathanael, who is generally believed to be the same, who is by the other evangelists called Bartholomew, assuring him that they had found the promised Messiah, namely Jesus of Nazareth. Nathanael's mean opinion of that city, and of the whole Galilean region, could scarcely permit him, at the first news, to believe that any thing so good as a prophet, much less the Messiah, could come from such a mean quarter. He was, however, soon undeceived, when Jesus told him some of the private discourse which Philip and he had had together under a fig-tree, far enough out of his hearing. These two therefore, and some others, followed him into Galilee, where they were all invited to a poor couple's wedding. Here the wine beginning to fail, Jesus's mother, who was one of the guests, acquainted him with it (H), who arose soon after, and, of his wonted compassion, miraculously supplied them with a fresh and sufficient quantity. This wonderful change of such a quantity of water into excellent wine filled the company with admiration, and further confirmed his new disciples, that he really was what they thought him, the true Messiah. From Cana he went to Capernaum, a small city on the west shore of the lake Genezareth, where we shall often find him in the sequel; and where he made but a short stay

His first miracle in Cana.

(H) The answer which ours and most other versions make him, who was to be the pattern of all perfection, give to his mother on this occasion, has given just offence to all serious readers; notwithstanding the specious glosses which commentators have put upon it, such, as if he expressed himself to her in those contemptuous terms, to prevent, if possible, that extraordinary worship, which he foresaw his followers would in time pay to her, and the like.

Whereas a learned critic of our own (23) has lately proved beyond contradiction, that the words if rightly rendered, are full of the deepest filial respect; for the word γυνη, woman, is so far from being a term of contempt, as it sounds in our language, that he has proved it from the best authors to have been given even to queens. We may say the same thing of the word אישה, ishah, in the Hebrew which is used in the same respectful sense by the Jews.

As for the phrase which is there rendered, What have I to do with thee? It is well known to be a Hebrew idiom, which implies no more than, What is it to you or me (24).

(23) Blackw. sacred class. vindic. (24) See a parallel in 2 Sam xix. 22. 1 Kings xvii. 18, & alib.

at this time, by reaſon of the approaching feaſt of the paſſover, to which he repaired with his diſciples, it being the firſt feſtival of that kind he celebrated ſince his entrance into his miniſtry [y].

Upon his coming to the temple, he found it crouded with people that ſold cattle, poultry, and other ſuch things as were uſed in the Jewiſh offerings, and had been ſet up there for the conveniency of thoſe that came from far to the feaſts, and bought them on the ſpot, rather than bring them from their homes. This had likewiſe introduced a number of money-changers for the uſe of thoſe who brought foreign coin inſtead of victims, and whoſe tables and trade were equally a profanation of that ſacred place. It is likely, that the prieſts, who might and ought to have made them keep their ſtalls and compters at a greater diſtance, made a perquiſite of their indulgence, and conſequently aggravated the abuſe. Againſt them therefore Chriſt choſe to exert the firſt eſſays of his authority and zeal, by turning them all out of that ſacred building, after a ſevere reproof for their mercantile profanation of it. But whilſt his diſciples admired his zeal for the houſe of God, ſo worthy of the ſon of David, the diſſatisfied Jews were queſtioning and demanding the ſigns of his authority; and received this remarkable anſwer from him, that they ſhould deſtroy this temple, meaning that of his body, and he would raiſe it up in three days. It was upon this occaſion that they, miſtaking his meaning, reminded him of the forty and ſix years it had been in building; of which we took notice a little higher. His diſciples, however, underſtood him much better after he was riſen from the dead [z]. In the mean time, he did not omit giving them many other pregnant proofs of his divine miſſion, in the many miracles which he did before them, and which ſtill increaſed the number of his diſciples; but he, who knew their hearts, eaſily judged, that many of them would ſoon turn their backs upon him, eſpecially when the ſanhedrin and the Phariſaic ſect came to denounce their ſentence of excommunication againſt them (I).

Drives the traders from the temple.

However

[y] John ii. 13, & ſeq. [z] Ibid ver. 18, & ſeq.

(I) It is doubtleſs a matter of great wonder, how the Jews could ſee ſuch a vaſt number and variety of miracles wrought by Chriſt on the ſick, halt, maimed, deaf, dumb, blind, paralytic, lunatic, demoniac, and other objects of pity, and yet believe him a falſe prophet, a deceiver, or any thing rather than a perſon ſent from God: how they could ſee him give ſight to thoſe that were born

However, though that ſect was the moſt inveterate againſt him, we ſhall find ſome of them of a more upright temper, born blind, life to one that had lain four days corrupting in the grave, feed ſo many thouſands with a few loaves and fiſhes, ſtill the winds and the ſeas by his ſingle word; in a word, to diſplay, as it were, his irreſiſtible power over the univerſal creation; and yet either condemn him as a cheat, or be ever aſking for ſome further and more convincing ſigns of his being the Meſſiah (25).

We have already accounted in part for this ſtrange proceeding in the detail we gave of their ſeveral ſects, whoſe tenets, being for the moſt part diametrically oppoſite to the doctrine and ſpirit of the goſpel, proved ſo ſtrong an obſtacle againſt it, as few were able to ſurmount. To this we may add, that Chriſt, chuſing the ſabbath day for working the major part of thoſe miracles, gave them ſtill a greater offence; their fooliſh ſuperſtitious prejudices making them look upon even ſuch works of mercy to be a violation of that holy day, notwithſtanding all he could urge to the contrary; a flagrant inſtance of which we have in the cure of the man born blind, in the chapter laſt quoted out of St. John.

But what moſt helped to confirm them in this abſurd judgment of him was, a paſſage in Deuteronomy (26), which, rightly underſtood, is only a prudent caution againſt their being drawn aſide by falſe prophets, and pretended wonder-workers; but which they did, and ſtill do, underſtand to this day, ſo literally and contrary to the plain deſign of the law-giver, as to infer a poſſibility of a man's working many and great miracles, either by the help of the devil, by magic, or other means, and without any other view, but that of withdrawing people from the ſervice of God.

Now, when men are once prepoſſeſsed with ſuch an abſurd notion, what miracles can any perſon work that may not be reduced under that claſs, if they have any diſlike either to his perſon or doctrine, or can find any plauſible objection againſt his manner of working them? All which concurred here againſt thoſe of our Saviour, and were upon thoſe accounts rejected by the generality of the Jews, even to this day, as we hinted above. Accordingly, they are ſo far from denying him to have done great and ſignal miracles, that they have invented the moſt ſtupid ſtories to prove, that he did them either by magic, which they ſay he learned in Egypt, or by going privately into the temple, and ſtealing thence the ineffable name of God, by virtue of which he could perform all thoſe great wonders; and many more ſuch ſhameful and childiſh evaſions, the bare mentioning of which is a ſufficient confutation of them. Thoſe that deſire to know more of this Jewiſh traſh, may conſult, among others, the book intitled Sepher Tholedoth Jeſu, or per, who, making a more equitable judgment of his miracles and doctrine, came to be inſtructed by him, and became his diſciples, the hiſtory or book of the generations of Jeſus, and ſome others which the reader may find in the margin (27).

(25) Vid. int. al. John vi. 1. ad. 30. ix. paſſ. (26) Cb. xiii. 1, & ſeq.

But to give our Engliſh readers a ſhort ſpecimen of their opinion concerning him out of thoſe books, ſome affirm him to have been the ſon of one Panther, begotten on a milliner of his debauching, and that the ſoul of Eſau, whoſe memory they have in great abhorrence, paſſed into him, which is, according to their doctrine of the ſoul's tranſmigration, mentioned at the cloſe of the laſt ſection. That he ſtole into the temple, and took from thence the name of God; and having made an inciſion into his thigh, ſtuck it into it, and let the fleſh and ſkin grow over it. That he became by it a very great conjurer and wonder-worker. That Judas was another of the ſame ſtamp and his competitor. That they had a great number of conteſts, which we ſhall forbear inſerting on account of their ridiculouſneſs as well as impiety; and that Judas was ſtill conqueror in all, and gave him at laſt a total defeat.

One would be apt to think theſe to be idle tales, invented only to amuſe their children, and breed them up in a contempt of chriſtianity; and ſome of them have even affirmed it, to wipe off the juſt imputation they would otherwiſe incur; and yet they are chiefly founded on ſome as ridiculous ſtories fetched out of their Talmud, where mention is made of Chriſt's miracles, and of the means by which he attained to the power of performing them; and paſs as current amongſt them, as the book out of which they are taken.

But what can they ſay for one of their greateſt rabbies (28), who affirms one Jeſua, the ſon of Berachia, or Perachia, to have been tutor to Jeſus Chriſt, and to have taken him into Egypt, and to have turned him off for his debaucheries; though in order to theſe two having been contemporaries, the latter muſt have been born under Alexander Jannæus, and have died in the thirty ſixth year of his age, in the reign of Ariſtobulus. This anachroniſm another learned rabbi (29) has endeavoured to rectify by ſubſtituting a ſecond Jeſua, who lived in the time of Hillel and Shammai, and was tutor to Jeſus Chriſt. But this, like their hiſtory of the ſecond temple, which makes Pompey to have taken him priſoner, doth but leſſen, but not clear, the anachroniſm (30); and only expoſes their ignorance, not to call it worſe, in attempting to invalidate his miracles by ſuch poor ſhifts.

But, laſtly, if we conſider the vaſt ſuperſtition which then reigned among the Jews, how addicted they were to aſtrology; what

(27) Rab. Gedaliah Shalſheleth Haccabalah Gantz. Chronol. Nitzachon Abr Ben. Dior. Tzemach David, & al. mult. (28) Abr. B. Dior. ubi ſupra. (29) Gedaliah, ubi ſupra. (30) Vid. Bayng. hiſt. Jud. lib. iii. c. 5. ſect. 5.

ſtrange disciples, though privately, for fear of their unbelieving brethren [a].

Nicodemus comes to be instructed by him.

AMONG these was one Nicodemus, a venerable ruler, who rightly concluding that such stupendous works could not be wrought without the divine assistance, and in confirmation of some new signal doctrine, such as the thinking part of the Jews expected the Messiah to bring with him; came privately one night to have a conference with him about it. Jesus, who took a singular delight to encourage such sincere inquirers [b]; and knew him to be a doctor of the law, immediately entertained him with the main and grand point of regeneration, without which, he assured him, it was impossible for a man to enter into the kingdom of heaven. He expressed himself moreover in such terms, as he might have justly expected to be well understood by him, by comparing it to a new birth, such as the Jews affirmed to be that of their new proselytes, concerning which the reader may see what we have said in a former volume †. But Nicodemus, better versed perhaps in the reigning disputes of his and the other sects, than with such fundamentals of moral divinity, as had been quite swallowed up by the present polemic contagion, seemed wholly at a loss how to understand it. Our Saviour therefore having given him a further explication of that heavenly doctrine, requested of him to embrace it upon his own authority for the present, assuring him, that it was one main purport of his coming down from heaven, to teach it to mankind. He added, that the miracles which he had seen him work should not be the only proof he would give men of strange power they attributed to the heavenly bodies, or rather to the angels which presided in each of them; what prodigies they thought might be done by the right evocation of them; what supernatural efficacy they ascribed to the right pronunciation of the name of God; how extensive they supposed the power of magic to be; and that it was not only lawful, but necessary, to learn it in one's own defence; and lastly, that those were not the notions of a small number, but of the whole nation, except perhaps some few more judicious and unprejudiced; such as was Nicodemus, and some others, whom we shall mention in the sequel, and who made a more impartial judgment of Christ's miracles; we need not wonder, that the rest, who neither liked his person, character, nor doctrine, should attribute those stupendous works to any other cause, than to the power and finger of God.

[a] Ibid. vers. 23. ad. fin. [b] Vid. int. al MARK x. 21. † Vol. III. p. 296.

his

his divine miſſion, ſince they ſhould ſee him ſhortly lay down his life in confirmation of it ; and, in ſo doing, fulfil all the prophecies and types of the Old Teſtament, and the decrees of the divine love and providence, by dying a piacle for the redemption of mankind [c]. And therefore he juſtly concluded, that if men receive not his divine teſtimony, but will ſhut their eyes to that marvellous ſaving light which he has brought into the world, it is becauſe their evil deeds, which are manifeſted and reproved by it, make them prefer their own darkneſs ; and this it is which aggravates their guilt, and will hereafter their ſad puniſhment [d] (K). Nicodemus, [c] John iii. verſ. 11, & ſeq, [d] Ibid. verſ. 19, & ſeq.

(K) We have contented ourſelves to give the bare ſubſtance of this divine colloquy, which contains indeed the quinteſſence of chriſtanity, viz the redemption of the world by the death of Chriſt, and the reformation of mankind by the help of this new light which he brought down to them. This light upon due attention, not only to this diſcourſe to the Jewiſh ruler, but on the tenor of the whole goſpel, will appear to conſiſtin theſe three particulars :

1ſt, That he came to teach us a more perfect rule of life, than human reaſon could, by its own unaſſiſted ſtrength, ever diſcover. For whatever ſome ſanguine men may imagine concerning the ſufficiency of that faculty, an impartial review of the world, and of the moſt polite parts of it, before the ſacred writings of Moſes and the prophets were publiſhed in other more known languages, will eaſily confute that fond conceit.

2dly, He came to communicate a ſuperior degree of ſtrength to our corrupt nature, without which the leſſons of that divine maſter would have been loſt upon the far greater part of mankind ; whilſt, like perſons infected with cuticular diſeaſes, they would ſtill have preferred the pleaſure of ſcratching to the benefit of a cure ; and therefore to inforce the obſervation of this new rule of life, without which man could be happy, neither here nor hereafter, and to make him accept of and ſeek for that divine aſſiſtance, which alone could enable him to live up to it.

He was, 3dly, to inforce it by the worthieſt and moſt powerful motives, the rewards and punishments of another life ; both which he has ſet before us in the ſtrongeſt light, that thoſe who could not be allured to the virtues of his goſpel, by the beauteous proſpect of the one, might at leaſt be frighted into it, by the dreadful apprehenſion of the other. That is, in other words ; that ſince our too great attachment to the things of this world was the unhappy ſource of all our diſaſters, this double proſpect of a future one might effectually wean us from them, by the aſſurance he has given us of demus, who felt the force of all theſe truths, became his diſciple from that very night, but without daring to make open profeſſion

of the fatal conſequences of an inordinate purſuit after them, and of the ample rewards which a generous neglect of them will intitle us to at the end of our race. All which is ſtill more ſtrongly inforced upon us from a due conſideration, that he who beſt knew the value of that immortal life, which he came to reveal, thought not his own life too dear a price to purchaſe it for us.

On this manifeſtation of the love of God to us, is founded our love to him as our ſovereign b'iſs and benefactor, and of our neighbour, as partakers with us of the ſame divine favour. Nor is the fear of his punishments, low and baſe as it may ſeem at firſt, leſs conducive to it. For how can a man be rightly frighted out of the paths of ſin and punishment into thoſe of virtue and reward, without feeling a ſecret love and gratitude towards his gracious deliverer, inſenſibly kindled in his heart, and riſing by degrees into moſt pungent remorſe for his paſt fol'ies, and into the moſt fervent deſires of pleaſing him for the future?

Now the foundation of all this muſt be laid on ſuch a ſtedfaſt faith as Chriſt ſpeaks of to Nicodemus (31), grounded on thoſe irrefragable credentials which he brought with him, ſuch as the many and plain prophecies concerning him, his innumerable miracles, his reſurrection, effuſion of his holy ſpirit, and ſeveral other concomitant evidences, which will further appear in the ſequel. This heavenly teſtimony, he adds, therefore, will be rejected by many becauſe their deeds are evil; for if his doctrine is confeſſedly ſo divine, and ſo excellently calculated for promoting our happineſs here and hereafter, that men of unbiaſſed reaſon might embrace it without thoſe heavenly credentials, there muſt ſure be ſome evil root in the hearts of thoſe that can oppoſe it, after they have ſeen it confirmed by ſo many miracles, prophecies, &c. and illuſtrated by his god-like example.

'Tis therefore to convince us of this, that he aſſures us in another place (32), that if any man will, or is ſincerely diſpoſed to do his (God's) will, he ſhall ſoon know whether or not his doctrine be of God; if he has a real deſire to be virtuous and holy here, in order to be happy hereafter, he ſhall receive a more feeling teſtimony of the divinity of my doctrine, than all thoſe outward ones of miracles, &c. for theſe, through the depravity of man's nature, may in too many of them produce but a kind of hiſtorical faith, which, deſcending no lower than the head, ſeldom brings forth any other fruit than ſpeculative ſyſtems. They were deſigned to convince the underſtanding, and ſilence the gainſayers; but the change of the heart and the conqueſt of mens inordinate paſſions, not being to be attained

(31) John iii. 18, 19. (32) Ibid. vii. 17.

profeſſion of it, for fear of the Jews. However, when their ſanhedrin was once plotting to put him to death, he had the courage to oppoſe it [e]; and when they had really crucified him, he and Joſeph of Arimathea, another Jewiſh ruler, were the only two of that high rank who joined to give him an honourable burial [f].

[e] Ibid. ch. vii. ver. 50. [f] Ibid. xix. 38, 39.

attained but by the aſſiſtance of the divine grace, which is now freely and more plentifully going to be offered to every believer, thoſe only will receive and feel the efficacy of it, who ſeek and pray for it from a ſincere deſire to comply with the terms of the goſpel, and from a due ſenſe of their wanting that ſuperior aſſiſtance to enable them to it. When theſe therefore come to feel the wonderful changes which this divine grace ſhall work in them; that it inſpires them with new affections, new thoughts and deſires; that it rectifies their corrupt nature, ſubdues their irregular appetites, enables them to live quite other lives, and to forego all things, even life itſelf, rather than loſe the favour of God, and the aſſurance of heaven; it will prove an inexhauſtible ſource of evidence of the truth and divinity of my doctrine, and of joy and comfort to them; becauſe that bleſſed Spirit, which worketh all theſe wonders in them, will bear witneſs with their ſpirit, that they are now the ſons of God (33); whilſt the careleſs and ſelf-ſufficient will ever fall ſhort of it, for want of this ſincere deſire after holineſs, or of a ſenſe of their ſtanding in need of any other aſſiſtance to attain it.

Thus much we thought neceſſary to premiſe, in order to the better underſtanding of the deſign and œconomy of the goſpel; for ſince the bare belief of it, or a faith in Chriſt, its divine author, without practice of his precepts, will never intitle a man to the rewards of it; and this practice, whatever may be pretended to the contrary, cannot be attained without the divine aſſiſtance; and this laſt is only to be obtained by prayer grounded upon a right belief in the truth and faithfulneſs of our heavenly redeemer and law-giver; but all three muſt co operate towards that main end; the miracles and other outward teſtimonies of the chriſtian diſpenſation were highly neceſſary to attract a degenerate world to a religion ſo oppoſite to theirs, and ſo contrary to their depraved appetites; but it is this wonderful change, which the divine grace it communicates, works in us, that gives the finiſhing ſtroke and ſtrongeſt light to its other evidence; and the man, once thus happily transformed into a new, a heavenly, creature, becomes more ſure of the truth and certainty of the goſpel, than if he had ſeen its divine author giving ſight to the man born blind, or raiſing Lazarus from the dead: becauſe he juſtly thinks them alike the effects of an almighty and miraculous power.

(33) Rom. viii. 16.

Jesus left Jerusalem soon after to go into the other parts of Judæa, where he set his disciples on baptizing those who received his doctrine. This brought on a dispute between them and those of the baptist, who was not yet cast into prison, but was still baptizing a little higher on the Jordan, in the neighbourhood of Salim and Ænon, more towards Galilee (L). The difference between them, being about Jesus's making a greater number of proselytes than John, was referred to the latter, who quickly decided it in favour of the former, adding thereto this noble testimony of him, that he was from heaven, and was above all, and testified the truths he had seen and heard; so that those who received his testimony, did set to their seal, that God is true, whereas those who reject it make him a lyar, and are therefore obnoxious to his divine displeasure, whilst they continue in their unbelief [g] (M). Soon after this, John, whose extreme sanctity had raised him to the esteem, not only of all the Jews, but even of Herod Antipas, the then tetrarch of Galilee, this last often took pleasure in hearing and advising with him [h] for a time; till having ventured to take Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, into his bed, he received so many severe reproofs from that holy person for his incest, that he at last caused him to be thrown into a prison, where he soon after ordered him to be beheaded, through the hellish intrigues of that incestuous lady, and to all outward appearance much against his

Year of the Flood, 3030. Of Christ, 31

John the Baptist beheaded by Herod.

[g] JOHN iii. 22 ad fin. [h] MARK vi. 20.

(L) Ænon was about eight miles south of Scythopolis (34); Salim in the neighbourhood of it was the same with the Salem of the Old Testament, where Melchisedech was king, and where some of the ruins of his palace were still to be seen in St. Jerom's time (35). The reader may see what we have said of it heretofore †

(M) Since the bare light of reason assures us, that the nature of God is incomprehensible, it follow, that he cannot make any revelation of himself to us, but what must include mysterious truths vastly above our reach; and that it must consequently be a strange perverseness in man to reject them upon that account, when they come attested to us with the seal of heaven, for that is in fact to give the lye to eternal truth. Whereas the belief of them, being only an open acknowledgment that God is true, cannot but be the most reasonable, as well as acceptable sacrifice we can make to him of that faculty, own will [i]. The occaſion of this unlawful marriage was as follows:

(34) Vid. Euseb. lib. [illegible] (35) Loc. Hebr. † Vol. II. p. 298. F.

The occaſion of it.

Herod, whoſe firſt wife was the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia was ſince fallen in love with that of his brother Philip, whom he had ſeen at his caſtle, where he had ſtopped ſome days in his journey to Rome. Herodias was the daughter of Ariſtobulus and grand-daughter of Herod the great, as has been hinted in a former note. Herod made no difficulty to diſcover his paſſion and to propoſe marrying her, to which ſhe conſented, upon condition that he divorced his firſt wife. This laſt, having received ſome information of her huſband's deſign, wiſely concealed her reſentment; and having obtained his permiſſion to retire for ſome time to the caſtle of Macheron, which was then in her father's hands, ſhe, inſtead of going thither, made all the haſte ſhe could to the Arabian court, where, being at length arrived, ſhe acquainted the king with the whole intrigue. This cauſed a rupture between Herod and Aretas, which ended in a war, which laſted till the death of Tiberius, four years after their falling out. Herod, thus rid of his wife without a divorce, made no ſcruple to marry his ſiſter-in-law, though ſhe had had children by his brother Philip, which was contrary to the Moſaic law. John the Baptiſt was not the only perſon who condemned that marriage as inceſtuous; the whole nation ventured to cry out againſt; but, as his character gave him a freer acceſs to the court, he had the courage to reprove both the king and his paramour in the ſevereſt terms. Herodias, being at length ſtung to the quick with his frequent reproaches of inceſt, and infidelity to Philip, reſolved to ruin him, and eaſily perſuaded the eaſy king to caſt him into priſon. His pretence for it, according to Joſephus * was his drawing ſuch multitudes after him to be baptized; but the true reaſon was that given by the evangeliſts above-quoted, namely his and Herodias's reſentment.

John confined in the caſtle of Macheron

The place where he confined him is not mentioned by the latter, but the former tells us it was the caſtle of Macheron; though he ſhould have told us how it came ſo ſoon again into his poſſeſſion, after he had juſt hinted before that it belonged to the Arabian king. But it is not unlikely, that he regained it from him after their rupture. All this while Jeſus continued preaching in Galilee, and working ſo many ſingular miracles, that the fame of it came to the Baptiſt in his confinement. John therefore, ſuppoſing his own death

[i] Ibid. Vid. & Matt. xiv. 1, & ſeq.

* Antiq. l. xviii. c. 7.

to

to be near at hand, as he had formerly foretold it, ſent two of his followers to inquire of him, whether he was the expected Meſſiah, not ſo much for his own ſatisfaction, as for that of his diſciples. They came opportunely to him, whilſt he was healing a number of ſick, halt, maimed, and blind, ſo that he only bid them return, and acquaint their maſter with what they had ſeen, leaving it to him to explain the matter to them. All this while Herodias had not been able to prevail on the king to attempt the life of his priſoner. His fear of the people, who looked upon him as an extraordinary prophet, had hitherto outweighed his baſe complaiſance to her. But ſhe ſoon after compaſſed that by her helliſh policy, which her perſuaſions had not been able to do. Herod's birth-day being celebrated with ſuitable ſolemnity, before a number of his head officers, and other perſons of diſtinction; ſhe took the opportunity, when they were in the height of their mirth, and the king moſt probably heated with wine, to ſend her daughter Salome to dance before him; and ſhe performed her part ſo well, that he promiſed with an oath to gratify her in whatever ſhe ſhould aſk of him, even to the half of his kingdom. This was what Herodias was waiting for, and for which ſhe had given her inſtructions to her daughter; ſo that the young princeſs, taking the king at his word, deſired the head of the Baptiſt to be given her inſtantly in a charger. Herod, ſurpriſed at her demand, expreſſed no ſmall concern at it, whether out of reſpect to that holy perſon or the fear of a tumult. But, at length, the conſideration of his oath and of his gueſts having turned the ſcale, he ordered an executioner to go and perform her bloody requeſt; which being done accordingly, his diſciples, upon hearing of it, came to take away the reſt of his body, and gave it an honourable burial. Thus fell that great good man, and more than a prophet, according to his own prediction *; of whom Joſephus in the place above-quoted, gives us the following character: That his whole crime was his exhorting the Jews to the love and practice of virtue; and, firſt of all, to piety, juſtice, and regeneration, or newneſs of life; not by the bare abſtinence of this or that particular ſin, but by an habitual purity of mind and body. Now, continues he, ſo great was the credit and authority of this holy man, as appears by the multitude of his diſciples, and the veneration they had for his doctrine, (for he could do what he would with them) that Herod, not knowing how far the reputation of a man of his ſpirit

Herodias's helliſh policy.

Salome dances before Herod.

Her bloody requeſt.

Joſephus's character of the baptiſt.

* JOHN iii. 30.

might influence the people toward a revolt, resolved at length to take him off, before it was too late, &c. He adds, that Herod was very unsuccessful in his war with the Arabian king, all which the Jews looked upon as a just judgment o God upon him for that impious murder. An antient father tells us † further, that when Herodias received the Baptist's head from her daughter, she pierced his tongue with a bodkin, and shewed it some other indignities, such as one may easily suppose from a person of her loose character.

Jesus goes from Judea into Galilee.

WE return to Jesus Christ, who, upon the news of John's imprisonment on account of the great number of disciples that followed him, began, it is likely, to fear, lest Pilate should take some umbrage at him upon the same account. For there came, as we observed a little higher, rather a greater resort of people to be baptized by his disciples; for himself, the evangelist assures, baptized none. This made him therefore leave Judæa, after a stay of about eight months [k], and depart for Galilee; when passing through Samaria, he converted the woman, and afterwards the inhabitants of Sichem, or, as the Jews by way of reproach called it, Sychar [l], which signifies drunk, according to the phrase of the prophet, who calls the rebellious Jews the Shicore Ephraim, the drunkards of Ephraim [m] (N). After a few days stay at that place, he went on into Galilee, where he was well received by the Galileans, who had seen his late miracles at Jerusalem at the late passover, and preached in their synagogues. Whilst he was at Cana, the place where he had turned water into wine, a nobleman came about a day's journey to him, besecching him that he would come down and heal a son of his, who was at the point of death, and expressed himself in such pressing terms, as sufficiently testified the sincerity of his faith. Jesus therefore, unto whom it was equally easy to heal at a distance, or at a greater nearness, dismissed him with these words: Go thy way; thy son liv-

The nobleman's son cured.

† Cont. Rufin.

[k] Vid. USSER. ann. sub A M. 4034.

[l] JOHN iv. pass. See also Vol. II. p 409, & F. IX. p 560. & alib.

[m] ISAIAH XXVII 1.

(N) Shechem or Sychar stood about forty miles from Jerusalem fifty two from Jericho, and ten from Shiloh (36), near unto Jacob's well.

(36) Vid. Euseb. & Hieron loc. Hebr. & Reland. Palæst. in Shechem etc.

eth. He obeyed, and, upon his inquiring of his ſervants at his return, found that he had begun to recover from the very minute in which the promiſe was come out of Jeſus's mouth; ſo that he and his whole family believed on him [n]. He went from thence into hisold city of Nazareth, and being entered one ſabbath-day into their ſynagogue, where the leſſon out of Iſaiah [o] was given him to read, in which there is a lively deſcription of the Meſſiah's preaching the goſpel, and of his confirming it with many godlike miracles of mercy; he expounded it of himſelf, with ſuch powerful and majeſtic grace, as raiſed the admiration of the whole audience. But ſome of them being offended at his exquiſite wiſdom, whom they knew to have had ſo mean an education among them, he reminded them of ſeveral other cities in Judæa, and of many perſons in Iſrael, who had rendered themſelves unworthy of the divine favours by the like unſeaſonable partiality. This reproof was ſo highly reſented by the Nazarites, that they ruſhed upon him with one conſent, and hurried him to the brow of the hill on which their city was built, with a deſign to have caſt him headlong down; but he, ſlipping through the croud, eſcaped their malice, and went to dwell at Capernaum, a city ſituate on the coaſts of Zebulun and Nepthalim; and preached among them, according to another oracle out of the ſame prophet [p], importing, that thoſe regions of Galilee ſhould in time be called, from their native darkneſs, unto the marvellous light of the goſpel. Being on another day preaching in one of their ſynagogues, there ſtood a demoniac before him (O), in whom the unclean ſpirit cried

Preacheth at Nazareth.

A demoniac cured.

[n] Ibid. ver 46. ad fin. [o] ISAIAH, lxi. 1 Vid. LUKE iv. 16, & ſeq. [p] ISAIAH ix 1, & ſeq. MATTH. iv. 14, & ſeq.

(O) We have already taken notice of the opinion of the Jews concerning theſe demons who poſſeſſed mankind, ſome, with Joſephus, believing them to be the ſouls of the wicked, and others, that they were a kind of imperfect creatures, whom God was forced to leave unfiniſhed on the ſixth day, becauſe the evening of the ſabbath came upon him before he had given them the finiſhing ſtroke (3[r]) Upon either of theſe accounts, they believe them to find ſome pleaſure and refreſhment in poſſeſſing and annoying the bodies of the living. Of this kind they reckon alſo the ſatyrs, incubuſes, fauns, familiar ſpirits †, &c. The Chriſtians, on the other hand believe them, with greater countenance from holy writ, to be

(3[r]) Vid Burſtorf. in Talm. cap. 1. & lib. Zerar, Hammor, ſive de ſuffumigiis medic. † See Vol. I. p. 163, (L).

cried with a loud voice; and acknowledging him to be the holy one of God, expoſtulated with him, not to deſtroy him. Him be fallen angels, who have borne a conſtant enmity to mankind ever ſince the creation of Adam.

But it is here objected againſt either hypotheſis, that if thoſe malicious ſpirits had ſuch an extenſive power, as theſe poſſeſſions ſeem to attribute to them, there would be no end of their miſchiefs, till they had made an end of mankind. Whereas, whatever we may read of them in former days of ignorance and ſuperſtition, we ſee nothing like it now even pretended among the more civilized nations, and only hear ſome imperfect accounts among the more remote and leſs cultivated ones, which yet may be either mere cheats, or at beſt mere deluſions, and this has made a great number of our modern ſceptics believe them all to have been of this laſt kind (38), as being leſs derogatory to the honour of God, than the ſuppoſition of his giving ſo great a power to evil ſpirits.

But theſe learned critics ſeem not to obſerve, that all theſe plauſible pretences rather confute than countenance their notion; for who can believe, that Chriſt, who was ſo jealous of his father's honour, would not only have overlooked, but both by his words and actions even countenanced and confirmed a national error ſo oppoſite to it, if he had not known, that God, for ſome ends beſt known to his infinite wiſdom, had ſuffered thoſe evil ſpirits, to afflict and puniſh mankind? If he had known, that all theſe pretended obſeſſions were the mere effects of melancholy, hypochondria, lunacy, and ſuch like diſorders, incident to our nature, would he not have equally diſplayed his miraculous power in curing of them under this notion? and would not his pretended interrogations of thoſe pretended devils, and their petitioning to him? his (39) diſtinguiſhing between their ſeveral kinds, and the different means of expelling them (40), have been acting a farce unworthy of his divine character? how much more his promiſing to his diſciples the ſame power of caſting them out (41)?

That theſe devils are every-where repreſented in ſcripture as enemies to mankind, is beyond all diſpute; and that they are not as yet confined to the place of their puniſhment, appears not only from their frequent expoſtulations with Chriſt. Art thou come to torment us before the time? but much more from that dreadful and definitive entence to be pronounced againſt the wicked, Go, ye curſed, into everlaſting fire, prepared for the devil, &c. which, if only prepared for them, implies, that they are not yet ſent into it. If (38) Vid. Le Clerc com. in loc. Becker Monde enchant. Bayle, & al. (39) Matth. viii. 28. Mark v. 9, & ſeq & alib. (40) Matth. xvii 20, & ſeq. (41) Vid. int. al Matth. x. 1. Mark xvi. 17. Luke x. 17.

therefore

Him Jesus having put to silence by his powerful word, cast him out, and healed the man, to the admiration of the people, who spread his fame throughout all that region; insomuch, that before he had taken a little refreshment at Peter's house, and healed his mother of a fever, under which she had languished some considerable time, they had brought from that whole neighbourhood all that were afflicted with diseases, and set them before him; and Jesus, according to his wonted compassion, laid his hands on every one of them, and sent them all home healed [q].

Calls Simon Peter

BEING come to the lake of Genezareth, or sea of Tiberias, the crouds followed him so thick, that he was forced to get into a boat belonging to Simon Peter, whom from a fisherman he had called to be one of his apostles, and bid him launch out a little way, and taught the people from thence. As soon as he had done speaking, he bid Peter cast his net for a draught; and was answered, that tho' they had toiled all night in vain, yet at his word they would try afresh. They did so, and caught such a large draught, as was like to have sunk the boat. Peter surprised at it, fell at his feet, and besought him to depart from such a sinner as he was; but Jesus taking him up, bid him be of good courage, for he would from thenceforth make him a fisher of men [r]. During his abode in Galilee, he continued still confirming his doctrine with such numbers of miracles, that his fame had reached all the neighbouring provinces of Syria, Phœnice, &c. insomuch, that many people came from thence to be healed of their infirmities by him. During his abode at Capernaum (P), a paralytic, [q] LUKE iv. 31. ad fin. [r] LUKE v. 4, & seq. MARK i. 17, & seq. & alib.

therefore we stick close to the plain and obvious meaning of the inspired writers, we must suppose those possessions to have been something very different from such pretended disorders of the body or mind; and where lies the unreasonableness of the supposition of a vast variety of spiritual beings, some of a good and benevolent, others of a bad and maleficent, nature, but all under the government of the supreme Being?

(P) This city was situate on an eminence by the lake of Genezareth, though the exact place be not known. Our Saviour exchanged it instead of that of Nazareth, where the Rusticness and incredulity of the Nazarites had been an obstruction to his doctrine and miracles. He made it his chief abode during the three last years of his preaching, and wrought a great number of miracles there; but as they made him no answerable returns for those favours, he forewarns paralytic, who had heard of his fame, got himself transported thither, in his couch born on mens sholders, to be presented to him; but the house, in which he was, being so thronged within and without, that they could get no access to him, they got him up to the top of the house, and having untiled part of it, let him down by ropes, and so set him before him. Jesus beheld their faith with pleasure, and addressing himself to the paralytic, bid him be of good chear, for his sins were forgiven; which, according to the Jewish notion, that such infirmities were the effects either of our own or of our parents sins [r], was no more than telling him that he was healed of his palsy. But the scrupulous Jews, not understanding it in that sense, accused him in their hearts of blasphemy, in assuming a power peculiar to God; but Jesus, by the immediate cure of the sick man, soon convinced them of their error, and of his being equally impowered to forgive sins and to cure any infirmities [t]. It was his custom, by reason of the great resort of people that came to hear him, to go out of the city from time to time, and to teach them by the sea-side; and, upon his often passing to and fro, he observed a publican sitting at the receipt of custom, named Levi or Matthew, and bid him follow him (Q). Matthew did not helitate one moment, but Cures a paralytic.

Matthew called.

[r] De hoc vid John ix. 2. [t] Matth. ix. 1, & seq. Luke v. 18, & alib.

forwarns them, that though their city was then exalted up to the clouds, it should shortly be brought down to the lowest abyss (42); which came accordingly to pass in the Jewish war, so that no footsteps remain of it.

(Q) The other evangelists give him only the name of Levi, which was his Jewish name; for he was a Jew, and the son of Alphæus, and native of Galilee He is therefore thought to have called himself by that of Matthew, which is supposed to have been significant of his profession, to express his grateful sense of his vocation. His chief residence and office was at Capernaum, and there it was, that he was called, from the profession of a publican, to the dignity of an apostle and evangelist

He has been highly reflected upon by Porphyry and Julian, surnamed the apostate (43) for thus lightly following a man, whom he had so little knowledge of; but as it is scarce probable, that he should live in the same city so long, and not have heard of his doctrine and miracles; so it is rather a wonder he did not become his disciple sooner, considering his great readiness in following him as soon as he was called; but it is likely, he thought his profession was

(42) Matth. xi. 23. (43) Vid. Hieron. in Matth ix.

as

but left his office and followed him; and to expreſs the ſenſe he had for this gracious call, he made him a ſumptuous feaſt at his own houſe, to which many of the ſame profeſſion were alſo invited. This gave a freſh occaſion of offence to the ſcrupulous Jews, who made ſome ſevere complaints of it to his diſciples; but Jeſus ſoon ſilenced their clamour, by aſſuring them, that he was come to call, not the righteous, but ſinners, to repentance [u].

AFTER ſeveral other miraculous works done during his ſtay in this place, Jeſus departed for Jeruſalem to be preſent at the approaching feſtival of the paſſover, where there uſed to be a great concourſe of Jews, who came beforehand to purify themſelves againſt that feaſt. In this city there was a famous pool or reſervoir, adorned with five porches or piazzas, and called in the Hebrew Beth-eſdah (R), whoſe water, being odious to him, as it was to the Phariſees and the reſt of the Jews, and would prove an obſtacle to his reception. But as ſoon as this gracious invitation had convinced him of the contrary, he ſufficiently ſhewed how ready and glad he was to embrace it, by his forſaking all to follow him.

His being here called the ſon of Alpheus has led ſome antients (44) into a notion, that he was the brother of James, who is alſo called the ſon of Alpheus (45); and they have, it ſeems, been followed in it by the generality of modern Greeks; but there ſeems to be no foundation for it. The goſpel gives us no further particulars concerning him, ſaving that he continued a faithful diſciple of his maſter; and therefore all we ſhall venture to add is, that he is univerſally allowed to have been the firſt that penned any ſuccinct hiſtory of the goſpel. He is ſaid to have wrote it at the deſire of the apoſtles and Jewiſh converts of Paleſtine, before his departure from it, to go and preach in the provinces allotted to him (46), about eight or ten years after Chriſt's reſurrection. The laſt quoted father tells us, it was written in the Chaldaic-Syriac tongue, which was then the common one, and in Hebrew characters. We refer our readers for the further particulars of it to the controverſy lately ſtarted about it. As for St. Matthew, he is moſt commonly believed, by antients and moderns, to have preached the goſpel in Perſia and Parthia, and to have ſuffered martyrdom in Caramania, a province then ſubject to the Parthians.

(R) Probably, as ſome conjecture from the words בית חסדה

[u] MATTH. ix. 10, & ſeq.

(44) Chryſoſtom. Homil. 33. in Matth Theodoret. & al. (45) Matth. x. 3, & alib. (46) Euſeb. Eccl hiſt. l iii c. 24. Chryſoſt. in Matth. i. Iren. l. iii. c 1. Hieron. de vir. illuſtr. & al.

being at ſome particular ſeaſons miraculouſly ſtirred, had the virtue of curing the firſt perſon that jumped into it of whatever diſeaſe he was troubled. Here Jeſus beheld among the crouds of ſick folk that waited for the motion, a man who had laboured under an incurable palſy thirty eight years, but, for want of ſome charitable hand to throw him into the water, had hitherto been deprived of the benefit of that place. Jeſus, moved with compaſſion at his miſery, healed him by his powerful word, and bid him take up his bed and go to his home. This cure, being done on the ſabbath day, gave freſh offence to the Phariſees, who looking upon him as a ſabbath-breaker, began to think of putting him to death for it. To diſculpate himſelf, and to convince them that works of mercy were ſo far from being a violation, that they were the proper buſineſs of the ſabbath, he expreſſed himſelf to them in words to this effect: As my Father worketh hitherto, ſo do I work: intimating thereby, that though God had reſted on the ſeventh day from creating, in memory of which the ſabbath had been inſtituted, yet did he not ceaſe on that day from the work of preſervation, which work himſelf was now

Cures a paralytic on the ſabbath.

beth cheſdah, the houſe of mercy, alluding to the merciful cures which were wrought there on the ſick, lame, &c. The vulgate, however, read it beth-zaida, which ſome render the Probatic pool, on a ſuppoſition, that the ſheep deſigned for ſacrifice were firſt waſhed in it, which ſheep ſo waſhed, were called Probatæ. Others, who read it בית אשדה, beth-eſhdah, render it the houſe of defluxion, from another ſuppoſition, that the waters in which the entrails of the victims offered in the temple were waſhed, emptied themſelves by a ſubterranean ſewer into this pool or reſervoir, whence ſome have taken it into their heads, that the blood, dung, and other filth of thoſe creatures running along with them, gave that medicinal virtue to the pool. Perſons of ſuch witty conceits are ſeldom ſollicitous about the character of the ſacred hiſtorians, or elſe the evangeliſts, attributing thoſe cures to a miraculous motion of the water, would make them more cautious, how they ſet up a bare conjecture againſt their teſtimony

The five porches mentioned by St John, ſeem to argue this pool to have been built in the form of a pentagon. Euſebius and St, Jerom (47), tell us, that they ſhewed ſtill in their time a kind of double pool or reſervoir, the one of which filled itſelf every year with rain water, and the other, which retained ſtill a kind of redneſs, as if from the blood of thoſe victims above mentioned, which the temple ſewer carried into it. The reader may ſee what has been ſaid of its remains in a former volume †.

(47) Loc. Hebr. † Vol. III. p 148, & (Q).

imitating, imitating, in preſerving a number of wretched periſhing objects, whoſe miſery claimed his pity and aſſiſtance. But the Jews, ever watchful for matter of new accuſation againſt him, inſtead of admiring his godlike imitation of that ever-beneficent Being, accuſed him of blaſphemy, for having preſumed to call him his father, making himſelf thereby equal to God. Jeſus tried in vain to remonſtrate to them, by many convincing arguments, that he had arrogated nothing to himſelf, but what his miraculous works did evince his undoubted claim to; and by aſſuring them, that they ſhould ſhortly ſee greater and more ſtupendous ones than thoſe wrought by him, ſuch as had never been done ſince the creation of the world. He tried in vain to convince them from the teſtimony of the prophets and other ſacred writings, from that of John the Baptiſt, but eſpecially of his heavenly father, who had declared him his beloved Son, and had given him moreover ſuch a miraculous power over the whole creation [w]. He was at length obliged to ſilence their falſe accuſation, by reminding them, that even the ſcripture gives the title of gods to mortal men [x]. If then, added he, they be called gods, againſt whom the ſentence of mortality had been pronounced by God (S) himſelf, why ſhould you reckon me guilty of blaſphemy, whom the father has thus ſanctified and ſent into the world, becauſe I call myſelf the Son of God.

His defence of it cenſured by the Jews.

Jeſus obſerving, however, how ſtrenuous the blinded Jews were againſt his doing works of mercy on the ſabbath, reſolved, if poſſible, to convince them of their error, by chuſing that day to diſplay ſome of the moſt ſignal ones, and exploding their cenſures by ſuch cogent arguments as they could not gainſay. Accordingly, after his departure out of Jeru-

Works other miracles on that day.

[w] JOHN v. 19, & ſeq. [x] Conf. Pſ. lxxxii. 6, &c. JOHN x. 34, & ſeq.

(S) This is certainly the meaning of Chriſt's words here, and not as ours, and other verſions render it, Thoſe unto whom the word of God came. For the place referred to in the pſalms is, I have ſaid ye are gods, but ye ſhall die like men. So that, according to the moſt literal ſenſe of our Saviour's words, they ſhould run thus: If they are called gods, againſt (not unto) whom the word of God came forth, meaning this ſentence of death. Thoſe that are acquainted with the Hebrew idiom, to which the evangeliſts were uſed, know, that the context muſt decide the meaning of thoſe particles, which are capable of ſeveral even oppoſite ſignifications, which the ſenſe alone can determine (48).

(48) Vid. Nort Knatchbul. Le Scene, & al. in loc.

ſalem, he went into one of their ſynagogues, where there ſtood a man, St. Jerom ſays he was a maſon, who had a withered hand. He began with aſking the Jewiſh doctors, whether it was lawful on the ſabbath; to do good or evil, to ſave or to deſtroy, intimating, that the omiſſion of the one, when a proper occaſion offered, was near equivalent to the commiſſion of the other. As they had nothing to anſwer to this reaſoning, they ſtood ſilent to let him do as he thought fit; but when he had reſtored the man's hand, by bidding him to ſtretch it forth, the ruler of the ſynagogue, inſtead of being convinced either by the miracle or argument, in a kind of indignation, fell a cenſuring thoſe objects of pity for offering themſelves to be healed on the ſabbath, and not rather on any other day of the week. This ſtrange behaviour extorted a ſevere rebuke from the meek Jeſus; he aſked him, whether they did not think it lawful to help an ox, an aſs, or a ſheep out of a ditch, or even to lead them to the water or paſture on that day? An undeniable argument, that they thought it lawful to do good to brutes on the ſabbath, and how much more was it to do ſo unto men? He urged alſo upon the like occaſion the circumciſion of children on the ſabbath, the prieſts killing and dreſſing their victims, and other ſuch-like works, which were uſually done on the ſabbath, and yet were far from being reckoned a profanation of it [y].

But there had one thing happened to him in the going to that place, in order, as is ſuppoſed, to preach at that ſynagogue, which had already highly exaſperated them. One of the evangeliſts obſerves [z], that it was the ſecond ſabbath after the firſt *; when as they were going through ſome corn fields, his hungry diſciples ventured to pluck the ears, and rub them between their hands to eat them. The Phariſaic croud, who beheld this kind of labour with a malicious eye, began to exclaim againſt their maſter for ſuffering it, it being in their opinion a manifeſt violation of the ſabbath. Jeſus was forced to excuſe it by reminding them of the prophet's words, I will have, or, more properly, I delight in mercy rather than in ſacrifice [a]; intimating thereby, that neceſſity takes away the rigour of the law, and juſtifying it by the example of David, who, in the like emergency, ventured upon the ſacred ſhew-bread, which was prohibited to all but the prieſts: and not only eat of it himſelf, but diſtributed it among his retinue. Their ſtubbornneſs was proof againſt all that he could urge in their or his own defence, and his ſilencing of them.

His diſciples cenſured for plucking the corn.

[y] Luke vi. 10, & ſeq. Matth. xii. 9, & ſeq. & al. [z] Luke vi. 1. * Du hoc Vid. Vol. III. p. 168. in fin. not. (M)
[a] Hos. vi. 6.

them, by ſuch convincing arguments, made them only the more inveterate, till they came at length to a reſolution of putting him to death. Jeſus, having timely notice of their wicked deſign, withdrew himſelf towards the ſea-coaſts, whither he was ſoon after followed by multitudes from all the maritime parts; and to whom he ſtill extended his wonted compaſſion, both by his teaching them and healing their ſick.

ONE night, having withdrawn himſelf both from them and from his diſciples; he went up to a mountain apart, and ſpent the whole night in prayer; and on the morrow calling them together again, he choſe twelve from among the reſt, to be the more immediate witneſſes, preachers, and recorders of his life and doctrine; and to whom he gave the title of apoſtles, which word ſignifies meſſengers or embaſſadors. The reader may ſee their names in the margin [b] (T). All that we ſhall ſay Chuſes the twelve apoſtles.

[b] LUKE vi. 14, & ſeq. MATTH. x. 2, &ſeq MARK iii. 16, & ſeq.

(T) Theſe were, 1ſt, Simon, whom he ſurnamed Peter and whom we have mentioned a little higher; and 2. Andrew his brother; 3. James, ſurnamed The Greater, an inhabitant of Bethſaida, and John his brother, who were the ſons of Zebedee and Salome, often mentioned in the goſpel. Theſe, as well as Andrew, had lately been the baptiſt's diſciples, but had left him to follow Jeſus, and on the account of their reſolute conſtancy, or more likely perhaps from that queſtion they aſked him, Wilt thou that we command fire from heaven, to conſume, &c (46) were ſurnamed by him Boanerges, or the ſons of thunder or tempeſt; that word being only a corruption of the Hebrew בני־רעם bene-raham, or rather רעש raahſh; 5. Philip mentioned before; and, 6, Bartholomew, ſuppoſed the ſame with Nathanael; 7. Levi, or Matthew, the publican and evangeliſt; and, 8. Thomas, ſurnamed Didymus, which ſignifies a twin; 9 James, diſtinguiſhed by the name of The Leſs, and the ſon of Alpheus, or Cleophas, and of Mary, the firſt couſin, if not the ſiſter of the Virgin Mary, for which reaſon he is often called the brother of our Lord; 10. Simon, ſurnamed The Canaanite, from Cana the place of his birth, and Zelotes, probably becauſe he had belonged to that ſect; 11. Judas, otherwiſe called Jude, and brother to James the Leſs, ſurnamed alſo Lebbeus, and Thaddeus: and Judas the traitor, and ſurnamed Iſcariot.

Concerning the ſurname of this laſt, there have been various conjectures; ſome thinking that he was ſo called from Keriot, a city in the tribe of Judah (50), from which he is ſuppoſed to have come;

(49) Luke ix. 54. (50) Vid. Joſh xv. 25. Eckard. Ed. Hod. ant. l. 4. Calmet. Jub xv. & al.

ſay at preſent of them is, that he did not give them this preference to all the reſt, either on account of their great ſenſe or learning, for they were ſome of the moſt rude and illiterate; nor for their credit rank or high birth; for they were moſtly, if not all, poor fiſhermen, and either natives or inhabitants of Galilee, the moſt obſcure and deſpiſed canton of the Jewiſh kingdom; much leſs for their courage, who proved all rank cowards in the time of danger. They had no reliſh or propenſity to his pure and exalted doctrine; for they dreamt of nothing, but of an earthly kingdom and temporal happineſs. In a word, they were in all reſpects the moſt unqualified for the great taſk to which they were appointed, the converſion of the world. But this was a work, which, as a great prophet had long ago foretold [c], and the apoſtle, has ſince obſerved [d], was to confound the counſels of the wiſe, ſwallow up the underſtanding of the prudent, and defeat the power of the mightieſt. We have already ſeen it in a great meaſure fulfilled in the perſon and character of their divine maſter, and in the circumſtances that accompanied his low and humble birth and education, as well as in that vaſt ſeries of wonders, which he wrought ſince his entrance into his public miniſtry. And we ſhall ſee the ſame infinite wiſdom diſplay itſelf ſtill more ſurprizingly, throughout the whole ſequel of this chapter.

Their character,

[c] Iſaiah xxix. 14. [d] 1 Cor. i. 19.

come; iſh in the Hebrew ſignifying a man. St. Jerom and Euſebius ſpeak of a town in the tribe of Ephraim, called Iſcariot (1); others, who make him of the tribe of Iſſachar, think Iſcariot only a corruption or abbreviation of Iſſachariotes; others fetch their etymologies of it ſtill further. The reader may ſee them in the vocabularies at the end of the vulgate and other bibles.

Were we to offer our conjecture on ſuch a dark and dry ſubject, we ſhould rather fetch it from the Hebrew, אישׁ־חרט Iſh-chirret, literally the man of the bag, or the bag-bearer. We have formerly obſerved †, that the proper ſignification of the word chirret, is a bag, in ſuch a one Naaman is ſaid to have tied his preſent to Gehaſi, (2); and St. John acquaints us, that Judas was a thief, and carried the bag: Why might not this nick-name then have been given him on that account by the diſciples, when they knew how fond he was of his office, and how unfaithful he was in the diſcharge of it.

(1) In Iſaiah xxviii. 1. † Vol. II. 564, (B). (2) 2 Kings v. 23.

In

IN the mean time, the wondering crouds flocked to him from all parts of Judæa and the neighbouring provinces, attracted by that divine and efficacious virtue which flowed from him, insomuch, that the bare touch of his garments wrought the most surprizing cures, on the sick, lunatic, demoniacs, and other afflicted persons. He led them therefore one day to a convenient spot of ground (U), where he preached to them that celebrated sermon, commonly known by the name of his sermon upon the mount. We shall not take upon us to repeat it here. The reader may read it in its native, but powerful, simplicity, in the places quoted in the margin [e]. All that we shall observe of it is, that he began it with a most comfortable display of the blessed state of those, whom both Jews and Gentiles accounted most miserable; that, through the whole course of it, he not only exploded the wretched glosses, by which the Jewish doctors had almost obliterated every moral precept of the Mosaic law, but substituted such new and excellent ones of his own, as exalted them to a pitch, which the world till then had neither heard nor dreamed of. To instance in one or two of his precepts, amongst the many sublime ones there delivered, how highly had that negative precept been admired by all the wisest heathens, of not doing to others what we should not desire to be done to us! and yet how vastly short is it of that new and noble one of his, whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, that do ye unto them [f]. We observed a little higher, that the Pharisees thought themselves free from guilt, provided they abstained from the very act of sin, though they indulged themselves in every thought, desire, and complacency, that came short of it; but here the ax is laid to the very root, and every sin, even in the least degree of it, condemned, even in the heart. Well might then his ravished audience cry out, that he taught

His excellent sermon on the mount.

[e] Matth. v, vi, & vii. pass. Luke vi, 20, & seq [f] Matth. vii. 12.

(U) St. Matthew (3) tells us, that he went up into a mountain, and St. Luke (4) hints, that he stood in a plain, or champain place. The difference may probably be smaller than we are aware of. Those mountainous parts have their plains as well as vallies; so that he might only stand on a higher ground than his audience, for the conveniency of being better heard, whilst they stood or sat on the plain ground below him. For St. Luke doth not expressly say, that he preached in the plain; but that he came down to it, to heal those that waited for him.

(3) Ch. v. 1. (4) Ch. vi. 17.

with

with a power and authority, vaſtly above what they had obſerved in the ſcribes and Jewiſh doctors [g].

He concluded this excellent diſcourſe with aſſuring them, that not every one that ſhould call him Lord ſhould enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that performed the divine will, and complied with the precepts he had been delivering to them. For the latter, added he, like the wiſe man that builds his houſe on a rock, builds his hopes on a ſure foundation; whereas the former, like the fool that builds on the ſand, is liable to have them overthrown by every blaſt, by every wind of doctrine, and by every temptation. On his deſcent from the mount to return to Capernaum, he was addreſſed by ſome of the heads of the city in the behalf of a worthy centurion, from whom their nation had received ſome ſignal favours, and whoſe ſervant was then very ill of a palſy. Jeſus offered to go to his houſe and heal him; but when the Roman officer heard of it, he ſent him an humble meſſage, in which he acknowledged himſelf equally unworthy to receive him under his roof, as he had been to come and offer his requeſt in perſon, but that he wholly depended on his efficacious word for the cure of his ſervant; For, added he, if my authority, ſmall as it is, can yet enforce obedience from thoſe under my command, how much more will your all-powerful one be obeyed, where-ever you are pleaſed to exert it! His ſingular faith and humility did not go long unrewarded; and Jeſus, highly pleaſed with him, healed his ſervant at that inſtant, and greatly commended his faith, as far ſurpaſſing all that he had beheld, even in Iſrael; upon which account he took occaſion to aſſure his audience, that many ſtrangers ſhould be admitted from the four corners of the world into his heavenly kingdom, whilſt the children of it ſhould be miſerably caſt out for their diſobedience and unbelief [h]. On the day following he went to Naim (W), and, upon his enter-

Heals the centurion's ſervant.

[g] Ibid. ver. ult. [h] Matth. viii 5, & ſeq. Luke vii. 1. & ſeq.

(W) This city was ſituate in the plain near mount Tabor, and within about two miles of that mountain, and was divided from it by the brook Kedron (5) The ſame author places it at a ſmall diſtance from Endor and Scythopolis (6). There was another city of that name in Idumæa, where, Joſephus tells us (7), Simon the ſon of Gorias made his retreat, after he had ſtrongly fortified it.

(5) Euſeb. ſub voce Naim. Reland. Pal. l. v. c. 7. (6) Euſeb. ſub voce Endor.

ing the city, he met a large croud of people accompanying the corpſe of a young man, the only ſon of a poor widow, and, in compaſſion to her, touched the bier, and raiſed her ſon to life, whilſt the aſtoniſhed multitude ſpread forth his fame through all that country, and proclaimed him the prophet ſent by God to redeem his people [i]. It was probably at this time, that the baptiſt ſent his two diſciples to him, of whom we have lately ſpoken, and upon which Jeſus took occaſion to cenſure the unjuſt judgment, which the unbelieving Jews paſſed upon that more than prophet, and himſelf: John, ſaid he, was a very abſtemious and mortified perſon, and you cried him down as a demoniac; me, who came in a more ſociable and affable way to call ſinners to repentance, you repreſent as a drunkard and glutton; but wiſdom will, in ſpite of your ſlanders, be ſtill juſtified by her children [k]. It was upon this account that he ſo ſeverely upbraided thoſe neighbouring cities, which had been witneſſes of his ſtupendous works, aſſuring them, that their fall would be much more dreadful than that of Sodom and Gomorrah, whom ſuch miracles would have wrought into the deepeſt repentance [l]. He concluded his diſcourſe with a ſolemn thankſgiving to his heavenly Father, who, in his infinite wiſdom, had choſen the humble and infant-like to impart the myſteries of his goſpel to, whilſt the proud and conceited worldlings rendered themſelves unworthy of them; and with a gracious invitation to all, that laboured under their ſinful burdens, to come and experience how eaſy the yoke, and how light was the burden, which he laid on his followers (X).

THIS

[i] Ibid ver. 11, & ſeq. [k] Ibid. 29, & ſeq. [l] Ibid. x. 13, & ſeq. Matth. xi. 20, & ſeq.

(X) This is a truth indeed that is beſt underſtood by one's own experience; yet as there is not one poſitive or negative precept of the goſpel, that is not excellently adapted to our own exigencies, and founded upon the ſolideſt wiſdom, it highly concerns us to liſten to this, rather than to our corrupt appetites, which will always make us look upon God as a ſevere task-maſter, rather than a kind and skilful phyſician, whoſe ſole aim is to cure us of our diſeaſes, and to reſtore our ſouls to that perfect ſtate of health, which alone can make us happy here or hereafter.

Were we indeed commanded to purchaſe this deſirable ſtate at as dear a rate as the miſer doth his gold, the ambitious his riſe, the ſoldier his fame, or the labourer his poor livelihood; though, even here, it would be our higheſt wiſdom to comply with the conditions, ſince the conſequence is of infinitely greater weight; how much

THIS diſcourſe moved a Phariſee, named Simon, to invite him to take a meal at his houſe, where he had not been long, before he was accoſted by a woman, formerly of a looſe character, but now a ſincere penitent. This woman came behind him in the humbleſt guiſe, accompanied with a flood of tears, with which ſhe waſhed his feet; and, having wiped them with her hair, began to anoint his head with a coſtly perfume ſhe had brought with her. A ſight ſo ſhocking to the proud Phariſee filled his head with a ſtrange notion, that, if his gueſt were a prophet, he would of courſe have ſpurned ſuch a notorious ſinner from him; but Jeſus, whoſe peculiar character it was not to break a bruiſed reed, or quench the leaſt good ſpark [m], but rather blow it into a flame, viewed her with a more compaſſionate and unerring eye, and diſmiſſed her with an anſwer as full of comfort, as her heart was of the ſincereſt repentance and love. Neither did he let his hoſt go unanſwered or unſatisfied; but, by a fit and pathetic parable, made him pronounce her a more worthy object of his mercy, and regard, than all his own pretended ſanctity and hoſpitality could intitle him to [n] (Y).

His pity to a poor ſhe-penitent.

Upon

[m] Iſaiah xlii. 3. Matt. xii. 20, & al. [n] Luke vii. 36, & ſeq. Mark xiv. 3. John xii. 1, & ſeq.

more muſt it be ſo, when every duty is not only eaſier and more worthy of a rational ſoul, but abſolutely neceſſary to fit us for that happineſs for which we were created!

Let thoſe, therefore, whom a wrong biaſs has warped into a prejudice againſt chriſtian duties, but view them with an impartial eye; and the more they conſider them, the more they will be convinced of this truth, that they are ſo far from being the arbitrary impoſitions of a ſupreme Being, that there is not one poſitive one, but is as neceſſary to the ſoul, as food is to the body; nor a negative one, that is not as expedient as abſtinence from groſs food is to a man in a high fever, or from drink to one in a tympany; but with this ſure and comfortable advantage, that the divine grace and aſſiſtance here promiſed will remove all difficulties and diſcouragements, and make every part eaſy and pleaſant; ſo that our own happy experience, which it is our fault if we fall ſhort of, added to God's infallible word, will make religion yield us the trueſt happineſs we can be capable of in this life, as well as the glorious aſſurance of a better in the next.

(Y) None of the evangeliſts has told us where this laſt ſcene happened. Our Lightfoot and ſome others think it was in Bethany, a city of Judæa; and that the Simon here mentioned, is the ſame with Simon the leper mentioned by the two other evangeliſts above-quoted, to which our bibles refer as a parallel; but it doth not appear

UPON his return to Capernaum, he was followed with such throngs of people, on account of his continual miracles, particularly the cure of a poor demoniac, deaf and blind, which he had just then wrought, that his mother and relations fearing, lest he should be stifled (Z) by the croud, came to disengage him from it. As they could not get into the house for the throng, they sent to desire him to come to them; but when it was told him, that they stood without, desiring to speak to him, he told the audience, that none were more nearly related to him, than those who came to him to hear the word of God and practice it. In the mean time, whilst his miracle on the demoniac had extorted an open confession from the better part of the by-standers, the Pharisees, moved with their usual indignation, cried out, that he cast out devils by Beelzebub the prince of devils †. Jesus easily confuted that slander, by shewing the folly of supposing Satan so far divided against his own interest; and that nothing, but a superior power to his, could force him to it; but, to assure them farther of the fatal danger of such malicious and impious suggestions, he added, that tho' every sin or blasphemy against the Son of man would, upon due repentance, be forgiven, yet that those against the Holy Ghost should find no forgiveness, either in this or the next world • (A); and therefore he concluded with Cures a demoniac.

The sin against the Holy Ghost

† De hoc vide supra., Vol. I. p. 105. • MATH. xii. 31, & seq. Mark iii. 28, &c.

pear, that this woman was the Mary mentioned by St. John; and we find our Saviour immediately after in Galilee working miracles, followed by a great multitude, particularly by some pious women, who attended on him, and assisted him with their purses, whilst he was taken up with his ministry.

These were Mary Magdalen, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel; Johanna, the wife of Chusa, Herod's steward; Susanna, and some others, who became part of his holy college.

(Z) So the word ought to be properly rendered and not, as ours and most versions do, that he was beside himself (8).

(A) It is neither our design nor provin e to repeat here, either the various opinions of divines concerning the nature of this sin, or the dreadful effects which a wrong notion of it has caused among weak and melancholy christians, especially among some sectaries in the predestinarian system. It might indeed be of greater comwith this warning, that men would give a ſevere account for every pernicious or hurtful (B) word at the day of judgment. Here fort to inſert ſome of thoſe elaborate expoſitions, which confine that ſin to thoſe Jews only, who made ſo perverſe a judgment of Chriſt's miracles, againſt the light of reaſon and conſcience; but as we cannot come into that notion, ſo neither would we lead our readers into it.

(8) Vide Le Scen. eff. on a new vers. Echard, & al.

A late critic (9) has endeavoured to take away all the difficulty, by affirming, that what we render blaſphemy, or ſin againſt the Son of man, means no more than the offences which one man commits againſt another. But if none but ſuch are to be forgiven, and thoſe againſt the Holy Ghoſt, or, as he underſtands it, againſt God, are either wholly excluded, or, at beſt, will, with great difficulty, be pardoned, it is to be feared we are left in a more woeful caſe, than that out of which he endeavoured to extricate us; but who doth not ſee, that whenever Chriſt ſpeaks of the Son of man, he always means himſelf, and not man in general?

Might we preſume ſo far as to give our opinion of this ſin, it would be this, that every ſlander or blaſphemy committed againſt Chriſt whilſt upon earth, and his divine miſſion as yet wanting ſome of its moſt authentic evidence, ſhould be capable of pardon; but after theſe laſt ſeals of his miſſion were ſuperadded, viz. his reſurrection from the dead, aſcenſion, and effuſion of the Holy Ghoſt, attended, as it was, with ſuch miraculous gifts, ſuch as prophecy gift of tongues, miracles, and the like; there remained no excuſe for unbelief, and conſequently no forgiveneſs either to the preſent or future generation of the Jews, who ſhould obſtinately perſiſt in it, nor indeed to any other perſons or nations, who ſhould reject the glorious light and evidence of his goſpel when offered unto them.

This may be thought to lean a little hard againſt our modern unbelievers; but let them conſider, whether the pretended grounds on which they reject the goſpel, bear any proportion in point of evidence with thoſe upon which we believe and embrace it; and if they do not, as all their united force never could, nor, we may ſafely add, never will be able to prove they do, let them lay the blame at the right door. Now, the goſpel plainly tells us, that nothing but faith in Chriſt, accompanied with a ſincere repentance, can obtain us the pardon of our ſins; how ſhould they then hope for it, who have neither the one nor the other to intitle them to it? Hence, we think, it plainly follows, that this is that only unpardonable ſin pointed out by our Saviour. See the next note but one.

(B) That this is certainly the plain import of the phraſe ῥημα αργον, which ours and other verſions render idle or unprofitable word,

(9) Le Scen. ubi ſupra, part 2. c. 4. ſect. 10.

appears

Here the Phariſees, being ſtung to the heart, began, according to their uſual cuſtom, to aſk him for a more convincing ſign of his divine miſſion; but he left them with this remarkable anſwer, that ſince thoſe he had already ſhewed them were not able to convince them, there ſhould be no other or greater given them than that of Jonah; for as that prophet was three days and nights in the fiſh's belly, ſo ſhould the Son of man be as many in the bowels of the earth, or grave, and riſe again on the third [P] (C).

FROM

[P] Matth. xii. 38. Luke xi 29.

appears from what goes before, that they proceed from an evil heart, which is therefore no more capable of producing better, than a corrupt tree can bear other than bad fruit (10).

(C) This ſaying confirms what we lately, and elſewhere before obſerved, that the reſurrection of Chriſt was to give the finiſhing ſtroke to the evidence of his miſſion. Before that, if his other miracles had convinced them that he was the Meſſiah, they would not have put him to that ſhameful death, which yet it was decreed and foretold he ſhould undergo; and it is upon this account that St. Peter excuſes that atrocious deed, as being done through ignorance. But after this his reſurrection was proved by ſo many irrefragable tokens, thoſe who rejected him became inexcuſable, and made way for the Gentiles who embraced chriſtianity. All which the reader may be fully ſatisfied of, by comparing, among a great number of others, the places quoted in the margin (11).

There are two difficulties ſtarted againſt what Chriſt here ſays of himſelf and Jonah, the one, that whatever the latter might be, Chriſt was far enough from being three days and three nights in the grave; and this has made ſome affirm, that he muſt have been crucified on the Thurſday, and not on the Friday. But the objection will eaſily vaniſh, when we obſerve, that, according to the Hebrew idiom, the particle ו ve, and, is often uſed for or, and that it may, and ought properly, be rendered three days or nights.

The other is from the impoſſibility of a whale's ſwallowing up a man whole, ſeeing the diameter of its ſwallow, when ſtretched at fartheſt, is little above three inches To which it is rightly anſwered, that the word here uſed ſignifies no more a whale than any other large fiſh that has fins; and that there is one commonly known in the Mediterranean by the name of charachias and lamia, of the bigneſs of a whale, but with ſuch a large throat and belly, as is able to ſwallow the largeſt man whole. There was one of (10) Vide Le Scen. ubi ſupra, c. 6 ſect. 2. (11) Conf. Acts ii. 31, & ſeq. iii. 17, & ſeq, & alib. & xiii. 46. xviii. 6.

this

Teaches in parables.

From thence he went to the ſea-ſhore, ſtill followed with great multitudes, and being got into a boat, he began to teach them again, not indeed in the manner he had lately upon the mount, but by a more familiar way, and more ſuitable to their groſs underſtanding; namely, by parables, ſuch as were very well known and underſtood by all the eaſtern nations, and not (as ours and other verſions ſadly intimate) that they might be loſt upon his ignorant audience; but as we have ſpoke fully on this important point in a former volume, we ſhall deſire our readers to turn to the place *. When he had finiſhed his diſcourſe, he ordered his diſciples to get him a ſhip to croſs the ſea of Galilee, into the territories of Philip the tetrarch, Herod's brother. Before he entered into the ſhip, there came ſome men who expreſſed a deſire to become his diſciples and follow him. One of them in particular juſt begged, that he might go and bury his dead father; and another to go bid farewel to his relations and friends. To the firſt of theſe he anſwered, Let the dead, ſuch namely as are ſo to the hopes of a future life, perform that office[q], and come thou and preach that eternal life which I am come to bring to light; but to the ſecond he gave this ſevere rebuke, that ſuch a retroſpection, as he expreſſed after thoſe worldly conſiderations, was wholly inconſiſtent with the character of one of his diſciples, whoſe mind and heart ſhould be ſo fixed on the concerns of another life, as to be wholly indifferent to all beſides; and ſo bid him follow without delay [r].

Stills the winds and ſea.

Being entered into the ſhip, whether to refreſh himſelf from the fatigues of the day, or to try his diſciples faith and manifeſt his own power, he withdrew himſelf into the ſtern, and there fell aſleep. There aroſe ſoon after ſuch a furious ſtorm of wind as was like to overſet them, and made them run to him, and awake him, crying, Maſter, ſave us, elſe we periſh. Jeſus, ſeeing them in ſuch conſternation, blamed their puſillanimity and want of faith; then, with his powerful word, rebuked the wind and ſea, which immediately obeyed. When his diſciples and the reſt of the company had beheld their danger and deliverance, they came and threw themſelves, trembling, at his feet, wondering, as well they might, what kind of man he was, who this kind caught within theſe twenty or more years, on the coaſts of Portugal, in whoſe throat, when ſtretched out, a man could ſtand upright. We may add, that the word uſed in Jonah, is דג גדול dag gadol, a great fiſh.

* Vol. III. p. 462, I.). [q] Matth. viii. 18, & ſeq. See alſo before p. 252. [r] Luke ix. 61.

could

could command thoſe unruly elements to be ſo quickly calmed; ſoon after which they landed on the other ſide, in the country of the Gergaſenes [f] (D).

HERE he was met by two demoniacs, ſo very fierce, one eſpecially more than the other, that no chains could confine them; but they choſe their habitation among the tombs, and made it unſafe to paſs by that way, till the ſight of Jeſus brought them trembling at his feet, where the devils began to acknowledge him to be the ſon of God, and beſought him not to torment them before their time. Our Saviour beheld the poor poſſeſſed with his wonted pity, and aſked the moſt furious of them, What was his name? and was anſwered, Legion, becauſe a multitude of thoſe evil ſpirits had taken poſſeſſion of him. Theſe therefore beſought him, that, if he caſt them out, he would permit them to migrate into the neighbouring herd of ſwine; which being permitted, the whole herd was immediately ſeen to tumble headlong down into the ſea, to the number of two thouſand, whilſt the two poor objects were reſtored to their health and ſenſes (E), The Cures two demoniacs.

[f] Matth, viii. 23, & ſeq Mark iv 36, & ſeq. Luke vii. 22, & ſeq.

(D) So the Greek manuſcripts of St. Matthew have it. Thoſe of the other evangeliſts call them Gadarenes. Some read Geraſenes, which makes it very difficult to know the ſituation of this canton, or of the city from which it took its name. Origen (12) thinks the name of the city to be neither Gedara nor Geraſa, ſince none of thoſe two cities were near any ſea or lake, but Gergeſa, ſituate on that of Genezareth or Tiberias, where they ſhewed ſtill in his time the rocky declivities, from which the ſwine were hurried down into the water. If ſo, that place might ſtill retain its name from the Girgaſhites, antient inhabitants of Canaan, of whom we have ſpoken in a former volume *.

This canton, where ever it was, muſt have been inhabited partly by heathens, which is the reaſon of the herd of ſwine being ſuffered to feed in that neighbourhood, which was not permitted in any place where they were all Jews, becauſe that creature is forbid by the Moſaic law (13).

(E) Thoſe who pretend to cenſure this miracle, as a wrong done to the owners, would do well to conſider how they queſtion the juſtice and authority of a perſon, who had given ſuch irrefragable proofs of both. Had the evangeliſts ſuppoſed any men capable of ſuch a preſumption, it is likely they might have given us ſuch reaſons for this action, as would have ſtopped their mouths.

(12) In Johann. Vide Calm. ſub Geraſa. * Vol. II. p. 182, & (D). (13) Vide Levit. xi. 7, & alib.

If

The news of this ſingular miracle were preſently ſpread through that whole region, and brought vaſt multitudes to the place; where they beheld with wonder the two men cloathed and in their right minds; but whether through fear, leſt any ill conſequence ſhould attend the loſs of the ſwine, or, which is as likely, leſt they ſhould receive ſome further and more grievous puniſhment from him, they meekly beſought him to depart their coaſts which he readily complied with.

Raiſes the ruler's daughter.

UPON his return to Capernaum, he was addreſſed by the ſorrowful ruler of the ſynagogue, whoſe daughter, about twelve years of age, was then expiring, and followed him to the houſe, attended, as uſual, with numerous crouds, among which was a poor woman, who had laboured a long time under an unnatural hemorragy, and conſumed her ſubſtance in ſeeking for the vain help of the phyſicians. She had ſuch a ſtrong faith in the world's Saviour, that ſhe thought the bare touch of his ſkirt would give her an immediate cure; and ſo it really did, but not without being perceived by him; for notwithſtanding his being ſo thronged by the multitude, he knew, by the virtue that was gone out of him, that ſome-body had touched him, and inquired of his wondering diſciples, who it was? The woman, finding, by this queſtion, that ſhe could not go undiſcovered, fell trembling at his feet, and owned herſelf the bleſſed object of

[t] MATTH. viii. 23, & ſeq. MARK. iv. 35. & ſeq. LUKE viii. 22, & ſeq.

If the owners of the ſwine were of that kind of apoſtate Jews, of whom we have had frequent occaſion to ſpeak in ſome former ſections, the puniſhment muſt be allowed to have been rather too mild than too ſevere. If they were Romans, Syrians, or of any other nation, they were ſtill guilty of a breach of faith to the Jews, who, though under a foreign yoke, were to be governed by their own laws; ſo that they might as well have introduced ſome of their idols into that country, as herds of a creature forbid by their law, and abhorred by the whole nation.

However, if the ſingularity of the miracle proved a means to convert them to chriſtianity, that was abundantly ſufficient to repay their loſs; and it is perhaps for this reaſon that Jeſus would not ſuffer the cured perſons to follow him to the other ſide, but bid them ſtay in their own country, to be ſtanding monuments of his miraculous power and goodneſs; and that the change he had wrought in them was not a tranſient action, done by ſome deluſion or faſcination, but a permanent and real, and conſequently miraculous cure, his miraculous power, and had this gracious answer superadded to her cure, Daughter, be of good comfort, thy faith hath made thee whole (F). By this time they were come so near the ruler's house, that they could hear the mournful tunes and cries that were made over the dead damsel, who had expired in the interim; and Jesus, who beheld with pity his paternal grief, bid him not fear but firmly believe; and entering the house with him, and with two or three only of his disciples, ordered the mourners to cease their doleful music, since the child was only asleep; but, whilst these derided him, he took Peter, James, and John, with the girl's father, into the upper room, and taking her by the hand, bid her rise; which she immediately did [u]. This miracle did still the more increase his fame, notwithstanding all his prudent cautions to prevent it (G).

his

HE

[u] MATT. ix. 18, &c. MARK v. 22, &c. LUKE viii. 41, & seq.

(F) Eusebius tells us, that the woman, out of gratitude, erected a brass statue to her miraculous physician, in which she was carved kneeling behind him, and laying her hand on the skirt of his coat. The story is much questioned, and if ever there was any such monument of this miracle; she can hardly be supposed to have been in a capacity of rearing it, because St. Mark and St. Luke tell us, that she had spent all her substance on physicians; so that it must have been done by some of the inhabitants of Cæsarea Philippi, of which city Eusebius says she was.

(G) Christ, often enjoining secrecy to the persons whom he cured, has been censured by some of our unbelievers, as unseasonable, and contrary to the design for which they were wrought, the proving of his divine mission. But he had several cogent reasons for preventing his miracles being too much blazed abroad, at least till after his resurrection; one of which was most probably, that he might not hasten the effects, as well as aggravate the guilt, of the Pharisaic malice, which, he knew, was to fall on him, before he had gone through every part of his work.

But there was a much greater motive to have these miracles concealed for the present; for the multitudes, who had already beheld so great a number of them, had conceived such notions of his being the Messiah, that, upon his feeding five thousand persons with a few loaves, they made a bold push to take him by force to make him a king (14); so that he was obliged to withdraw himself from them into some private mountain. Such attempts might therefore have proved of dangerous consequence, either by causomes to Nazareth.

(14) John vi. 15.

He ſoon left Capernaum, to go and reviſit his ungrateful city Nazareth, and, in his way thither, cured two poor blind men. He went, as uſual, into their ſynagoue, and preached to them with ſuch powerful eloquence, as aſtoniſhed the whole audience; but they, remembering the meanneſs of his education and parentage, were offended at him, inſtead of admiring him the more for it. This ſtubbornneſs of theirs prevented his working any ſignal miracles there; ſo that he contented himſelf with healing ſuh ſick perſons as offered themſelves in his way, and departed, never to viſit them again. By this time Sejanus having been put to death at Rome, and Tiberius been undeceived with regard to the falſe accuſations of that helliſh miniſter againſt the Jews, ſent orders to all his governors to have them treated with greater mildneſs, as we obſerved a little higher out of Philo; and Tacitus [w] obſerves thereupon, that they enjoyed a long peace under that emperor; which could mean no more, than that they neither diſturbed his government, nor he their tranquillity; but they were at this time in too great a ferment among themſelves to be properly ſaid to have been at peace. But theſe inteſtine feuds of theirs were beneath the notice of a Roman hiſtorian, if he knew any thing of them; for theſe troubled themſelves no farther about what was done in foreign provinces, than the intereſt or fame of their commonwealth was concerned in it; and this, as a judicious hiſtorian of our own obſerves [x], is probably the reaſon, why they are ſo ſilent about the glorious tranſactions of theſe three laſt years of our Saviour's life.

Sends his apoſtles to preach.

We are now come to the third year of his public miniſtry, which he began with making a thorough progreſs through all the cities of Galilee; where beholding, with his wonted compaſſion, the multitudes that followed him every-where, and how few the labourers were in compariſon of the plentiful harveſt in view, he ſent his twelve apoſtles, two and two, to preach alſo through all that country. To qualify them for this high office, he endowed them with his own miraculous gifts, commanding them to diſpenſe them with the ſame gratuitous liberality as they had received them, and at the ſame time forbidding them to incumber themſelves with any worldly conveniencies, but depend upon providence for a ſupply ing an inſurrection, and bringng the civil power upon him; all which, and many others of the like nature, were oppoſite to his deſign, and the ſcheme of providence concerning the time, nature, and manner of his death.

[w] Annal. l. vi. c. 25. [x] Echard. cent. 1. ch. 4.

and

and reward worthy their charitable labour. He reminded them, however, that they must not expect it so much in this life as in the next; for, added he, I send you as lambs among wolves; and since you have been witnesses of the ill returns which I have met with from this blind and ungrateful generation, you must not expect to fare better than your master; but rather rejoice to be, like him, despised, rejected, and persecuted; for they will hurry you many a time to the judgment-seat, and inflict many a grievous punishment on you; but be not terrified at it, nor solicitous what answer you shall make to their puzzling and ill-natured questions; for ye shall be endued with such wisdom at those times, as all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay [y]. In other cases, remember always to join the innocence of the dove to the cautiousness of the serpent (H). Blessed indeed will be the case of those who receive you and your doctrine; but miserable and dreadful, beyond that of Sodom and Gomorrah, shall be the fate of those who reject you. And as for yourselves, depend upon it, that he, without whose permission not a sparrow falls to the ground, will be still your sure guide and protector [z]. With these excellent gifts and instructions they departed, whilst Jesus tarried still at or in the neighbourhood of Capernaum, where he heard, about this time, the news of the baptist's death, mentioned a little higher, and whither his disciples soon after returned, and with no small joy acquainted him with the success of their late mission [a].

Herod all this while had only laid his conscious fears asleep by the death of his troublesome monitor, which were soon awaked again at the fame of Jesus, whom he supposed to be that prophet risen from the dead, whilst others took him for Elias, or some other of the antient prophets. This obliged him

[y] Vide LUKE xxi. 15. [z] MATTH. ix. 36, & seq. x. 1, & seq. MARK vi. 7, & seq. LUKE ix. 1, & seq. [a] MATT. ibid. & seq. MARK vi. 30.

(H) That seems the most obvious sense of the Greek φρονιμος, and not wise, as most versions render it. We have elsewhere shewed upon what account that creature is ironically called cunning and crafty in several parts of the scripture, and refer our readers to what has been said there †. But here our Saviour only bids his disciples to imitate their cautiousness or presence of mind, they being known to guard with their heads the rest of their bodies and to dart it with surprizing quickness where-ever the other parts are in danger.

† See IV. p. 116.

to withdraw himself, with his disciples, into a desert place, where he was, however, followed by a great multirude, and taught them there. The day being far spent, and victuals scarce in such a place, Jesus, unwilling to send them away fasting and faint, made the troops sit down in a convenient place, and having blessed his mean and scanty provision, which consisted in all of five barly loaves and a few small fishes, multiplied, and distributed it amongst them; and, after they had all eaten to satiety, his disciples were ordered to gather the remaining fragments, and filled twelve baskets with them, over and above what had been eaten by the multitude, which amounted to five thousand men, besides women and children. This stupendous miracle made them look upon him as the promised Messiah. They therefore were consulting to have made him king by main force; but, as soon as he perceived it, he resolved to convey himself far enough out of their reach [b]. He bid therefore his disciples to cross over the lake towards Bethsaida, whilst he stayed to dismiss the people, after which he was to follow them. Whilst they were on the water, he withdrew into a retired part of the mountain, to spend some part of the night in prayer. The wind, being then contrary and very fierce, hindered them from reaching the shore; but whilst they were rowing and toiling in vain, Jesus came towards them, about the fourth or last watch of the night, walking on the boisterous waves, and made as if he would pass by them; at which they gave a hideous cry, supposing that they had seen what the Jews call a mazik, or spectre of the worst kind, concerning whose power of doing mischief their rabbies tell us wonders too absurd to deserve a place here [c]. Jesus soon recovered them of their fright, by assuring them that it was he; but Peter, between doubt and surprize, answered him, Lord if it be thou, bid me come to thee on the water; and being permitted, ventured to walk towards him. A sudden gust of wind having swelled the surges, and his faith beginning to fail, he found himself sinking, and cried out to his master for help. Jesus stretched forth his hand to save him, upbraided his want of faith, and led him into the boat, where himself being also entered, there followed a calm, and they were agreeably surprized soon after with the sight of the wished-for shore [d]. Here he was again met by innumerable multitudes, who brought him their

Feeds five thousand with five loaves.

Walks on the sea.

[b] MATTH. xiv. 14, & seq. JOHN vi. 5, & seq. ad 17. [c] Vide auct. Tzeror. Hammor, & Hebr. comment. in Psal. xci. [d] MATTH. ubi supra, ver. 24, & seq. MARK vi. 46, & seq. JOHN vi. 16, &c.

diseased

diſeaſed from all parts to be cured. Among them were a great number of thoſe whom he had lately ſo miraculouſly fed, who had miſſed him, and came ſeeking after him, and expreſſed a more than ordinary joy when they had found him. Jeſus, however, blamed their untimely diligence, becauſe it did not ſo much proceed from a love to his doctrine, or from an earneſt deſire after that eternal happineſs which he preached to them, as from the temporal advantages which they expected from his carnal reign, as they believed him to be the Meſſiah. He therefore exhorted them to ſeek after thoſe more ſpiritual ones, which he was come to tender to them. This unexpected turn had a ſtrange effect upon them, inſomuch that they, who, at the firſt ſight of his late miracle had cried him up as the great deliverer promiſed by Moſes[e], began now to queſtion him, and to aſk for ſome freſh and ſurer tokens of his being ſo. Moſes, they ſaid, had proved his miſſion, by giving their forefathers manna from heaven; but as for him, he had done nothing like it for them, but only talked of his coming down from heaven, tho' they knew him to be the ſon of Joſeph and Mary, and promiſed them no other food and drink than that of his body and blood, which was ſtill a ſtranger and more offenſive doctrine. Jeſus tried in vain to perſuade them, that theſe were not ſo imaginary or unnatural food as they apprehended, but ſuch a real and efficacious one, as could alone fit them for, and raiſe them to a happy immortality. All theſe, and ſeveral other, ſpiritual topics, ſerved only to convince them, that he was not the Meſſiah they wanted, and were taught to expect; ſo that the greateſt part of them forſook him from that very hour. Jeſus was nothing leſs ſurprized at this deſection, which, he obſerved to his diſciples was owing to a want of ſuch a true diſpoſition of mind, as nothing could work in them, but the miraculous grace of his heavenly father, ſince nothing leſs than that could rectify the carnal warp, which their prejudices had given to their minds. He addreſſed next to his diſciples, to know of them, whether they felt any inclination to leave him, as the reſt had done? To whom Peter gave this glorious anſwer in the name of the twelve, Lord, whither, or to whom ſhould we go? Thou haſt the words of eternal life, and we are now fully aſſured, that thou art the Chriſt, the ſon of the living God. Jeſus took occaſion here to hint to them, that he had indeed choſen them twelve, but that one of them was a devil, Reproaches the carnal zeal of the multitudes.

Simon's noble confeſſion.

[e] Conf. DEUT. xviii. 15. JOHN vi. 14, & 30, & ſeq.

devil, meaning Judas Iscariot, who was to betray him [f], though he continued to follow him with the reſt (I)

THESE

[f] JOHN vi. 30, ad fin.

(I) The choice of this traitor into the apoſtolic college was not without a manifeſt providence, not only as he was thereby to fulfil that prophecy, that Chriſt ſhould be betrayed by one of that number (15), but as his character and actions juſtified the admiſſion of him into it. It is plain from what Chriſt ſays here of him, and the apoſtles elſewhere, that his offering himſelf a candidate for the apoſtleſhip was wholly from ſiniſter motives, and this made him put in preſently after for the office of treaſurer.

On the other hand, he ſaw enough to have made him a true convert to Chriſt and his heavenly doctrine, for he not only was a witneſs to all his ſtupendous works and excellent ſermons, but was, like the reſt, endued with the ſame miraculous power and chriſtian knowledge; ſo that if he continued in the ſame helliſh diſpoſition of mind, it was not out of any doubt concerning either the miracles or doctrine, much leſs from any knowledge, or even ſuſpicion he could poſſibly harbour, that his maſter was acting ſome grand impoſture; for had either of theſe been the caſe, he would have been ſo far from hanging himſelf out of remorſe for his treachery, that he would have gloried in the action, and juſtly too. The great horror therefore which he expreſſed for his guilt, and his deſperate end, when he ſaw him unjuſtly condemned by the ſanhedrin, could proceed from nothing elſe but a ful conviction, that the perſon whom he had thus betrayed was the true Meſſiah, that his miracles were real, and his doctrine altogether divine

If it be aſked, how a man, under ſuch conviction, could act ſuch a perfidious deed? it may be anſwered, that he did it in a fit of anger and reſentment, when he diſdainfully beheld the profuſion of a precious ointment beſtowed on his maſter, which, he thought, might have been better ſold for three hundred pence, and put into his bag (16) He might perhaps not foreſee all the ill conſequences of his treachery, but might ſuppoſe, either that the ſanhedrin would acquit him, or that he would work ſome ſignal miracle to extricate himſelf out of their hands; ſo that when he found it quite otherwiſe, it threw him into that horrid deſpair and madneſs in which he died.

We ſhall have occaſion in the ſequel to ſpeak more fully of the nature of his death. In the mean time, we beg leave to obſerve, after an eminent critic, an error which has crept into moſt tranſlations concerning him, which ſeems to intimate as if there had been ſome worſe place than ordinary appointed for him in the other

(15) Conf. Pſal. xli. 9. & John xiii. 18. (16) John xii. 3, & ſeq.

THESE things happened a little before the third paſſover after his entrance into his miniſtry; for the evangeliſt [g] hints, that that feſtival was at hand; but whether Jeſus went up to it, or ſtayed in Galilee, is no where expreſly ſaid. Only the former is moſt probable, not only from his conſtant and zealous attendance on all other feſtivals, but becauſe his abſence at this time, on any pretence, might have ſhewn an ill precedent to his diſciples, and given the Phariſees an occaſion of ſcandal and accuſation. But, if he went up to Jeruſalem, he did it ſo privately, and ſtayed ſo ſhort a time there, by reaſon of the plots which the heads of the Jews had laid againſt his life that it was not known to them till he was gone back into Galilee, where we find him preſently after [h]. It is at this paſſover, that Pilate is ſuppoſed to have made ſuch a ſevere example of the rebellious Galileans or Gaulonites, whoſe blood he mingled with their ſacrifices, as they were performing their devotions in the temple [i]; the news of which being afterwards brought to Jeſus, as well as the misfortune of thoſe eighteen men, whom a tower in that metropolis, named Siloam, cruſhed to death, he aſſured them, that neither of them came to ſuch a dreadful end, becauſe they were greater ſinners than the reſt; but that, without a ſpeedy repentance, they ſhould all ſhare in ſome ſuch-like dreadful fate.

THE feaſt being over, the ſcribes and Phariſees, who miſſed him there, ſent ſome of their ſpies after him to watch his words and actions, and to catch ſome matter of accuſation againſt him. The firſt thing theſe laid hold on was, his and his diſciples eating with unwaſhed hands, contrary to the traditions of the antients, and the conſtant cuſtom of the Phariſaic ſect. Jeſus eaſily exploded this accuſation, by ſhewing them the hypocriſy of cleanſing the hands, diſhes, and other veſſels, whilſt their hearts, which did moſt want it, were careleſsly left in all their filth of rapine, deceit, and other real defilements. But he went further to ſhow the miſchiefs ther world on account of his crime. The words run thus in the verſion (17). Lord——ſhew whether of theſe two thou haſt choſen, that he may take part in this miniſtry and apoſtleſhip, from which Judas by tranſgreſſion fell, that he might go into his own place. Whereas theſe laſt words ought more properly to be rendered, that he, viz. the perſon now to be choſen, may go into his (that is, Judas's) place, that is, may fill his vacant office (18).

[g] Ibid. ver. 4. [h] John vii. 1, & ſeq. [i] Luke xiii. 1, & ſeq.

(17) Acts i. 24, 25. (18) Le Scene, eſſay ubi ſupra.

ariſing

arising from too close an adherence to those traditions, a great part of which, though plainly opposite to the divine law, were yet preferred to it in point of authority and observance. He instanced in several particulars, especially that abominable one, by which they had made void the only command with a promise, that of children honouring and succouring their parents [k]. He not only shewed them the impiety of some, but the unreasonableness and stupidity of others, of those traditions; such as those that absolved a man that swore by the temple, but not him that swore by the gold of the temple, or him that swore by the altar, though not him that swore by the gift that was on it; though, as he justly observed to them, it was the temple that sanctified the gold, and the altar that sanctified the gift. These severe reflections did so much the more gravel these Pharisaic spies, as they seemed to come down to the capacity of the meanest of his audience, and could not but inspire the people with a singular contempt for those expounders of the law, as well as with a great veneration for himself.

To avoid therefore the persecutions which were likely to be raised against him from that quarter, he withdrew himself towards the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, and entered into a house privately, being unwilling to be known there; but it was soon beset by a great number of sick folk, who flocked to him to be cured. Among these was a Pagan woman (K), who yet addressed him with the title of Lord, and Son of David, and earnestly intreated him in behalf of her daughter, who was tormented with a devil. Jesus at first seemed so far to overlook her, that his disciples begged of him either to grant her suit, or dismiss her with a denial. The woman, becoming thereupon more importunate, received this unexpected repulse from him, that it was not fit to deprive the children of their bread, to cast it unto dogs; but she, nothing discouraged at so mortifying an answer, threw herself at his feet, and owned herself indeed unworthy of a child's [k] Matth. xv. 1, & seq. Mark vii. 1, & seq. & alib.

(K) St. Mark calls her a Syro-Phœnician, because she was an inhabitant of Phœnice, of which Sidon was the metropolis, that province having been joined by conquest to that of Syria *, St Matthew, who wrote in Hebrew or Syriac, calls her a Canaanite, because Phœnice was the antient seat of the Canaanites, Sidon being the eldest son of Canaan (19).

* See before, Vol. II. p. 295, & Vol. VIII. p. 500. (19) Vid. Genes. x. 15. & Vol. II. p. 302.

portion.

portion; but at the same time humbly expostulated with him, that the whelps were permitted to feed on the crumbs that fell from their masters table. Jesus highly commended her singular faith, and pronounced her daughter healed; and the woman highly satisfied with his promise, returned home, where she found her daughter sitting on the bed and perfectly cured [l].

Heals the Syro-Phœnician's daughter.

SHORTLY after this, Jesus went more eastwards towards the head of Jordan, and took a progress through Decapolis, (L), where, among other miraculous cures, he gave speech and hearing to a man born deaf and dumb, insomuch, that the astonished multitude cried out; That he had done all things well, and made the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak [m]. He was followed by the multitude from thence into some desert mountain, where he tarried three days with them, teaching them, and healing all their sicknesses of whatever kind. But as they had brought no sufficient quantity of provisions, Jesus pitying their case, and being unwilling to send them away empty, signified his design to his disciples; and finding that they had still seven loves and a few fishes, he multiplied both, as he had done before, into a sufficient quantity, to satiate four thousand men besides women and children; and seven baskets full, which the disciples gathered of the remaining fragments [n]; after which he dismissed the multitude, and crossed the lake of Tiberias towards the south-east parts of Magdala or Dalmanutha (M). Here he was accosted again by Multiplies seven loaves among four thousand.

[l] Matth. ibid. ver. 21, & seq. Mark vii. 24, & seq. [m] Matth. ibid. 31, & seq. Mark viii. 1, & seq. [n] Iid. ibid. & seq.

(L) A canton in Palestine, so called from its ten cities, situate some on this, and some on the other, side of Jordan, the capital of which was Scythopolis; it was mostly inhabited by Gentiles.

(M) It is not easy to know, whether these be two names of the same place, or two different ones, nor to guess where their situation was, only some where upon the coasts of the sea of Tiberias. For so much St. Mark intimates, when he says, that Jesus, crossing that sea, came to Dalmanutha (20); and St. Matthew, speaking of the same thing, says, he came to the coasts of Magdala (21). Some manuscripts of this last have Magedan and Magdan instead of Magdala. This makes it next to impossible to guess with any probability at their situation; for which reason we shall refer those by ſome of the Phariſees and Sadducees, who came to aſk of him a ſign; to whom having anſwered as formerly, that they ſhould have no other but that of the prophet Jonah, he ſailed back, and left them to make the application. In their paſſage, he bid his diſciples beware of the leaven of the Phariſees and Sadducees, which caution gave them a ſtrange kind of an alarm, becauſe they had forgot to take ſome proviſion with them; but after he had put them in mind of his two late miracles on the loaves, they came at length to underſtand, that the leaven, he forewarned them againſt, was the pernicious doctrines of thoſe two ſects [o]. Upon his landing at Bethſaida, the native place of ſome of his diſciples, a blind man was brought to him to be reſtored to his ſight. Jeſus could not refuſe his help to ſuch objects; but, as he had received ſuch ungrateful returns from the people of that city, for the many miracles he had wrought among them [p], he was unwilling to aggravate their guilt by freſh ones. Taking therefore the blind man with him out of the town, he reſtored him to his ſight, and bid him go directly to his home, without entering into the city again [q].

(20) c. viii. 10. (21) xv. ult.

Cures a blind man.

Being come to the borders of Syria, in the neighbourhood of Cæſarea Philippi, a city built by Philip the tetrarch who have a mind to know the conjectures of the learned, to the authors quoted in the margin (22).

[o] Iid. xvi. 1, & ſeq. Mark viii. 10, & ſeq. [p] Vid. Matth. xi. 21. [q] Mark viii. 22. & ſeq.

The laſt quoted author ſuppoſes Dalmanutha to be the ſame with Medan, a pleaſant place near the Phiala, or ſpring of the Jordan, where a kind of fair is kept, and much reſorted to all the ſummer. Hegeſippus, it ſeems, calls that place Melda and Meldan, from which he thinks Dalman to be a corruption, by degrees ſtretched out into Dalmanutha. This is going very far for an etymology, and yet it is by far the beſt we have met with, and perhaps nearer than that of our learned Hammond, who takes it to be the Meggiddo mentioned by the prophet (23), and famous for the death of two Jewiſh kings, Ahaziah and Joſiah (24).

Magdala is a corruption of the Hebrew Migdol, ſignifying a high tower. There might be many places of that name in Judæa, as well as in the neighbouring provinces; and if this Medan or Meldan was the ſame with Dalmanutha, then Magdala may have been ſome famous tower or land-mark leading to it, or ſome ſtrong caſtle or fortreſs belonging to it. All which is at beſt but conjecture.

(22) Euſeb. Hieron in loc. Hebr. Reland. Lightfoot, Hammon, Calmet, & al. (23) Zechar. xii. 11. (24) 2 Kings ix. 27. xxiii. 29.

of

of that canton, the ſon of Herod the Great, as was hinted a little higher, he began to queſtion his diſciples, who had by this time been about a year choſen into the apoſtleſhip, what the Jews commonly thought of him? Being anſwered, that he was ſuppoſed by ſome to be John the Baptiſt, by others Elias, or ſome other prophet, he aſked them, what their own opinion was of him? To this Peter anſwered for himſelf, as well as for the reſt, whoſe judgment concerning him he could not but know, and affirmed him poſitively to be the Meſſiah, the Son of God. It was upon this noble confeſſion that Chriſt ſurnamed him Peter, or Rock, and promiſed him upon that rock to build his church, to give him the keys of his heavenly kingdom, and the power of binding and looſing; ſo that which of the two ſentences he pronounced upon earth, ſhould be ratified in heaven. But he charged him and the reſt of his collegues not to let it be ſo much as whiſpered abroad, that he was the Meſſiah or Chriſt, till he was riſen from the dead [r].

The Jews opinion of Chriſt.

Peter's noble confeſſion of him.

FROM this time finding their faith ſo well founded, he began to open a myſtery to them, which they little dreamed of, but which it was high time for them to be acquainted with; namely, that of his ſufferings and death at Jeruſalem. Peter, thunder-ſtruck as it were, at ſuch an unexpected diſcovery, could not forbear crying out, Lord, far be it from thee, that ever any ſuch thing ſhould befall thee; but he preſently received ſuch a ſevere rebuke from him, as gave him to underſtand, that he was but a novice in the doctrines of man's redemption and ſelf-denial. He took therefore that fair opportunity to rid them of all their prejudices concerning a temporal kingdom, and to aſſure them, that there was no way for them, or any other of his diſciples, to enter into his heavenly one, but by treading in his ſteps, and going from the croſs to that glorious crown, which waited for them at the end of their race. He concluded this ſorrowful diſcourſe with aſſuring them, that ſome of thoſe that were there preſent ſhould not ſee death, till they had ſeen the beginnings of this his kingdom powerfully diſplayed before them [s] (N). But Chriſt foretells his ſufferings and death.

[r] Matth. xvi. 13, & ſeq. Luke ix. 18, & ſeq. & alib [s] Matth. ibid. verſ 22, & ſeq. Luke ubi ſupra, verſ 22, & ſeq. Mark viii 31, & ſeq.

(N) Accordingly he gave them ſoon after ſeveral ſure indices of it: Firſt, in his glorious transfiguration, then in his reſurrection, aſcenſion, in the wonderful change that was wrought on them by

But as he had given ſuch a kind of foretaſte of his ſufferings and death, as could not but make a deep effect upon them, conſidering that they had always looked on him as the reſtorer of the kingdom of Iſrael, and continued to do ſo even after his reſurrection [t]; he thought fit to give ſome of the moſt intimate of them a ſpecimen of his future glory.

Transfigured upon the mount.

THESE were Peter, and James, and John, whom he took up with him to an exceeding high mountain, generally believed to have been mount Tabor, or Thabor, deſcribed in a former volume †, and was there transfigured before them: This happened whilſt he was at prayer [u], when they ſuddenly beheld a luſtre darting from his face, outſhining even that of the ſun. His garments contracted a ſplendid whiteneſs exceeding that of ſnow. Moſes and Elias appeared immediately after, in all the brightneſs of their glorified ſtate, and conferred with him about the ſufferings and death which he was ſhortly to undergo at Jeruſalem, and for which he was to be exalted above every name in heaven or earth [w]. During this extraordinary intercourſe the three apoſtles, whether overpowered with the heavenly viſion, and fallen into a kind of trance; or whether it happened at night, when their eyes were uſed to be cloſed with ſleep; they found themſelves in a kind of ſlumber for ſome time, from which being at length recovered, they beheld the glory, wherewith their maſter and his two heavenly viſitors were ſurrounded; and Peter, in a kind of ecſtatic ſurprize, cried out, Lord, how good is it for us to be here! Let us make three tabernacles, one for you, one for Moſes, and the third for Elias (O), [t] Vid. Acts i. 6. † See Vol. III. p. 101, & A. [u] See Luke ix. 28, & ſeq. and the parallels. [w] Conf Pſ. cxxxviii. 2, & Philip. ii. 9, and Vol. IX. p. 536, note.

the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt, when they came to ſee and taſte of that ſpiritual kingdom, which they had before but the moſt imperfect notion of; in the ſucceſs of the goſpel through the greateſt part of the world, in ſpight of all the oppoſition of the Jews and Gentiles; and, laſtly, in the dreadful vengeance he took againſt the former, by the arms and power of the latter, according to his formal prediction of that laſt cataſtrophe. All which will be beſt ſeen in the ſequel.

(O) Bede informs us (25), that, in conſideration of this requeſt of the apoſtle, the chriſtians in after-times built three ſumptuous churches on the top of that mount, which were had in great reverence, and very much reſorted to by the devout pilgrims.

(25) Homil. in Matth. xvi.

being

being ſcarcely ſenſible of what he ſaid. Their ſurprize increaſed, when they found themſelves ſurrounded by a bright luminous cloud; ſoon after which they heard a voice from heaven, ſaying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleaſed: hear ye him. At theſe words they remained proſtrate on the ground, ſtruck with wonder and amazement, till their maſter came and raiſed them up; when, upon their looking about, they were ſurpriſed to find him alone, and in his uſual dreſs and appearance [x].

THEY came down ſoon after to rejoin the reſt of their company, and, in the way, Jeſus gave Peter, and his two aſſociates, a ſtrict charge to conceal the viſion till he was riſen from the dead. Theſe laſt words cauſed a freſh queſtion among them, what the expreſſion of his riſing from the dead ſhould mean; for, it ſeems, they could not yet perſuade themſelves of what he had ſo lately told them concerning his death at Jeruſalem. However, they took care not to ſpeak of his tranſfiguration till after his reſurrection. St. Peter, by his ſecond epiſtle, which he wrote a little before his own death [y], appears to have retained ſtill the moſt lively impreſſion of it by that ſhort, but elegant deſcription he gives of it there [z], though he owns at the ſame time the evidence which is drawn from the teſtimony of the prophets to be ſuperior to it. By that time they were got to the foot of the mountain, where a great multitude, and among them ſome Phariſees, waited for them, and had had no ſmall ſtrife with thoſe diſciples of his, whom Jeſus had left behind him; before he could well inquire into the occaſion of their diſpute, a man preſſed through the croud, and fell proſtrate at his feet, and implored his aſſiſtance in the behalf of his ſon, who was miſerably tormented with a dumb demon, by whom he was ſometimes hurried into the fire, and at other times into the water, and was become ſuch a diſmal object of pity, that he had brought him to his diſciples, but that they had not been able to give him any relief. Jeſus, moved with the deepeſt compaſſion at this doleful ſtory, could not forbear upbraiding both his diſciples and the whole Jewiſh generation with their want of faith; and, to convince them the more powerfully of it, ordered the child to be brought before him; and, whilſt he was in the ſtrongeſt convulſions and agonies, and his ſorrowful father beſeeching him in moſt moving terms, only returned him this anſwer, that, if he could believe, the cure of his ſon would be eaſily performed. At theſe words Comes down from the mount.

[x] Matth. xvii. 1, & ſeq. Mark ix. 2, & ſeq. Luke ix. 28, & ſeq.
[y] Chap. i. v. 13, 14. [z] Ibid. v. 16, & ſeq.

the

the father immediately cried out, Lord, I believe, supply my unbelief; and Jesus, rebuking the evil spirit, forced him to go out, not without hideous cries, and leaving the boy breathless on the ground, insomuch that the by-standers believed him dead. But Jesus soon undeceived them, and, taking him by the hand, raised him up, and delivered him to his father perfectly cured. As soon as they had withdrawn themselves from the astonished multitude, his disciples begged of him to know the reason, why they had in vain attempted to cast this devil out? to whom he answered, that all their disappointments in general were owing to their want of faith; but that this particular one was owing to their neglect of fasting and prayer, which alone could obtain a sufficient power from heaven to expel that kind of evil spirits [a].

Heals a demoniac.

Foretels his crucifixion and resurrection.

Jesus having observed the three, at their coming down from the mount, questioning about his resurrection, took this opportunity, as they were moving towards Capernaum, and freed from the crouds, to speak to the twelve afresh concerning his approaching death; and to assure them, that he should be betrayed into wicked hands, to be crucified, but that he should rise again on the third day. But their heads seem to have been so filled with a notion of an earthly kingdom, that, instead of desiring him to explain further to them the grating mystery of his cross, they were rather debating how he was likely to dispose of his new dignities, which they had more immediately in view. This dispute lasted till they were got to the city, where the collectors asked them, whether their master did not pay the usual tribute (P)? and Peter, who knew his disposition to give God and

[a] Matth. xvii. 14, & seq. Mark ix. 14, & seq. Luke ix. 37, & seq.

(P) Several interpreters have thought the tribute-money here exacted, to have been that which every one was to pay yearly to the temple; and that Jesus pronounced himself exempt from it, on account of his being the Son of God. But we rather think with Beza, that it was the capitation-money, which had been made in the time of Cyrenius, after Archelaus's banishment; of which we have lately spoke. For, as our Saviour seems to observe to St. Peter here, it was a tax imposed upon the Jews by the arbitrary will of Cæsar, against justice and equity; because, by their former alliances with Rome, they were to be free from all such imposts. However, to avoid giving offence, or too great a countenance to the pernicious Gaulonitish faction, Jesus rather chose to work a miracle, than refuse to conform to the law of the conqueror, and Cæsar their due, answered them in the affirmative. Jesus, however, expressed himself to him in such manner, as plainly hinted that tribute to be due only from strangers, and not from the children, or those who are free-born. Nevertheless, added he to Peter, to prevent giving any offence on that account, go and cast thy hook into the lake, and in the mouth of the first fish thou takest, thou wilt find a piece of money (Q); pay that for thee and me [b]. Pays the tribute.

As soon as Peter was returned, Jesus asked them, what they had been disputing about in their way thither, whilst they, conscious of their ill-timed ambition, held their peace. But Jesus, who knew it perfectly well, taking a child in his arms, expressly told them, that the only way of becoming great in his heavenly kingdom was, to become like that little child in innocence and humility; and that the more nearly they resembled him in those two excellent virtues, the peculiar foundation of his religion, and of all christian virtues, the greater and higher would their rank be there; whereas pride and ambition, the bane of his new and divine institution, were the ready means to exclude them from having any share or title to that glorious kingdom. Here one of the apostles interrupted him, to acquaint him, that they had observed a man take upon him to cast out devils in his name, and had forbidden him, because he thought himself above following them. But Jesus blamed his untimely zeal, since no man could work miracles in his name, but out of some due Reproves the ambition of his disciples.

[b] Matth. ibid. 22,& seq. Mark & Luke ubi supra, ad fin.

queror, and bring thereby a greater mischief upon himself and nation.

It seems, as if by this law or tax every man had been obliged to inrol himself in some city, whether of his nativity or abode. Jesus had made his chief residence at Capernaum, after he had forsook Nazareth. Peter had done the same in all likelihood, and that is the reason why he bids him give the piece of money for them both, without mentioning any thing of the other apostles, who might be inrolled at Bethsaida, or some other town near the lake.

(Q) This piece the Greek calls Stater, and the Hebrew or Syriac אסתירא, astira; it was equal to the double shekel, and was worth about half a crown of our money (26).

(26) De hoc vid. int. al. Brerewood de ponder. Bernard de mensur. & Prideaux in præf. ad connect. Beza, & al. in Matt. ubi supra.

regard

regard to his person and character [c]; then, resuming his figurative discourse, he told his audience, that whosoever should receive one of these little children, or meek and humble disciples, the least favour bestowed on them, though but a cup of water, in his name, should not fail of a reward. On the other hand, added he, whosoever shall presume to despise or give them just cause of offence (as it is indeed scarcely possible for men of that low and humble character to escape such a contemptuous treatment from a haughty and degenerate world), such indignities will meet with the same severe punishment, as if offered to my own person, or even to God himself, whose greatest favourites they are. But whilst mankind entertain a spirit so contrary to that of my gospel, they will hardly ever be free from such pernicious offences; and this is the reason why I, who am come to save that which is in danger of being lost, am so earnest in warning you against them. If a good shepherd find, that one in a hundred of his sheep is gone astray, how readily doth he leave the rest, to go and fetch back the straggling one! and how much greater pleasure would it be to me to recal every poor straggling mortal, who know how desirous my heavenly father is that none of them should perish, but that they may all be saved!

Recommends humility.

Charity.

But I tell you moreover, that you should be so far from offending these meek disciples of mine, who are incapable of giving you the least just provocation to it, that you ought to avoid even retaliating the wrongs and offences that are done to you. You all stand in great need of forgiveness from your heavenly father; but how can you ever expect it from him, if you refuse it to your fellow-creatures? In offences of a different nature, and of ill tendency to religion, your duty is to admonish the offender, first in the privatest manner; if this fails, repeat it before one or two witnesses; if this doth not reclaim him, declare his offence to the church; and if he rejects their admonition and censure, let him be rescinded from it; and, till he return and submit, look upon him as an infidel; pity and pray for him, but avoid all familiar intercourse with him. For here I repeat it again, whatever sentence is thus regularly passed upon such an obstinate offender by you here on earth, shall be ratified in heaven. For whatever any number of you, though ever so small, thus gathered in my name and spirit, shall agree to ask from above, I will surely be in the midst of them, to direct rect and help their prayers, and ſend them home with the deſired bleſſing.

[c] Mark ibid. ver. 38, 39. Luke ix. 49.

HERE Peter, finding that an offender was to be forgiven, if private admonition reclaimed him, aſked his maſter, how often he muſt repeat that forgiveneſs? whether ſo far as ſeven times? and was anſwered, not only as far as ſeven, but as ſeventy times ſeven times. But to prevent their being ſcared at ſuch an unlimited number, he explained to them the unreaſonableneſs, as well as danger, of an unforgiving temper, by the ſignificant parable of a wicked ſervant, who, having had the vaſt debt of ten thouſand talents mercifully forgiven by his lord, went and arreſted a fellow-ſervant for a poor hundred pence, and, without any regard to his intreaties and tears, threw him into a gaol; for which mercileſs cruelty his lord condemned him to a condign puniſhment. The application was eaſy, and the force of the parallel eaſily felt; but Jeſus was pleaſed to corroborate it, by aſſuring them on his infallible word, that they muſt expect no forgiveneſs from his heavenly Father, unleſs they were willing and ready to forgive each other their treſpaſſes [d]. Forgiveneſs.

AFTER a ſhort ſtay at Capernaum, the feaſt of tabernacles drawing near, ſome of his near relations, who were, it ſeems, the backwardeſt to believe in him, obſerving what a long ſtay he had made in Galilee, and how the fear of the Jews had made him avoid going into Judæa [e], took upon them to reprove him for it, telling him, that, if his deſign was to make himſelf known to the world, he ought to go and ſhew himſelf at Jeruſalem to the great concourſe of people that were juſt ready to flock to that feaſt, inſtead of hiding himſelf in thoſe obſcure corners of Galilee. Jeſus, inſtead of reproving their temerity, only took occaſion to remind them, that they indeed had nothing to fear there from the Jews; but that it was otherwiſe with him, againſt whoſe life the heads of that nation were more buſily plotting at this time than ever. He therefore told them, that they might go thither as ſoon as they pleaſed; but as to himſelf, he would take his own time. He ſtaid not long, however, after them, but went thither in the privateſt manner he could, for fear of awaking the jealouſy of his enemies [f]. He choſe to go through ſome parts of Samaria, and ſent one or two of his diſciples to prepare a lodging for him at one of their towns on the road; but theſe, according to their uſual rancour, underſtanding that he was going to Jeruſalem to the approaching feaſt, refuſed to give him any entertainment; which ſo exaſperated his company, that Jeſus goes to the feaſt of tabernacles.

[d] MATTH. xviii. 15, ad fin & alib. [e] JOHN vii. 1, & ſeq.
[f] Ibid ver. 4, & ſeq.

the two Boanerges, whom we mentioned in a late note, were for bringing down fire from heaven to consume that ungodly place. But Jesus gave them so severe a rebuke, as made them sensible how diametrically opposite such a revengeful and murdering spirit was to that meek and charitable one, which brought him from heaven to save mankind [g].

Appoints seventy disciples.

BEFORE he reached Jerusalem, he was pleased to appoint another college of disciples, to the number of seventy, answering to the number of the elders chosen by Moses to be his assistants [h], as that of the twelve apostles did to the twelve tribes of Israel (R). These he sent also by two and two, and with the same instructions and miraculous power which he had given to the twelve apostles; with this difference only, that the former were permitted to go to any city of Israel, but these only to those particular cities where himself designed to come after and preach [i]. By this time the feast of tabernacles was come, when there was no small search after, nor small strife about, him; some doubting whether he would venture himself there, some affirming him to be a prophet, others an impostor. He appeared at length publickly in the temple about the latter end of the feast, and, to their great surprize, taught boldly and openly there; and displayed such a superior knowledge of the sacred books, that they could not forbear asking one another in a kind of amazement, whence a man of so mean an education could ever attain to it? When Jesus heard this reasoning, he assured them, that his doctrine was not from men, but from heaven; and that if any of them Teaches in the temple.

[g] LUKE ix. 51, & seq. [h] Vid. Exod. xviii. pass. DEUT. i. 9. See also Vol. II. p. 547, & Vol. III. p 3. & (H). [i] LUKE x. 1, & seq.

(R) The names of these seventy or seventy two (for they are indifferently called by either number, the first because expressly mentioned by St. Luke, and the latter from a supposition that he uses the round number instead of that of seventy-two, answering to seven out of each of the twelve tribes) are mostly unknown to us We find only twenty-eight of them in Eusebius (27), Epiphanius (28), and Papias (29), chiefly mentioned in the acts, they are as follows: Matthias, Mark, Luke, Barnabas, Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, Nicolas, Justus, Apelles, Sosthenes, Rufus, Niger, Cephas, Thaddeus, Aristion, John, Barsabas, Andronicus, Junius, Silas, Lucius, Menahem, Jason, and Ananias, the same who baptized St Paul (30).

(27) Eccl. hist. l. i. c. 12. Vid. & Mills in Luke x. 1. (28) De Christ c. 1. (29) Ap. Euseb. ubi supra, l. iii. c. 39. (30) Act. ix. 10, & seq.

were were but ſincerely diſpoſed to do the will of God, they would ſoon be convinced of the truth of what he ſaid. Whilſt therefore ſome admired his courage, in ſpeaking ſuch bold truths at the hazard of his life, and affirmed his miracles to demonſtrate him to be the true Meſſiah, others, more obſtinate, objected the meanneſs of his birth and parentage. To theſe he anſwered, that whatever they might know of his earthly deſcent, they were wholly ignorant of his heavenly one; all which he inforced by ſuch irrefragable proofs, that a great number of them began to believe openly in him, which when the Jewiſh magiſtrates knew, they ſent ſome of their officers to apprehend him. But as his time was not yet come, inſtead of following their inſtructions, they came back filled with admiration, and told thoſe chiefs, that they never heard a man ſpeak like him. [k].

ON the laſt day of the feaſt, in which they uſed the ceremony of drawing water, and bringing of wood into the temple, concerning which the reader may ſee what we have ſaid in a former volume *, Jeſus took occaſion to entertain his audience with a diſcourſe on thoſe living waters, which were to be imparted to thoſe who believed in him, alluding, as the evangeliſt obſerves, to thoſe gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, which were ſhortly after to be poured on his church. This laſt ſpeech cauſed a freſh diviſion among them, ſome believing that none but the Meſſiah could expreſs himſelf in that exalted manner; others objecting his being an obſcure Galilean, whereas the Meſſiah was, they rightly ſaid, to be born in Bethlehem; for ſo he was, though they knew it not. But the Phariſees, more exaſperated than the reſt, to hear ſuch numbers of the multitude, and particularly the officers ſent to ſeize on him, declare themſelves ſo openly for him, were the loudeſt in their invectives againſt him and them, alledging, that none of their learned rabbies or rulers, or indeed any but an accurſed ignorant mob, had believed on him. Here Nicodemus, who was his diſciple, though ſecretly, undertook to moderate the difference, by reminding thoſe hot headed zealots, that the law did not permit them to condemn a man in that raſh and mercileſs manner, and without hearing what he had to ſay in his own defence. This ſpeech galled them ſo much the more, becauſe though they were conſcious of the charge, they dared not bring it to ſo fair an iſſue. They therefore aſked him in a tumultuous manner, whether he was a Galilean? and bid him go and ſearch the ſcriptures, and he would find that that province never yet produced a prophet (S); after which the assembly was broke up for that time [l].

The Phariſees inveigh againſt him.

[k] JOHN vii. 11, & ſeq. * Vol. III. p 183, & 266.

An adultress brought before him.

Jesus went that night out of the city, and retired towards the mount of olives, and returned again early in the morning, and taught in the treasury of the temple, where the Scribes and Pharisees brought an adultress before him, said to be taken in the very act (T). We have seen in a former volume, that the Mosaic law condemned such offenders to death †, and they failed not to remind him of it; but pretended to have a desire to know what he thought was to be done in this case, that they might find some accusation against him, such as his too great severity, if he condemned; or if he did not, his too great indulgence and disregard to the law; or, in either case, his assuming a judicial power. Jesus, who easily perceived their malicious design, stooped down, and made as if he did not hear them, but was writing something with his finger on the ground. This made them more earnest to make him declare his mind, upon which he rose up, and told them, that he, who was free from sin, should cast the first stone, and then returned to his former attitude. This unlooked-for answer filled those hypocrites, not only with wonder, but with such shame and remorse, that they withdrew themselves one after another, and left the woman alone with him. When Jesus stood up and found all her accusers gone, he dismissed her with this mild reproof, Go thy way, and sin no more, and then resumed his discourse to his audience [m].

[l] John ibid. vers. 37, ad fin. † See Vol. III. p. 318.
[m] John viii, 1, & seq.

(S) And yet we have formerly shewn, that Jonah, who is universally acknowledged by them to have been a prophet, was a native of Gathepher, a town in the tribe of Zebulun in Galilee †, so that these men must have been either very ignorant or perverse to have affirmed such a palpable falshood.

(T) This whole story of the woman is omitted in the Syriac and some other antient versions. Those who conclude from our Saviour's absolving or rather refusing to condemn her, according to the Mosaic law (31), that adultery ought not therefore to be looked upon as a capital crime under the gospel, may as well argue against the lawfulness of dividing inheritances, because he refused in the like manner to intermeddle with such an affair, when desired by one of the parties (32).

† Vid sup Vol. IV. p. 62, (A). (31) Deut. xvii. 7. (32) Luke xii. 13.

HE

HE began with telling them, that he was the true light of the world, and that thoſe who followed him were free from darkneſs. This expreſſion exaſperated the Phariſees afreſh, who thought that title to belong to them alone. They therefore deſpiſed him, as bearing teſtimony of himſelf, but were anſwered, that they indeed were peculiarly famed for bearing a pompous teſtimony and complimenting one another; but as for him, he had the teſtimony of Moſes and the prophets, of John the Baptiſt, and above all, that of his heavenly father, of which the ſtupendous works, which he wrought before them, were an undeniable proof. But, added he, this will more evidently appear after ye have lifted me up on the croſs; for then ſhall my diſciples find themſelves truly freed from that yoke and thraldom, under which the reſt of the world doth groan. Here the Phariſees, not perceiving that he ſpoke of the freedom from ſin and guilt, told him with their wonted aſſurance, that they being Abraham's children, it was out of his power to make them freer than they were, ſince they had never been in bondage to any; but Jeſus, inſtead of exploding the falſhood, told them, that if their actions were to determine whoſe children they were, their pride, avarice, perſecuting and murdering ſpirit, and their perverſe oppoſing of all ſaving truths, rather proved them the children of the devil and the ſlaves of ſin, than the free-born off-ſpring of a righteous Abraham. The Jews, unable to reſiſt ſo juſt a cenſure, contented themſelves with calling him a Samaritan and a demoniac, but were anſwered, that the zeal which he had conſtantly expreſſed for his father's honour, and the malice with which they had as conſtantly oppoſed him in it, could eaſily determine which of the two did moſt deſerve the appellative of demoniac. However, he added, turning to his audience, this I aſſure you of, that he who obeys that divine law which I am preaching unto you, ſhall never die. This equivocal expreſſion raiſed new arguments, as well as new invectives, from the carnal Jews, which, in this and ſome other occaſions, we ſhall for brevity omit; tho' they roſe to ſuch height, that they attempted ſeveral times to ſtone him, but he as often miraculouſly conveyed himſelf away from them [n].

The ſeventy return with joy.

UPON his departure from the city, the ſeventy diſciples rejoined him, and with no ſmall joy acquainted him with their ſucceſs, and that the very devils became ſubject unto them. Jeſus, though pleaſed with the approaching downfal of ſatan's [n] Ibid. verſ. 12, & ſeq.

power,

power, yet obſerving that his diſciples ſeemed to expreſs too great a ſatisfaction at their miraculous power, bid them rather rejoice at their having their names written in heaven. Whilſt he was giving them ſome further directions for their rightly diſpenſing of theſe new gifts, a certain doctor of the law aſked him, what he muſt do to be ſaved? Jeſus referred him to the Moſaic law, the ſum and ſubſtance of which conſiſted in loving God above all things, and our neighbour as one's ſelf. But as the ſtrait-laced Jews ſcarcely accounted any but thoſe of their nation and ſect for their neighbour, the lawyer aſked him further, whom he ought to look upon as ſuch? Upon which Jeſus put forth that moſt excellent parable of the Jew that fell among thieves; and, after having been overlooked and neglected by prieſt and levites, was at length happily relieved by the charitable Samaritan. From which he concluded, that our duty to our neighbour was not confined to ſect, nation, or any other circumſtance, but extended to all mankind. In his way to Galilee, he ſtopped at a ſmall village called Bethany, ſituate on the furtheſt part of the mount of olives, where he was entertained by Lazarus and his two ſiſters. Theſe upon his arrival were very differently employed, Martha in preparing an elegant ſupper, and Mary in liſtening at Jeſus's feet to his heavenly diſcourſe. Martha, vexed to ſee her ſiſter Mary (U) leave the whole care of the feaſt to her, went and complained of it before him; but, inſtead of her help, ſhe received this ſevere rebuke from Jeſus's mouth, that ſhe incumbered herſelf too much about the trifling affairs of a ſupper, whilſt her wiſer ſiſter was minding the one thing neceſſary, the concerns of another and a better life [o].

Parable of the good Samaritan

Teaches in Galilee.

FROM Bethany he proceeded to Galilee, where he went about teaching in every ſynagogue, and other convenient places, inſtructing his followers with many excellent parables, [o] Luke x. 17, ad fin.

(U) This Mary has been wrongfully confounded with that ſinful woman, mentioned a little higher, out of the ſame evangeliſt, who doth not tell us her name, but only that ſhe came to be abſolved by Jeſus. It doth in no caſe appear, that Mary, Lazarus's ſiſter, was ever a woman of that looſe character; on the contrary, Jeſus, who often lodged at their houſe, is expreſly ſaid to have had a particular affection for the whole family; we ſhall ſee a pregnant inſtance of it in the ſequel.

and

and confirming all ſtill with ſome new miracles [p]. Among the laſt, he wrought one on the ſabbath day, in ſome Jewiſh ſynagogue, on a poor decrepid woman, whom old age and ſickneſs had ſo bowed down, that ſhe had not been able to raiſe herſelf up during the ſpace of eighteen years. Jeſus, moved with her miſery, called her to him, and having laid his hands on her, pronounced her free from her infirmity, not without moving the Phariſaic indignation and reſentment; but Jeſus retorted their reproofs with ſuch powerful arguments and familiar parables, as did at leaſt ſilence them, though all too little to convince them, that doing ſuch good deeds was the proper work of that day. The following is a very pregnant inſtance of it.

Jeſus, after frequent peragrations through Galilee and Judæa, was come to the feaſt of the dedication of the temple, inſtituted by Judas Maccabæus, and mentioned in a former ſection *. He chanced one day, which was the ſabbath, to meet in the ſtreet a man that was born blind, concerning whom his diſciples aſked him, whether the ſins of his parents, or his own, had brought that calamity upon him (W)? Jeſus anſwered, that neither his own nor his forefathers ſins were the cauſe of his blindneſs; but that God ſuffered ſuch things to happen for the greater manifeſtation of his unlimited power, adding that he was chiefly come to make a fuller diſplay of it. Having thus ſaid, he ſpit upon the ground, and anointed the blind-man's eyes with the moiſtened earth, and bid him go and waſh himſelf in Siloam's pool. He did ſo, and obtained his ſight, to the no ſmall admiration of all that ſaw him, who could hardly perſuade themſelves that he was the ſame perſon, till he had aſſured them of it. The news of this wonderful cure was ſoon brought to the ſanhedrin, whither the man was alſo brought, and carefully examined; but, upon his acquainting them with the circumſtance of Jeſus's anointing his eyes with the clay made with his ſpittle, a great diſſenſion aroſe among them, one ſide affirming this action to be a breach of the ſabbath, and the other aſking them, how they could ſuppoſe it poſſible for a ſinner and ſabbath-breaker to work ſuch an extraordinary miracle? To Cures a man that was born blind.

[p] Luke cap. xi, & xii paſſ.

* See before, p. 12, & ſeq. & note (W).

(W) This queſtion plainly proves, that the Jews believed the doctrine of the ſoul's ſinning in a pre-exiſtent ſtate, and being puniſhed for it in another. Elſe a man born blind could not be ſuppoſed to have been born ſo on account of his own ſins.

be

be therefore satisfied of the truth of the fact, they ordered his parents to be brought before them, who, upon examination, owned the man to be their son, and to have been born blind; but pretended to be ignorant how he had recovered his sight. Upon their receiving this further evidence, they called the young man in again, and bid him ascribe the glory of his cure to God alone; for as to the man who had wrought it, they knew him to be a sinner and a cheat. After several other inquiries, in which they betrayed the most unaccountable partiality, and inveterate rancour against his divine physician, the young man at length took the liberty to plead in his defence; and to remind them, that since the creation of the world no such cure had ever been wrought on a man born blind, and that it was consequently not only above the power of such a hateful sinner as they represented him, (since all such are in the highest detestation with God) but even above the power of any but a true prophet sent from above.

The sanhedrin condemn him.

Such strong reasoning, accompanied with so much candor and honest boldness, might have wrought on any hearts but those of the Pharisaic mould; but these, exasperated to hear themselves so justly reproved by a man whom they accounted altogether born in sin, after a severe and contemptuous rebuke, ordered him to be turned out of the assembly [q] (X). But Jesus, who found him soon after in the temple, gave him a more gracious reception, and then, turning to the audience, took occasion from the late partial behaviour of the sanhedrin, to exclaim against those false and pernicious teachers, under the similitude of shepherds and their flocks, and to shew them, that many of those climbed up into the sheep-fold by private and unlawful ways, like thieves and robbers, only to kill and destroy the sheep. That others, who were only hirelings, and had neither property in, nor [q] John ix. per tot.

(X) The text doth barely say, that they ordered him to be turned out; but some understand it of his being cast out of the synagogue, or, in other words, that they excommunicated him. It is true, they had passed that sentence on every one that should Jesus acknowledge to be the Christ (33), and his actually doing so before them all, had laid him liable to it; but it doth not appear from the evangelist, that they pronounced excommunication against him: if they did, he seems to have been the first confessor, as John the Baptist had been the first martyr, for the testimony of Christ.

(33) John ix. 22.

true

true concern for their flocks, minded nothing but their fleece and their milk; so that when they saw them in danger from ravenous beasts, they left them to become a prey, instead of protecting and defending them. Hence he proved himself to be the true shepherd, because he came to give his life for his sheep, and to procure them wholesome and lasting pasture. He concluded with telling them, that he had other sheep than those of the Jewish kind, to bring into his fold, which would prove more tractable and obedient to his voice, intimating thereby the conversion of the heathen world.

THIS discourse had likewise a different effect on his audience, some calling him a demoniac, and blaming the rest for listening to him; others asking, when they had ever known a demoniac utter such excellent truths, or open the eyes of a man born blind[r]?.

WE pass now to the fourth and last year of his public ministry, an epoch full of the most surprising and signal events that ever the world beheld; the redemption of mankind by the blood of the Son of God; his resurrection, ascension, mission of the Holy Spirit; miraculous change wrought on the apostles and first preachers of christianity; the church of Christ planted by the powerful preaching of a few plain and illiterate fishermen, confirmed by great and glorious miracles wrought by them, by many supernatural gifts bestowed on them, and by them on the first believers and preachers, and in a little time cemented by the blood of innumerable martyrs, and founded on so firm and immoveable rock, that neither the powers of earth or hell have since been able to destroy it. We shall omit a great number of his excellent sermons, parables, strenuous struggles with the incredulous Jews, and frequent persecutions from the Pharisees and Sadducees; but especially a much greater number and variety of miracles which he wrought within this short interval, to come to that celebrated one, which determined the sanhedrin at length at any rate to put him to death. We mean the raising of his friend Lazarus from death to life, after he had been four days buried, and corrupting in his grave, and in the presence of a great multitude of considerable Jews, who, by reason of the nearness of Bethany to Jerusalem, were come thither from that metropolis to the burial, and were eye-witnesses of this stupendous fact.

Year of the flood, 4035. Of Christ, 36.

The last year of Christ's ministry.

Jesus had designedly conveyed himself away at some distance from him, during the time of his sickness, and had at last acquainted his disciples with his death, adding to it, that he would now go and raiſe him up to life. Upon his approaching to Bethany, Martha, who was informed of his coming, went to meet him at ſome diſtance from the place, and complained to him with tears, that if he had been there, her brother would not have died. Jeſus comforted her with the promiſe of his riſing again, but ſhe underſtanding it of the laſt reſurrection, earneſtly intreated him, that he would now uſe his never-failing interceſſion with his heavenly father to have him reſtored to life. Having obtained a gracious promiſe from him, ſhe went in haſte to call her ſiſter, who came accordingly, accompanied with a great number of Jews, who were come to comfort her, and, by her haſty departure, ſuppoſed that ſhe was going to vent her tears at her brother's grave. As ſoon as ſhe came in ſight of Jeſus, ſhe fell on her knees, and expreſſed her grief in ſuch a pathetic manner, as drew ſome ſighs and tears from him, as well as from the reſt of the by-ſtanders. At length, ſeeing freſh multitudes coming towards him, he deſired the two ſiſters to conduct him to the grave, the ſight of which drew a freſh ſhower of tears from him; inſomuch that the Jews wondered, that he, who could give ſight to a man born blind, ſhould not interpoſe the ſame miraculous power to have ſaved ſo dear a friend from death. Whilſt they held this diſcourſe, Jeſus ordered the grave-ſtone to be removed, at which Martha cried out, Lord, by this time he ſtinketh! But he, after a gentle reproof for ſuffering her faith to fail ſo ſoon, addreſſing himſelf to heaven in a pathetic prayer, called out aloud, Lazarus, come forth. Upon which he that was dead came out, bound as he was in his funeral dreſs (Y); from which he was, at Jeſus's deſire, immediately looſed [f].

He raises Lazarus from the dead.

[r] JOHN x. 21.

It

[f] John xi. 1, & ſeq.

(Y) This circumſtance, expreſly mentioned by the evangeliſt, renders the miracle ſtill more authentic and unqueſtionable. We are told by him in another place (34), that the cuſtom of the Jews (thoſe at leaſt that could afford it) was to embalm the dead with an aromatic mixture of myrrh, aloes, and other gums, mixed with ſpices, with which they rubbed their bodies all over, more or leſs profuſely, according to their circumſtances, or regard to the dead perſon; after which they wrapped their heads all over with a napkin, and their whole body with a ſhroud or winding ſheet, both which they afterwards ſweathed as tightly as they could with proper bandages (35).

(34) xix. 39. (35) De his vid. Jo Nicolas ſepult. Hebraeor. Calmet diſſert. in ead. Leo de Moden. cerem. Jud. part. 5. c. 8. Lamy apparat. & al.

We

IT is eaſy to imagine either the joy of the two ſiſters, or the ſurpriſe of the reſt of the Jews, at the ſight of ſo ſtupendous a miracle; and indeed it wrought ſuch a conviction in the greateſt part of them, that they began now to confeſs him in good earneſt to be the Meſſiah. And not only thoſe who had been witneſſes of it, but vaſt multitudes of others, who, hearing of it from them, came flocking to Bethany to be further ſatisfied of it, believed alſo in him. The ſanhedrin was ſoon acquainted with this tranſaction, and were in no ſmall concern how to put an effectual ſtop to this dangerous increaſe both of his fame, and of the number of his diſciples. For, as they rightly argued, if we let him alone and ſuffer him to work ſuch ſignal miracles, all men will believe on him; the conſeq:ence of which will be, that the jealous Romans will come and deſtroy both our place and nation. At length Caiaphas, the then high-prieſt ſtood up and ſpake to this effect: You ſeem to know nothing at all, nor to conſider that it is expedient that one man ſhould die to prevent the ruin of a nation[t]. Little did he or they think he was then inſpired from above, and that he was delivering the will and decrees of heaven, that Jeſus ſhould ſuffer death, not for the Jewiſh nation only, but for the faithful, which were to be gathered together in him, from the four corners of the earth. For being high-prieſt that

The Jews conſult to put him to death.

Caiaphas propheſies.

[t] Ibid. verſ. 47, & ſeq.

We formerly obſerved alſo, that they buried their dead very ſoon †, ſeldom or never keeping them twenty-four hours above-ground. Lazarus therefore having been dead four days, muſt have lain at leaſt three of them in his grave, which was a cave cut into the rock and covered with a large ſtone; ſo that it was impoſſible for any cheat or impoſture to be tranſacted with all thoſe circumſtances, ſince if it could be even ſuppoſed, that a perſon could live ſo many days in ſuch a damp and airleſs cave, yet the linen ſweathed on his face and body, and over ſuch a gummy compoſition, muſt have ſmothered him in leſs than ſo many hours.

This was ſo plain and unqueſtionable, that neither any Jews there preſent, nor even any of the ſanhedrin, pretended to deny or doubt of the fact, but rather condemned him upon the notoriety of it, and as tending to give riſe to a new ſect, which would indanger their church and ſtate. Of the ſame nature afterwards was the apoſtle's cure of an old cripple; which, though the whole ſanhedrin owned a d acknowledged to be a miracle (36), yet they endeavoured, by the like unjuſtifiable means, to ſuppreſs, and upon the ſame account.

† Vid. ſup. Vol. III. p. 360, & ſeq. (36) Vid. Acts iv. 14, & ſeq. Conf. cum cap. iii. 4, & ſeq.

year, it pleased God to give him the spirit of prophecy, to utter this great and comfortable truth, and thereby further manifest the accomplishment of the divine oracles, concerning the Messiah's dying for the sins of the world. His advice was readily embraced, and after they had once resolved on his death, they were easily determined to cut off Lazarus also, the sight of whom daily increased the number of believers.

But Jesus, who knew his own appointed time, as well as the result of their last consultation, withdrew himself into a small city, called Ephraim, in the neighbourhood of the wood or wilderness of that name [u], and there continued with his disciples till the approaching feast of the passover. He left the place six days before that feast to go to Jerusalem, and took Bethany in his way, where Lazarus and his sisters entertained him and his disciples at a sumptuous supper; it being a sabbath night, at which times they kept a more plenteous table. Whilst they were eating, Mary, to shew her extreme regard to their guest, came and anointed his feet with a precious ointment of spikenard, whose fragrancy filled the whole house. Whilst the disciples were wondering at her profuseness, Judas, whom we observed to have been their knavish treasurer, could not conceal his indignation at it, and asking, why the ointment was not rather sold and the money given to the poor? the rest of the twelve seemed also in some measure to join with him in it [x], till Jesus had severely rebuked him, and excused her generous action, as an anticipation of his burial rite; adding moreover, that the memorial of it should be preserved to her honour, as far, and as long as, the preaching of his gospel should reach, or endure [y].

On the very next day (Z), Jesus, knowing his time to be just at hand, marched now boldly towards Jerusalem, whilst his disciples, to whom he had more than once or twice foretold all the circumstances of his future sufferings and death [z], accompanied him with heavy and trembling hearts.

[u] Vid. 2 Sam. xviii. 6, & seq. [q] Conf. Matth. xxvi. 8, Mark xiv. 4. & John xii. 4. [y] John ibid 7. & seq. [z] Vid. Matth. xx. 17, & seq. Mark x. 32, & seq. Luke xviii. 31.

(Z) This happened in this year on the tenth day of the month Nisan, answering to the twenty ninth of our March, and was the day on which the passover lamb was taken up and presented at Jerusalem (37).

(37) Vid. Usher. & Echard. & sup. Vol III. p. 170, & seq.

A

As for the traytor Judas, he conceived ſuch a grudge againſt him at the laſt night's action, that he reſolved to betray him into the hands of his enemies upon the very firſt opportunity. When they were come to Bethphage upon mount Olivet, within a ſmall mile of Jeruſalem, Jeſus directed two of his diſciples to a place where two roads met, and bid them bring from thence a ſhe aſs, with a young colt by her, that had never been backed; and if the owners aſked them any queſtions, they ſhould only anſwer, that the Lord had occaſion for them, and they would readily permit them to be brought to him. They brought the aſs and colt accordingly, and having ſpread a garment upon the latter, ſet Jeſus on it, and accompanied him to Jeruſalem, in a kind of triumph, attended by great multitudes; ſome of whom going before, ſtrewed the way with their garments and green boughs, crying out Hozanna (A); bleſſed is the ſon of David, and bleſſed is the king of Iſrael, who cometh in the name of the Lord. Thus was that famous prophecy of Zechary fulfilled; Fear not, O daughter of Sion, behold thy king cometh to thee, juſt, humble, and meek, and riding on the fole of an aſs [a]. The multitudes ſtill increaſing as they went on, the Phariſees, which beheld the ſight and heard thoſe acclamations with no ſmall indignation, drew nearer to him, and earneſtly deſired him that he would command at leaſt his diſciples, if not the whole croud, to be ſilent. But Jeſus rather choſe to ſilence their own envy, by aſſuring them, that if thoſe ſhould hold their peace, the very ſtones would cry out, and proclaim the divine author of ſo many glorious miracles. But he took a much more effectual method to ſuppreſs the pomp and noiſe of that mock triumph, as well as the Hozannas of the multitude, which, he but too well knew, would in a few days be changed into the blaſphemous cry of, Away with him, crucify him. For as he drew nearer to Jeruſalem, the ſight of that rebellious and unhappy metropolis having revived in his mind the more dreadful proſpect of that approaching ruin, which was now haſtening on upon it, and which he himſelf had more than once

Jeſus weeps over Jeruſalem.

[a] Conf. ZECH. ix. 9. ISAIAH lxii, 1. MATH. xxi. 1. ſeq. MARK xi. 1, & ſeq. & alib.

(A) Or rather, according the Hebrew, Hoſhah na, Save, we pray; ſo that this was a kind of prayer or bleſſing uſed by the Jews, and taken from the hundred and eighteenth pſalm (38), and ſignified ſave, preſerve, and proſper, Lord, this Son of David.

(38) verſ. 25.

foretold

foretold to his disciples (B), it was then a proper time to damp their untimely joys, by reminding them of it; and here

(B) Particularly in that full, elegant, and pathetic description he gave to them of it, when being near the same place, the twelve desired him to look back, and behold the beauty and magnificence of the temple; the strength and prodigious size of its stones, and the like (39); and where he foretold them, that before the present generation was dead and past, not only that stately and stupendous fabric, but the whole city, would be reduced into a heap of rubbish (40).

And on this occasion it was, that from the likeness of the destruction of the Jewish polity, and that of the world, or, (as other perhaps more rightly understand it) the final end of idolatry, irreligion, and every wicked work; ushering in the milenium, in which Christ and his doctrine shall be universally acknowledged and professed throughout the world, during a thousand years; from the near resemblance, I say, of those two dreadful catastrophes, of which the former seems to have been a lively type of the latter; whether as to its prognostics, such an universal degeneracy and apostacy, a general deception by false prophets, lying wonders, abominable wickedness, cruelty, oppression, wars, tumults on the earth, dreadful signs in the heavens; and the like; or, as to its dismal consequences, the horrid destruction of the Jews by war, pestilence, and famine, in the former, or of the sinful race of men in the latter, typified by that of Gog and Magog, and other figurative expressions preceding the milennum; Christ takes occasion to make such a natural, but almost unperceptible, transition, that the primitive christians could not easily distinguish them, but were led into a notion, that he spoke of one and the same catastrophe, which was consequently to happen before the extinction of the then living race.

For it was in this sense that they took the word generation, according to which it was also meant, and really fulfilled with respect to the Jews; but the word דור dor, was no less capable of a larger sense; the Hebrew, Syriac, &c. having none other or better to express a much longer series of time. Thus they indifferently speak of the generation of the antediluvians, of that under the judges, kings, priests &c. and we have elsewhere more than once observed that they divided the world into three epochas, or, in their style, into three generations, consisting each of two thousand years. The first before, the second under, the law, and the third under the messiah. It was therefore to the exit of this last, that the second part of his prophecy had an eye, when that thorough change was to be wrought in the world, elegantly expressed

(39) Vid. Matth. xxiv. 1, & seq. (40) Ibid. vers. 34. in here it was, that the diſmal ſcene, having quite diſarmed him of his anger and reſentment, made him break out into the following compaſſionate expoſtulation, mixed with a flood of tears: Oh that thou hadſt but known, at leaſt in theſe thy latter days, the things that would have conduced to thy peace! but now are they hidden from thee; and now the ſad appointed time draws near, when the enemy ſhall ſurround thee with trenches, and incloſe thee on every ſide, butcher thy children within thy boſom, and level thee with the ground, ſo that not a ſtone ſhall be left ſtanding upon another, becauſe thou wouldſt not know the time of thy viſitation [b] (C). The people, however, more in the pruphetic writings by a new heaven, and a new earth, a new Jeruſalem, &c.

[b] Conf. LUKE xix. 37, & ſeq. & JOHN xii. 12, & ſeq.

As long therefore as the miſtake of the primitive chriſtians in cutting that epocha ſo very ſhort, had no other tendency than to make them more fervent, zealous, and heavenly-minded, more patient and heroic under ſufferings and perſecutions, and more fervent and diligent in preaching the goſpel; the inſpired writers might have thought it a ſufficient warrant for their overlooking it. But St. Peter, among others, ſeems to have taken particular care to rectify it, and to obviate the objection which might be raiſed from their non-completion at the expected time, by reminding them that what they miſtook for a delay, was not really ſuch, ſince with God a thouſand years were but as one day (41). A phraſe well underſtood then by the Jews, to whom he wrote, and which alluded moſt probably to the notion of the ſix days of the creation, preſignifying the ſix thouſand years duration of the world, before the great and glorious change, which it was to receive at Chriſt's ſecond coming.

(C) Thoſe who maintain the doctrine of predeſtination, though even in the more moderate ſenſe of it, called by them the Sublapſarian ſyſtem, would do well to conſider, what a horrid ſcene of mockery and injuſtice they make the ſon of God, and Redeemer of the world, to act here upon this melancholy occaſion. For if the Jews blindneſs and infidelity, their perſecuting and murdering of him, their obſtinacy in rejecting him and his doctrine, and thoſe dreadful puniſhments which were ſhortly to be the conſequence of it, were not only abſolutely unavoidable by them, but were owing to the want of that ſupernatural grace and power, which he only came to impart to ſome few elect, whilſt he wholly excluded the reſt of mankind from it; with what ſincerity could he ſay to them, even with tears, Oh that thou hadſt known at leaſt, &c. or with what

(41) 2 Peter iii. 8. Conf. cum Revel. xx. 6.

juſtice

more full of the preſent triumph, than mindful of his diſtant threatnings, went and entered the city with their uſual acclamations, and drew ſuch a vaſt concouſe after them, to know who this prophet was for whom they made all this buſtle, that the whole city was in an uproar; and well it might, when they heard them ſay, that it was Jeſus of Nazareth, the promiſed Meſſiah, and remembered at the ſame time what a ſevere ſentence the ſandedrin had paſſed againſt not only him, but every one who ſhould acknowledge him to be the Chriſt.

Monday before his paſſion.

Jeſus repaired immediately to the temple, and, as he had formerly done, expelled all the mercantile brood from that ſacred place, and convinced them of his authority in ſo doing, by working ſeveral cures there on the ſick, lame, and blind, whilſt the wondering multitude continued their loud acclamations of Hoſannah to the ſon of David [c], to the great ſcandal of the Phariſees, who did all they could to ſilence them. But Jeſus, who knew the main ſpring of all their pretended zeal, not only ſtopped their inveſtives, by reminding them of that prophecy out of the pſalmiſt; Out of the mouths of babes and ſucklings thou haſt perfected praiſe; but expoſed their malice and obſtinacy by ſuch ſtrong arguments and pungent parables, that they would doubtleſs have laid hold on him, had not the fight of ſo great a multitude overawed them [d]. There were at this time a number of Greeks (D), who were come to the juſtice cry out againſt them, Oh Jeruſalem, that murdereſt the prophets, &c. how often would I have gathered thee and thy children, with the ſame care and tenderneſs that a hen doth her chickens! and ye would not, therefore, &c. (42); but there is ſomething ſo monſtrouſly ſhocking and impious both in that ſuppoſition, and in the doctrine from which it flows of courſe, that we may juſtly wonder, that neither this, nor all the learned treatiſes which have been written againſt it (43), have hitherto been able to explode it; but as the argument belongs no further to our province, than as we are bound to vindicate the divine juſtice and mercy diſplayed in the goſpel, we ſhall gladly diſmiſs it.

[c] Conf. Pſ. viii. 2, & Matth. xxi 15. [d] Matth. ibid. 24. ad fin.

(D) Theſe were properly neither Jews nor Gentiles, but what the former called proſelytes of the gate, of whom we have ſpoken more fully in a former volume †.

(42) Matth. xxiii. 34. & ſeq. (43) Vid int al. Le Clerc, Pilling, Whitby. † See Vol. III. p. 293.

teſtify, feaſt, and expreſſed a deſire to ſee him. Jeſus readily cauſed them to be called in; and to take off the ſcandal of the croſs; by which he was going to procure the ſalvation of both Jews and Gentiles, he entertained them with a diſcourſe on his ſufferings, and cloſed it with aſſuring his audience, that thoſe only, who, after his example, were ready to lay down their lives for the ſake of heaven, would be intitled to it. Reflecting next on the glory which God would receive from his death, he broke out into this ejaculation, Father, glorify thy name; and was anſwered by a voice from heaven, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again. This was probably meant of the plentiful effuſion of the Holy Ghoſt, and that converſion of the Gentile world, which was ſhortly to follow his death; but the people, not rightly attending to it, miſtook the voice, ſome for that of an angel ſpeaking to him, ſome for what they called the bath-col (E), and others for a clap

(E) This word which literally ſignifies the daughter voice, or daughter of the voice, is what the Jews have ſubſtituted to the gift of prophecy, after this laſt had been extinct in Zechary and Malachi, the laſt of the prophets. For though they allow, that ſeveral eminent men among them have been ſince endowed with it, ſuch as we have ſeen ſome of the Eſſenians; yet they looked upon them in an inferior view to the former, who received theirs by immediate inſpiration, whilſt theſe had it chiefly by the help of the bath col.

They are, however, divided in their notions concerning this laſt, having no other guide to go by than their pretended tradition, which they make no difficulty to underſtand, every one in his own way, and as it beſt ſerves their turn. Whilſt therefore ſome pretended, that it was a plain, loud, and articulate voice, ſuch as was heard by young Samuel (44); others looked upon it as a kind of ſoft whiſper, and others again as a kind of internal voice ſpeaking to the heart of the perſon.

Whether there is any foundation for the two former, is hard to affirm upon ſo tottering a teſtimony as that of the rabbies, who all own to have lived long after they had in ſome meaſure ceaſed to be common. Of this nature was that which is affirmed to have been heard to pronounce rabbi Akiba, happy in the next world, after he had been ſent out of this by order of the emperor Hadrian; and another, which declared two famous doctors, Hillel and Samuel, to be worthy to receive the Holy Ghoſt; and ſome others (45), which if really heard, might be yet owing to ſome juggle of thoſe who were concerned in it. As for the laſt, or inward one, though it (44) 1 Sam. iii. 4, & ſeq. (45) Vid. de his Baſnag. hiſt. de Juifs, tom. 3. ch. 5. ſect. 8, & ſeq.

clap of thunder; till he aſſured them, that it was a real voice ſent from heaven, not for his but their ſakes; and to warn them to make a right uſe of that light, or irrefragable evidence, which he had afforded them, leſt they ſhould bring upon themſelves a judicial blindneſs. For, added he, when I am once lifted up, alluding to his death upon the croſs, I ſhall draw all men unto me [e], intimating thereby doubtleſs, that his laying down his life in confirmation of his doctrine, joined were hard to diſprove good men having ſuch ſecret motions or impulſes, yet they may be of too uncertain a nature to be always depended upon.

[e] John. xii. 20. & ſeq.

But if we examine the practice of the compilers of the talmud, or even of thoſe that lived before them, we ſhall find them conſulting this bath-col in a much different way, and not unlike that of the Romans in their ſortes Virgilianæ, and other heatheniſh ſuperſtitious methods; of which the two or three following, taken out of the talmud (46), will be a ſufficient proof. "Rabbi Jochanan and "Rabbi Simeon, deſirous of ſeeing the face of Rabbi Samuel, a "prince among the Babyloniſh doctors, ſaid, Let us follow the "directions of the bath-col. As they were paſſing by a ſchool in "their travel thither, they heard one of the boys reading theſe "words out of the book of Samuel; And Samuel died; from which "they inferred, that the perſon they were in ſearch after was dead, "and ſo it actually proved".

Two other doctors going to ſee a friend of theirs, and hearing a woman ſpeak the words, The lamp is going out, and her next neighbour anſwer, May the lamp of Iſrael never go out, took this alſo for a warning from the bath-col (47). But the moſt ſurpriſing was, that of one rabbi Aſher, who had been guilty of ſo many notorious crimes, that upon his being led through thirteen different ſynagogues, in each of which they examined the verſe which the readers were then upon, they were every one found to be reading a grievous ſentence againſt him, ſuch as in one, the words, There is no peace to the wicked; in another, thoſe of the pſalmiſt, Unto the wicked God ſays, What haſt thou to do to preach my laws? &c. and ſo of the reſt (48).

The whimſical way likewiſe of prying into futurity by the caſual opening of a book, was not confined to Jews and Gentiles, but was even practiſed by the chriſtians in the times of ignorance and ſuperſtition, of which the reader may ſee ſome inſtances in dean Prideaux in the place laſt-quoted out of his connection.

(46) Tractat. Shabbath. fol. 8. col 3. Vid Prid. connect. ſub an. c. 29. (47) Otho, hiſt doct. Miſhn. ap. Baſnag. ubi ſupra, ſect. 9 (48) Vid. Hotting. excerpt. gemar. & Baſnag. ubi ſupra.

to

to all the other evidences, that had preceded and were to follow it, and to the excellency of his precepts and rewards, would be ſufficient to draw all ſincere and well-diſpoſed perſons to his goſpel and religion.

THIS heavenly diſcourſe made a deep impreſſion on many of his audience, and amongſt them upon ſome of their chief rulers, who yet did not dare own themſelves his converts, for fear of being thruſt out of the ſynagogue. When the evening came, Jeſus, to avoid the croud, withdrew himſelf and his diſciples for that night to Bethany; and on the next morning they returned to Jeruſalem. In his way he obſerved a fig-tree afar off, full of leaves indeed; but upon his approaching nearer it, as expecting to have found ſome fruit upon it, according to the ſeaſon of the year (F), and finding himſelf

(F) It is ſtrange, that all verſions, except the antient Saxon one, have made St. Mark there ſay, that the time of the figs was not yet come, when the very time of the year, the warmneſs of the climate there, as well as the tenor of the ſtory, the deſign and juſtice of the curſe (for who can think the judge of all the earth could pronounce an unjuſt one?) all ſhew, that the time of the figs was come 49.

The deſign of this ſentence on a fruitleſs tree, like that other, Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground, was, to ſhew the Jews what they muſt expect to be their lot, if, after having received ſo many incentives to repentance, eſpecially of late from the preaching of the baptiſt, of Chriſt's apoſtles and his own, they continued ſtill, like this fig-tree, barren and fruitleſs. This ſhould therefore have made the interpreters ſee, that there was either ſome error crept into the text, or a manifeſt one in the verſion; and, upon due conſideration, they would have found, that, without any violence to the former, the latter ſhould have been rendered, For where he was, the time of the figs was come, or it was the time of the figs there.

This verſion will likewiſe juſtify the act, ſince it could be no injuſtice to the owner to rid his ground of a plant which ſucked its nouriſhment from it, without making any return to him; and here we beg leave to obſerve, that except this withering of the fig-tree, and that of ſending the ſwine into the lake, of which we have ſpoken in another note, all the other miracles were of the beneficent and merciful kind; ſo that to complain of two miracles of ſevere juſtice, if they were really ſuch, againſt him, who, ſetting aſide his abſolute power, has given us ſo many thouſands of goodneſs and mercy, argues a mind ſo extremely perverſe and ungrateful, as ought to make them fear leſt ſomething worſe ſhould befal them.

(49) Vid. Heinſ. in loc. Le Scene Eſſay, part 2. c. 6.

disappointed, he cursed the tree, upon which it presently withered down to the very root. On the next morning; Tuesday. which was the Tuesday, Peter casting his eye upon it as they went to Jerusalem, could not forbear wondering at the suddenness of the change; upon which Christ took occasion to assure them, that if they had but a stedfast faith in God, they might work much greater wonders than this; which they did accordingly, when their faith was soon after miraculously strengthened by the supernatural effusion of the Holy Ghost upon them. Confutes the Pharisees. Being arrived at the temple, the Pharisees began to ask him again for some surer tokens of his authority, than those miracles he wrought before them: Jesus, who knew that nothing could convince them, if these did not, appealed immediately to the testimony of the baptist, asking them at the same time, whether or no they acknowledged it from heaven? Here they found themselves sadly intangled; if they answered in the affirmative, they condemned themselves; and if negatively, they were in danger of being condemned by the audience; so that they were forced, after some deliberation, to have recourse to that pitiful shift of owning that they knew not whence it was, for which Jesus justly pronounced them unworthy of any further evidence from him [f].

It was upon this occasion, that he tried to awaken them to a sense of their obstinacy and dangers, by several familiar but pungent parables, such as that of the unjust and murdering husbandmen; of the wedding supper; and of the ingratitude and inhumanity of those that were invited to it; and some others of the same nature. But these, though feelingly enough understood by that hypocritical tribe, wrought no other effect upon them, than to set them upon seeking for some more effectual means to cut him off; and since they found it dangerous, by reason of the admiring multitude, to make any attempt upon him, to expose him at least to the resentment of the civil power. It was with this view that they sent their disciples, with some of the Herodians, to intangle him with the grand question about the lawfulness of paying tribute to Cæsar, of which we took notice in the last section; and which being easily perceived, Jesus as easily defeated their malicious intent, by calling for a piece of Cæsar's coin, and exposing their hypocrisy, in making use of his money and protection, and yet refusing to pay tribute to him, as affirm-

[f] Matth. xxi. 23, & seq. Mark xi. 27, & seq. Luke xx. 1, & seq.

ing

ing it inconsistent with their duty to God [g]. Next to these came the Sadducees, armed, as they thought, with such a puzzling question against the resurrection, as all his learning could not elude the force of. It was of a woman, who, having been married, according to the Mosaic law [h], to seven brethren, had died at length, without having any children by any of them. They asked him therefore, if there was any resurrection, whose wife she must be, since they all had her to wife?

Jesus prefaced his answer to their stupid question with this excellent one; Do ye not therefore err, because ye know not the scriptures nor the power of God [i]? implying thereby that their denial of the resurrection proceeded from their either not acknowledging (G), or, if they did, from their not rightly considering [g] MATTH xxii. 15, & seq. LUKE & MARK. [h] DEUT. xxv. 5. [i] MARK xii. 24.

(G) We think the words, not knowing, might be more properly rendered, according to the Hebrew idiom in other parallel places, not acknowledging the scriptures and the power of God Thus St. Paul is introduced, as not knowing the high priest (50), who presided at the judgment seat, before which he was brought to be tried; when it is plain every child could not but have known him, both by his garb and the place where he sat. Those who understand it, that the apostle, in the height of his resentment, had forgot, or did not consider, that he was the high-priest, make him say something unworthy of his great character and usual behaviour on such occasions; besides, that it puts some strain upon the plain meaning of the word know, which cannot be properly used to imply to consider, call to mind.

But the sense which with some critics we give here to that word, is both more agreeable to the Hebrew idiom, and to the known zeal of the apostle; and he may justly say, I do not acknowledge him to be high-priest; since we have seen throughout the two last sections, that that dignity was become so venable, that the vilest wretches might obtain it, provided they proved but the highest bidders. All which was contrary to the Jewish law. In this sense then, the Sadducean error will be founded on their unbelief of, and not on their not understanding the scriptures, or the power of God; and, indeed, considering their denial of the immortality of the soul, and the rewards and punishments of another life, they can scarcely be supposed to have believed either scriptures or the divine power.

(50) Acts xxiii. 5.

But

confidering the ſenſe of the ſcriptures and the extent of the divine power. For, ſaid he to them, the ſtate of the bleſſed after the reſurrection is not to be meaſured by the exigencies of this life. Here marriage is neceſſary to keep up the race of mankind; there they will, like the angels in heaven, be free from ſuch carnal and ſuperfluous appetites, where their life will be wholly ſpiritual. He concluded with proving the truth of the reſurrection from thoſe of the ſacred books, which they profeſſed to acknowledge; which not only put a final end to that diſpute, but forced even an approbation from the contrary ſect of the Phariſees [k]. He next received a ſingular applauſe from one of the ſcribes for his excellent anſwer concerning the grand and chief command in the law [l]; after which he ventured to propoſe a queſtion to them concerning the Meſſiah, namely, Whoſe ſon they thought he was to be? To which they anſwered with one accord, the ſon of David; if ſo, ſaid he to them, how came David to call him Lord by the Spirit, Saying, the Lord ſaid unto my Lord, ſit thou on my right hand? How then think ye he could be at once his Lord and his ſon (H)? This laſt queſtion quite nonpluſed his whole audience, Silences the Sadducees.

His queſtion about the Chriſt.

[k] Matth. xxii. 23, & ſeq. Vid. & parallel. [l] Ibid. verſ. 34, & ſeq.

But if we take the word in the other ſenſe, and admit, that their error proceeded from the want of a right and due underſtanding of both, and not through a queſtioning or diſputing of either; yet as long as they took upon them to limit the ſenſe of the one, and the extent of the other, by the ſhallow ſcan of their reaſon, they did but pretend to believe, or at beſt fancied they did ſo, though in fact they denied them. If we were to examine the ſource of that ſcepticiſm and infidelity which reigns now ſo much among us, and oppoſes all goſpel truths with ſuch ſeeming aſſurance, we ſhould find it flowing from this Sadducean leaven, which is ever ready to limit the divine power and will, as ſoon as their reaſon cannot keep pace with it.

(H) It doth not indeed appear that they had any notion of his divine nature, and therefore might be eaſily puzzled to anſwer this queſtion; though it ſeems from ſome expreſſions in the goſpel, that they had had ſome higher idea of him, than that of his being the bare ſon of David, or deliverer of Iſrael. Thus Nathanael, being convinced of his being the Meſſiah, addreſſes him with theſe words: Rabbi, thou art the ſon of God, thou art the king of Iſrael (1). Thus Peter, and Martha alſo, to name no more, affirmed him to be the Chriſt the ſon of God, that was to come into the world (2).

(1) John i. 49. (2) Ibid. xi. 27. Matth. xvi. 16.

However

audience, insomuch, that they never ventured to put any more puzzling questions to him from that time [m]. It was probably on this night, that being retired with his small attendance to Bethany, he was there invited by Simon, surnamed The Leper, and where Mary came and anointed his head and feet with a fresh quantity of the same precious ointment, which she had lately bestowed on him on the like occasion (I); and gave a new subject of murmuring, not to Judas only, but to the rest of the twelve. Jesus excused her a second time as he had done before, and perhaps to the satisfaction of the rest; but Judas, who thought it an unreasonable profusion, resolved that night to go and betray him to the sanhedrin [n].

IN the mean time, Jesus knowing his time to be just at hand, and recollecting how oft the twelve had quarrelled among themselves about precedency, and perhaps they had started the same dispute on this very night [o]; to give therefore an effectual check to their unreasonable ambition, so contrary to the spirit of his gospel, and to leave them a lasting memorial of the contrary virtue, instead of rebuking them as he had done heretofore, he rose up from the table, and having

[m] Ibid. vers. 42, & seq. MARK xii. 34. LUKE, &c. [n] MAT. xxvi. 6, & seq. MARK xiv. LUKE, &c. [o] Vid. LUKE xxii. 24.

However, the Jews have since found out a more effectual way of evading the force of this question, by affirming, that David did not there speak of the Messiah, it never being the custom any where for the ancestors to give any of their successors the pompous title of their lord; but the meaning of David, according to them is, the Lord (God) said unto my Lord Abraham, Sit thou on my right hand, &c. (3), for Abraham being superior to David in point of geniture, might be properly called lord by him.

(I) The circumstances of these two actions are so alike in all parts, except the first being said to have happened at the house of Lazarus, and this last at that of Simon, the leper (so called, perhaps, because he had been lately cured of that distemper, either by Jesus, or by some other means) that it is not easy to know whether they were really two, or one and the same. We should be apter to suppose the last, were not the generality of commentators for the first. The house might belong to Simon, and go by his name, and Lazarus might be a tenant and the master of the feast, and so both evangelists be reconciled.

(3) Vid Munst. vers. Hebr. Matth. not. ult. in cap. xxii.

laid

laid aside his upper garment, and girded himself with a napkin in the guise of a waiting servant, came with a bason of water, and began to wash their feet, and wipe them with the towel which girded him. Peter, however, was so offended at this condescension, that he could not at first be prevailed upon to suffer it; whereupon Jesus told him, that though he could not see the reason of it now, he should be made sensible of it in time. But Peter, still stiffly persisting in his refusal, was commanded immediately to submit, under the penalty of forfeiting all his right and title in him [p]; which terrible threatening frighted him at length into a ready compliance (K). After Jesus had gone round with his humble task, he took up his upper garment, and addressed himself to the twelve in words to this effect: Ye rightly call me Lord and master, for such I really am; if then you have seen me, for your example and encouragement, condescend so low as to wash your feet (which among the Jews was reckoned the lowest office [q] a man could do to another), know and remember, that those who pretend to be my disciples, must never think themselves above performing the lowest office of charity to one another. It is by such acts of mutual and sincere love, that men will know, and I acknowledge, you for mine. A new command I leave with you, that as I have loved you, and did not think my life too dear a price to save you, so ye also love one another, and stop at no difficulty or discouragement, where the good of your fellow creatures, especially fellow christians, calls for your charitable assistance. Upon these conditions I leave you my peace, such a peace as neither the world can bestow on you, nor any thing make you capable of Washes his disciples feet.

Recommends charity to them.

[p] John xiii. 8. [q] De hoc vid. 1. Sam. xxv. 41.

(K) If ever a non-compliance to a command was justifiable, or even, we had almost said, commendable, it was certainly on this occasion, where it apparently flowed from the deepest regard which that apostle had of his master, as well as from the humblest sense of his own unworthiness Since therefore Jesus was so far from admitting it as an excuse, that, without giving him any further satisfaction, he bids him to obey under the most severe penalty; this whole circumstance seems to be transmitted to us as a warning, how we make our short-sighted reason the standard of our faith or obedience, in things plainly revealed or expressly commanded. Since God is not obliged to give us, nor we indeed capable of comprehending his all wise ends and purposes, whose ways and reasons must be allowed to be infinitely above our comprehensions.

tasting

taſting the ſweet influence of, but the divine virtue I am recommending to you [r].

AFTER theſe and ſome other heavenly diſcourſes, with which he cloſe to entertain them, during the ſhort time he had to ſtay, that they might make the ſtronger impreſſion on them, he concluded the whole with an elegant and pathetic deſcription of the laſt day, when every man ſhould receive the rewards of his deeds done in this life, according as they were either good or evil. And becauſe he knew how apt men were to be more apprehenſive of the divine anger for the commiſſion of wilful crimes, than for the omiſſion of ſuch neceſſary duties, as he had been inforcing, and to find out a ſalvo to excuſe their neglect of them; he choſe to awaken them from that fatal miſtake, by deſcribing the general enquiry of that ſolemn day, as running chiefly on theſe laſt; that is, whether they had, or had not, fed the hungry, cloathed the naked, viſited the ſick, and the like; and the retribution of his rewards or puniſhments, as chiefly diſpenſed according to their performance or neglect of thoſe eſſential duties [s]. Deſcribes the day of Judgment.

WHILST he was inſtructing his diſciples in theſe and many other excellent truths [t], the ſanhedrin were holding their conſultations how to lay hands upon him, at ſome proper ſeaſon, when the multitude were out of the way. As they therefore feared doing it during the approaching feſtival, leſt they ſhould cauſe ſome inſurrection among the people, Judas came to their relief, and offered to betray him unto them for a certain reward, which they gladly agreed to, and paid him out of hand. The ſum covenanted had been long ago foretold by one of the prophets, and we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more of it in the ſequel. The feaſt of unleavened bread or paſſover being then juſt at hand, the Jews ſet about removing all the leaven from their houſes, according to the Moſaic law, and preparing themſelves for the celebration of that grand feſtival. Wedneſday. Judas betrays him.

Thurſday being come, in which Jeſus was to celebrate his laſt, and moſt ſolemn, paſſover, he directed two of his diſciples by a ſpecial token to a houſe in Jeruſalem, where they ſhould prepare all things for it; and he followed them thither with the reſt of the twelve towards the evening. When they were ſet down on their couches, according to the cuſtom of thoſe countries, he drank a glaſs of wine, with which the maſter of the family always began the ſolemnity of the paſchal lamb; Thurſday.

[r] JOHN, ibid, & ſeq. [s] MATTH. xxvi. 31. ad fin. [t] JOHN xiv, xv, xvi, xvii. paſſ.

after which, whilſt they were eating, he told them with ſome concern, that one of them ſhould betray him, pointing to Judas; that Peter, who had always appeared the moſt zealous, ſhould thrice deny him; and that the reſt ſhould all forſake him on that very night, and reminded them of ſome prophecies, in which theſe things were written concerning him. At the concluſion of the ſupper, Jeſus took the bread, and, having broke and bleſſed it, diſtributed it among them, ſaying, Take eat, this is my body, which is given for you: do this in remembrance of me. Then taking and bleſſing the cup of wine alſo, he ſaid, Drink ye all of this, for this is my blood of the New Teſtament, which is ſhed for you, and for many, for the remiſſion of ſin (L). He ended this ſolemn rite, with aſſuring them, that this was the laſt wine he ſhould drink; for the traytor's hand, which was ſhortly to betray him, was juſt ready to deliver him up to death; when all Chriſt's laſt ſupper.

(L) We have contented ourſelves with repeating the bare words of this divine inſtitution, without venturing to give them any gloſs that ſhould ſeem to lean towards any of thoſe various ſyſtems, which every church and ſect has ſeverally formed from them; and which, being not only endleſs, but out of our province, we gladly forbear entering further into, to avoid giving any offence.

The oppoſition which a conſiderable writer has of late met with from ſeveral quarters, upon his venturing to give the world his own particular one on that ſacred ſubject, ſhews, how dangerous it is to revive a controverſy of this high nature; in which every ſide is ſo jealous of any word that glances even the leaſt contradiction to their received doctrine.

And yet we cannot but own, that too tenacious a zeal ſeems in this laſt inſtance to have carried his opponents cenſures farther than is, perhaps, conſiſtent with chriſtian candor and charity. The ſmall regard that is paid to that ſacred inſtitute by very great numbers, on the one hand, and the viſible neglect of it in others, from ſome miſtaken dreadful apprehenſions about it, might incline that writer to think his book and ſyſtem excellently well calculated to obviate thoſe two grand obſtacles to a more frequent uſe of it.

As for thoſe men, who from a firm and ſincere perſuaſion, that God diſplays ſome further miracles of grace and mercy in that ſacrament, find themſelves inſpired with greater love to God, and charity to men; with a great propenſity to virtue, and abhorrence to vice; and, in a word, feel their minds and hearts more effectually attracted from earth to heaven; that author muſt be ſuppoſed too ſagacious to have wrote his book for ſuch men, ſince they could not come down to his notions of it, without being conſiderable loſers by the change.

things

things, that were written of his being numbered with the tranſgreſſors, would have their full accompliſhment [u]. The whole ceremony was cloſed as uſual with a proper hymn (M); after which, Jeſus having again exhorted his diſciples to continue ſtedfaſt in their faith and reliance on him, and recommended them to the protection and care of his heavenly Father, by a moſt fervent and pathetic prayer, he ordered them to follow him over the brook Kedron [w].

Enters the doleful garden.

WHILST they were going to the mount of olives, to a place called Gethſemane (N), Judas ſlipped from them, and went to the high-prieſt's palace to get a ſufficient number of hands to come and ſurprize Jeſus in his retirement. Jeſus, on the other hand, being entered into the garden, where he uſually reſorted, bid ſome of his diſciples to ſtay and watch near the entrance of it, whilſt he took Peter, James and John further into the garden; that as they had been the witneſſes of his glorious tranſfiguration, they might now be ſo of his preſent ſorrows and dreadful agonies. Having therefore earneſtly injoined them to be watchful, he parted from them about a ſtone's caſt; where his human nature feeling the moſt violent ſtruggles between fleſh and ſpirit, at the apprehenſion of his future ſufferings, he threw himſelf proſtrate on his face, and with utmoſt fervency, mixed with the moſt ſubmiſſive reſignation to the heavenly will, he prayed, that, if it were poſſible, the dreadful cup might paſs from him. He repeated the ſame prayer twice more, but with ſuch fervency and reſignation, that the vehemency of the ſtruggle between thoſe two paſſions, joined to the proſpect of what [u] MATTH. xxvi. 20, & ſeq MARK. xiv 18, & ſeq. LUKE xxii. 1, & ſeq &c. [w] JOHN xvi, & xvii. paſſ.

(M) Or rather what the Jews call the Hallal, conſiſting of ſix euchariſtical pſalms, beginning at the hundred and thirteenth, and ending with the hundred and eighteenth, and with which they uſed to cloſe all thoſe ſolemnities (4).

(N) So called probably from the Hebrew גת השמן, gath haſhemen, the oyl preſs. For as the mount had its name from the quantity of olive trees that grew upon it, it is probable, that this garden, which was at the foot of it, had a preſs in it; and this reconciles the evangeliſts, two of whom mention only the mount (5), another the garden (6), and the fourth the gethſemane or oyl-preſs (7),

(4) Vid. הגדה-של-פסח & al ritual. Jud. (5) Matth. xxvi. 30. Luke xxii. 39. (6) John xviii. 1, (7) Mark xiv. 32.

he was to undergo from the malice of men and devils, threw him into an agony and bloody ſweat, inſomuch, that there was an angel ſent on purpoſe to comfort and ſtrengthen him under it [x] (O). By this time the traytor Judas, at the head of his armed gang, was far advanced into the garden, whilſt the diſciples were fallen into a ſound ſleep. Jeſus therefore, having awakened them with the news of his enemies being at hand, went forward to meet them, whilſt Judas, who led the van, came to offer him the treacherous kiſs, which was to be the ſignal to the reſt; who thereupon ſurrounded and made ſure of him. In the interim, Peter drew his ſword, and ſtruck off the ear of one of the high-prieſt's ſervants, but was ſeverely rebuked for it by his maſter, who, by a miraculous touch, healed the wounded perſon, and then ſuffered himſelf to be bound and led away as a malefactor, without any other mark of reſentment, than his obſerving to them, that it was now their hour, in which the power of darkneſs was let looſe againſt him. When the eleven heard this ſaying, they immediately forſook him and fled, according to his prediction (P), and the ſoldiers conveyed their priſoner firſt to His agony and prayer.

Is betrayed and apprehended.

[x] Luke xxii. 40, & ſeq.

(O) This dreadful ſcene muſt be confeſſed to contain ſome myſteries far enough above our utmoſt capacities; but which, we think, may be much more reaſonably and ſafely believed on the authority of the ſacred writers, than the latter diſputed on the account of the former. The whole œconomy of man's redemption is every-where repreſented to us as an unſearchable myſtery of divine wiſdom and goodneſs, and as the object of our belief, and not of our comprehenſion.

For this reaſon therefore it is, that God has taken ſuch care to confirm it to us by the moſt irrefragable evidence, by types and prophecies from the beginning, and by innumerable miracles and ſupernatural gifts accompanying the preaching of theſe ſaving truths. It was on that divine authority, that the primative chriſtians received them, and ſealed their faith in them with their lives; and it is on the ſame grounds, that they have been conveyed to us through a ſucceſſion of near ſeventeen centuries; and it will be time enough for us to give up the one, when infidelity has overthrown the other. Till when the imperfect notion we have of the mutual action of our ſouls and bodies will be an effectual check, how we preſume to call in queſtion, or to reconcile, thoſe oppoſite paſſions in the human to the divine nature of Chriſt.

(P) Which he quoted to them out of the próphet (8); I will ſmite the ſhepherd, and the ſheep ſhall be ſcattered. In the like man-

(8) Zechariah xiii. 7.

ner

to Annas, the late high-prieſt and father-in-law to Caiaphas, who was now in poſſeſſion of that dignity, as we hinted a little higher out of the Jewiſh hiſtorian [y].

HERE they found the ſanhedrin ſitting, though at that late time of night, and waiting for Jeſus to be brought before them, as he was accordingly: upon which the high-prieſt began to ask him ſeveral queſtions concerning his doctrine and diſciples, in hopes to find either ſome hereſy in the one, or rebellion in the other. Jeſus contented himſelf with referring him to theſe laſt, whom he told them he had always taught in the moſt public manner, and who were therefore fitteſt to bear witneſs againſt him, if he had taught them any thing amiſs. For this anſwer, juſt and modeſt as it was, an officer ſtruck him a violent blow on the face; and Jeſus, having given him a gentle reproof for his raſhneſs, ſtood before them, with aſtoniſhing patience and humble ſilence, whilſt the inſtruments of the ſanhedrin were buſy in ſeeking out freſh evidence to put him to death. After much ado, they brought a couple of fellows, who depoſed, that they had heard him brag, that he would deſtroy the temple and rebuild it in three days; but even their evidence jarring in ſome particulars, as the expreſſion of Jeſus was figurative, they dared not condemn him upon it; but were forced to have recourſe to another expedient, which was to make him turn his own accuſer. Caiaphas therefore riſing up, adjured him by the living God, to anſwer directly to the ſupreme court, whether he was the Chriſt the ſon of God or not (Q); and, upon his readily anſwering in the affirmative, and adding, that they ſhould hereafter be convinced of it, when they beheld him ſitting at the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven; fell a rending his cloaths, which was not law-

Tried before the ſanhedrin

[y] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 3. Vid & LUKE ubi ſupra, v 54. MATTH. xxvi. 57 JOHN xviii. 12, & ſeq.

ner the whole ſcene of his ſufferings is moſt lively deſcribed by another prophet (9), who is therefore called evangelical, becauſe his prophecy ſeems rather a rehearſal of things paſt, than a prophecy of what was to happen ſo many centuries off; as the ſequel will preſently ſhew.

(Q) Nothing could be more cunningly excogitated than this queſtion; to which if he anſwered in the affirmative, they were ready to condemn him as a blaſphemer, and if in the negative, as an impoſtor and deceiver of the people.

(9) Iſai. liii. paſſ. & alib.

ful

ful for an high-prieſt to do [z], and pronounced him guilty of blaſphemy. The reſt of the court did readily join with him, and having pronounced him guilty of death, and ordered him to be brought early on the next morning to receive his ſentence, they left him to the mercy of the guard, who made it the cruel diverſion of that night to uſe him with the vileſt indignities and blaſpemies [a].

Condemned

Whilst this melancholy ſcene was acting Peter and John, the latter of whom was known to ſome of the family, having recovered themſelves from their laſt fright, had got admittance into the hall, willing to know what was likely to be determined concerning their maſter. Their courage, however, was ſoon cooled again, when they ſaw what treatment he underwent from an inraged and inſulting rabble; ſo that Peter being thrice challenged for one of his diſciples, as often ſtiffly denied it, and, rather than not be believed, bound it the laſt time with an oath. The cock crowing now the third time, put him in mind of Jeſus's prediction; but that which gave him a more lively ſenſe of his cowardice and perfidy, was a pitying look which he received at that inſtant from that gracious and forgiving Saviour; upon which the tears guſhing plentifully out of his eyes he was forced to leave the hall to go and hide his grief and ſhame [b].

Denied by Peter.

Friday. Early on the next morning, the chief-prieſts and ſanhedrin, being convened at their uſual place, ſent for Jeſus to have him further examined, and to pronounce their final ſentence upon him, in order to have it ratified by the Roman governor (R). In the mean time, Judas, being ſurpriſed at what had [z] Vid. Levit. xxi. 10, & alib. [a] Matth. xxvi. 57 ad fin. Mark xiv. 53 ad fin. Luke & John. Vid. & Isai. l. 6. [b] John xviii. 15. & ſeq. Matth. Luke &c.

(R Not, as ſome have imagined, becauſe the Romans had ſome years ago deprived that court of the power of life and death; for we ſhall meet with ſeveral inſtances of the contrary in the ſequel; in particular that of the protomartyr Stephen, who was regularly tried, condemned, and ſtoned, by their ſingle authority 10), about a year after. But they ſeem to have had a double end in it; the one to throw the odium of his death, as much as poſſible, upon Pilate and the Romans as if he had condemned him for raiſing ſome rebellion againſt them; and the other, to make him undergo a more ſevere and ignominious puniſhment, and ſuch a one as they could not inflict upon him by their own power, becauſe it was not one

(10) Acts vi. 8. & ſeq. vii per tot.

of

had paſſed within the ſanhedrin, was ſtung with ſuch lively remorſe, that he came and threw the reward of his treachery down before them, owning himſelf the vileſt of wretches, for having betrayed an innocent perſon to them; but they, regardleſs of his ſorrow and deſpair, bid him look to it; upon which he went, and, as moſt verſions render it, hanged himſelf[c] (S). But thoſe hypocritical judges were ſoon of thoſe that were preſcribed by their law; concerning which the reader may, if pleaſes, turn to our third volume †. So that their pretence of its not being lawful for them to put any man to death was no farther true, than in caſes where the crime was againſt the ſtate; of which the governor was the proper judge But as to blaſphemy, or any other crime againſt the Jewiſh religion, the inſtance above related of St. Stephen plainly ſhews that they made no ſcruple to put the guilty perſon to death without the governors conſent.

Judas's remorſe.

[c] MATTH. xxvii. 5.

Yet nothing of this was done without the direction of providence, ſince crucifixion was the death which it had been foretold by David he ſhould undergo (11), and which he himſelf had likewiſe often hinted, both to the apoſtles and to the reſt of the Jews (12). Accordingly therefore, the acculation, which they intented againſt him before Pilate, was of a civil nature: We have found, ſaid they, this turbulent fellow raiſing up ſeditions, and forbidding to pay tribute to Cæſar (13)

It istrue, indeed, when they found that this accuſation could not determine that governor, who ſaw through their malice and injuſtice, to condemn him; they tacked the other of blaſphemy to it, and inſiſted, that their law made it capital; but this was only added to give more weight to their other accuſation; upon which they wanted him to be condemned, as the ſequel will ſhew.

However, it was neceſſary to obſerve theſe circumſtances thus far here, againſt thoſe, who, from the notion of the whole power of life and death being taken away before this time, have inferred, that the ſceptre ſpoken of by Jacob (14) was alſo departed from Judah. The contrary of which will be ſeen in its due place.

(S) The difficulty which interpreters have found to reconcile what is ſaid of his hanging himſelf here, with what St. Peter ſays in another place (15), That he fell headlong, and burſt aſunder, and his bowels guſhed out, has made them fall into ſeveral conjectures, ſuch as the breaking of the rope before he was quite dead, and his throwing himſelf down ſome precipice, which brought on the laſt diſmal

† Page 310, & ſeq

(11) Pſal. xxii, 16.

(12) Vid. John iii 14. xii. 32, 33.

(13) Luke xxiii. 2.

(14) Gen. xlix. 10. Vid. & Vol. II. 441, (G).

(15) Acts i 18.

ſoon after taken with a quite different qualm of conſcience, thinking it now unlawful to refund thoſe thirty pieces of ſilver into the treaſury, becauſe it was the price of blood, tho' they had made no ſcruple to take them out of it, to purchaſe that very blood. After ſome deliberation therefore, they agreed to buy a potter's field with them, for a burying-place for ſtrangers; and in ſo doing fulfilled an old prophecy, in which the number of pieces, the deſign for which they were given, the purchaſe made with them, and the potter to whoſe ſhare they came at laſt, were expreſsly foretold [d]. The field was accordingly bought ſoon after the feaſt was over, and from thence was called in their tongue, Haceldama, or the field of blood [e]. It ſtood on the ſouth ſide of mount Sion, within a ſtone-caſt of the pool of Siloam.

[d] Conf. Zech. xi. 12, 13. [e] Vid. Matth. ubi ſupra. ver. 7, & ſeq. Acts i. 19.

diſmal circumſtances of his death, and the like * ; all which is ſaid without foundation.

What the ſame apoſtle ſays a little lower, and which the verſions have, as we obſerved in a former note, miſrendered, that he might go into his own place (16), has led others to look upon his fall, burſting, &c. as a further judgment on that unhappy wretch (17), who did yet ſhew the moſt lively tokens of a ſincere repentance, viz the moſt public acknowledgment of his crime, reſtitution of the ill-gotten money, reparation to the beſt of his power to the injured perſon, and an open condemnation of their unjuſt proceedings againſt him. Now all theſe difficulties might be eaſily removed, if they had rendered the words of St. Matthew, according to Le Scene, that he was ſuffocated, namely with grief, ſhame, and remorſe, or, which is the ſame thing, died of a ſquinancy occaſioned by it (18).

His falling on his face which, as the ſame critic obſerves, is all that is implied by what we render, he fell, and others, he thruſt himſelf headlong, and burſt aſunder, is, it ſeems, no more than what is common to people in that diſtemper; who fall down on their faces for want of breath, and commonly burſt after it (19). This ſenſe therefore will eaſily reconcile the two ſacred hiſtorians, without either doing violence to the text, having recourſe to improbable conjectures, or introducing the divine vengeance purſuing even his breathleſs carcaſe.

* Vid. Theophylact. Maldonat et al in loc. (16) Acts Ibid. ver. 23. (17) Vid int. al. Taylor's life of Chriſt, in loc. Echard eccleſ. hiſt. Tremell. Beza, et al (18) Le Scene's Eſſay, part 2 c. 7. ſect. 3. (19) Vid. eund. & auct. ab eo citat.

A a

As ſoon as the ſanhedrin had ended their proceſs againſt Jeſus, he was hurried before the Roman tribunal, and there accuſed of perverting the people, raiſing ſeditions, ſetting up for a king, and forbidding tribute to be paid to Cæſar. They would not, however, venture into the prætorium, or judgment-hall, for fear of polluting themſelves, and becoming unfit for the approaching ſolemnity; but deſired the governor to come out to them, whilſt they ſtood in the open place before his palace-gate. When Pilate heard the accuſation, and found that it was cognizable by himſelf alone, he cauſed Jeſus to be brought before his tribunal, where he aſked him, whether he was really a king? Jeſus readily anſwered him in the affirmative (T); but added at the ſame time, that his kingdom was not of this world; for if it had, his ſervants would have fought in his defence, and ſaved him from falling into the hands of his perſecutors. This was enough to convince the governor of the injuſtice of his accuſation, which he already knew was the effect of ſome private malice they had againſt him. However, that he might know ſomething more concerning his imaginary kingdom, for ſuch and no other he ſeems to have ſuppoſed it, he aſked him again, Art thou really a king? To which he replied, I am indeed. For this cauſe was I born, that I might bear witneſs to the truth; and none are my ſubjects, but ſuch as obey the voice of truth. Pilate, being ſtill more out of conceit with this new kind of kingdom, contented himſelf with aſking what he meant by truth? and, without ſtaying for an anſwer, went out to the people, and told them, that he could find no fault in their pretended criminal. When the Jewiſh rulers heard this, they were ſtill more vehement in their accuſations. Pilate therefore urged him to give ſome kind of anſwer to them; but he, who knew how vain it was to attempt it, made then no other defence, than that of a ſurprizing and invincible ſilence.

Jeſus brought before Pilate.

THE Jews took this opportunity to be more vehement in in their invectives, in order to exaſperate the fluctuating governor againſt him, by aſſuring him, that he had filled not only Jeruſalem and all Judæa, but even all his own country of Galilee, with his ſeditious doctrine. As ſoon therefore as Pilate heard that he was of that country, and belonged to

(T) Ours and ſome verſions make his anſwer ſomewhat ambiguous, as if he dared not to ſpeak out, Thou ſayeſt it, or, thou ſayeſt that I am a king; whereas, according to the Hebrew idiom, it ſhould properly be rendered, It is as thou ſayeſt, I am indeed a king.

Sent to Herod.

Herod's jurisdiction, he ordered him to be immediately sent to him, in hopes at once to lay an obligation on that tetrarch, with whom he had been at some variance, and to throw the whole burden of this intricate and dangerous trial upon him; he being then come to Jerusalem to the feast. Herod was no less glad to see a person, of whom he had heard such wonders, and from whom he expected to have seen some signal miracles; but Jesus, ready and liberal as he was of them to the poor and afflicted, disdained to work them, either to gratify the curiosity of such a tyrant, or to silence the malice of his enemies; so that, in spight of all their vehement accusations and of Herod's scornful treatment of him, he would not so much as vouchsafe him an answer to any of his questions. Herod, affronted at his obstinate silence and his own disappointment, began to treat him as a despicable person, and turned him over to his guards, with orders to send him back to Pilate; and these, after several rude indignities, arrayed him in a gorgeous robe of mockery, and brought him back to the hall of judgment. From this time, however, Pilate and Herod laid aside all their resentment, and were perfectly reconciled to each other.

Brought back to Pilate.

WHILST this was doing, Pilate's wife had sent to warn him against having any hand in condemning that just person, on whose account she had been terrified with some dreadful dreams that night. The Romans were very observing of these kinds of superstitions; so that this message made him still more afraid to yield to the pressing instances of the tumultuous Jews. As soon therefore as Jesus was brought back to him, he came out to them, and plainly told them, that he could not condemn a person, in whom, after the strictest examination, he had not been able to find the least capital crime; nor even Herod himself, who, tho' much better acquainted with their laws, had sent him back to him absolved. I will therefore, added he, inflict some lighter punishment on him, and let him go. This proposal, instead of mollifying them, made them more instant to have him crucified. He bethought himself at length of another expedient, which he expected would have both saved him, and assuaged their fury. You know, said he to them, that it is a custom for your governors to release to you some one criminal on these festivals, whom you shall name. Tell me therefore, shall I deliver you this man, or Barabbas, who lies in prison for an insurrection and murder? He judged indeed, and reasonably too, that they would not carry their resentment or boldness so far, as to prefer a rebel and a murderer before an innocent person; and therefore it was, that he gave them only the choice of these two.

Barabbas preferred to him.

two. But, two his great ſurprize, the people, inſtigated by the prieſts and rulers, demanded Barabbas to be releaſed, and Jeſus to be crucified, in ſpight of all he could ſay in his behalf.

SINCE therefore he could not work on their reaſon and conſcience, he reſolved to try what he could do on their pity, and ordered Jeſus to be ſent to the pillar, and to be ſeverely ſcourged (U); which was accordingly done, and (as we may ſuppoſe, from the natural barbarity of the Roman ſoldiers, as well as from the additional indignities which they offered to him preſently after) was executed with utmoſt ſeverity. After they had untied him, the whole cohort gathered about him, threw a ragged purple robe about his mangled body, ſet a crown of thorns upon his head, and put a reed in his hand; and whilſt ſome bowed the knee to him in mockery, and ſaluted him king of the Jews, others did buffet him, ſpit upon him, and uſe him with utmoſt inſolence and inhumanity. Pilate thought this a proper time to bring him forth to them in this ſad and deplorable guiſe, not doubting, but the ſight of ſo diſmal an object would have melted them into pity and remorſe. But he little knew the temper of the Jews, and that the more abject and miſerable the perſon appeared, on whom they had fixed ſuch great hopes and expectation, the more they would deteſt and abhor him. And ſo he found it happened on this occaſion, tho' to his greateſt ſurprize; and the (U) This puniſhment was not like that uſed among the Jews, of which we have given an account in a former volume †, and did neither exceed forty ſtripes, nor was reckoned diſhonourable, ſince even their monarchs were ſubjected to it. But among the Romans, it was very ſevere and ſhameful. The perſon being ſtripped naked, at leaſt down to the girdle, had his hands tied to a ring faſtened to a ſtone pillar, not above a foot and half high, if ſo much, ſo that his body was bent forward almoſt double, which gave ſuch an advantage to the executioners, that the blows came down, as it were, with double force.

Jeſus ſcourged and mocked

This particular part of our Saviour's ſuffering is rightly ſuppoſed to be foretold by the pſalmiſt (20), in theſe words; The plowers plowed upon my back, and made long furrows. As likewiſe that of his being buffeted, and ſcornfully ſpit upon in the halls of the high-prieſt, and of the governor, by the prophet Iſaiah (21) in theſe terms; I gave my back to the ſmiters, and my cheeks to them that plucked off the hair; neither did I hide, or defend, my face from being ſhamefully ſpit upon.

† Vol. III. p. 310, & (A). (20) Pſ. cxxix. 3. (21) Ch. l. 6, & ſeq.

very people, who, but six days before, followed him with their loud Hosannahs, could not now behold him in that abject state, without crying out with greater vehemence, Away with him, crucify him. Pilate, surprized at this horrid cruelty, refused again to comply, alledging, that he found no fault in him; upon which the priests and elders, finding it impossible to get him condemned for sedition, began to accuse him of blasphemy: We have a law, said they to him, which condemns him to death for calling himself the Son of God. At these last words, Pilate, still more terrified, took him again to his tribunal, and asked him several questions, to which Jesus disdaining to answer, he tried again to provoke him to it, by reminding him, that it was in his power to condemn or release him. Jesus gave no other answer to it, than by reminding him in his turn, that all his boasted power came to him from above, and that he should therefore be accountable for his abuse of it, though the greater guilt did fall on those who had delivered him up unto him. These last words made such an impression on the governor, that he went out to the people, fully determined, as he thought, at any rate to release him. But during this interval the priests and rulers, who knew but too well the temper of the Roman prætor, bethought themselves of an expedient which would quickly bring him into a compliance; so that, before he could well discover his resolution to them, they began to cry out, with one accord and in a threatening tone, Thou art not Cæsar's friend, if thou lettest a man go, who, by assuming the royal title and forbidding to pay the usual tribute, has declared himself his open enemy. This argument proved more powerful than all the rest, and Pilate now no longer daring to refuse their unjust demands, for fear of bringing his loyalty to Cæsar into question, having first washed his hands (W) before them all, and declared himself innocent of the blood of that innocent person, delivered him up to be crucified, and released the seditious murderer, according to their desire [f].

Accused of blasphemy.

Condemned to the cross

[f] Vid. Matth. xxvii. per tot. Mark xv. pass. Luke xxiii. per tot. John xviii. & xix. pass

(W) This mock ceremony seems to have been a kind of form used by judges in cases of this unjustifiable nature. Else Pilate could not but be conscious, that all the water of the sea could not wash away the guilt of his unrighteous sentence; no! not, though the impious Jews did then pray that the sin and punishment of it might fall on them and their unhappy posterity (22).

(22) Matth. xxviii. 25.

As

As ſoon as Pilate had pronounced that moſt unjuſt ſentence againſt the moſt innocent of men, the Roman ſoldiers led him back to the hall, where they ſtripped him of his mock royalty, and put on him his own garments; and having laid his croſs on him, they led him with two other criminals out of the city (X), to a place called in Hebrew, Golgotha, and in Latin, Calvary, to be crucified. His tender body, quite ſpent with watching and ſufferings, beginning to ſink under its weight, they compelled a Cyrenean Jew †, named Simon, to help to bear his croſs after him. In this doleful march he beheld ſome women melting into tears at the ſight of his deplorable condition; but it ſeems, as if the more dreadful fate, which waited the unhappy Jews, had made him quite inſenſible of his own miſery; for turning to them with uſual compaſſion, he bid them rather weep at the more diſmal proſpect of their future ruin, when their calamities would make them wiſh their wombs had been barren, and their breaſts incapable of yielding any nouriſhment to a generation, whoſe infidelity would ſhortly render them the ſad objects of the divine vengeance, and the ſcorn and hatred of the world [g].

† De his vid. Vol. IX. pag. 561, & (D). [g] Luke xxiii. 27, & ſeq.

(X) The Jews ſuffered no criminals to be put to death in any of their cities, much leſs in the metropolis; and this was done in imitation of what had been practiſed in their camps in the wilderneſs (23), and was typified by the red heifer and ſcape-goat, of which we have ſpoken in a former volume *; ſo that Chriſt the grand propitiatory victim, was led, loaden with the ſins of mankind †, to be offered up without the gates of Jeruſalem.

Golgotha or Calvary was a rocky hill on the weſt ſide of the city (24), and was a kind of charnel ſtore houſe from which it had thoſe names, which ſignify the place of a ſcull, probably from its reſemblance to it; and was alſo made uſe of for a place of execution.

It is ſuppoſed by the antient fathers to have been the mountain where Abraham went to ſacrifice his ſon. Some of them add, on the authority of a Jewiſh tradition, that the ſcull of Adam had been there buried by Shem, to whom his father gave it in charge after the flood, as it was he who was to people the holy land (25).

(23) De hoc vid. int. al Vol. III. p. 11. & 71, & note. * Ibid. 205, (V). 210, & (Z). † Ibid. in fin. note (Z). (24) See the map of the city. (25) Hieron. Euſeb. Tertul. Orig. & al. mult.

It was now about the sixth hour of the day, answering to our mid-day (Y), when they came to the place, where they offered him some wine mixed with myrrh (Z), which, when he

(Y) The difference between St. Mark, who calls it the third hour (26), and the other two evangelists, who call it the sixth (27), is easily reconciled by their different ways of dividing the day, namely, either into twelve hours, beginning at the sun-rise (28), which the two last follow, and into four parts, called also hours; but which they distinguished only by three, six, nine, and twelve; and these were the usual hours to repair to the temple or synagogues, &c. to pray (29); and to this last way of reckoning the former seems to allude, calling it the third hour, probably because the sixth was not quite begun. Perhaps also is he there speaking, not of his real crucifixion, but of the Jews obtaining Pilate's sentence of it against him, which was certainly near the third hour, or our nine of the clock in the morning.

(Z) This mixture was probably given to intoxicate the sufferers, that they might be less sensible of their torment; and Jesus might refuse it upon that very account, because it became him, who was then going to offer himself a free and voluntary sacrifice to God for the sins of men, and was to shew them a pattern how to bear afflictions with due resignation to the divine will; to avoid a thing which might too far discompose his thoughts, and shew too ill a precedent to his followers.

One of the evangelists makes this mixture to consist of myrrh and wine (30), and another of vinegar and gall (31). Hence some suppose, that though the former was usually given on such occasions, yet the soldiers, out of spight and contempt, gave him the latter, which would have a contrary effect. But we much doubt, whether the Romans, naturally delighting in being cruel to persons in misery, could be capable of so much compassion towards criminals. Their barbarous sports and spectacles argue rather the reverse. Besides, the vinum myrrhatum, we are told (32), was highly esteemed by them, insomuch that one of the laws of the twelve tables forbad their dead to be washed or sprinkled with it. And who can imagine, that they would bestow it on such criminals as they condemned to this kind of death, which was held in the greatest ignominy and reproach among them?

It is more likely, that the evangelist, who wrote in the Hebrew, or Syriac, made use of the word מר, mar, which signifies bitterness, or any bitter ingredient, and that his translator mistook it for מור, (26) Ch. xv. 25. (27) Luke xxiii. 44. John xix. 14. (28) Vid. Matth. xx. 3, & seq. John xi. 9 (29) Ut Act iii. 1. x. 9. De his vid. & Druf. in loc. Goodwin. Moses & Aar. l. iii. c. 1. sect. 6, 7, & seq. (30) Mark xv. 23. (31) Matt. xxvii. 34. (32) Vid. Plin. l. xiv. c. 13.

mor,

he had tasted, he refused to drink. They then stripped him of his cloaths, and, extending his body on the cross, fastened him to it, with nails driven through his hands and feet, whilst he was earnestly praying to his Father, to forgive them a deed, which they committed through ignorance. After which they reared up the cross, and fixed it on the ground, so that his body hanged on four wounds, made on the most tender and sensible parts of the body. With him they crucified two malefactors (A), one on each side, according to that oracle, which foretold his being numbered with transgressors [h]. Pilate had likewise ordered the title of his accusation to be fixed to the cross; it was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, the three most known tongues at that time, and in these words; Jesus of Nazareth, king of the Jews. The chiefs were therefore highly affronted at it, and came to beg of Pilate to have it altered, and, instead of calling him king of the Jews, to have it inserted that he assumed that title to him. But he as stiffly refused it, and sent them away with this haughty answer, What I have written, I have written. Here, whilst the soldiers, who were set to watch him, fulfilled another prophecy of him, in the division they made of his garments, and casting lots on his robe, because it was without seam, and woven from top throughout [i]; the priests and elders were verifying another, in the scornful taunts and injurious reflections they cast upon him, in the height of his anguish and dying pangs. He saved others, said they in a deriding tone; but cannot save himself: he pretended to trust in God, let him now deliver him, if he had such delight in him [k]. Their example was followed by Jesus crucified between two thieves.

Reviled by the priests, &c.

[h] Conf. Isai. liii. ult. & Mark xv. 28. Luke xxii. 37. xxiii. 33.
[i] Conf. Ps. xxii. 18. & Luke xxiii. 34. [k] Conf. Ps. xxii. 7, 8, & Matth. xxvii. 41, & seq.

mor, myrrh; and thus the two evangelists will be reconciled, and the prophecy fulfilled, They gave me gall to eat, and, in my thirst, vinegar to drink (33). For the whole tenor of this psalm seems to be a continued prophecy of Christ's sufferings, as well as of that judicial blindness, ruin, and dispersion, which fell on the impenitent Jews (34).

(A) These are reasonably supposed to have been two of the gang of those free booters, whom the Jews called לסטים, listessin, and the Romans prædones; such as we have observed in a former section, used to infest those countries, and had given Herod so much trouble to suppress.

(33) Ps. lxix. 21. (34) Vid. a vers. 22, ad fin.

all

all the multitudes that were gathered to see the dismal sight. The very criminals, who were crucified on each side, could not forbear reviling him, till one of them, stung at last with some lively remorse, gave his fellow-sufferer a severe rebuke for his impiety; then addressing himself to the suffering Jesus, who was then, more than ever, touched with a feeling of our infirmities, and sympathising with his torments and agonies; in the humblest terms confessed his own guilt; and in that pathetic and glorious confession he made of him, whilst under the same shameful sentence and punishment, gave such a signal instance of his faith and piety, as no age of the christian church since that time could ever parallel (B); and for which he received this comfortable assurance, from him that had the keys of life and death, This day shalt thou be with me in paradise [1].

The penitent thief forgiven.

Whilst Jesus hanged on the cross, he beheld his sorrowful virgin-mother standing by, on whom was now verified the saying of old Simeon, that a sword should pierce her very soul; and with her stood his beloved disciple, with Mary Magdalen, and some other women. The sight of her grief, which must be supposed to be beyond expression at this dismal juncture, revived his tenderness for her; so that, being now come to the last period of his life, he recommended her to the care of that favourite disciple, intreating them to shew to each other from thenceforward the endearing duties of mother and son; and from that time John took her to his own

[1] Luke ibid. 39, & seq.

(B) This remarkable circumstance is the more worthy being observed in all its parts, because many a wicked person have flattered themselves with a dangerous notion, that some such short ejaculation at their last agonies will meet with the like success, though in every other particular quite opposite to him.

He sees Jesus rejected and condemned by his whole nation, who had been witnesses of his stupendous works; sentenced by the Romans; reviled by the Jewish priests and elders; forsaken by his own disciples; undergoing a most ignominious and excruciating death; and yet, under all these disadvantageous circumstances, acknowledges him a King, a Saviour, and a Lord He proclaims the unrighteousness of his sentence, and the justice of his own: he declares his faith and hope in him; his belief of another life; and so submissive is he under his torments, that, instead of praying to be delivered from them, either by some miracle, or by a speedy death, his extreme humility will not suffer him to ask for more than a bare remembrance of him, when he came into his kingdom.

house.

houſe [m]. In the mean time a horrid darkneſs overſpread the face of the earth; the ſun hid, as it were, himſelf from ſo diſmal a ſight (C); all the ſpectators were ſeized with a ſudden terror and amazement. Some returned to Jeruſalem, ſmiting their breaſts, and proclaiming him a righteous man, whilſt the reſt, more hardened, ſtood in a kind of mournful ſilence, expecting the event. This unnatural darkneſs and diſorder, which laſted from the ſixth to the ninth hour, that is, from noon to three of the clock after it, was followed by a greater, when Jeſus, quite ſpent with pain and anguiſh, cried out, Eli, Eli, Lama Sabachtani (D); and having taſted the mingled

[m] John xix. 25, & ſeq.

(C) This darkneſs was the more miraculous, becauſe it happened in the time of the oppoſition of the two luminaries, when conſequently there could be no eclipſe of the ſun. For we have formerly obſerved, that the paſſover began in the full moon *; beſides, the total darkneſs of the ſun's eclipſes laſted but at moſt twelve or fifteen minutes; whereas this is recorded to have laſted three full hours (35). Whether it reached the whole hemiſphere, or only the land of Judæa, is not eaſily determined, the antient fathers being divided about it. Origen, and ſome others, confined it to the latter (36), whilſt others (37) extend it over the former. Theſe quote the famous aſtronomer Phlegon, the free-man of the emperor Adrian, who affirms, that in the fourth year of the CCII olympiad, which is ſuppoſed to be that of the death of Chriſt, there was ſuch a total eclipſe of the ſun at noon-day, that the ſtars were plainly to be ſeen. It has indeed been diſputed, whether this year of Chriſt's crucifixion anſwered to that of the olympiad abovementioned; and what is there of this nature that ſome bold critics will not diſpute? but we ſhall refer our readers, for a fuller view of the controverſy, to the learned doctor Dawſon's diſſertation on that ſubject. Tertullian, in his uſual elegant way, refers the heathens to their public records for this ſurpriſing phænomenon, wherein mid-night happened at noon-day (38). And Suidas introduces Dionyſius the Areopagite, then at Heliopolis in Egypt, expreſſing himſelf to his friend Apollophanes concerning this unnatural eclipſe; that either the author of nature ſuffered, or was ſympathiſing with the ſufferer.

(D) Or, which is more probable, repeated the whole twenty-ſecond pſalm, of which thoſe are the title, or firſt words, and in which there are the moſt lively ſtrokes of all the remarkable par-

* Vol. II. p. 521, & Vol. III. p. 170, & [illegible] (35) Vid. Matth. xxvii. 45. (36) In Matth. ubi ſupra, & alib. (37) Julius Africanus ap. Syncel. Euſeb. in chron. Hieron. & al. (38) Apolog. c. 21.

gled vinegar, which was offered to imbitter his laſt gaſp, recommended his ſpirit into the hands of his heavenly Father, and in an agony of prayer yielded up the ghoſt.

For

ticulars of his paſſion; ſome of which we have already quoted, others we have elſewhere explained in a manner wholly new, and yet ſatisfactory, as we have found, to many of our readers *. The word שבקתני, ſabachtani, here uſed, inſtead of the Hebrew עזבתני, hazabthani, ſhews, that it was quoted out of the Chaldee paraphraſe, which was then the moſt in uſe, and in which alone that word is to be found (39). So that he ſeems here to have, as it were, reminded his heavenly Father, how he was now fulfilling all thoſe prophecies contained in that pſalm, which is a kind of epitome or ſummary of all the other oracles relating to his ſufferings and death. In conſequence of which, he was praying to him that he would make good to him and to his ſpiritual poſterity, that is, to his church, all thoſe gracious promiſes, which are contained in the latter part of the ſame pſalm, from the twenty-ſecond verſe to the end.

The Jews therefore, who knew that there was no other way then, to quote either a pſalm, or any other ſection of holy writ, but from the firſt words of it, as we have elſewhere ſhewn might have ſaved their invectives againſt Chriſt, as if he had been then ſeized with a kind of deſpair (40), and objecting to him the words of the pſalmiſt, I never ſaw the righteous forſaken, &c. (41). Our commentators might likewiſe have ſaved themſelves the trouble of accounting for this ſeemingly deſpairing expoſtulation, from the ſuppoſition, that the Deity had wholly withdrawn every ſpark of comfort and hope from him, whilſt he was thus undergoing the puniſhment due to ſin; ſome of whom have carried it to ſuch a height, as cannot be read without horror (42). Whereas the ſuppoſition above mentioned, that he was then repeating this noble pſalm, which, after the capitulation of his unparallelled ſufferings, concludes with the moſt comfortable promiſes both to him and his followers; ſhews him to have been ſo far from either doubt or deſpair, that he comforted himſelf under the terrible weight of the former by the aſſured proſpect of the latter. And that he really died in this godlike temper of mind, all the other circumſtances of his paſſion and death, as well as his laſt dying ejaculations, and the noble teſtimony which the centurion gave of it, do plainly ſhew.

And here we beg leave to make one remark more on the elaborate metrical verſion, mentioned at the beginning of this chapter,

* Vid Vol III. p. 211, in fin. (Z). (39) Vid. Munſt. in Pſ. xxii. note b. Prid connect. part. 2. l. 8. ſub an A. C. 27. (49) שוחר־טוב, & al. comment. in Pſal. (41) Pſal. xxxvii. 24, 25, & alib. (42) Vid. inter al. Calvin. in loc. & inſtitut.

wherein

FOR immediately upon his expiring, the frame of nature fell, as it were, into convulſions: the earth quaked, the rocks wherein that learned prelate, ſpeaking of the pſalm we are now upon, thinks to have found in it ſuch difference of ſtyle, matter, &c. that he cannot forbear ſuppoſing they are two different pſalms, abſurdly tacked together by the Jews, and which ought to be divided at the twenty-ſecond verſe above-mentioned, where a kind of new theme ſeems to begin.

The ſtrange prodigies which happened at his death.

But, with due ſubmiſſion to his lordſhip's great judgment, we think this difference of ſtyle, &c. highly conſiſtent with the two-fold deſign of it, the one to foretel the great humiliation of Chriſt, and the other to ſhew his glorious exaltation immediately following it (43). The ſubject of thoſe two prophecies being vaſtly different, it could hardly be otherwiſe, but the ſtyle muſt be ſo likewiſe. We may add, that the fifty third chapter of Iſaiah, which runs almoſt parallel in both theſe caſes, and is allowed by all chriſtians, as it was once by the antient Jews, to relate to the Meſſiah (44), might be as properly divided into two, as this pſalm; which yet never came into any man's head, on account of that difference, or any other. No not even into that of the Jews, though ſo cloſely pinched by it, that they have even ventured to ſplit the perſon there ſpoken of into two.

Before we diſmiſs this noble pſalm, we beg leave to anſwer an objection which the latter raiſe againſt our reading in the ſixteenth verſe, כארו, caru, they pierced my hands, &c. inſtead of כאריו, caare, which they pretend is the true reading, and ſignifies like a lion, as if the meaning had been, my hands and feet, like thoſe of a lion; (to which they were forced to add to make it ſenſe,) were watched or obſerved. And this exchange of the latter for the former they do not ſcruple to charge us with, as done deſignedly by the ſacred hiſtorian (45).

As we have no manuſcript of ſo old a date as to be able to decide the matter on either ſide. it might be a ſufficient anſwer to obſerve to them the unlikelihood, that St. Matthew, who was a converted Jew, and wrote in a language ſo well underſtood by the whole nation, ſhould dare to quote a paſſage ſo contrary to its received reading and ſenſe, if theirs had really been the right one.

We might tell them farther, that by their own confeſſion the ſeptuagint verſion had altered the ſenſe of ſeveral texts of ſcripture, which they thought looked derogatory of either their lawgiver, or of the Meſſiah. Of this laſt nature was the changing of the words of the text, Mine ears haſt thou bored, for a body haſt thou prepared for me. Concerning which we have ſpoken more rocks were cleft aſunder, the graves opened, the dead raiſed; and the veil, which covered the moſt holy place, was rent in twain from the top to the bottom, uncovering thereby thoſe myſteries of the Moſaic diſpenſation, which had now in his death their full accompliſhment; in token of which he broke out in his laſt agonies with thoſe ſignal words, It is finiſhed. Here the centurion and infidel ſoldiers, obſerving his meek and pious exit, and the miraculous circumſtances which attended it, were ſtruck with ſuch admiration and dread, that they confeſſed him to be the ſon of God [n]. Not fully in our third volume ‡; to which we might add, that Juſtin Martyr charges them (46) with having made many other more conſiderable alterations, and in particular with having expunged the words ἀπο τȣ ξυλȣ out of the tenth verſe of the ninety-ſixth pſalm, when both that verſion and the ancient Latin one made from it, called Vetus Itala, read, Dicite in gentibus, Dominus regnavit à ligno; which laſt words are likewiſe to be ſeen in ſome other verſions in the ſame tongue (47); and is it not more reaſonable to think, that when the old Mazorites came to find what uſe was made of this text againſt them, they might at firſt ſlide the כארי in the margin, or keri, and by degrees change that into the ketib; than to ſuppoſe an evangeliſt to be guilty of ſuch a manifeſt and wilful corruption. Thoſe who are unacquainted with the terms of keri and ketib, may ſee what we have ſaid of them at the beginning of this chapter *.

(43) De hoc vid. Philip ii. 8, & 9. (44) Vid. int. al. Mori Diatrib. in Iſai. liii. præf. & not. paſſ. & paralleliſm. int. loc. & nov. teſt. ſcript. (45) Vid. int. al Auct. lib. Nitzachon.

[n] Matth. xxvii. 50. & ſeq.

But let the words have ſlipped in or out of the text as they will, as long as they own that כארי is the true reading, it will be ſufficient to anſwer them with the learned Hottinger, in his diſſertation on that word, that it may as well be the participle כרי and ſo ſignify as properly piercing, the א being there euphonical or hemantic; in which caſe the ſenſe will run more elegant and agreeable to the Hebrew idiom, which often uſes the participle for the verb, piercing my hands and my feet; whereas, take the caari in the Jewiſh ſignification, the ſenſe is imperfect, and muſt be ſupplied with a far-fetched verb, to make it intelligible.

However, we are far enough from allowing this laſt to be the true ancient reading; the contrary has been fully proved from the ſeptuagint verſion, which reads it as we do, Cari; and from the confeſſion of ſeveral rabbies, as the reader may ſee, among many more, in the two learned authors quoted in the margin (48).

‡ Pag. 194. not. (N). (46) Dialog. con. Tryph. (47) Vid. Orig. Exempl. in loc. Pſalter. pentaglot Auguſt. in Pſ. in loc.
* Pag. 524, (Z). (48) Bochart. hieroz. p. 1. l. iii. c. 6. Hare in Pſ. xxii. note 35.

To

ſo did the Jewiſh prieſts and elders, who remained inflexible in ſpite of all theſe prodigies, and purſued their malice to the utmoſt, and without the leaſt relenting. It was now paſt three of the clock, the time in which the evening lamb was daily offered up; and this was the eve of their ſabbath, and of one of their grand feſtivals; that the ſolemnity of it therefore might not be ſullied or diſturbed by the hanging of the three bodies on the croſs [o], they went to beg of Pilate, that he would order their legs to be broke, and that they might be taken down, and carried off. This was immediately executed on the two criminals; but when they came to Jeſus, and found him already dead, they broke not his legs, but one of the ſoldiers, ſeemingly out of wantonneſs, ſtruck his lance into his ſide, which immediately iſſued forth water and blood. Theſe laſt circumſtances happened, not without a peculiar direction of providence, not only as they fully aſſured us of his being really dead, but as they verified two ſignal prophecies concerning him; the one, that not a bone of his ſhould be broken [p]; and the other, that they, the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, ſhould behold him whom they had pierced [q].

WHILST theſe things were tranſacting on mount Calvary, Joſeph of Arimathea (E), a wealthy and honourable Jewiſh ruler, and a ſecret diſciple of Jeſus, but yet of ſuch courage and integrity, as to proteſt againſt their violent and unjuſt proceedings againſt him, went boldly to Pilate and begged leave to take down and bury his ſacred remains. Pilate at firſt could ſcarcely believe that he could be ſo ſoon dead, but being aſſured of it by the centurion, he readily granted his [o] De hoc vid. Deut. xxi. 22. & ſeq. & Vol. III. p. 313.

[p] Vid Exod. xii. 46. Numb. ix. 12, & alib.
[q] Zechar. xii. 10. Conf. cum. John xix. 36, & ſeq.

(E) The ſame which is called in the ſacred Hebrew books Ramah, and Ramathah, and ſignifies a high place; and this is the reaſon why we meet with ſeveral of the ſame name, which have been confounded one with another. This therefore here ſpoken of by the evangeliſts, and which St. Jerom places between Joppa and Lydda (49), and ſome modern travellers on an eminence between the former and Jeruſalem, being conſequently on the weſt of that metropolis, was very different from Ramathaim Zophim, Samuel's native place, which was ſituate on the north of it. As the reader may ſee by comparing Saul's journey, in ſearch of his father's aſſes (50), with the map of Paleſtine (51).

(49) Epitaph. in Paul. (50) 1 Sam. ix. 4, & ſeq. (51) Vid. R. I. Paleſt.

requeſt.

Christ embalmed and buried.

requeſt. Joſeph had a garden adjoining to the place, in which he had hewn a new tomb in the rock, which he deſigned for himſelf, but was now by a particular providence better diſpoſed of, and was made the repoſitory of his maſter's body. We have formerly obſerved in what manner criminals that died by the hands of juſtice were to be buried apart †; but, in reconding him in this maiden grave, they ſeem to have fulfilled another ſignal prophecy in the ſame chapter of Iſaiah, where the hiſtory of his ſufferings is ſo lively repreſented, and where this remarkable circumſtance is foretold, that tho' he was numbered (in his death) with the tranſgreſſors, yet he ſhould have his grave among the great or wealthy [r]. Nicodemus, another of his private diſciples, aſſiſted at the doleful rite; and theſe two having haſtily embalmed the body with a large quantity of myrrh and aloes, and wrapt it in a new winding-ſheet, depoſited it into this new ſepulchre, wherein no corpſe had as yet been laid; and covered the mouth of it with a large ſtone, not to be removed but by a good number of hands; after which they went to prepare themſelves for the celebration of the enſuing ſolemnity [ſ]. In the mean while, the jealous Jews went to Pilate, and acquainted him, that Jeſus, whom they there ſtyle this deceiver, had formerly boaſted, that he would riſe again on the third day; and that it was therefore highly neceſſary to have his tomb well guarded till then, leſt his diſciples ſhould privately ſteal him away, and then give out, that he was really riſen, which would make the laſt miſtake more dangerous than the firſt. Pilate eaſily agreed to what they aſked, and to prevent any impoſition of that kind, told them, Ye have a guard (F); go ye therefore

His tomb ſealed and guarded.

† See Vol. III. p. 313

[r] Iſaiah liii. 9. Vid. Mor. diatrib. in loc. & parallel. in fin.

[ſ] Matth. xxvii. 57, & ſeq. Mark xv, 42, &c. Luke xxiii. 50, &c. John xix. 38, & ſeq.

(F) We think there is here a material circumſtance, which has hitherto paſt unobſerved, and which ſtill more ſecures the truth of Chriſt's reſurrection, viz. his tomb being guarded, not by a Roman but a Jewiſh watch. The former might have been liable to ſuſpicion, and theſe Pagan ſoldiers, little minding whether the Jews or Chriſt's diſciples were moſt in the right, might have been bribed by the latter to connive at an attempt to impoſe on a whole nation, which they hated and deſpiſed. But a Jewiſh guard, or, as they are therefore and make every thing as ſure as you can. So they went and ſet a guard at the door of the ſepulchre, and ſet their ſeal upon the ſtone [t]; and, by their extraordinary care to prevent any private attempt, made the truth of his reſurrection appear in the ſtronger light, as we ſhall ſee in the next ſection.

SECT. VII.

The Hiſtory of the Jews, from Chriſt's reſurrection to the total deſtruction of their city and temple, and diſperſion of that people.

WE have hitherto ſeen Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God in his loweſt humiliation, deſpiſed, rejected, and abhorred; perſecuted, tried, and condemned to a death of utmoſt ſhame and ignominy; expiring on a croſs and laid in a grave, and in all theſe reſpects in the loweſt and moſt abject condition of a man. The third day after his death, being the firſt day of the week, or our Sunday, and are elſewhere called, the officers and band of the high-prieſts (2), and were perhaps the ſame who had ſo lately brought him from the garden into that pontiff's palace, where they had made him ſuffer ſo many indignities, theſe, we ſay, could not be ſuppoſed to join in ſuch a cheat.

[t] Matth. xxvii. 62, ad fin.

Now this ſeems to be the reaſon why Pilate, who by his late behaviour ſeems to have entertained a much higher notion of Chriſt, might now be ſo far apprehenſive of his keeping his promiſe, that to prevent all ſuſpicion from him or his ſoldiers, he tells the Jewiſh chiefs, You have a guard of your own; make the beſt uſe you can of it. We do not, however, pretend to inſinuate, that they were permitted by the Romans to keep any troops of militia of their own; but only, that ſince the high-prieſthood had been joined to the royalty in the time of the Maccabees, they uſed to have a conſiderable body of life-guards, it is more than probable, that, after theſe two dignities were parted, the pontiffs were ſtill allowed the ſame, though perhaps in a leſs number, or elſe it will be difficult to gueſs what to make of thoſe ſoldiers and officers of the high-prieſt, which are ſo often met with in the goſpels and in the acts.

(2) Vid John xviii. 3. Conf. cum vii. 32, 45. Matth. xxvi. 47. Mark xiv. 43. Acts iv. i, & alib..

the Christ rises from the dead.

the fifth of April [a], offers him to our view in his glorified state, and risen again from the dead, according to his own promises, and the oracles written of old concerning him [b]. By the earliest dawn of this day, those pious women, who had accompanied him through his last three years travels, and had prepared a costly mixture to embalm his body, not dreaming at least of his so sudden resurrection, made their way towards the place, where they had seen him deposited two days before. They do not seem to have known any thing of a guard being set over it, their great concern was only how to get the ponderous stone rolled from the entrance. But that obstacle was already taken off by a miraculous earthquake, which had likewise put the guards to flight, so that at their arrival they found the stone rolled on one side, and an angel cloathed in a refulgent array sitting upon it. Their surprize was still greater, when they heard the heavenly messenger reprove their officious, but untimely, piety, in words to this effect: Why seek ye the living among the dead, forgetful of what he often repeated to you, that he was to suffer death, and to rise again on the third day? Behold the place where he was laid, and from which he is risen, and go and acquaint his disciples with it, and tell them, that he will meet you in Galilee according to his promise. They did so accordingly, and, with the greatest joy and wonder, went and told them what they had seen and heard; but those, still backward to believe, looked upon it as the effects of fancy and delusion [c].

The angel's speech to the women.

Two of them, however, had the curiosity to run to the sepulchre: John, who was the youngest of the two, came first, and stooping down found, that the body was really gone; but when Peter came next, he went into the place along with that beloved disciple, and to their surprize found the grave-cloaths and the napkin, not hastily and confusedly thrown by, but neatly folded up separately; upon which they began to entertain some hopes, and returned to acquaint the rest with the news [d]. Whilst they were thus together, and the women with them, Mary Magdalen, who had stayed in the garden, prying about to find whether the body had not been removed to some other place, came hastily to them, and assured them, that the Lord had appeared

[a] Vid. USSER. ann. sub A. M. 4030, p. 843. [b] Conf. Psalm xvi. 10. & Act. ii. 31 & alib. [c] Matth. xxviii. 1, & seq. Mark xvi. 1, & seq. Luke xxiv. 1, & seq. John xx. 1, & seq. [d] John ibid. vers. 3, & seq.

appeared to her there [e]. But neither could this further confirmation diſpel either their ſorrow or unbelief; till Jeſus at length came and ſhewed himſelf to them, gave them a gracious All-hail, and bid them be of good comfort, for he was alive again, and, according to his promiſe, would ſhortly meet them in Galilee. In the mean time, the frighted guards leaving the garden with utmoſt ſpeed and confuſion, went to acquaint the chief-prieſts and rulers with what had happened; upon which a council was immediately called. Here one might have reaſonably expected, they would either have yielded to ſo much evidence, or at leaſt ſuſpended all further reſolutions, till they had made a full inquiry into the fact. But inſtead of that, they rather choſe at any rate to ſuppreſs a truth, which was ſure to caſt the deepeſt guilt on their late unjuſt ſentence againſt Chriſt [f]; and accordingly bribed the watch with a good round ſum, to give out, that his diſciples had ſtolen him away whilſt they were aſleep, promiſing them at the ſame time, that if the matter came to the governor's ears, they would find means to pacify him, and bear them harmleſs. Upon which they went and ſpread abroad that report, which was readily ſwallowed by the greateſt part of the Jews, and went ſtill current among them for many years [g] (A).

ON that evening, two of the diſciples going to a village called Emmaus, diſtant about ſixty furlongs, or eight miles north-weſt of Jeruſalem, were diſcourſing with each other about the ſtrange tranſactions of the day, when Jeſus overtook them, and without making himſelf known, aſked

[e] Ibid. verſ. 15, & ſeq. [f] Vid. int. al. Acts v. 28. [g] Matth. xxviii. 9, & ſeq.

(A) So ſays the evangeliſt (1). But the Jews have ſince found out another way to oppoſe this ſignal truth, by denying that of his crucifixion, under pretence, that it was a puniſhment unuſual and unwarranted among them We have had frequent occaſion to mention this and ſome others of their poor and ſhameful evaſions, and ſhall not repeat them here.

Much leſs ſhall we take upon us to anſwer all the cavils which out modern ſceptics have raiſed againſt this important article, which has been ſo ſtrenuouſly defended by ſo many abler hands, and more particularly of late by a very learned pen, and in a manner wholly new, but ſo convincing, that nothing need be added to it (2), as indeed nothing has, or can be, replied to it.

(1) Matth. xxviii. 15.

(2) Trial of the witneſſes, paſſ them the cauſe of their melancholy entertainment. Cleophas, one of the two, in a kind of ſurprize, that he ſhould ſeem ſo great a ſtranger to the tranſactions of the laſt week, began to give him an account both of them and of thoſe of that day; particularly their ſurprize at the viſion, which the women had ſeen at the ſepulchre, concluding the whole with a kind of complaint, that though they had hitherto looked upon Jeſus as the future deliverer of their unhappy nation: yet it being now three days ſince they had ſeen him expire on a ſhameful croſs, their hopes were almoſt at an end, in ſpite of the women's report of his reſurrection, and its being in ſome meaſure confirmed by ſome of the apoſtles, who had been that morning at the ſepulchre. Here Jeſus took occaſion to blame their want of faith, not only in him, but in the ſcriptures, where both his ſufferings and death, reſurrection and glory, were ſo plainly foretold, and to give them a thorough expoſition of them from the firſt to the laſt. By this time they were got to the village, where Jeſus made a ſhew as if he deſigned to go farther; but they had been ſo comforted by his diſcourſe, that they intreated him to ſpend that night with them, the evening being then juſt upon cloſing. He went in with them accordingly, and, being ſat down at table, began with the breaking of the bread, as he had been wont to do; upon which they knew him, and he immediately vaniſhed. This ſurpriſing diſcovery added to the warmth which their hearts had felt, whilſt he expounded the ſcriptures to them on the road, would not ſuffer them to tarry longer there; but they went to communicate their joy that very night to the reſt that were then gathered together at Jeruſalem, and who acquainted them at the ſame time with his having appeared unto them [h].

Appears to the twelve at ſupper. Year of the Flood, 3035. Of Chriſt, 34.

All theſe circumſtances had been ſo far from convincing them hitherto, that they rather concluded, from his ſo ſudden diſappearing, that they had only ſeen ſome ſpirit in his likeneſs. They ſeemed ſtill more confirmed in it, when being ſat down to ſupper, with the gates faſt for fear of the Jews, he ſurprized them with his preſence, and gave them his uſual ſalutation, Peace be to you. To convince them therefore of their miſtake, he commanded them to draw near, and conſider his pierced hands and feet, handle his body, and ſatisfy themſelves by all proper means, that he was no ſpirit or phantaſm, but their real riſen lord and maſter. Whilſt they were ſtill fluctuating between joy and doubt,

[h] Luke xxiv. 13, & ſeq.

he

he reminded them of his former promiſes, explained thoſe oracles to them, in which theſe things were preſignified of him, renewed his former commiſſion and power to them to preach and confirm his goſpel, and left them for that night with his uſual bleſſing, full of joy and wonder, to collect and compare the ſeveral tranſactions of that glorious and ſignal day [i] (B).

Thomas, one of the eleven apoſtles, called Didymus, chanced to be abſent when this happened; ſo that when the reſt informed him of it, he plainly told them, that he ſhould never believe it, till he had thruſt his finger into the print of the nails, and his hand into his wounded ſide. Eight days after being the twelfth of April, Jeſus appeared again to them, when Thomas was there, and invited him to come and take that full demonſtration, which he had ſo ſtifly inſiſted on; but the incredulous ſervant, being now fully aſſured without it, fell at his gracious feet, and, with an humble ecſtaſy of joy, confeſſed him to be his Lord and his God; upon which he was diſmiſſed with this gentle reproof; Thou believeſt, Thomas, becauſe thou haſt ſeen; but bleſſed are they that have not ſeen, and yet believe [k]. Some days after, they all left Jeruſalem, and went according to his appointment into Galilee; where he appeared again unto them, and, after his uſual ſalutation, ſaid unto them, All power is given me in heaven and earth. Go therefore and preach to all nations; baptizing them in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, &c. [l] Seven of them being ſoon after gone to the ſea-ſide to fiſh, namely Peter, John, James, Thomas, Bartholomew, or Nathanael, and two others not named, and having toiled all night in vain, Jeſus manifeſted himſelf again to them in the morning, by the kind and known token of a beneficial miracle; and, after they had dragged their loaded net to the ſhore, condeſcended to eat and drink with them. After breakfaſt, Jeſus addreſſing himſelf to Peter aſked, whether he loved Appears to Thomas.

To ſeven others.

[i] Luke xxiv. 36, & ſeq. JOHN xx. 19, & ſeq. & alib. [k] JOHN ibid. verſ. 24, & ſeq. [l] MATTH. xxviii. 16, & ſeq.

(B) This laſt was the fifth appearance he made of himſelf on this one day, viz. 1. to Mary Magdalen; 2. to the other women; 3. to Peter, in ſome manner not plainly recorded, but mentioned tranſitorily by St. Luke and St. Paul (3); 4. tothe two diſciples; and, 5. to the whole college at ſupper.

(3) Luke xxiv. 34. 1 Corinth. xv. 5.

him more than the reſt? and being anſwered in the affirmative, commanded him to feed his flock. He repeated the ſame queſtion twice more to him, inſomuch that Peter, being grieved at it, broke out into this expreſſion; Lord, thou, who knoweſt all things, muſt know that I love thee. After this treble confeſſion of his unfeigned love, deſigned probably as a kind of expiation for his treble denial of him, Jeſus plainly told him, that the time would come, when he ſhould make a much more authentic acknowledgment of him, when he ſuffered himſelf to be bound and led to a glorious matyrdom for his ſake, and in imitation of him, intimating thereby, as the evangeliſt hints, his crucifixion, by which he was to glorify God, as he did accordingly many years after, with a conſtancy becoming a chief apoſtle (C). This

His commiſſion to Peter.

was

(C) The ſufferings and matyrdom of the primitive preachers of the goſpel being not only an irrefragable teſtimony of their ſincerity, as well as aſſurance of the facts and truths delivered by them, but moreover one of the higheſt inſtances of the divine wiſdom and power, which was to be diſplayed in the propagation of it (4); it will not be amiſs to ſpeak a little more fully of them, in his place, and upon this occaſion; ſince the thread of this chapter will not permit us to follow them into thoſe foreign countries, where they ſealed it with their blood.

Whoever conſiders what a ſtrenuous oppoſition the degenerate world has always made to chriſtianity, muſt own, that whatever fate had attended the preachers of it, was ſure to be turned into an objection againſt it. Were they encouraged, admired, and careſſed, or did their charitable labour meet with ſuitable returns, No wonder, would it have been ſaid, they are ſo zealous and indefatigable to propagate a goſpel, which turns ſo much to their credit and advantage. Were they deſpiſed, abhorred, perſecuted, and liable to the moſt ſhocking diſcouragements, how inconſiſtent would it have been thought with the divine goodneſs and juſtice, to ſuffer ſuch faithful, zealous, and charitable ſervants to be thus treated by thoſe, whom their chief ſtudy and deſign was to render the moſt happy perſons both here and hereafter; or to permit men of ſuch excellent and godlike diſpoſitions to be expoſed to the barbarous fury of the very vileſt of human race!

What medium the moſt conſummate human forecaſt could have found out between theſe two caſes, we may well be at a loſs to imagine But here it was, that infinite wildom and power triumphed in ſuch a manner, as was once more to confound the moſt wiſe and prudent of the world. And this was done, by creating,

(4) Conf. Iſai. xxix. 14. 1 Cor. i. 19, & ſeq.

a

was the third time of his appearing to the full body of his disciples after his resurrection. After that prediction, Jesus bid Peter as it were, such a new nature in those primitive professors of the gospel, as should not only render them insensible of, but even capable of receiving the most ecstatic comforts in the most excruciating torments, to which they were going to be exposed. By this, the objections of worldly gain on their part, or of injustice on God's were fully obviated; whilst the amazed world beheld them most calm, serene, and joyful, when, to all human appearance, they laboured under the heaviest loads of pain, and misery.

This miraculous change once wrought in them, they are no more the cowards that forsook their master, or shut their doors for fear of the Jews; but in the synagogues, the streets, and even to the face of death, freely confess and preach him (5). Peter, who through fear of the danger of being his, had thrice denied and forsworn him, can now sleep as calmly and soundly in a dungeon, with his hands and feet loaded with irons, and on the eve, as he thought, and Herod designed, of his matyrdom, as if he had been in his own bed, and out of all danger (6). Paul and Silas after having been unmercifully scourged, are thrust down into the lowest hold of a common gaol, and are heard by all the prisoners to sing psalms and hymns in the middle of the night (7).

In a word, this surprizing change was not confined to the apostles, disciples, and preachers of the gospel, much less to the infancy of it; but extended itself to their proselytes of all ranks, ages, sexes, conditions, and countries, during near three hundred years, if not much beyond. All which is a subject so well known and attested, not only by the primitive fathers and apologists; the former of whom, sealing the truth with their blood, and the latter, moreover, appealing to the records of their enemies and the notoriety of the facts, must consequently be allowed unexceptionable witnesses; but likewise by the very heathen authors themselves, who seemed as much to despise them for their folly, as they were astonished at their universal constancy; so that it would be superfluous to insist longer upon it.

We are not insensible indeed, how much the innumerable instances of this kind, which we meet with in the latter histories of Socrates, Sozomen, and others, have been thought exaggerated, and what little credit those writers have of late among us. The story of a Laurence throwing his sarcastical jests on his judges and executioners, whilst broiling on a gridiron, has been thought so monstrously absurd and unnatural, that it has almost discredited all

(5) Vid Act. ii, iii, & seq. pass. (6) Ibid. xii 2, & seq.
(7) Ibid. xvi. 23, & seq.

the

Peter come after him; who, turning about and ſeeing the beloved diſciple, aſked his maſter, whether he would have him the reſt. We would therefore beg leave to ask theſe doubtful gentlemen, whether they would have believed that ſtory, had it been tranſmitted down to us by any, but chriſtian writers; or, which is ſtill more, by men profeſſed enemies to chriſtanity, and at the ſame time of avowed ſenſe, learning, and integrity? If they would, we hope we may be permitted to ſubjoin one here of altogether as ſurpriſing a nature, and upon the authority of a perſon of the unqueſtionable character laſt mentioned Libanius, the famous orator of Antioch a perſon greatly eſteemed by all for his learning and humanity, but eſpecially by the emperor Julian, as appears by their mutual literary intercourſe, is the author we are ſpeaking of (8). The ſtory he relates is of one Mark, a venerable old biſhop of Arethuſa, a city in Syria between Emeſa and Epiphania; who endured the moſt exquiſite torments, under the above mentioned emperor, not only with utmoſt conſtancy, but braved his enemies with ſuch biting ſarcaſms in the midſt of his torments, that, being at laſt overcome by his heroic behaviour they were forced to let him down, and go off with his life, to prevent the heathen ſpectators falling down and worſhipping him The deſign of this ſtory, as well as of the orator's letter, was, to ſtop a perſecution newly raiſed under that apoſtate monarch againſt the chriſtians, for the havock they had made of the Pagan temples under his predeceſſor's reign; and the judge to whom he writes it, had then a zealous chriſtian priſoner, named Orion, who, it was apprehended, would prove a ſecond Mark, if the ſame ſeverities ſhould be uſed againſt him, and much more, leſt the known conſtancy of the reſt ſhould cauſe an univerſal defection from paganiſm. For which reaſon Libanius, though a bitter enemy to chriſtianity, is for putting an immediate ſtop to all further perſecution.

His letters, to the number of above ſixteen hundred, though preſerved in manuſcript, in ſeveral public as well as private libraries, and a good number of them printed and tranſlated into Latin (9), are yet ſo little known by our Engliſh readers, that we hope it will not be thought impertinent, if we ſubjoin here the ſubſtance] both of the letter and of this ſignal ſtory; though, for the better underſtanding of it, we ſhall be forced to have recourſe to Theodoret's (10) aſſiſtance. For the ſtyle of the former is ſo in-

(8) De Liban. & ejus epiſtol. Vid. int. al. Eunap. vita Liban. Joban. Chriſt. Volf præfat. in cent. epiſt. Liban. ſophiſt. cum not. Lipſik. 1711. (9) Fr. Zambicar. Joban. Sommerfeld. Morel. & al ap Volf. ubi ſupra. (10) Hiſt. Eccl. l. iii. c. 7. Vid. & Sozomen l. v. c. 10.

tricate

him alſo follow him? But Jeſus rebuked his untimely curioſity, with telling him, If I will have him tarry till I come, what tricate and laconic every-where, eſpecially where he ſpeaks of things and facts of a recent nature and univerſally known, that, without the guide of ſome other hiſtorian, one would never gueſs what he means or alludes to, becauſe he contents himſelf with the bare hint of them, as the reader may ſee by the letter itſelf (11). We hope the curiouſneſs of the ſubject, as well as the character of the author, will excuſe the length of this note; though, to ſhorten it as much as we can, we ſhall join the account out of thoſe two authors together, leaving to our readers to compare them with each other at their own leiſure.

" Mark, the heroic biſhop in queſtion, having in the reign of " Conſtans built a chriſtian church by and on the ruins of a Pagan " temple, and being like to ſuffer for it under Julian, endeavoured " at firſt to avoid it by flight; where being informed that ſome of " his dioceſe were going to be taken up for it, he came back and " ſurrendered himſelf to the heathen officers, as the only perſon " accountable for that fact. But theſe, without regard to his learn- " ing, dignity, or great age, ordered him to be ſtripped naked, " and ſcourged from head to foot. From thence he was flung into a " ſtinking common-ſhore; and being taken out again, was ex- " poſed in that condition to the mercy of a great number of ſchool- " boys, who made it their cruel ſport to pink his fleſh with their " writing inſtruments.

" All this was done to oblige him to refund the damages of the " demoliſhed temple, which when he conſtantly refuſed to do, " they beſmeared him all over with honey and a kind of ſweet " ſauce, called garon, and hoiſted him up into the air in a kind of " net, or open baſket; where, it being then the heat of ſummer, " the bees, waſps, &c. did eat him up alive. Whilſt he hung in " this dreadful condition, they offered to abate him half of the " ſtipulated ſum, thinking his refuſal owing to his inability of pay- " ing the whole. But, to their ſurpriſe, he anſwrered, that he ſhould " think it as impious to refund a doit, as the whole ſum. But " what increaſed their wonder beyond expreſſion is, he was all " this time ſo far from uttering a groan, or ſhewing the leaſt ſenſe " of pain, that he even ſeemed to make himſelf merry with his " Pagan tormentors, telling them, that they were from beneath, " but he from above; alluding to his ſuſpenſion. The conſequence " of the whole was, that, being at length overcome by his ſuper- " natural conſtancy, they let him down, and releaſed him full of " the deepeſt veneration and reſpect ".

Now, when a ſtory comes to us confirmed by a perſon of Libanius's character, and who was not only contemporary to it, but ſpeaks of it with the ſame aſſurance, as if he had been an eye wit-

(11) In epiſt lxx.

neſs

what have you to do with it? hence arose a strange notion among the rest, that that disciple should not die [m]; though, in all probability, Christ meant no more than his tarrying on earth, till his coming to take vengeance on the Jewish nation, which St. John actually lived to see totally dispersed.

THUS did our risen saviour manifest himself, either to his whole church, or to some of them more particularly, during the space of forty days, in all convincing proofs; instructing them still further in his heavenly doctrine, discoursing more familiarly with them of his spiritual kingdom, dispelling their doubts, allaying their fears, and comforting their hearts with the glorious prospect of an eternal life to crown their painful and arduous race. At length, the appointed time of his departure drawing near, he gathered them together, to the number, as St. Paul tells us, of above five hundred [n]. He led them into a retired part of a mountain, where he again gave them fresh assurances of his never-failing love, care, and protection, to the end of the world, renewed his commission and miraculous powers to them, together with the promise of ness of it; we know not well how that of Laurence, or any other, can be questioned in those historians. The same sophist adds to what Theodoret says, that the people were so astonished at the old bishop's constancy, that they worshipped him as a god; and that when Julian heard of it, though he was vexed at the demolition of the temple, he yet chose rather to forgive him, than to make further trial of his patience.

[m] JOHN xxi. per tot. [n] 1 CORINTH. xv. 6.

He concludes his letter with desiring his friend the judge, not to make of Orion his prisoner a second Mark, or a second Marsyas (who had been lately flayed alive). If, says he, you think Orion has a golden mine in his skin, you would do well to get it out; if not, by Jupiter, you had better let him go; or if you must punish him, do it in such a manner, that he may have no opportunity to make a public shew of his patience and constancy. Some have thought, that all this moderation of our orator might be owing to an apprehension of Julian's being succeeded by a christian (12); but, be that how it will, it cannot invalidate the testimony which he gives to those heroic sufferers. However, many of his letters appear full of the same moderate spirit, in other instances; and the tenor of the letter above mentioned shews him to have been rather afraid of the effects of the christian constancy, which under such grievous persecutions always drew, as well it might, a great number of converts, and threatened a total dereliction of their heathen temples and worship.

(12) Le Clerc, bibl. A. M. 1715. part 2. sect 4.

a plentiful

a plentiful effuſion of his Holy Spirit to direct them into all truth, and fit them for their glorious work, the converſion of the world •.

HAVING finiſhed his diſcourſe, he bid them return to Jeruſalem, where he would meet them before his aſcenſion, as he accordingly did‖; and ordered them to remain there till they had received the promiſed Comforter, by whom they ſhould ſhortly after be endowed with power from above, anſwerable to their high commiſſion. Great need they ſtill ſtood in of ſuch a divine director, ſince theſe laſt words filled them again with hopes, that their maſter was now going indeed to reſtore the kingdom of Iſrael. Jeſus was here again obliged to check their untimely curioſity, but referred the further diſplay of this important point to that promiſed heavenly inſtructor. And now having finiſhed his glorious work, he led them forth toward Bethany, to the mount of Olives; where being arrived, he tenderly gathered them about him, and, in their full ſight, went up to heaven, leaving his gracious bleſſing upon them, and the comfortable aſſurance, that he was going to prepare a place for them in his own kingdom; whilſt they, in an adoring poſture, followed him with their wiſhful eyes, till a bright cloud received him out of their ſight (D). Whilſt their eyes were thus fixed ſtill towards him, two angels appeared to them in bright apparel, and ſaid unto them, Ye men of Galilee, why ſtand ye gazing up to heaven? The ſame Jeſus, whom ye have now beheld aſcending thither, ſhall in the like manner come down again from thence [P]; meaning, doubtleſs, at the laſt day to judge the world; till when he will there re-

Aſcends into heaven.

• MARK xvi. 17. ad fin, ad fin. Act. i. 6, & ſeq.

‖ Ibid. ver. ult. LUKE xxiv. 46.

(D) This happened, according to our learned Uſher's computation, hinted a little higher, on a Thurſday, the fourteenth of May, which is the ninth month of the Jewiſh year, and in the thirty-ſixth, or, according to others, the thirty-third year of his age, and the nineteenth of Tiberius's reign. There is an antient tradition, which adds, that it was about the time of noon when he was taken up, and aſcended from one of the ſummits of mount Olivet, where the print of his feet, where he laſt ſtood, was ſtill to be ſeen, and on that account has been had in great veneration ever ſince. The reader may ſee what we have ſaid of it in a former volume †, main, and reign at the right hand of his Father, till all his enemies be made his footſtool [q] (E). The [q] Conf. Pſ. cx. 1. Matth. xxii. 44. Act. ii. 35. Hebr. i. 13. x. 12, 13.

† See before Vol. III. p. 104, K, 105, L.

(E) It will not be amiſs to cloſe this hiſtory of the Saviour of the world with thoſe other teſtimonies which we find concerning him, both in Joſephus and in ſome eminent heathen authors We begin with the former, becauſe we have elſewhere promiſed to ſay ſomething further concerning that known and much controverted paſſage of his, which runs to this effect (13):

"At the ſame time there was one Jeſus, a wiſe man, if at leaſt "he may be called a man, who was a great worker of miracles, and "a teacher of truth, to all that were deſirous to learn it, and had "a great number of diſciples, both of Jews and Gentiles. This "was (or as St. Jerom read it, credebatur, was believed to be) "the Chriſt whom Pilate through the envy of the heads of our "nation, cauſed to be crucified; but this did not hinder his diſ-"ciples from cleaving ſtedfaſtly unto him. He was ſeen by them "three days after his death, according to the prophecies concern-"ing him. The chriſtian ſect ſubſiſts to this day, call themſelves "by his name, and acknowledge him for their head".

This paſſage being not only found in all the manuſcripts of that hiſtorian, but quoted by St. Jerom, Euſebius (14), and other antients, the main objection againſt it is, how Joſephus could expreſs himſelf in ſuch a manner concerning Chriſt, and yet live and die a Jew To which may be added another difficulty, viz. how he could acknowledge him the promiſed Meſſiah, after he had once complimented the Roman emperor with that title. But thoſe who believe it to have been foiſted in by ſome pious chriſtians, will find it ſtill much more difficult to account how they could get it inſerted in all future copies, and ſuppreſs all the old and genuine ones.

Thoſe who know how much has been already writ for and againſt it, will eaſily excuſe our not entering further into that controverſy, than referring our readers to the authors themſelves, whom he will find quoted in the margin (15).

All that we ſhall add by way of leſſening the two difficulties raiſed againſt the genuineneſs of the text is, 1ſt, That Joſephus was no leſs a courtier, than a Jew and a Phariſee; he might, as an hiſtorian, who made great ſhew of ſincerity, be forced to publiſh a truth, the ſuppreſſion of which would have brought his character in queſtion, and yet not have reſolution enough to ſacrifice his temporal intereſt to his conviction. The cruel treatment which the diſciples of Chriſt met with from Jews and Gentiles, might be a ſufficient obſtacle, to a man of his mould, liſting himſelf into their number. He might, and had in all probability converſed with ſeveral learned chriſtians, who might have inſpired him with a great veneration for their di-(13) Antiq. l. xviii. c. 4. (14) Lib. de ſcriptor. Vid. & Euſeb Eccl hiſt. l. i cap. 11. iii. c. 9. (15) Vid int. al. Huet. demonſtr, evang prop ſect. 11. & Arnold. diſſert. de loc. ſuſp. an. 1661.

vine

THE diſciples, thus warned, returned immediately to Jeruſalem, where they ſpent their time in prayers, faſtings, and ſuch-like vine maſter, and, from the many prophecies concerning him, have convinced him of his being the Meſſiah, and at the ſame time, his brethren of the Phariſaic leaven might trump up their notion of a double Meſſiah, viz. a ſuffering one, and the other a great and glorious conqueror.

For no time could be more likely to produce ſuch a wild diſtinction, than that about which he wrote his hiſtory, when all their hopes were wholly quaſhed, the ſceptre long ago departed from Judah, the ſecond temple deſtroyed, the nation ruined, the utmoſt length of their computation of Daniel's weeks long ſince ended, and the chriſtians every-where beating them out of all other reintrenchments, and forcing them at length to truſt themſelves to this broken plank; and was not a man of Joſephus's character as likely to prefer this ſoothing notion, to the manifeſt danger of becoming a profeſſed chriſtian, as any of his fraternity?

But, laſtly, who can tell, how far the ill treatment which he met with from theſe laſt, at the ſiege of Jeruſalem, their invincible obſtinacy and ingratitude, their cruelty, hypocriſy, and irreconcileable hatred to him, may have provoked him to lay this heavy charge upon them, of crucifying the Meſſiah, and to aggravate it with thoſe other teſtimonials concerning him, without being himſelf thoroughly ſatisfied with them, through prejudice and intereſt? If we join his reſentment againſt them, and their notion of two Meſſiahs, with his fawning action of complimenting Veſpaſian with the title of Meſſiah, we ſhall find, that he acted nothing but what became ſuch a conſummate politician; and the paſſage above-quoted concerning Chriſt, and that concerning the Roman emperor, tho' ſet at that great diſtance from each other, to conceal his deſign, when brought nearer together, may amount to no more than this: Since the heads of our nation did unjuſtly reject and crucify the firſt Meſſiah, who came to them in the ſpirit of meekneſs and charity, and in all reſpects anſwered the deſcription given of him by the antient prophets, it is but juſt that the ſecond, who is to be the glorious conquering one, ſhould ſignalize the premiſes of his reign, with the extirpation of thoſe unworthy wretches, and thereby fulfil the prophecies concerning himſelf, and his glorious and univerſal kingdom. All which was in a great meaſure already done before the hiſtorian wrote his two hiſtories, in the laſt of which he ſpeaks of his conference with that prince (16), and may have dreſſed it in the moſt advantageous manner to gain the applauſe of the Romans.

If therefore this text ever ſuffered any alteration, it ſeems to have been only in the omiſſion of the word was believed, which we find was (16) Bell. Jud. l. iii. c. 14. v. c. 12.

ſuch-like other duties, as were likelieſt to qualify them for the reception of the promiſed Comforter. They were about a hundred and twenty perſons, probably exclusive of the women, who did not uſe to be reckoned in the number, though they kept ſtill with them, and among the reſt the virgin Mary, who is here particularly mentioned, and for the laſt time [r]. The place they uſed to aſſemble in, was a large upper rooom (F), where a few days after their maſter's aſcenſion, Peter addreſſed himſelf to the reſt, and reminded them how neceſſary it was, before they entered into their grand commiſſion, to chuſe a new member into the apoſtolic college, from among thoſe who had been converſant with Jeſus from John's bap-in St. Jerom's copy, though not in that of Euſebius, Ruſinus, and others, where it was left out; but whether through careleſsneſs, or wilfully, muſt be left to the readers candor. And, after all, we may as well ſuſpect the great character which the Jewiſh hiſtorian gives to John the baptiſt, and to St. James, whom he calls the brother of Chriſt (17), which yet caſt no ſmall honour to this laſt, whoſe martyrs they were.

[r] Act. i. 14.

Concerning the teſtimony of heathen writers, we have already mentioned thoſe which confirm the ſupernatural eclipſe which happened at Chriſt's paſſion and the appeal which the apologiſt fathers made to the heathen records for that and other facts. Tacitus confirms alſo Chriſt's having been put to death by Pilate governor of Judæa under the emperor Tiberius (18). We might add ſome others, were we not afraid of ſwelling this note too much. The readers may ſee them in the apologies above-mentioned, and in the authors quoted in the margin (19).

For the ſame reaſon we ſhall forbear mentioning that of the Mohammedans, and all further debate on the apocryphal goſpels, epiſtles, and other writings concerning him, and all uſeleſs inquiries after his perſon, ſhape, mien, and other ſuch particularities of neither importance, nor the leaſt certainty. As for his pretended correſpondence with the king of Edeſſa, we ſhall refer our readers to what has been ſaid in a former volume †.

(F) The words εἰς το ὑπερῶον (20), do certainly imply ſome upper room of a houſe, and not of the temple, as ſome have imagined. This might be therefore that large one in which Jeſus had celebrated the laſt paſſover with his diſciples (21); and is ſuppoſed to have belonged to one of them, namely to John, ſurnamed Mark, and is ſaid to have been turned, in proceſs of time, into a ſtately church.

(17) Antiq. l. xx. c. 8. (18) Annal. lxv. c. 4. (19) Vid. int. al. Minut. Felix. H. Grot. de verit. Le Clerc. in eund. Abadie & al. (29) Acts xiii. † See Vol. IX. p. 481. (21) Mark. xiv. 14, 15.

tiſm

tiſm to that perſent time; to fill the vacancy which the traitor Judas had made to their number. The propoſal being approved, two candidates were offered to them, namely Joſeph, ſurnamed, Juſtus and Barſabas (who is ſuppoſed by ſome to be the brother of James the Leſs, and by others the ſame with Barnabas), and Matthias, who was one of the ſeventy diſciples (G). After a ſhort prayer to the diſcerner of all hearts, to direct them to the perſon whom he had made choice of, they caſt their lots, and Matthias was choſen into the apoſtolical miniſtry, and their number completed again [r].

WHEN fifty days from Chriſt's reſurrection were finiſhed, which uſhered in the grand feaſt of pentecoſt, whilſt the diſciples were all aſſembled at their uſual place, ſuddenly there was heard a mighty ſound from heaven; a vehement wind filled the room they were in, when there appeared a kind of cloven tongues of fire ſitting upon each of their heads; upon which they were all filled with the Holy Ghoſt, illuminated with his heavenly light, inflamed with his divine heat, inſpired with the knowledge of foreign tongues, and endowed with all other ſupernatural gifts, to qualify them for their glorious taſk, the converſion of the world. They ſet themſelves immediately about it, Jeruſalem being then filled with people, who came from all parts of the world, both Jews and proſelytes, who flocked thither, as uſual, to that grand ſolemnity. Theſe, hearing of that wonderful event, came to them in great crouds, and were beyond meaſure ſurprized to hear ſuch poor illiterate Galileans, who never knew any but their own mother tongue, and that no better than as ſimple fiſhermen, expreſs themſelves with ſuch unheard-of readineſs and energy, and diſplay in all their different tongues and dialects the moſt ſublime myſteries of the goſpel. The ſacred hiſtori-

The Holy Ghoſt deſcends on the apoſtles

[r] Act. ibid. 15. ad fin.

(G) The traditions concerning theſe two, and others of their collegues, are ſo uncertain, that there is no relying on them, otherwiſe this Joſeph ſhould be the ſame with that often mentioned in the goſpel among the relations of our Saviour; and by his ſurname of Barſabas, he ſhould be the ſame with Barnabas, who is yet ſaid to be a Cyprian levite (22). Matthias ſhould likewiſe be the ſame with Zaccheus (23), though this laſt became a diſciple but a few weeks before Chriſt's death, and the apoſtles choſe only thoſe for candidates, who had been with him from the beginning of his miniſtry.

(22) Acts iv. 36. (23) De his vid Clem. Alexander. Strom. N. D. Lyra, Corn. a Lap. & al,

an an mentions fifteen different countries, out of which this assembly consisted [t]. Whilst therefore some, struck with amazement at what they saw and heard, were questioning what the issue of such a prodigy would be, others absurdly attributed it to some excess of new wine, which they supposed the apostles had been guilty of that morning. Which when Peter understood, he first exploded the supposition, by reminding them, that it was but the third hour of the day, or nine of the morning; and then proved to them from the scriptures, that there was nothing happened in this extraordinary change, but what had been plainly foretold and elegantly described by one of the prophets [u]. From that he proceeded to those other oracles, which had presignified the death and resurrection of Christ, the true Messiah; all which he shewed to them, with such powerful and convincing eloquence, that three thousand of his audience were immediately converted to his doctrine, and continued strict and zealous professors of it [w] (H).

They convert three thousand souls.

Some

[t] Ibid. c. ii. 8, & seq. [u] Joel ii. 28, & seq. conf. cum Isai. xxix. 19, & seq. xliv. 3, & seq. cum Act. xi. 15, & seq. [w] Act. c. ii. vers. 37, ad fin.

(H) Those that will not acknowledge the truth of this miraculous transaction, must suppose that surprising change in the apostles to have been wrought by some such method as this which follows; we leave them to their choice. They must suppose the hen-hearted college to have been all at once seized with a desperate phrentic courage, or inspired with it by some one of the boldest of them, suppose the pretended champion Peter, by some such speech as this:

Men and brethren, The natural consequence of our having been so egregiously cheated by our late master, and made to wait so long in vain for his pretended resurrection, should according to human prudence be this; that we should for the future detest the very memory and mention of him; that we should become so much the more tenacious of the expositions and traditions of our betters, since it was our departing from them, to follow him, that has brought us into this dilemma; and lastly, that we should go and beg for absolution of the sanhedrin, which they'll hardly make a difficulty to grant; for what wonder is it, that such poor illiterate fishermen as we are should be so easily deceived, when so many of their learned bench, were caught in the same snare?

But for my own part poor and simple as I am, I think I could undergo the most dreadful hazards in life, rather than to stoop to such a base submission; and my project, if I can but bring you into it,

SOME time after Peter and John, repairing to the temple at the uſual evening hour of prayer, healed a poor cripple, who it, is to do the very reverſe; to cry our late maſter up ſtill for the true Meſſiah, to profeſs a greater love and veneration for him than ever, to affirm that we have ſeen him riſen from the dead, converſed with him full forty days, in all convincing proofs, and at length ſeen him go up to heaven; and to propagate the cheat, not only among our nation, but alſo among the Gentiles, as far and wide as we can; and, to make it the better go down with the world, we will pretend to a new and miraculous commiſſion from heaven to the ſupernatural gifts of prophecy, tongues, miracles, and every thing that is great and ſtupendous, or apt to raiſe our maſter's glory and our own.

Methinks, I hear you already making ten thouſand objections and difficulties againſt my project, which I doubt not but you look upon as the moſt romantic that ever came into a crazy brain; and I who have duly weighed them, do give you leave to think ſo ſtill, if I do not remove every one of them, and convince you that my ſcheme is no leſs practicable, than it is heroic and glorious.

You will object in the firſt place, that ſuch a deſign will expoſe us to the higheſt oppoſition and reſentment from Jews and Gentiles, to impriſonments, ſcourgings, tortures, and death; I own it, and that is the reaſon of my being ſo zealous for it; and I promiſe myſelf an unconceivable pleaſure in carrying it on under all theſe difficulties and dangers. But our pretence you'll ſay, to miracles, tongues and other ſupernatural gifts, will be a moſt effectual means to betray us, becauſe we ſhall at every turn be ready to diſcover our want of them. Suppoſe it happen ſo; can we not ſtill face them down that we have them, though they cannot ſee them? Can't we find means to impoſe, not only upon the eyes and ears of the world, but upon the very underſtandings of the greateſt philoſophers that now reign either at Rome or Athens? Let us but reſolutely undertake, and I promiſe you, you will meet with a thouſand unexpected accidents, that will force, as it were, a ſucceſs into your very laps.

But the greateſt objection perhaps to you is, that we ſhall bring the hatred of even God himſelf, as well as of the world, upon us; we ſhall not only deprive ourſelves of all the hopes of the true promiſed Meſſiah, but of all other comforts of this or of the next life; and what a dreadful thing muſt it be to be thrown into a dungeon, or led to ſome cruel execution; abhorred by God and man, tortured by the ſting of a conſcience as black as the very hell we are haſtening to, without one poor glympſe of hope or comfort, either from within, or from without us?

There

who fat begging at the gate. This drew immediately a great concourſe of people about them to the place called Solomon's porch;

There is indeed ſomething in this thought which may appear terrible to mean ſouls; but mine is above ſhrinking at ſuch bugbears, when the glorious proſpect of impoſing one of the vileſt cheats is put in the ſcale againſt it. For let our guilt be of never ſo deep a dye, and the generality of the world judge never ſo juſtly of it, yet as long as we make the greateſt boaſts to ſanctity, piety, charity, and every real virtue, and take care that our life, at leaſt outwardly, doth not bely our pretence, we ſhall ſtill meet with admirers enough to keep up our ſpirits from flagging in this noble undertaking; and who could grudge to run any dangers, or even to die for ſuch a cauſe?

And now, methinks, I ſee you all, like me, impatient to ſally out in this heroic race; but there is ſtill one danger, againſt which I muſt warn you all. It is likely, that when we come to be diſperſed at a vaſt diſtance from each other, as we muſt be of courſe to carry on the work, ſome one of us may, through fear of torments, or of ſome cruel death, be cowardly enough to diſcover the whole impoſture, in which caſe we ſhall all loſe the fruit of our labours. Our late puſillanimous behaviour, and mine in particular, to our late maſter in the garden, might indeed incline one to fear, leſt there ſhould turn out another Judas from among us. But there is ſomething within me that gives me a quite contrary notion of you all, and that you will reſolutely perſiſt in carrying on the common cauſe, and not, through any baſe fear or terror, torture or death, make ſhipwreck of that glorious deſign, to which we are going to ſacrifice all that is dear and valuable in this and the next world.

And therefore let me only add a few neceſſary directions to you, and then let us go on and proſper: 1. It is cuſtomary for perſons of our character to be elated at every ſucceſs or applauſe, and ſunk down at every foil. We muſt act the reverſe Never appear more joyful, lofty, and undaunted, than when you meet with the greateſt oppoſition, ſcorn, and ill treatment; nor ever more humble and abaſed, than when men are ready to fall down and worſhip you. This you know was our maſter's caſe, and we muſt, whatever we do, profeſs an utter contempt of every thing that this world is fond of, and ſeem to court nothing but poverty and miſery, croſſes and perſecutions. We may in all likelihood fare the better for it; but if we do not, we ſhall at leaſt ſave our credit, if we ſave nothing elſe.

2. It is not only natural, but ſweet, to ſuch men as we, to retaliate ill uſage, though never ſo juſtly deſerved, with ill language and ill offices, to complain of injuſtice and cruelty, and even to call for vengeance from heaven on our pretended oppreſſors. But I adviſe you, whatever betide us, to let your behaviour breathe nothing porch; where Peter, having reproved their ſtupidity in gazing at them, as the authors of ſo ſignal a miracle, aſſured them, thing but the moſt ſurpriſing patience, meekneſs, reſignation, and charity to your worſt enemies, and, in the midſt of the moſt exquiſite racks and tortures, and even with your laſt breath, to pray to heaven for them. You will perhaps aſk, how human nature can be capable of ſuch heroic courage? But remember only your character and reputation, as apoſtles, will riſe or ſink, according as you follow this rule; and then I doubt not, but that will enable you to go through all this, and much more.

Many other ſuch-like directions will occur in the courſe of our race, which I ſhall take care to communicate to you as often as opportunity offers. But one main one I muſt not omit before we ſet about the work: for without this you will be apt, in your preaching or writing the hiſtory of our late maſter, to aggravate every word or action of the Jews againſt him, to exclaim againſt the pretended injuſtice and impiety of the ſanhedrin for condemning him; on the baſeneſs and cowardice of Pilate in ratifying their bloody ſentence; on the cruelty of the Roman ſoldiers for their inhuman treatment of him; and on the obſtinacy and perverſeneſs of the Jews for not believing our report concerning him. And you may think yourſelves intitled to do ſo from the example of the antient prophets, of the baptiſt, and even of our maſter, who made no ſcruple to reprove our nation in the ſevereſt terms.

But I abſolutely forbid all ſuch invectives and aggravations as derogatory to our honour, and to that hitherto unexampled plainneſs and ſimplicity, to which, I inſiſt, every one of you ſhall confine himſelf in the relation of thoſe facts, without betraying the leaſt reſentment, or indeed any other emotion, but what ſhall ſeem to flow from the deepeſt concern, pity, and charity to all the actors in that ſcene. You may perhaps at firſt not be aware of the uſefulneſs and excellency of this caution; but a little experience will ſoon convince you, that nothing will preſerve or raiſe your character more. And now men and brethren, &c.

We ſhall go no further with this ſuppoſed ſcene, becauſe we think it clearly appears by this time, that a man muſt be capable of believing any thing, that can think it poſſible for one, or all, of theſe twelve fiſhermen to concert, much leſs to execute with ſuch ſurprizing ſucceſs and efficacy, a plot and impoſture of ſo black and helliſh a nature, under all thoſe difficulties and diſadvantages.

But here it will perhaps be pretended, that the whole ſtory of the goſpel, acts, &c. was made a long time after, and the characters, facts, and other advantageous circumſtances, feigned at leiſure. But then the queſtion will be, by what miracle, inchantment, or faſcination, they could be introduced into the world, be them, that they had wrought it by no other power than that of Jeſus Chriſt, whom their elders and rulers had through ignorance condemned to the croſs. He concluded with ſuch a powerful diſcourſe, on the danger of an obſtinate and ungrateful unbelief, and on the unſpeakable benefits of a ſpeedy faith and repentance, that five thouſand more were added to them. Thus did the new church of Chriſt daily improve, not in the number only, but in the zeal and fervour, holineſs and charity, of its members; beginning now a kind of heavenly life upon earth, diſclaiming all property, ſelling all they had, and chearfully laying it at the apoſtles feet, to be diſtributed to the relief of their brethren; and being even in their worldly goods, as well as in their hearts and affections, ſo perfectly united, that they became the wonder of the world, even of their very enemies. Thus were the divine oracles fulfilled, the promiſes of Chriſt performed, and his church miraculouſly planted and propagated by that heavenly Spirit; to continue under his direction to the end of the world, maugre all the oppoſitions of Jews and Gentiles [x].

A new miracle adds five thouſand more.

But the malice of the prieſts and rulers did not expire with the death of its divine author. This new and ſignal miracle on the impotent man; the number of converts it drew after it; the zeal, boldneſs, and eloquence of the apoſtles, all contributed to awaken their fears with their wonder, and to put them upon freſh means to ſuppreſs what they called this new and dangerous ſect. The apoſtles and the cripple were brought before them, and Peter, in an elegant ſpeech, aſſured them, that it was by the name and power of their great maſter, now glorioufly inthroned in heaven, that they had wrought this miraculous cure; demonſtrated to them from the ſcriptures, that he was that chief corner-ſtone, which univerſally received, believed, and atteſted by a ſeries of men of all ranks and qualities, by men of learning and probity, who ſealed thoſe truths with their blood? How and in what age or generation, after Chriſt or his apoſtles, theſe things were introduced? a ſucceſſion of prelates, preachers, and martyrs, together with a great number of their pretended writings, the decrees of councils, and other records, each quoting their predeceſſors up to the ſacred writers, foiſted in with the whole concomitant chain of evidence, which has hitherto illuded the attempts of the ſubtileſt enemies of chriſtianity? When, we ſay, the bare poſſibility of ſuch an univerſal impoſition, with all theſe circumſtances, can once be ſhewed, it will be then time enough to turn ſceptics; and if ever that ſhould prove the caſe, where we ſhall ſtop, God alone can tell.

Peter's ſpeech to the ſanhedrin.

[x] Acts iii. 1, & ſeq.

Was

was long ſince foretold to be rejected by the builders [y], and was now become the foundation of the new covenant, ſince there was no name given under heaven, by which men might be ſaved, but that of Jeſus Chriſt, crucified indeed by them, but raiſed again by his own victorious power. The ſanhedrin, having nothing to oppoſe to theſe pregnant proofs, and yet aſhamed to be convinced, and afraid to uſe violent means by reaſon of the admiring multitude, contented themſelves for the preſent with forbidding them to preach any more in that name; to which Peter replied, We have received a contrary command from God, and you may eaſily judge which of the two ought to be obeyed [z].

Peter, upon his return to his collegues, acquainted them with what had paſt, and the orders they had received from the Jewiſh chiefs; upon which they joined unanimouſly in prayer to God, to ſtrengthen their faith, courage, and miraculous power, that they might boldly go on in their miniſtry, and preach his crucified Son in ſpite of all oppoſition and diſcouragements; upon which they felt their upper room violently ſhaken, and their hearts inſpired with ſuch zeal, that neither threatenings nor perſecutions, racks, tortures, or cruel deaths, could put a ſtop, either to their preaching, or to its miraculous ſucceſs: for ſuch it really was, being ſtill attended with ſome freſh miracle (I), which at once confirmed the believers, and ſtill added freſh ones to their number. In the mean while the ſanhedrin, which conſiſted chiefly of Sadducees, finding their endeavours ineffectual, began to think it high time to try ſome ſeverer means; and to that end ordered them to be ſeized, and caſt into a common gaol. But, before the next morning, an angel had opened the priſon-gates to them, and bid them return to their preaching, which they did accordingly. By that time the council was ſet to determine ſomething concerning them, word was brought to them, that the priſoners were eſcaped

His ſecond defence.

[y] Pſ. cxviii. 22. [z] Acts iii, & iv. paſſ.

(I) Theſe miracles, we are told (24), became ſo frequent and known by this time, that they drew multitudes of people from all the neighbouring cities and countries to Jeruſalem, who brought their ſick friends, paralytics, lunaticks, demoniacs, &c. to be healed by the apoſtles. Inſomuch that the very ſhadow of Peter paſſing by cured many of them, who, by reaſon of the throngs that followed him, could not by any other means get acceſs to him.

(24) Acts v. 15, & ſeq.

by ſome miracle; for that on that morning not one of them was to be met with, though the priſon-gates were found cloſely ſhut. Whilſt they were debating about this new prodigy, the news came, that they were preaching as uſual at the temple. Their fears now increaſing with their ſurpriſe, they ſent for them, yet without violence; and Caiaphas, having expoſtulated with them, how they dared tranſgreſs their command, they boldly anſwered for themſelves, that as obedience ceaſed to be due to magiſtrates, as ſoon as it began to contravene that which was due to God, they had ſtrictly followed their duty in preaching the reſurrection of Chriſt, and the remiſſion of ſins through him, and giving the ſame irrefragable proofs of thoſe ſaving truths, which they themſelves had of them [a].

Gamaliel's advice to the Sanhedrin.

THIS noble anſwer, which gave them to underſtand, that they were not to be frighted into a baſe compliance, did raiſe their indignation to ſuch a degree, that they were juſt ready to vent it in ſome ſeverer manner, when Gamaliel (K), one of their members, a perſon of greater coolneſs, and a learned Phariſee, ſtood up, and moderated their reſentment for the preſent, by reminding them, that if this counſel was merely human, it would ſoon be cruſhed, as many others of the like nature, which he named, and they knew had lately been; but if it was of God, it was vain, as well as impious, in them to oppoſe it. Wherefore, concluded he, my opinion is, that we let theſe men alone, and wait the event, leſt we ſhould be found at length to contend with an almighty power. His counſel was readily agreed to, and the apoſtles being called in, after having received a ſevere correction and rebuke for their contumacy, were diſmiſſed, and they joyfully rejoined their collegues [b]. About this time the tetrarch Philip, the brother of Herod, died at Julias, in the thirty ſeventh year of his reign, from the death of Herod the

Year of the Flood, 3037. Of Chriſt, 37.

[a] Ibid. & ch. v. 17, & ſeq. [b] Acts, ibid. ver. 33. ad fin.

(K) This was the perſon at whoſe feet St. Paul had been brought up (25); ſome add alſo Stephen and Barnabas (26); he is affirmed by an antient writer to have been already converted to chriſtianity (27); others pretend, that he was not till after the martyrdom of Stephen. But we have no certainty of any of theſe facts, nor of ſeveral others that are ſaid of him, concerning which the reader may conſult Baſnage in the place laſt quoted.

(25) Ibid. xxii. 3. (26) Vid. Lucian Rev. de S Steph. Baſnag. Hiſt. des Juifs, Tom. 2. l. iv. c 3. (27) Recogn. c. 65, & ſeq.

Great.

Great. He was buried in a magnificent tomb, which he had erected during his life; and, as he left no heirs of his own body, his tetrarchy was resumed by Tiberius, and annexed to the province of Syria, then under the government of Flaccus Pomponius; but with this restriction, that the revenues of that country should still be kept within the limits of it. Josephus tells us, that Philip was of so opposite a disposition to his father or brother, that his government was mild and quiet; that he went always attended with a small number of servants, some of whom carried a chair after him, which served him as his tribunal, to be ready to receive every petition or complaint, and to do justice every-where upon the spot [c].

Seven deacons chosen.

ABOUT the same time, the apostles, at the complaint of some Grecian proselytes, ordained seven deacons from among the number of believers, to be overseers of the ministry in the relief of the necessitous members. We know little of five of them, besides their names, which the reader will find in the margin (L). But Stephen, who is mentioned at the head of the rest, was a man of extraordinary faith, learning, and zeal, and full of the Holy Ghost, who wrought such wonders among the people, that he gave great umbrage to the Jews. He had confuted several of the heads of them in their respective synagogues [d], concerning their notion of the perpetuity of the Mosaic law, for which he was accused before the sanhedrin. Here the high-priest having given him leave

[c] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 6. [d] Acts vi. 9, & seq.

(L) These were Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, and Nicolas; this last is there called a proselyte of Antioch. The rest being also all Greek names, shews them to have been Hellenists, and that this new order was made in favour of the converts from them.

Some have affirmed this last to have been the author of the beastly Nicolaitan sect, that sprung up in the earliest age of the church (28); others have strenuously vindicated him from it (29). We can gather nothing certain concerning it. Philip is probably the same who converted the Samaritans (30), baptized the eunuch of queen Candace (31), and had four daughters endowed with the gift of prophecy (32). As for the other five, we know no more of them, than what has been mentioned above.

(28) Vid. Epiphan hæres. 25, & not. Coteler. (29) Clem. Alexandr. Stromat. l. iii. Eusеb. Theodoret. August & al. (30) Acts viii. 5, & seq. (31) Ibid. ver. 26, ad fin. (32) Ibid. xxi. 9, & seq.

(L)

to ſpeak for himſelf, he began his defence, with an hiſtorical deduction of the true worſhip of God, excluſive of the Moſaic rites; which laſt he ſhewed by authentic proofs were to be done away, to make room for a more ſpiritual religion under the promiſed Meſſiah. This ſpeech was accompanied with ſuch powerful eloquence, angelic majeſty, and with ſuch a ſevere reproof for their conſtant reſiſting the Holy Ghoſt, and perſecuting thoſe who delivered his divine oracles to them, that not being longer able to bear what they called his blaſphemy, they condemned him to death, and hurried him, as was uſual in ſuch caſes, out of the city; where the witneſſes, who were to throw the firſt ſtones, laid their upper garments at the feet of young Saul, then a zealous Phariſee and enemy to chriſtianity, but ſince the great apoſtle of the Gentiles; and having, according to the Moſaic law, laid their hands on the condemned perſon, overwhelmed him with ſtones, whilſt he called on God to forgive them his death, and on Jeſus to receive his departing ſoul [e]. Authors are not agreed about the exact year of his death, but moſt of them, after Uſher, Pearſon, and others, place it about this time, that is, about a year after that of his divine maſter.

Stephen ſtoned.

The chriſtians perſecuted.

THE death of this glorious protomartyr was ſoon followed by a more grievous perſecution againſt the chriſtian converts, which yet the divine providence turned into a means of propagating the goſpel far and wide, by the diſperſion of a great number of them, who, after Stephen's death, left Jeruſalem and Judæa, according to our Saviour's advice, When you are perſecuted in one city, flee into another [f]. So that few but the apoſtles ſtayed at Jeruſalem, whilſt the reſt went and preached, ſome at Samaria, ſome at Cyprus, and others elſewhere; but ſtill among the Jews, for the time for the converſion of the Gentiles was not yet come. One of the chief inſtruments of this new perſecution was the young Saul, mentioned a little higher, who obſerving with what zeal the ſanhedrin endeavoured to cruſh the growing church, got a commiſſion from them to ſeize, bind, and impriſon all its members where-ever he met them; purſuant to which, he made a terrible havock of them, without regard to quality, age, or ſex, till being himſelf miraculouſly converted in the midſt of his bloody career, as he was going to Damaſcus, he became as zealous a promoter of it [g]. During this perſecution, [e] Ibid. vii. per tot. [f] Matth. x. 23. [g] Vid. Act. viii, ix, & ſeq.

Samaria

Samaria having received the gospel by the preaching of Philip, and Simon Magus, who had formerly bewildered them with his sorceries, being himself become a convert, the apostolic college at Jerusalem deputed thither Peter and John, who being come, imparted the Holy Ghost unto them by their prayer and imposition of hands. Simon, observing the wonderful efficacy of this last ceremony, would have purchased the same power of the apostles at a large sum; for which profane proposal Peter sharply rebuked him [h], and after-ages have branded his memory, by giving that new and unheard-of sin the name of Simony.

The Samaritans converted.

ABOUT the beginning of the next year, L. Vitellius, being sent by Tiberius proconsul of Syria, came to Jerusalem about the feast of the passover, where he was honourably received by the magistrates of that metropolis, in requital of which he remitted to its inhabitants the whole duty of the fruits that were set to sale. He likewise put all the pontifical habits, which used to be kept in the fortress of Antonia under the custody of a Roman officer, into the possession of the Jewish high-priest, to be thenceforth kept and disposed of at their pleasure; after which, having deposed Caiaphas from the pontifical chair, and raised Jonathan the son of Annas or Ananus to that dignity, he departed for Antioch, his capital [i]. Soon after this a tumult happened at Samaria, in which Pilate acted with such arbitrariness and cruelty, that it proved a main step to his ruin. There had appeared there a certain impostor, some think the Simon lately mentioned, who persuaded the Samaritans, that if they would repair to their sacred mount Gerizim, for such they held it above all mountains, as we have often seen in this chapter, he would direct them to the sacred vessels, which Moses had formerly buried there. The credulous people came in shoals armed to him, and encamped before a village called Tirathaba, waiting for others to join them there, till they could make a sufficient body to go up and take possession of the pretended holy treasure. Pilate, who had timely notice of it, sent a strong body of horse and foot, who attacked them with such fury, that they killed a great number of those deluded wretches, took many of them prisoners, and dispersed the rest; after which he ordered those of the best rank and quality to be beheaded without mercy or delay. The Samaritans had immediately recourse to Vitellius, and complained Vitellius's kindness to the Jews.

[h] Ibid. viii. 14, & seq.

[i] Conf. JOSEPH. antiq. l. xv. 14. & xviii 6.

of

of the maſſacre done among them, aſſuring him at the ſame time, that their aſſembling in arms was not with a ſeditious view, but to ſecure themſelves from the intolerable oppreſſions of the Jewiſh governor. Vitellius, who was well acquainted with his cruel and rapacious character; upon this complaint diſpatched his friend Marcellus to take the government of Judæa upon him, and ſent orders to Pilate to repair immediately to Rome, there to anſwer the Samaritans accuſation before Cæſar's tribunal. Pilate was forced to obey, but, being detained by contrary winds, Tiberius was dead before he could reach Rome. This depoſition, which was but the fore-runner of much greater evils to that cruel oppreſſor, happened in the tenth year of his tyrannic government[k] (M).

During

[k] Antiq. ibid. c. 5.

(M) The acts of Pilate have made ſo much noiſe among the learned, that it will doubtleſs be expected we ſhould give our Engliſh readers ſome idea of them, ſince they are ſo confidently quoted by a great number of antient fathers (33), and have been as ſtrenuouſly oppoſed or defended by learned moderns (34). It ſeems indeed very probable, that every governor of a province of the Roman empire was obliged to ſend an account, at leaſt, of the moſt material tranſactions that happened in his time; and if ſo, the crucifixion of a perſon of the Meſſiah's character, through the tumultuous malice of the Jews, and contrary to Pilate's own inclination, was of too ſignal a nature not to be tranſmitted to Rome by him, though but to diſculpate himſelf of that unjuſt deed, and to throw all the odium of it on the ſanhedrin

It is true, thoſe acts that have been tranſmitted to us vary in many particulars, according to the ſeveral hands they have paſſed through; and ſome of them carry ſuch a face of forgery, that they cannot be reaſonably ſuppoſed the ſame with thoſe which thoſe antient writters ſpeak ſo poſitively of, and have given us ſuch ſeemingly authentic fragments of. So that to conclude them all to be forged by ſome pious zealots, is to carry ſcepticiſm beyond its due bounds. For who can think that men of ſuch ſenſe, learning, and integrity, as the apologiſts were, ſhould dare to appeal to thoſe records in favour of the perſecuted chriſtians, which, if once found to be forged, muſt have done their cauſe the greateſt prejudice? How could

(33) De his vid. Juſt. Mart Apol. 2. Tertul. Apolog. 5. Euſeb. Eccl. Hiſt. l. ii c. ii. Oroſ l. vii. c. 4. Chryſoſt. Epiphan. hær. 50. Greg. Turon & al mult (34) Vid int. al. Caſaub. Exercit. 16 Baron. annal. Fabric. apocryph. N. T. & al. ab eo citat

they

DURING theſe tranſactions in Judæa, Herod had been carrying on his unſucceſsful war againſt Aretas, of which we have they ſpeak of them, not only as of things commonly known and acknowledged, but with the ſame confidence, and ſeeming exactneſs. as if they had ſeen them, conſulted, and copied them out of their archives? Is it not more reaſonable to believe, that there were ſuch records, though ſadly blended and corrupted in thoſe after-ages, which, through the baſeneſs of arch heretics, and the blind zeal of others, produced ſuch numbers of other apocryphal writings? Euſebius tells us, that even the Pagans did, in the beginning of the fourth century, trump up a new account of the acta Pilati (35), doubtleſs to oppoſe to thoſe cited by Juſtin and Tertullian in the foregoing one. Another mongrel ſect, called Quatuordecimans, had likewiſe a ſet of them quite different from the reſt, and from which, Epiphanius tells us (36), they defended ſome of their tenets. And where is the wonder that records of ſuch important nature ſhould be corrupted and altered, by deſigning men, ſo long after? Is it not rather a greater one, that thoſe of the two apologiſts above-mentioned, who wrote as if they had had the authentic copies of the true ones before their eyes, ſhould have been preſerved to us? We ſhall now give our readers the ſubſtance of them in as few words as we can.

Pilate to Tiberius, &c.

" I have been forced to conſent at length to the crucifixion of " Jeſus Chriſt, to prevent a tumult from the Jews; though it was " very much againſt my will. For the world never ſaw, nor pro- " bably will, a man of ſuch extraordinary piety and uprightneſs. " But the high prieſt and ſanhedrin fulfilled in it the oracles of " their prophets, and of our ſybils. Whilſt he hung on the croſs, " a horrid darkneſs, which covered the earth, ſeemed to threaten " its final end. His diſciples, who pretend to have ſeen him riſe " from the dead, and aſcend into heaven, and acknowledge him " for their God (37), do ſtill ſubſiſt; and by their excellent lives " ſhew themſelves the worthy diſciples of ſo extraordinary a maſ- " ter. I did what I could to ſave him from the malice of the Jews; " but the fear of a total inſurrection made me ſacrifice him to the " intereſt and peace of your empire, &c.

There is nothing in all this that can appear inconſiſtent with the character of ſuch a governor as Pilate was, if we except his ſaying there, that Chriſt's death had been foretold by the prophets and ſybils; and Joſephus of Arimathea, when he went to beg his body, might in all likelihood inform him of the one, and the other he might either know, or be told by ſome of his own people. As for have already ſpoken; and Tiberius, vexed at the ſucceſs of the latter, had ſent expreſs orders to Vitellius to invade his country, and either to take him priſoner, or ſend his head to Rome. Vitellius, in his march into Arabia, deſigned to have paſſed through Judæa, but was happily diverted from it by the Jewiſh heads, on account of the Roman ſtandards. Upon this condeſcenſion Herod and he came to Jeruſalem, where they were highly honoured, and offered the uſual ſacrifices, and removed Jonathan from the prieſthood to give it to his brother Theophilus [l]. Here they received the news of Tiberius's death, and of the inſtallation of the emperor Caius, of which a fuller account ſhall be given in its proper place; and Vitellius ſtayed to receive the oath of fidelity from the people to the new emperor. Jeruſalem was the firſt eaſtern city, it ſeems, that heard the news of his ſucceſſion, and offered up ſacrifices for him [m]. By this time Artabanes having ſucceeded Aretas in Arabia, Vitellius went and made an alliance with him near the Euphrates, where Herod gave them a magnificent entertainment under a ſtately pavilion, which he had reared for that purpoſe near the banks of that river. The Roman general ſent immediately an account of this tranſaction to the emperor, and was ſurpriſed to find by his anſwer, that Herod had been beforehand with him, and had acquaint-the reſt, the fear he was in of being called to an account for his unjuſt ſentence, might make him the more diligent in ſending ſuch a favourable relation of the tranſaction, as might beſt prejudice that tickliſh emperor in his favour Some apocryphal writings tell us, that he was forced to do it in his juſtification; and that Tiberius, who had long lingered under a decay, which eluded the ſkill of his phyſicians, had been adviſed to ſend for Jeſus from Judæa, to cure him by his miraculous power. They add, that when he received this account from Pilate, he not only highly reſented it from him, but much more from the Jewiſh ſanhedrin, whoſe court he ordered the former to demoliſh, that, being the only place where they were allowed to ſit in council, they might never more pronounce another ſentence from it. But this ſtory we would be far from putting on the level with the acts of Pilate in point of evidence. As for that prætor, there is no record what became of him after his being ſent to Rome. Only an antient tradition, ſupported by ſome ſeeming authentic monuments, ſays, that he was baniſhed to Vienne in Dauphine, where his miſery forced him to kill himſelf with his own ſword.

(35) Ubi ſupra, l. ix c. 4. (36) Hæreſ. 50. (37) Theſe laſt particulars are only in Tertullian and Euſeb. ubi ſupra.

[l] Antiq. ibid. c. 8. Vid. & DIO, l. lix. [m] Vid. PHILO. legat. ad Caium.

ed

ed him with all the particulars of it; for which he bore him a mortal grudge ever after [n].

ALL this while the christian church increased to a surprising degree, not only in Judæa, but in all other parts of the world; to which the apostles themselves, after having left James the Less bishop of that of Jerusalem (N), dispersed themselves, [n] JOSEPH. & DIO, ubi supra.

(N) When this choice or installation was made, whether immediately after the descent of the Holy Ghost, or after the death of the protomartyr, or in any intermediate space between, is not easy to guess; and that he was made bishop of Jerusalem, and that this metropolis was made the first christian see, we have not from any sacred writers, but from the fathers (38) and antient tradition; and both add, that he wore a golden plate on his forehead, probably in imitation of the Jewish high priest †. It is supposed, that both St. Peter and the two sons of Zebedee gave him the preference of being the first bishop, on account of his being so nearly related to Christ. For he was the son of Cleophas or Alpheus, the brother of the blessed virgin, from whom he was therefore his first cousin, and hence called his brother, according to the Hebrew custom (39).

This his preference is further confirmed by his being mentioned by the apostle before Peter and John, who are there called the two other pillars of the church (40), and especially by his sitting as president at the first council at Jerusalem, when the question about the circumcision of the heathen converts was condemned (41). For there Peter having opened the point to the assembly, and Paul and Barnabas related the main particular of their conversion, James stood up and summed up the whole debate; and having delivered his own opinion, and backed it with scripture authority, he gave the definitive sentence, which was assented to by the rest (42)

The fathers above-mentioned speak very much of his great sanctity, mortified life, miracles, &c. for which he was surnamed by Jews as well as christians, The Just. They add, that he had also that of Obliah or Ophliah given him, which signifies the fortress of God; and that he was even allowed to enter into that part of the temple which was only permitted to the priests, though he was not of that order, and that the people crouded about him to kiss the hem of his garment (43).

Baronius quotes a story out the Talmud (44), that a Jew named Eleazar, having been bit by a venemous serpent, James was sent for to cure him in the name of Jesus the son of the carpenter, which was strenuously opposed by a Jewish rabbi there present;

(38) Clem Alexand Hegesip. ap Euseb. Eccl hist l. ii c 1. Epiphan hæres 29. & 78 † De quo vid Vol III p 238. &c. (39) Vide Galat i 19. Joseph antiq l xx. c 8 (40) Galat. ii. 9. (41) Acts xv 4, & seq (42) Ibid. ver. 13. & seq. Vid. & Lesley's case stated. (43) Vid. Hieron. in Galat. i. (44) Annal. an. 63.

themſelves, either about, or ſoon after, this time. It is out of our province, not only to follow them out of Judæa, but even to enter into many tranſactions of theirs within it, which have no concern with the Jewiſh hiſtory we are upon. Such as their councils held at Jeruſalem, their converts, miracles, ordination of biſhops, and many more of that kind; which regarding only the firſt propagation and planting of the chriſtian church, we ſhall refer our readers for them to thoſe chriſtian annaliſts, hiſtorians, and other authors, who have wrote on the ſubject, and which are too numerous and too well known to need being mentioned in the margin.

THAT we may therefore reſume and finiſh our hiſtory without any further digreſſion, we ſhall conclude what relates to the chriſtian church with the miraculous converſion of Cornelius the Roman centurion, the firſt-fruits of that of the Gentile world; becauſe it is there, that we formerly fixed the final departure of the poor remains of the Jewiſh ſceptre or and that whilſt they were debating about the lawfulneſs of the cure, the venom grew to ſuch a head, that the patient died; upon which the ſtiff necked rabbi congratulated him for dying without breaking the rules of the Jewiſh doctors.

Some apocryphal writings were attributed to St. James, but were condemned by the church, which receives none but the epiſtle that bears his name, and which he is ſuppoſed to have written a little before his death, which happened about the year of Chriſt 62; when his great ſanctity having rendered him obnoxious to Ananus, the ſon of Annas the high prieſt mentioned in the goſpel, he drew him into the following ſnare. He ſent for him to declare unto the miſtaken people what they ought to think of Jeſus concerning whom they had, he pretended, conceived ſome wrong notion. For the better conveniency of his being heard, he was placed in ſome gallery, or high balcony, of the temple, where the people from below inquired of him concerning the crucified Jeſus, to which the good old biſhop anſwered, That Jeſus, whom you crucified, ſits now at the right hand of God.

As the populace below were of the Jewiſh leaven, the prieſts and Phariſees that headed them expected them to have broke out into invectives and blaſphemies, inſtead of which they all broke out into Hozannahs to him; upon which the chiefs cried out, The Juſt, alluding to his ſurname, is alſo in the deluſion, and ordered him to be thrown headlong down. His fall not having made an end of him, they fell a covering him with ſtones, whilſt he prayed to God for them, for which one of them came and knocked his brains out with a club (45).

(45) Euſeb. ubi ſupra, l. ii. c. 23.

power.

power †. We there obſerved, after the learned Mr. Mede, that the words of Jacob might, and by the event ought to be read, The ſceptre ſhall not depart, &c. till Shiloh come, and to him the nations be gathered; which could not therefore be totally removed, till this promiſed converſion of the Gentiles was in ſome meaſure accompliſhed. It had indeed began to dwindle long before, but there were ſtill ſome remains left; they were ſtill governed by their own laws, their ſanhedrin had ſtill a great power, even of life and death, as we obſerved in the caſe of St. Stephen. The reader may ſee ſome further tokens of it in the margin (O). But from this time it was ſo

† See Vol. II. p. 441, note (G)

(O) We have a pregnant inſtance of this in the aſſault which was made on St. Paul in the temple (36), where he was ſeized, and was going to be carried before the high-prieſt, but was reſcued by Claudius Lyſias, the commanding officer of that place. This is the firſt inſtance we meet with of the Romans interfering in a caſe of this nature; and accordingly, when the priſoner was brought before the governor, Tertullus, the Jewiſh orator, complained of the violence done to them in theſe words (37): We found this peſtilent fellow, meaning Paul, raiſing ſedition through the world, a ring leader of the Nazarite ſect, who went alſo to profane our temple; whom we therefore laid ho'd on, and would have judged according to our law. But the chief captain Lyſias came, and by main violence reſcued him from our hands, &c.

What judgment they deſigned to have paſſed upon him, is eaſy to know, both by what the people cried out when he made his defence (38), and by the accuſation they brought againſt him, ſedition and ſacrilege; for ſuch they deemed the profanation of the temple, which was made capital by their law. Accordingly, we have taken notice in a former ſection of certain inſcriptions faſtened to certain pillars of the building, forbidding all ſtrangers, and polluted Iſraelites, to enter beyond the court of the Gentiles, under pain of death †. It may be likewiſe gathered from the judgment which Feſtus, Agrippa, and others made of him, that he had done nothing worthy of death (39); by the reaſon which Feſtus gave for not delivering him into their hands; It is not the cuſtom, ſaid he, for the Romans to deliver a man to die, before, &c. (40); and by the Jews laying in wait to kill him by ſtratagem, ſince they could not get it done in a judicial way.

All this ſeems further confirmed to us by his appeal to Cæſar. He knew the crime alledged againſt him to be capital, and chiefly (36) Acts xxi. 27, & ſeq. (37) Ibid xxiv 5, & ſeq.

(38) Ibid. xxii. 22, 23. † Vid. ſup. p. 183, ſub not. (B).
(39) xxvi. 31. (40) Ibid. xxv 16.

of

ſo curtailed and reduced, that no footſtep was to be ſeen of it, even before the laſt ſiege of Jeruſalem, which was to give the finiſhing ſtroke to that and ſeveral noble prophecies. As this converſion of the Roman centurion was to uſher in a new and ſingular epoch, it is no wonder, it was accompanied with ſuch remarkable and miraculous circumſtances. Of this ſort were the extraordinary piety and charity in that new proſelyte, and the viſion that appeared to him, and directed him where to ſend for Peter, who was to preach Chriſt to him; the ſurprizing viſion, which that apoſtle had about the ſame time; the explanation and the command which he received from the Spirit; the great readineſs with which Cornelius and his company received the word preached; and their

of a religious nature; and yet refuſes to be tried by the ſanhedrin, and affirms that he ought not to be judged by any other tribunal than that of Cæſar. Doth not this imply that the power of life and death, even in religious caſes, was by this time taken away? Doth not the defence he made there before Feſtus (41) ſeem to amount to this? Though the new governor, out of a deſire to ingratiate himſelf to the Jews, offers to make them judges of my cauſe; and if they ſhould condemn me, has ſtill the power to put a negative upon their ſentence; yet, for as much as all capital caſes are now to be tried only before Cæſar's tribunal, I appeal to that, and proteſt againſt his complaiſance to them as contrary to the preſent law.

Upon the whole we have an inſtance of the ſanhedrin's trying, condemning, and executing Stephen by their own authority about a year after Chriſt. Twenty ſix years after they endeavoured to do the ſame by St. Paul, and were prevented by the Roman captain. Being hindered from doing it by their own authority, they endeavoured to prevail firſt upon the old, next upon the new governor, to conſent to his being put to death, and are refuſed by both, unleſs after a fair trial and conviction at the Roman tribunal. At length they found means to perſuade the new one to recede in ſome meaſure from his prerogative, and let them try the pretended criminal themſelves; and this laſt proteſts againſt it, and appeals to Cæſar as the only tribunal where he can be lawfully tried What can this argue, but that, between the death of St. Stephen and the tryal of St Paul, the Jews had loſt all their power of trying criminal cauſes; and ſince this inſtance of the latter is the firſt we meet with, of their being diveſted of that power, about twenty years after the converſion of Cornelius; ſeems it not to follow, that the Jewiſh ſcepire was not totally departed till after the Gentiles had been gathered to that of the Shiloh there propheſied?

(41) Acts xxv. 9, & ſeq.

being

being endowed with the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, even before their baptiſm. All which are ſo well known, that we ſhall not dwell longer upon them; but only obſerve, that there was a further neceſſity of ſome ſuch extraordinary and miraculous circumſtances, to determine Peter and ſatisfy the reſt of the apoſtles and Jewiſh converts; ſince it plainly appears, that notwithſtanding Chriſt's repeated commiſſion to them to convert all nations, yet they ſo little dreamed of the heathen being to be brought into his fold, that the former would never have gone to proſelyte this or any other heathen, nor the reſt have been pacified for his ſo doing, if theſe remarkable occurrences had not reminded them, that a happy entrance was to be thereby opened to the reſt of the Gentile world [o].

WE return now to the Jews, who, ſoon after the death of Tiberius, received a new governor from Rome, named Marullus, inſtead of Pontius Pilate, or rather of Marcellus, to whom the care of Judæa had been committed after his depoſition. At the ſame time Caius Caligula gave his old friend Agrippa, the ſon of Ariſtobulus and grandſon of Herod the Great, of whom we have formerly ſpoken *, the tetrarchy of his late uncle Philip, and added to it that of Abylene in Syria, which had formerly belonged to Lyſanias. Agrippa, whom St. Luke calls by the common name of Herod [p], had been brought up at Rome with Druſus the ſon of Tiberius, and by his extreme generoſity, or rather profuſeneſs, had gained himſelf many friends at court; but they were of the courtly mould. For after Druſus's death, the emperor having removed all the friends of that young prince from him, leſt they ſhould revive the memory of his ſon, Agrippa found himſelf reduced to the greateſt extremities, indebted over head and ears, pennyleſs, and almoſt friendleſs. In this condition he came into Judæa, and ſhut himſelf up in a caſtle in Idumæa, reſolved through ſhame, vexation, and miſery, to ſtarve himſelf to death. His wife Cyprus, the daughter of Phaſael, did what ſhe could to aſſiſt him, writ to his ſiſter in his behalf; and theſe two furniſhed him with ſome preſent ſubſiſtence, but all too little for a prince of his extravagant temper. To this Herod, Herodias's huſband, added ſome further favours to him, made him a magiſtrate of Tiberias, and aſſiſted him with ſome ſmall ſums. But this kindneſs was ſoon at an end, and Herod having one day upbraided him with it at ſome banquet,

[o] De. hoc vid. Act. x. & xi. paſſ & alib

* See before, ſect. v. p. 197, in fin. not.

[p] Act. xii. 1, & ſeq.

Agrippa,

Agrippa, who could not brook the affront, retired to Flaccus, governor of Syria, where he had not ſtayed long before he diſobliged him, and was forced to retire again into Italy. After many other rubs and misfortunes, which the reader may ſee in Joſephus [q], he was at length, through the ill offices of one of his freedmen, thrown into priſon, and loaded with chains, by Tiberius. He continued in this miſerable condition till that prince's death, when Caius, with whom he had formerly contracted an intimate friendſhip, ſent for him from his priſon to his own palace, arrayed him in purple, exchanged his iron chain for one of gold of the ſame weight, put a diadem on his head, and gave him the two tetrarchies above-mentioned, with the title of king. Agrippa did not, however, come immediately into his new dominions, but continued about a year longer at Rome with the new emperor. He obtained at length leave of him to come and viſit his Jewiſh territories, and to ſet things in the beſt order, and took Egypt in his way. He embarked at Puteoli at the end of July, and came a few days after in ſight of Alexandria. The magnificence of his entry into that city, though he choſe to make it in the night to avoid its being too much obſerved, drew the envy of the Alexandrians, who could not behold this new upſtart Jewiſh king in ſuch ſplendor, without offering ſeveral indignities to him, though at a diſtance (P); and Flaccus their governor, who was no lover of the Jews, not only winked at it, but beheld it with a ſecret pleaſure. He was likewiſe there informed of the indirect means which Flaccus had taken to render the Jewiſh nation odious to the emperor. All which made him willing to leave the place as ſoon as poſſible. The great oppreſſions, perſecutions, and horrid butcheries, which the Alexandrian Jews ſuffered from this baſe governor, for refuſing to worſhip the new made emperor, and his behaviour to the embaſſadors, ſent to him to repreſent their loyalty in all other caſes that were conſiſtent with their law, are out of Agrippa raiſed by Caius.

Year of the flood, 3037. Of Chriſt, $\frac{4}{37}$.

Jews perſecuted at Alexandria.

[q] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 7.

(P) One of them was the ſetting up a poor fooliſh fellow that uſed to go naked about the ſtreets, dreſſing him in a kind of mock royalty, and making him ride through the great places of the city, with a tattered life-guard like himſelf, and huzzaing of him with the word Maris, which means the ſame as, God bleſs the king; whilſt others came to preſent their petitions, demanded juſtice &c. and expoſed his royalty to the moſt audacious ridicule (42).

(42) Philo in Flaccum. Joſeph. antiq. l. xviii c. 8.

our province; the reader may see a full account of it in Philo above-mentioned [r]; and we shall see by-and-by, that those of Judæa were like to have suffered as much from him, though they had such a powerful advocate as king Agrippa to intercede for them, had not Caius's death put a happy period to his impious project of being acknowledged as a deity.

WHILST these horrid cruelties were acting at Alexandria, Flaccus's Agrippa, who had left that city to get into his new kingdom, took care to acquaint the emperor with them, who dispatched Bassus immediately to seize that bloody governor, and bring him to Rome, where he was stripped of all his riches, banished into an island of the Archipelago, and at length put to death there. Cruelties punished.

IN the mean time Herod Antipas, who had formerly treated Agrippa with such contempt, could not now behold his glory and his being in such favour with Caligula without the deepest envy. His wife, a haughty woman, could not brook that he should be contented with the bare title of tetrarch, whilst her brother was now raised to that of a king; and did not cease teazing him, till she made him take a journey to Rome to obtain the same title from the emperor. She even accompanied him thither, in hopes that her presence would greatly influence that monarch; but Agrippa, who was timely acquainted with their ambitious designs, had taken care to send thither one of his freedmen, named Fortunatus, to accuse Herod with having had a hand in Sejanus's late conspiracy, and, as a proof of it, to mention the arsenals which he had filled with arms, sufficient to furnish seventy thousand men. As soon therefore as Herod was entered into the presence, and had paid his respects to the emperor, Fortunatus presented him with Agrippa's letter. Caius having read it, asked Herod whether he had really such a great reserve of arms? He was forced to confess it; upon which he was stripped of his tetrarchy, and sent into banishment to Lyons in France. Caius understanding, however, that Herodias was Agrippa's sister, he offered to pardon her, and to procure her the payment of all the sums she had lent her brother; but she refused his generosity; and since she had been the cause of her husband's disgrace, she chose to accompany him, and to share the same fate with him (Q); upon which Herod Antipas's ambition.

Accused to Caius.

Banished

[r] In Flaccum.

(Q) Josephus tells us elsewhere, that he was banished into Spain (43), and that he died there; so that he must either have which Caius gave both his tetrarchy and all his treasure to Agrippa, after Herod had enjoyed the former forty three years [f].

(43) Bell. Jud l. ii c. 16.

A new storm raised against the Jews. Year of the Flood, 3038. Of Christ, 43. 40.

In the mean time, Caius, having taken it into his head to cause his statue to be set up in the very sanctuary of the temple, sent orders to Petronius, then governor of Syria, to see it executed, and to have a number of troops ready to prevent any obstruction from the Jews. Petronius, who knew the zeal of these, as well as the impetuosity of his master, could not set about such a command without some dread; and to gain time, sent for the best statuaries and materials from distant parts, whilst he gathered his army into the neighbourhood of Ptolemais. This last action having alarmed the nation, he was forced to tell them the orders he had received; upon which he was addressed by all the heads of the Jews, who in the humblest manner assured him, that they would sooner hazard the loss of all that was dear to them, even their lives, than suffer their temple to be thus profaned. The governor strove to bring them into a compliance, by reminding them of the danger of their opposing, or of his not obeying the emperor's command, and that their resistance would be interpreted as a downright rebellion. They answered him, that the prayers and sacrifices they offered daily for the emperor were a sufficient token of their loyalty. However, added they, we are so far from designing to rise up in arms upon this occasion, that we will suffer ourselves to be butchered in the most cruel manner; and this will be all the resistance you will meet with from us, if you go on with your design.

Agrippa intercedes for them.

Soon after this, Aristobulus the brother of Agrippa, accompanied with some of the royal family, came to Petronius, and begged, that they might have leave to try to mollify the emperor by an embassy, and that he would second it with a letter to that monarch in their behalf. Petronius at length consented to write to the emperor, but forbad them to send any embassy, or let their reluctance be so much as suspected at the Roman court. He wrote accordingly to the emperor, that he had met with difficulties in the execution fled thither afterwards, or, which is more likely, he was sent thither from Lyons, when Caius and Agrippa came to this last place, and made some stay in it. This was the Herod before whom Christ was brought before his death.

[f] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 9. Vid. & Dio, lib. lix. Philo. ubi supra.

of

of his orders, through want of proper hands; and that the ſtatue, which he deſigned ſhould be a maſter-piece of its kind, was not yet reared, becauſe he feared leſt the taking ſo many men from their other labours, ſhould bring a ſcarcity in the land, lower the tribute, and ſuch other reaſons, which, inſtead of appeaſing, greatly exaſperated the emperor. He was juſt reading the letter, and in the height of his reſentment, when king Agrippa, who was then at Rome, came into his preſence. He was greatly ſurprized to ſee ſuch a mixture of paſſions in his looks and geſtures, and began to fear he had either offended, or been in ſome way miſrepreſented to him; when Caius, who eaſily obſerved his diſorder, broke the ſecret to him in words to this effect: Your Jewiſh ſubjects are ſtrange creatures to refuſe to acknowledge me for a god, and to provoke my reſentment againſt them; I had commanded the ſtatue of Jupiter to be ſet up in their temple, and they have, it ſeems, oppoſed it, and raiſed a kind of univerſal inſurrection.

Obtains his ſuit.

AT theſe words Agrippa, like one thunder-ſtruck, after having in vain tried to keep himſelf up, fell into a ſwoon, and was carried off into his own palace, where he continued in that condition till the third day, when having taken a little ſuſtenance, he ſet himſelf about writing to the emperor the letter which the reader may ſee at full length in Joſephus [t], and the ſubſtance of it in the margin (R). Caius, inſtead of being

[t] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 11. Vid. & legat. ad Caium.

(R) He began with juſtifying the love he had expreſſed for his own country in their laſt interview, and to which he was bound, not only by the law of nature, but even by thoſe of his own religion, he being deſcended from a race of ſuch noble anceſtors, as had during a long ſeries of ſucceſſions enjoyed the regal and pontifical dignity; for ſo he really was by his grand-mother Mariamne, the beloved wife of Herod the Great, who was of the race of the Aſhmonean princes, as we have often hinted in ſome former ſections.

He went on with acquainting him, that he choſe to intercede for his own nation in writing, rather than by word of mouth, as he thought it the moſt reſpectful way of the two; and that the many ſignal favours he had received from him, gave him grounds to hope, that he ſhould now obtain a favour, which would coſt him nothing, but would be eſteemed by the Jews as the greateſt he could beſtow on them: That Jeruſalem could not but be thought worthy of his regard, ſince it was the firſt city of the eaſt, which had proclaimed him emperor, and offered up ſacrifices for him: That as to the temple of that metropolis, it had been highly reverenced by being moved at the king's concern, was rather the more exasperated againſt the Jews, and againſt him, for his concern for ſuch an ungrateful race, as he called them; whom all his favours could not work into a compliance to his will. However, he began to relent when he read the letter, and Agrippa, who drew a good omen even from his not anſwering it, took the liberty to invite him to a ſumptuous entertainment, which Caius, who really loved him, eaſily accepted. Here the Jewiſh king, having well warmed his gueſt with wine, began to extol the great and ſignal favours he had heaped upon him; and, by his large encomiums and expreſſions of gratitude, found means to get a freſh promiſe of whatever he ſhould aſk. To this Agrippa anſwered, Since it is your pleaſure to add this new favour to all the reſt, I will beg for ſuch a one as will at once be an irrefragable proof of your goodneſs to me, and draw a plenty of heavenly bleſſings upon your head; and that is, that you will ſet aſide your reſolution of ſetting up the ſtatue in the temple of Jeruſalem. This petition, which ſhewed not only the greateſt diſintereſtedneſs, but alſo the moſt unfeigned love for his country and religion, even at the hazard of his life, had ſuch an effect on that emperor, that he wrote immediately to his governor, that if his ſtatue was not already ſet up, he ſhould forbear doing it; adding, that he had altered his deſign out of friendſhip to Agrippa. However, the lightneſs of his temper ſoon made him repent of his complaiſance to him; ſo that he deſigned to have made a ſecond attempt, unknown to him. At the ſame time his reſentment againſt Petronius being kindled afreſh, he ſent him an order to diſpatch himſelf; but Caius was Auguſtus, Tiberius, and many others of his anceſtors, for whoſe memory he profeſſed a ſingular honour, and whoſe pious conduct, he hoped, he would imitate upon this occaſion: That as to himſelf, the greateſt favours he had heaped upon him would only increaſe his unhappineſs, if he did not think fit to grant him this laſt: That it was impoſſible for him to outlive the profanation of that ſacred place, and the diſgrace and ruin of his nation.

He concluded with reminding him, that he ſhould be juſtly eſteemed a traitor to both, if he ſhould be wanting in uſing his utmoſt intereſt at this juncture, and that the world would not fail to think him diſcarded of his imperial favour, if he did not ſucceed in a petition of this nature. This long and pathetic letter was immediately ſealed, and ſent to the emperor; and Agrippa waited with the utmoſt impatience for an anſwer, but in vain; Caius, though mollified by it, not vouchſafing to take the leaſt notice of it to him.

aſſaſſinated

assassinated time enough to prevent either mischief taking effect [u] (S).

Agrippa, who was still at Rome, did not a little contribute to the succession of Claudius (T); in consideration of which, this last confirmed to him all Caligula's grants, gave him Judæa, Samaria, and the southern parts of Idumea, entered into a solemn alliance with him, and made several edicts in favour of the Jews. At his request he gave likewise the kingdom of Chalcis to his brother Herod, who was also his son-in-law; Agrippa had the honours of the consulship, and Herod those of the prætorship, conferred upon them; both were intitled to enter into the senate, and to pay their compliments to the emperor in Greek, which was usually done in Latin [w]. All these grants were engraven on copper, and set up in the capitol; thus was Agrippa raised to the height of glory, his territories extended to the furthest limits of his grandfather Herod the Great, and his power and credit with the senate even much greater than his, when at the highest pitch.

Agrippa's policy at Rome.

Claudius's friendship to him.

[u] Antiq. ubi supra. SUETON. in Caligul. [w] Antiq. l. xix. c. 3, & 4. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 18. DIO, lib. lx.

(S) During this interval, besides the raging persecution in Alexandria, there happened some others in other places, and upon other accounts, particularly in Mesopotamia and Babylon. But we chuse to refer our readers for them to Josephus (44), rather than swell this history with things that happened out of Palestine.

It will be sufficient to observe here, that as the Jews in other parts withstood the preaching of the gospel, where-ever the apostles and primitive converts brought it, and with the same vehemence as those of Palestine, they seldom, if ever, fail'd sharing in their punishment.

(T) It must be owned, that the part which Agrippa acted in this election between the new emperor and the senate, is not much to his honour, and was more becoming a consummate courtier than a king (45), as we shall see in the Roman history. But the wonder will cease, when we remember, that he had been brought up at that court, had spent most of his life there, and that the various vicissitudes his fortune had formerly led him through, would not suffer him to be over-nice at such a juncture, when his kingdom and all depended upon his securing the friendship of the next successor. In other things he really acted in a quite different character, as the sequel will shew.

(44) Antiq. ubi supra, c. 12. per tot. (45) Vid. Joseph. et Dio, loc. sup. citat.

Agrippa comes to Judæa.

He returned soon after into his kingdom, where he shewed a more extraordinary attachment to the Jewish religion than any of his predecessors, and began with the solemn performance of the vow of Nazareat †; after which he caused the golden chain, which Caius had given him, to be hanged up in one of the most conspicuous parts of the temple, to be a monument to posterity of the instability of human affairs. He deposed Theophilus from the high-priesthood, and gave it to Simon Cantharas the son of Boethus. He divested him of it soon after, to bestow it on Jonathan the son of Annas, who had already enjoyed it after Caiaphas; but he modestly refused it, telling the king, that he thought himself sufficiently honoured to have once enjoyed that dignity; upon which it was given to his brother Matthias [x].

His character.

Agrippa was not only a zealous observer of the Jewish religion, but he was likewise an excellent prince, delighting in acts of generosity and clemency (U). He had been at an immense † De hoc vid. Vol. III. p. 229, & seq. [x] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 5, 6, & 7.

(U) We have a signal instance of it in the case of one Simon, a surly fanatic lawyer, who had ventured to exclaim against him in a public assembly, as unfit to enter into the court of the Israelites, because he was an Idumean by the father's side. The king, who was then at Cæsarea, only sent for him to the theatre, made him sit down by him, and, instead of reproving his boldness, mildly asked him, whether there was any thing in him, or his actions, which he thought contrary to the Jewish law. This behaviour so mollified the man, that he answered him in the negative, approved of all he did, (for Agrippa was very fond of those public shews) and, in a submissive manner, begged pardon for his former speech, which was readily granted to him (46).

His treatment of Silas, whose great obligations he had already rewarded with the command of all his forces, has indeed been censured as savouring of ingratitude; but the abuse which that general had made of his power, his contemptuous behaviour towards him, and his public protesting that he would never cease upbraiding him with his former condition, and his own past services to him, might well deserve his resentment; which yet he carried no further than imprisoning him: for it was Herod that put him to death immediately after that of Agrippa (47).

Josephus, in the place last quoted, instances, as a monument of his magnificence, the stately theatre which he built at Berytus in Phœnice; in which, among other spectacles he gave the people

(46) Antiq. l. xix. c. 7. (47) Id. ibid.

there,

immenſe charge in building, beautifying, and fortifying a new quarter on the north ſide of the city, which he called Bezetha, or the new city, and in procuring the emperor's leave to ſurround it with a ſtrong wall, which, if he had obtained, would have rendered that metropolis impregnable. But Vivius Marſus, who had this year ſucceeded Petronius in the government of Syria, repreſented the danger of ſuch a deſign, which had already been carried on to ſome forwardneſs, in ſuch lively colours, that Claudius immediately ſent him an order to deſiſt. So conſiderable was he, and eſteemed by all his neighbours, that, in one of his progreſſes to Tiberias, he had no leſs than five kings, who came to compliment him there. Theſe were Antiochus, king of Comagene, Samſigeran, king of Emeſa, Cotis, king of Leſſer Armenia, Polemon, king of Pontus, and Herod, king of Chalcis. This meeting, however, gave Marſus ſuch jealouſy, that he came thither himſelf; and though Agrippa complimented him ſo far as to go ſeven ſtades to meet him, yet that governor commanded them all to depart, and return to their reſpective kingdoms. This action did ſo affront the Jewiſh king, that he ſent to deſire the emperor to recal him from his government, and eaſily obtained it; but Claudius died juſt before the orders had reached Syria [y].

Year of the Flood, 3040. Of Chriſt, 42 or 45.

Viſited by five kings.

UPON his return to Jeruſalem he depoſed Matthias the ſon of Annas from the high-prieſthood, and gave that dignity to Elionæus the ſon of Cithæus; and as he was very fond of pleaſing the Jewiſh nation, he began to perſecute the chriſtians, who till then ſeem to have been very quiet at Jeruſalem ever ſince St. Paul's converſion. The firſt who fell a victim to his popular zeal was, James the Leſs, ſurnamed Boanerges., whom he cauſed to be beheaded (W). The pleaſure there, he cauſed fourteen thouſand condemned criminals to repreſent a fight, which they did in ſuch good earneſt, that there was not one left alive of all that number.

[y] Antiq. ibid. c ult. ad fin.

(W) This was not the James, whom we mentioned a little higher to have been a near relation of Chriſt, and on that account choſen biſhop of Jeruſalem, and was not martyred till many years after; but one of the ſons of Zebedee, and brother of John.

Euſebius adds (48), upon the teſtimony of Clement biſhop of Alexandria, that the ſoldier or captain that was to lead him to execution,

(48) Eccl. Hiſt. l. ii. c. 9.

Beheads James, and imprisons Peter.

pleasure which this action gave to the Jews, encouraged him to imprison Peter also, with a design to cut him off also immediately after the feast, which was that of the passover, and fell on that year on the first of April, in the forty fourth year after Christ. Peter was therefore strongly guarded, having four quaternions of soldiers at his prison door, and being fastened hands and feet with chains to his dungeon; whilst prayers were put up for him by all the christians in and about Jerusalem, and obtained him a miraculous deliverance. For on the very night before his designed martyrdom, an angel came and awaked him out of a sound sleep, knocked off his fetters, opened the prison door, and led him safe through some of the streets of the city, and left him to go and seek for some safe asylum; which he accordingly did, after he had gone and acquainted some of the brethren with his miraculous deliverance[z].

Soon after this disappointment, Agrippa returned to Cæsarea, where he designed to have exhibited some public games in honour of Claudius Cæsar, and was attended thither with a numerous train of the most considerable persons, both of his own, and of the neighbouring nations. He appeared early on the second morning of the festival at the public theatre, in a costly suit artfully wrought, so that the sun-beams, darting upon the silver-ground of it, were reflected with such an uncommon lustre, that the people beheld him with a kind of divine respect. He addressed himself in an elegant speech to the deputies of Tyre and Sidon, who had been some time in disgrace with him, and were now come to beg his pardon, and the continuance of his favour to their respective nations. Here the embassadors, prompted perhaps by some of his court sycophants, as is usual in such cases, gave a great shout, crying out, that it was the voice of a god, and not of a man, and added some gestures of a kind of adoration. The king, too sensible of the people's praise, approved, instead of checking their impious flattery; upon which the angel of the Lord smote him with a dreadful disease[a], under which hav-cution, was converted to christianity, by the noble defence which that apostle made at his trial, and that they were both martyred together. Some other particularities concerning his austere life, great piety, &c. are added, which, though they may be true enough, we dare not vouch for upon the bare testimony of antient tradition (49).

[z] Act. xii. per tot. [a] Ibid. ver. 20, ad fin. Antiq ubi supra.

(49) Vid. Epiph. hæres. 58. c. 4, & seq & al.

in;

ing lingered five days, he expired in all the misery that can be expressed or imagined (X). He left a son of the same name, who was then but seventeen years old, and had been brought up at Rome, and three daughters, Berenice married to Herod, and then sixteen years of age, and Mariamne and Drusilla, both young and unmarried, though contracted, the former to Julius Archelaus, the son of Chalcias, and the latter to Epiphanes, the son of Antiochus, king of Comagene. He died in the fifty fourth year of his age, and the seventh of his reign. Claudius was going to bestow the kingdom on his son, according to a former promise; but was dissuaded from it by his courtiers, on pretence that he was too young to be trusted with the care of such a nation; upon which Judæa became again a province of the empire, and Cuspius Fadus was sent governor of it, with this particular order, that he should act nothing in concert with Marsus; that he should severely punish the inhabitants of Cæsarea and Sebaste, or Samaria, for the indignities they had offered to the memory of the late king (Y); and that he should send his troops that were kept in Judæa away into Pontus. But he was soon after persuaded to let them abide still in the

His dreadful death.

Judæa made a province by Claudius.

(X) The sacred historian says, that he was eaten of worms (50), and Josephus, that he was seized with such violent pains in his heart and bowels, that he could not but reflect on the baseness of his flatterers, who had but lately complimented him with a kind of divine immortality, who was now going to expire in all the torments and agonies of a miserable mortal.

The latter adds, that whilst he was as yet in his prison, an owl happened to pearch over his head; upon which a German, who was there, foretold him his future rise and happiness; but bid him take notice, that the next time that he saw that bird, it would prove ominous to him, and that he would live but five days after it; which happened accordingly. For whilst he was applauding himself with the shouts and compliments, which the assembly were paying to him, on occasion of his oration, the same bird appeared over his head, pearching upon a rope, from which he concluded, that his life and glory was at an end (1).

(Y) These ungrateful wretches, not contented with making the greatest rejoycings at Agrippa's death, and blackening his memory with the vilest outrages, had pulled down the statues of his three daughters from the theatres, and other public places, and carried them into their public stews; where they prostituted them in such a manner, as is unfit to be mentioned (2).

(50) Acts xii. 23. (1) Conf. antiq. l. xviii. c. 8. & l. xix. c. ult. (2) Antiq. l xx. c. 1.

former, which proved a ſource of new troubles and miſeries [b]. It was about this time that the famine foretold by Agabus, a chriſtian prophet [c], began to rage; againſt which the new churches, planted at Antioch and other places, ſent the believers at Jeruſalem a liberal relief, by the hands of Paul and Barnabas; whilſt Helen, queen of Adiabene, is ſaid to have relieved the Jews, and afterwards the chriſtians, in the pious and plentiful manner we have ſpoken of in a former volume †.

Fadus ſent into Judæa.

Fadus, upon his arrival in Judæa, was forced to ſuppreſs the banditti, which were by that time grown very numerous and powerful; and to quell an inſurrection which the Jews had raiſed againſt the inhabitants of Philadelphia, which was the ſame city with Rabbah, the capital of the Ammonites [d]. In the mean time, Claudius, having recalled Marſus out of reſpect to the late king, had ſent Caſſius Longinus into that government, who came immediately to Jeruſalem, and inſiſted upon the pontifical veſtments being put into his poſſeſſion, in order to be kept, as formerly, in the fortreſs of Antonia. The Jews ſurpriſed at this new demand, begged leave that they might ſend a deputation to the emperor againſt it, and did not obtain it from that governor, till ſome of the heads of the nation had put their ſons as hoſtages into his hands. But upon the embaſſadors applying to Claudius, in which they were backed by the young Agrippa, they obtained a grant, that thoſe ſacred robes ſhould be kept in the poſſeſſion of the high-prieſt, in the manner Vitellius had granted it, ſix years before. At the ſame time Herod king of Chalcis obtained of that emperor the ſuperintendency of both the temple and ſacred treaſury; together with the authority of naming whom he would to the pontifical dignity; in purſuance to which, he depoſed Cantharas, and raiſed Joſeph the ſon of Cami to it. After Herod's death, young Agrippa obtained the ſame grant for himſelf, and enjoyed it till the time of the Jewiſh war [e].

Year of the Flood, 3043. Of Chriſt, 45 or 48.

Theudas an impoſtor beheaded.

DURING Fadus's government there aroſe a notable impoſtor, named Theudas (Z), who drew great numbers of the [b] Antiq. ubi ſupra. [c] Act xi. 27. ad fin. † Vol. IX. p. 488, & ſeq. [d] Antiq. l. xx. c. 1, & 2. [e] ibid.

(Z) We muſt take care not to confound this Theudas of Joſephus with another mentioned by St. Luke, and ſaid to have appeared juſt after the death of Herod the Great, and has been taken notice of in a former ſection †; and is ſuppoſed to be the ſame with the ſon of Ezechias mentioned by Joſephus under the name of Judas.

† See before, p. 276, & (S).

deluded

deluded Jews after him, bidding them follow him beyond Jordan, and promiſing them that he would divide the waters of that river, as Joſhua had done, by his ſingle word. Cuſpius ſent ſome troops of horſe and foot againſt him and his followers, killed ſome of them, took others priſoners, and amongſt them Theudas himſelf, whom he cauſed to be beheaded, and his head to be brought to Jeruſalem. This, according to Joſephus, is the moſt remarkable thing that happened during Fadus's government [f]; he was ſoon after ſucceeded by Tiberius Alexander, an apoſtate Jew, of ſacerdotal race, and nephew to the famous Philo, often quoted in this chapter [g]. One of his firſt exploits was the crucifying James and Simon, the ſons of Judas, ſurnamed Galileus, head of the Gaulonitiſh ſect, ſpoken of in a former ſection; and about the ſame time Herod, king of Chalcis, having depoſed Joſeph the ſon of Cami, gave the high-prieſthood to Ananias the ſon of Nebedeus, and died ſoon after, in the eighth year of Claudius. That emperor gave his kingdom to young Agrippa, in prejudice of Ariſtobulus, the eldeſt ſon of the deceaſed.

Ventidius Cumanus ſucceeded Alexander in the government of Judæa, and it was in his time that thoſe troubles began, which ended in the ruin of the Jewiſh nation. The great concourſe of people, which their feſtival brought to Jeruſalem, obliged the Romans at ſuch times to keep a guard before the gates of the temple, to prevent tumults. It was now the paſſover, when one of the Roman ſoldiers upon duty, had the impudence to expoſe his nudity to open ſight; this indignity raiſed the reſentment of the Jews to ſuch a height, that they went and complained of it to Cumanus, and in an inſolent manner told him, that the affront was offered by his order, not only to the nation, but to God. He tried at firſt to appeaſe them by fair means, but finding them to grow more tumultuous, he ordered all his troops to come to the place; the ſight of which alarmed them ſo, that they fled in the greateſt fright and confuſion, inſomuch, that upwards of ten thouſand were ſtifled to death in their flight, by running over one another in the narrow paſſages that led to and from the temple. The copies of Euſebius and St. Jerom ſay thirty thouſand. Soon after this diſaſter another happened in Samaria, where ſome Galilean Jews, going to one of the feaſts, were inſulted, and one of them killed. This brought on a terrible ſkirmiſh, in which a great number of the Jews were killed, and the reſt went to complain to Cumanus againſt the Year of the Flood, 3050. Of Chriſt, 55 or 52.

[f] Id. ibid.

[g] Ibid c. iii. & bell. Jud. l ii. c. 11.

Samaritans; but he, being bribed by these, refused to do them justice; upon which the matter was brought before Quadratus governor of Syria, who sent both parties to Rome, and Cumanus with them, to answer for themselves there (A). The Samaritans were cast, and condemned to die, Cumanus sent into banishment, and Celer one of his tribunes, who had been involved in the same guilt, condemned to be dragged through the streets of Jerusalem, and then put to death [h].

Felix made procurator of Judæa.

In the year following Claudius Felix, the brother of Pallas, the emperor's chief favourite, being then in Judæa, succeeded Cumanus in the government of it, under whom the Jewish affairs went still from bad to worse (B). The [h] Antiq. ubi supra. c. 4, & 5.

(A) They were all sent in chains thither, though they were the heads of each of the contending nations. Those among the Jews were Annas and Jonathan, who had been both high-priests, Ananias the present pontiff, and his son the captain of the temple, or rather chief of the Levites, who were the keepers of it, with some others. Those of the Samaritans were likewise considerable persons, and these joined interest with Cumanus; but the credit of young Agrippa at the Roman court easily turned the scales in favour of the Jews.

Those in Judæa had not met with so favourable a judge, and Quadratus, who had the power to try and condemn even the governors themselves, if he found them guilty, though he remitted the grand trial to Cæsar's court, had caused a great number of the most stirring among them to be, some crucified, and others beheaded, besides those that had been killed in the several engagements, especially in the canton of Atrabatene (3).

(B) Josephus says, that the Jewish nation, especially Jonathan the late high-priest, had desired him for their governor. He had been the year before chosen one of the judges by Quadratus, in the dispute between them and the Samaritans, and had perhaps ingratiated himself to them by his mild behaviour towards them; but after he became their governor, he behaved like a tyrant. Tacitus says rightly of him (4), that he governed them with the arbitrariness of a monarch, and with the genius of a slave. He was the brother of Pallas, and therefore made no difficulty of committing the greatest oppressions and cruelties, till the flame broke out into an open rebellion, and ended in the most dreadful ruin and misery that ever nation felt.

(3) Antiq. l. xx. c. 5. ubi supra, c. 6.

(4) Hist. l. v. c. 9. Conf. cum. antiq.

land

land ſwarmed without with robbers and banditti, and within with falſe prophets, and pretended miracle-mongers, who were ſtill blowing the coals of diſcontent and ſedition; ſo that there paſſed ſcarcely a day, in which there was not ſome dreadful execution made upon ſome of thoſe miſcreants [i]. To theſe we may join the Sicarii or aſſaſſins (C), which crouded themſelves into all the cities and towns of the kingdom, and committed the moſt horrid murders and butcheries, under covert and pretence of zeal for their religion and liberties. Among the falſe prophets, and pretended ſaviours, by whom that infatuated nation was ſeduced, there was a ſignal one that came from Egypt, and had drawn above thirty thouſand men after him, by the large promiſes he made to them of a ſpeedy deliverance. His followers were, however, ſoon diſperſed by the Roman troops but one was no ſooner gone, but there ſtarted up another, ſo that the moſt violent remedies did rather inflame, than aſſuage, their ſeditious diſeaſe. But Felix did not exert his cruelties on the rebellious rout alone, but on all others indiſcriminately, whom his avarice or reſentment marked out for deſtruction. This obliged the good old prieſt Jonathan, who had been moſt inſtrumental in procuring him the government, to expoſtulate often with him, and to complain of his ill conduct. Felix at length, unable to bear his juſt cenſures, hired one Ischa-Doras, a perſon in whom Jonathan put great confidence, to aſſaſſinate

[i] Ibid. c. 6. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 12.

(C) Theſe were another kind of robbers, who came and mixed themſelves among the crouds and aſſemblies, with ſhort daggers under their cloaks, and ſtabbed all that came near them in open day, and then were the firſt to cry out murder! They not only, by this vile method, rid themſelves of their enemies, but would hire themſelves to murder any others for a ſmall ſum. So that it became extremely dangerous to go into any places of public reſort.

They are ſuppoſed to have been the ſpawn of the Gaulonitiſh faction, which began near fifty years before, as we have ſeen in a former ſection * ; and in ſpight of all the ſeverities which the Romans made them feel, ſtill kept up their ſeditious ſpirit, and daily increaſed in number. They were afterwards better known by the name of zealots, and under that ſpecious title committed ſuch unheard of crimes as haſtened the total ruin of their city and nation. We have ſeen in a former volume †, whence they pretended to derive their origin; though by their actions one would rather think it came from hell, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel.

* See before, p. 235, &c.

† See Vol. III. p. 316 &c.

assassinate him, which was accordingly done (D). This murder going unpunished, because the person who should have revenged it was the chief actor in it, proved the source of an infinite number of others, which were committed every-where, the temple not excepted; and the Jewish chiefs and even the pontiffs made no scruple to hire the assassins above-mentioned, to rid them of any persons that were obnoxious to them [k].

Marries Drusilla.

WE have already taken notice, that Drusilla, Agrippa's daughter, had been contracted to Epiphanes; but he refusing the circumcision, her brother gave her to Azizus king of Emessa, who consented to that ceremony out of love to her, she being one of the finestwomen of that age. But as her virtue was far enough below her beauty, Felix, who was become enamoured with her, did easily persuade her to forsake her husband, and to be married to him, though a Pagan, and one of the worst of that kind [l] (E). He was himself made perhaps more sensible of it than ever he had been when the apostle St. Paul was brought before him, and made that noble discourse on justice, temperance, or chastity, and a judgment to come; which threw him into such a fit of remorse and trembling, as made him cry out to him, It is enough, go thy ways for this time; and when I am more at leisure, I will send for thee [m]. It proved however but of short du-[k] Id. ibid. [l] Id. ibid. & seq. [m] Act. xxiv. pass. & antiq. ubi supra, c. 7.

(D) It is impossible to guess from Josephus, in what year this murder was committed; only by his expressions it seems to have been done about the beginning of Felix's government (5).

(E) Her two sisters did not prove much more virtuous than she. Berenice the eldest, and formerly married to her uncle Herod king of Chalcis, being become a widow, was shrewdly suspected of holding an incestuous intercourse with her brother Agrippa. To suppress that suspicion, she married Polemon king of Pontus, and of part of Cilicia; but, she soon after broke off with him, and by her loose behaviour confirmed the reports that had been spread concerning her unlawful intrigues. Her husband on the other hand, who had embraced judaism on her account, was no sooner forsaken by her, than he cast off her religion, and returned to his paganism, Mariamne the youngest had been married betimes to Archelaus the son of Chelcias or Elchias, probably of the Herodian family; but she likewise forsook him to marry one Demetrius, an Alexandrian Jew, and one of the richest and most considerable of that city, and was then their Alabarca or chief (6).

(5) Antiq. ubi supra, c. 6. (6) Ibid. c. 5.

ration

ration. Felix did afterwards ſend for him indeed more than once, but it was rather in hopes of a bribe from him, than a deſire of being made better acquainted with thoſe important truths, which he had heard of him; ſo that after near two years, finding himſelf diſappointed, and ready to be recalled from his government, he choſe to leave his priſoner in bonds, to ingratiate himſelf to the exaſperated Jews [n].

Festus ſucceeds Felix. Year of the Flood 3056. Of Chriſt 62 or 59.

HE was accordingly ſucceeded by Portius Feſtus, who upon his coming found the nation in that diſtreſſed condition we have been ſpeaking of; and, which was ſtill worſe, the very prieſthood had begun a civil war among themſelves, ever ſince the laſt year of Felix's government, the occaſion of which ſeems to have been the frequent depoſitions of the pontiffs, and their pretenſions after it to a greater ſhare of the tythes than the inferior prieſts could afford them (F). Agrippa had the year before depoſed Ananias, and put Iſhmael in his room; there were ſtill ſeveral more ſuch diſcarded pontiffs alive, who all pretended to the ſame income of the tythes, which they enjoyed with that dignity, which muſt of courſe

A civil war among the prieſts.

[n] Act. ubi ſupra, ad fin.

(F) We have obſerved in a former volume *, that the Levites were to gather in the tythes from the people, and to allot a tenth part of them to the prieſts. Theſe allowed the high-prieſt a proportion of it ſuitable to his dignity, and divided the reſt among themſelves. When therefore the number of depoſed pontiffs began to increaſe to ſuch a degree, as to leave the inferior ones too ſmall a quantity for their ſuſtenance, it bred a mutiny among them. The latter refuſing them their competency, they ſent their armed men to force it from them, to plunder their houſes and barns, and to kill all that oppoſed them. This obliged them to hire the ſicarii to repel force by force, and thoſe that could not ſtand thus in their own defence, were ſtripped of all they had, and left to ſtarve.

Joſephus ſays, that Felix had ſent a good number of them in chains to Rome to anſwer for their crimes, which yet he adds were of a light nature; and might therefore be ſome of this oppreſſed ſort who had armed themſelves againſt the cruelty of thoſe tyrants. He adds, that they were kept priſoners, ſome years, till he came himſelf thither on purpoſe to procure their freedom which he did by the intereſt of Poppea, who was a lover of their nation, and was ſoon after married to the emperor Nero. He highly applauds the piety of thoſe prieſts, who, ſays he, were content to live upon nuts, and dry figs, rather than pollute themſelves with the uſual food of the Gentiles (7).

* Vol. III. p. 220, & ſeq. (7) In vita ſua.

impoveriſh

impoveriſh the inferior ſort, who therefore refuſed it to them. The rancour aroſe at length to ſuch a height, that each party uſed to go along accompanied with a troop of the ſicarii, and upon every rencounter fell foul on each other, killing all that oppoſed them, and filled both city and country, and even the very temple ſometimes with blood. Feſtus was therefore forced to begin his government with the greateſt ſeverity, in order to ſuppreſs this treble butchery; namely, that of the prieſthood againſt each other; that of the ſeditious laity againſt the Romans and thoſe that contentedly ſubmitted to them; and that of the banditti abroad, who infeſted the whole country, and robbed, plundered, and maſſacred everywhere without mercy [o]. The ſuppreſſion of all theſe different parties, and the ſevere examples he made of their leaders, impoſtors, and of the moſt ſtirring and mutinous of the rebels, was what took up the greateſt part of his time and labour during his ſhort government.

Paul brought before Feſtus

THREE days after his arrival in Judæa, he went to Jeruſalem, where Ananias the late high-prieſt, and the reſt of the Jewiſh chiefs, came to demand juſtice againſt Paul, who was ſtill kept priſoner at Cæſarea. As ſoon therefore as he was returned thither, he cauſed him to be brought before him, and after a full hearing of both ſides, eſpecially of the priſoners defence, pronounced him innocent of any capital crime. But his enemies ſtill inſiſting that he was worthy of death, and Feſtus being willing to oblige them with a ſecond trial at Jeruſalem, Paul took hold on the privileges which the law then gave him, to appeal to Cæſar, and prevent thereby the effects of their further malice. Agrippa and his ſiſter Bernice being come to Cæſarea to compliment the new governor, and having expreſſed a deſire of ſeeing this celebrated priſoner, Feſtus, who knew that prince to be thoroughly verſed in the Jewiſh laws and cuſtoms, readily agreed to have him brought once more to the bar. Here Paul being permitted to ſpeak for himſelf, made ſuch a noble defence, that Feſtus acquitted him of every fault, except that of having turned his brain with too much learning; whilſt Agrippa, conſcious of the truth and force of his reaſoning, owned himſelf almoſt convinced by him, and after ſome private conference with the governor, it was declared that he might have been releaſed, if he had not appealed to Cæſar [p].

And Agrippa.

Agrippa diſpleaſes the Jews.

IN the mean time Agrippa, who came often to Jeruſalem, and had a lodging near the temple, of which he had the ſuperintendency [o] Antiq. ubi ſupra, c. 6.

[p] Act. xxv, & xxvi. paſſ.

perintendency given him after his uncle Herod, took it into his head to build him a palace there, of such a height, that he could oversee all that was done in the innermost court of it. The Jews were the more displeased at it, because Festus and the Romans would likewise come and take a view of it from thence; for which reason they built a partition wall high enough to cover that sacred place, which the king and governor taking as an affront, ordered it to be pulled down. The Jews, after much opposition, obtained leave at length to send deputies to Rome; and these by the intercession of Poppea (G), got a grant from the emperor for the keeping up of the wall. Ishmael the then high-priest being at the head of this embassy, was for his laudable zeal deposed by Agrippa, who bestowed that dignity on Joseph, surnamed Cabbis, the son of the late pontiff Cantharas. Josephus, adds, that Poppea detained Ishmael and Chelcias as hostages at Rome[q].

Festus dying towards the latter end of this year, Nero nominated Albinus to succeed him; in the mean time Agrippa, having given the high-priesthood from Cabbis to Ananus, a proud Sadducee, this last took that interval before the arrival of the new prætor to call a council, and to have James the apostle and bishop of Jerusalem, and some other christians, condemned and stoned to death (H). Upon the governor's arrival at Alexandria, complaint was made to him of this presumptuous and unlawful step. Albinus resented it, and sent the new pontiff a very threatening letter; and Agrippa, who feared the consequence of his anger, took care to depose him, and to [q] Antiq. ubi supra, c. 7. ad fin.

(G) Josephus highly commends that empress's piety, though, setting aside her love to the Jewish nation, she had not one virtue that could intitle her to this compliment. On the contrary, she was known to be a lewd princess, the promoter of a great number of murders, which she made her husband commit on the greatest persons of the empire, and prevailed at length on that mad monarch to repudiate, banish, and at length put to death, his virtuous wife Octavia, to marry her, as we shall see more at large in the Roman history.

(H) So says Josephus; but we have related the manner of his death according to the testimony of some antient fathers in a late note, to which we refer the reader.

This Ananus was the fifth son of that Ananus or Annas, mentioned by the evangelists, that had enjoyed the high-priesthood after their father, an honour and happiness that never happened to any but him, says that Jewish historian (8).

(8) Antiq. l. xx. c. 8.

put another in his room, viz. Jesus the son of Damneus, before the governor was got to Jerusalem. Judæa gained nothing by the change of either governor or pontiff. As for the former, he was such a cruel rapacious monster, that Felix and Festus, bad as they were, were honest men to him; and yet he was still in one respect better than his successor, in that he endeavoured at least, either to hide or to colour his ill actions by some pretext or other.

His first care was to suppress the sicarii, robbers, and banditti, which were now grown more numerous, and bolder than ever. He punished with the utmost severity as many as came into his hands, and they only became the more impudent by it; insomuch that they ventured one night, during one of their feasts, to enter into the city, and to carry off Eleazar the son of Ananias, the late high-priest, who was secretary of the temple, and to send his father word that they would not release him, till he had procured the enlargement of ten of their associates, whom Albinus kept in prison. Ananias, who was a very opulent person, easily bribed with a round sum the rapacious governor to consent to it, but his compliance was attended with very bad consequences; being forced still to redeem some near relation at the same price, as often as any of the banditti were got into the governor's hands [r]. On the other hand Agrippa, having given the high-priesthood from Jesus the son of Damneus to Jesus the son of Gamaliel, those two pontiffs got each of them a strong escort of armed men, and committed the vilest outrages, not only against each other, but against the inferior sort, who were often plundered of all they had, and reduced to the lowest misery. About this time the Levites and singers, who, as we have formerly observed *, had no particular dress to distinguish them from the laity, obtained leave of Agrippa to wear white robes like the priests, and some other privileges, which were contrary to the Jewish law, and did not a little displease the better sort of the Jews, as well as the whole priesthood. Agrippa was likewise become odious to his subjects, on account of his high taxes on them, to support his extravagance, sumptuous buildings, public spectacles, games, and such-like profusions [s].

About this time all the work of the temple being quite finished, and eighteen thousand hands at once discharged, as we observed in a former section †, a proposal was made to

[r] Ibid. c. 8. * Vol III. p. 253. [s] Antiq. ubi supra, Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 1, 3. † Pag. 182, & (Z).

that

that prince to employ them in the taking down an old ſtately galery of the temple, four hundred cubits high, which was in danger of falling, and rebuilding it anew; but Agrippa conſidering the expenſiveneſs and length of the work, abſolutely refuſed it, and told the Jewiſh chiefs that they might employ thoſe hands in paving the city with white ſtones; but that not being agreed to, the greateſt part joined themſelves with the banditti for fear of ſtarving. Albinus after a two years government was recalled by Nero, and ſucceeded by Geſſius Florus, the laſt and worſt governor that ever Judæa had. Joſephus ſeems at a loſs for words bad enough to deſcribe him by, or a monſter to compare him to[t]; his rapines, cruelties, conniving for large ſums with the banditti, and in a word, his whole behaviour, was ſo open and bare-faced that he was looked upon by the Jews, more like a bloody executioner ſent to butcher, than as a magiſtrate to govern them. His deſign was to provoke them to ſuch an open rebellion, as might either give him the brutiſh pleaſure of ſeeing them deſtroy each other, or prevent his oppreſſions, murders, and other helliſh works being inquired into. He ſucceeded but too well in it; and a war was kindled accordingly through his means, which ended not but with the total ruin of the Jewiſh nation. This great event, ſo plainly foretold by Chriſt, ſo punctually fulfilled, and ſo lively deſcribed and related by a Jewiſh hiſtorian, and an eye-witneſs, might well deſerve a larger place in this chapter; but as it is ſo very well known, and abounds with ſuch dreadful murders, cruelties, and other circumſtances, fit only to fill a reader with horror, we ſhall content ourſelves with giving ſome of the moſt remarkable ſtrokes of it, to avoid drawing this chapter to too great a length.

Geſſius Florus's bloody government. Year of the Flood, 3065. Of Chriſt, $64\frac{65}{67}$.

ABOUT four years before this dreadful war broke out, and about ſeven before the ſiege of Jeruſalem, whilſt the Jews did ſtill enjoy ſome kind of peace, a country fellow, named Jeſus, came to the feaſt of tabernacles, and was on a ſudden ſeized with a kind of phrenſy, as the Jews thought it, which made him cry out without ceaſing: Wo to the city, Wo to the temple: A voice from the four corners, a voice againſt Jeruſalem, a voice againſt the nation, &c. and in this lamentable tone he ran through all the ſtreets of the city night and day, and on the ſabbaths and other feſtivals, was heard to ſpeak thoſe words louder, and in a more diſmal tone, without ever loſing his voice, or even being hoarſe with crying; and, what was ſtill more ſurpriſing, neither threats nor the moſt severe punishments that could be inflicted on him (I), could make him desist or utter a groan or complaint, or any other words than those dreadful woes, till he saw his predictions begin to be fulfilled by the siege of the city, when he cried out in a more dismal tone, Wo also to myself; and was in that instant killed by a stone thrown in by the besiegers [u]. There were several more such prodigious warnings sent to that unhappy nation in the sequel, which though all too little to bring them to a better mind, are sufficient to convince us, that God did not doom them to this dreadful destruction, till their impiety and hardness of heart had forced that severe punishment from him.

A prodigious warning to the Jews.

[t] Antiq. ibid. c. 9. Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra.

Complaints made to Cestius Gallus. Year of the Flood, 3064. Of Christ, 69.

Judæa being thus distracted within and without; and groaning now more than ever under a tyrant, who openly promoted those mischiefs he should have remedied; vast numbers of Jews forsook it to seek an asylum among foreign nations, whilst those that stayed behind applied themselves to Cestius Gallus, the then governor of Syria, who was then at Jerusalem at the passover, and besought him to pity their wretched state; and free them from the tyranny of a man who had totally ruined their country. Florus, who was present when these complaints were preferred against him, made a mere jest of them; and Cestius, instead of making a strict inquiry into his conduct, dismissed them with a bare promise, that Florus should behave better for the future, and set himself about computing the number of Jews that were then at Jerusalem, by that of the lambs that were offered at that festival (K), in order

[u] Bell. Judaic. l. vii. c. 12.

(I) Josephus adds, that some of the Jewish heads, being highly displeased at this poor fellow, caused him to be severely whipped; and that this not proving sufficient either to silence him, or to make him answer to other questions; they had him brought before Albinus, who ordered him afresh to the whipping post; where they gave him so many and severe lashes, that his ribs were quite uncovered, without forcing a word or groan from him. And lastly, that being dismissed as a madman, he continued his dreadful outcries, without taking the least notice by word or gesture, either of those that hurted him or gave him food.

(K) This computation could not be very certain, because, tho' none but Jews offered these lambs at the feast, yet those who had contracted any legal pollution were excluded from it. Besides, one lamb might serve for twenty persons, tho' never for less than ten. However, they took this last number for each lamb; and found that of the lambs to amount in the whole to two hundred and order to send an account of it to Nero; and by that computation the whole was found to amount to two millions five hundred and fifty six thousand. Josephus thinks they rather amounted to three millions [w].

SOON after this, the contest between the Jews and Syrians about the city of Cæsarea, which had been kept in suspence ever since the time of Felix (L), being at length decided in favour of the Syrians, the decree was no sooner brought to Judæa, but, as if it had been agreed, that this should be the signal for a revolt, the Jews every-where, resolved to take up arms, and thus began the fatal war in the second year of Florus's government, in the twelfth of Nero's reign, the seventeenth of that of Agrippa, and in the sixty-ninth year of Christ [x]. Agrippa, who was at this time at Jerusalem at the beginning of this revolt, strove in vain to assuage them by a long and elaborate speech, as well as by other proper means; they only listened to him, till he came to insist on their submitting to Florus, till a new governor could be obtained from Rome; this single proposal exasperated them to such a degree, that they began to pelt him with stones, and forced him to leave the city, which was immediately in a flame. Florus beheld all this with an inhuman pleasure, and without putting the least help to quell the sedition, though earnestly intreated to it by the Jewish heads. Agrippa sent them indeed three thousand men; but what could they do now against such an inraged multitude as were then up in arms? The evil soon spread all over the kingdom, and though the Jews were every-where the sufferers, yet did not their despe-and fifty five thousand. But as among the poor, one of them might serve for more than ten, and as far as twenty, Josephus rightly guesses that there must have been a much greater number, tho' considering the bigness of the place, one would wonder how it was possible for it to contain even that.

[w] Ibid l. ii. c. 13, & alib.

[x] Conf. antiq. l. xx. c. ult. & Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 14.

(L) This contest, in which the Jews maintained that that city belonged to them, because it had been built by Herod, and the Syrians pretended that it had been always esteemed a Greek city, since even that monarch had reared temples and statues in it; grew to such a height, that both parties came at last to blows, and took up arms against each other. Felix at length put an end to it for a time, by sending some of the chiefs of each nation to Rome to plead their cause before the emperor, where it hung in suspence till this time, when Nero decided it in such a manner as caused this insurrection.

rate

rate rage abate in the leaſt. Nothing was now to be ſeen but robberies, murders, and all manner of cruelties; cities and villages filled with dead bodies of all ages, ſexes and qualities, even down to the ſucking babes. The Jews on their part neither ſpared Syrians nor Romans, but retaliated their cruelties where-ever they got the better of them, for which vaſt numbers of their peaceful brethren were butchered in their places of abode. The Cæſareans fell ſuddenly on thoſe of their city, and maſſacred twenty thouſand of them, two thouſand were murdered at Ptolemais, and fifty thouſand at Alexandria. In a word, there was neither town nor city, where the Pagans proved either ſtronger or quicker than they, where they did not commit the ſame horrid butcheries. At Jeruſalem Florus cauſed one day his troops to go and plunder the high market, and to kill all they met; and they murdered accordingly three thouſand five hundred perſons, men, women, and children. Among thoſe that were brought priſoners to him, there were ſome men of quality, and who had been even honoured with the Roman knighthood; yet this did not ſave them from his cruelty; on the contrary, he cauſed them to be whipped before his tribunal, and then crucified [y].

Jews terribly perſecuted.

Berenice, who had ſtayed at Jeruſalem after her brother, being bound there by a vow of Nazareat thirty days, ſpared neither prayers, meſſages, nor viſits to mollify the brutiſh prætor, till at length ſhe was likely to have loſt her life by it, and with great difficulty recovered her palace before his helliſh inſtruments could reach her. Yet not diſcouraged by it, ſhe went barefoot to him on the very next day, threw herſelf at the foot of his tribunal, and in the moſt ſubmiſſive terms intreated him to put a ſtop to the ſhedding of ſo much blood. The brute did not ſo much as vouchſafe her the leaſt token of common reſpect, ſo that ſhe ran a ſecond riſk of being torn in pieces before ſhe could get home [z]. This may ſerve to give a ſketch of that governor's character, who, becauſe he was depending on that of Syria, failed not to write to Ceſtius, and throw all the fault on the Jews; inſomuch, that this laſt knew not well which to believe, Florus, or Agrippa, Berenice, and other conſiderable Jewiſh heads, who gave him a quite different account [a].

Berenice intercedes in vain.

In the mean time, a great number of aſſaſſins having joined themſelves to the ſeditious, beat the Romans out of the fortreſſes of Maſſada, Antonia, and the towers of Phaſael,

The zealots beat the Romans.

[y] Ibid. [a] Ibid. c. 15. [a] cap. 16.

Marianne,

Mariamne, and others; killing all that oppoſed them. They began next to ſet fire to the palaces of Agrippa, and Berenice, of the high-prieſt Ananias, and of his brother Ezechias; and theſe two laſt, who had hid themſelves from their fury, being diſcovered, were murdered without mercy. Menahem, one of the ſons of the late Judas, chief of the Gaulonites, had now put himſelf at the head of the ſicarii, who now called themſelves zealots; and being come to Jeruſalem, was choſen chief of the ſeditious there, but was ſoon after maſſacred by them, with a great number of his men. His nephew Eleazar ſucceeded him as chief of the zealots, and beſieged the Romans ſo cloſe in their caſtle, that they capitulated at length to retire only with their lives; which being promiſed to them, he cauſed them all to be maſſacred on the ſpot, though it was on the ſabbath [b]. This treachery was cruelly retaliated on the generous Jews of Scythopolis, or Bethſhean, who had offered the Greeks of that city to ſtand by them againſt their brethren, who were beſieging them. But their ſincerity being unhappily ſuſpected by their townſmen, theſe obliged them to retire into ſome neighbouring wood, where on the third night they came upon them, when they were aſleep, and killed thirteen thouſand of them, and ſeized upon all their wealth [c] (M).

Scythopolitan Jews maſſacred.

BY this time the revolted Jews had carried their conqueſts beyond Jordan, and had taken the fortreſſes of Macheron and Cyprus; this laſt they razed to the ground, after having put all the Romans to the ſword; ſo that Ceſtius Gallus, who had hitherto kept himſelf an idle ſpectator of all theſe mutual devaſtations, began to think it high time to beſtir himſelf. He marched into Judæa with a powerful army, burned all the towns and villages in his way, maſſacred all the Jews he [b] Ibid. c. 17, 18. [c] cap. 19.

(M) It was on this dreadful occaſion, that a conſiderable Jew, named Simon, who had ſignalized himſelf in the defence of Scythopolis againſt thoſe of his own nation, obſerving what bloody returns the Greeks made them for their friendſhip, in a fit of rage and deſpair, inſtead of ſtanding in his own defence, fell on his father, mother, wife, and children, who clung round about him, and killed every one of them; after which, getting on the heap of their dead bodies, he run himſelf through with his own ſword (9).

(9) Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 19.

could

could come at, and came and encamped before Gibeon (N), about the feaſt of tabernacles. The people at Jeruſalem no ſooner heard of his approach, than they forſook the ſolemnity, and, though on the ſabbath, armed themſelves, and came out againſt him with ſuch fury, that they had in all likelihood, defeated him, had not his foot been timely ſuccoured by his cavalry. He loſt above five hundred men, and the Jews but twenty-two. The latter having ſeized on all the paſſes round about, Ceſtius was forced to ſtay three days near Bethoron, where Agrippa joined him, and aſſiſted him with his troops, his perſon, counſel, and good offices. He tried once more to bring the Jews to ſome temper, by ſending two of his chief captains to offer them a pardon, and ſome terms of peace; but the revolters, inſtead of hearkening to their propoſals, killed one of them, and wounded the other, who narrowly eſcaped with his life. This baſe action, which was highly condemned by the more moderate Jews, cauſed a diſſenſion between them, which Ceſtius failed not to improve, by ſallying ſuddenly againſt them, and purſuing them almoſt up to Jeruſalem. He ſtayed three days at Scopas, a ſmall mile from it, to try whether their fright would make them relent, and then advanced towards them in order of battle on the thirtieth of October, and put them into ſuch conſternation, that they abandoned all the outer quarters of the city, and retired into the inner cincture near the temple. Ceſtius ſet fire to the former, and began himſelf to beſiege the latter, and took up his head quarters in the royal palace [d].

Year of the Flood 3064. Of Chriſt 60.

Ceſtius defeated.

HAD the governor vigorouſly puſhed on the ſiege, it is likely he might have put an effectual end to the ſedition; but [d] Ibid. c. 20, 21, & ſeq.

(N) This city, the capital of the antient Gibeonites †, was diſtant about fifty ſtades or ſeven little miles north of Jeruſalem, and ſituate on an eminence, as its name properly imports (10). Joſephus ſays elſewhere, it was but ſorty ſtades from that metropolis (11).

Ceſtius's army conſiſted of the whole twelfth legion, two thouſand men picked out of the other legions, ſix cohorts of foot, four of horſe, beſides three thouſand horſe and ſix thouſand foot ſent him by Agrippa and Antiochus, and four thouſand from Sohemus; in the whole about twenty thouſand foot and five thouſand horſe.

† Vid. Vol II. p. 176. (10) Joſeph. ubi ſupra. Euſeb. loc. Hebr. (11) Antiq. l. vii c. 10.

that

that ſinful nation was now reſerved for greater evils, and the ſiege was on the ſudden ſhamefully raiſed; at the inſtigation of ſome of Ceſtius's generals, whom Florus had corrupted; which gave a new life to the ſeditious. They purſued him to his camp at Gibeon, haraſſing him in the rear, whilſt thoſe that kept the paſſes attacked him in flank. His army in deſpair, not being able to move forward or backward, made the mountains echo with their hideous cries, and after a loſs of four thouſand foot, and four hundred horſe, and of a great part of their baggage, being aſſiſted by the intervening night on the eighth of November, happily got down through the narrow ſtreights of Bethoron, and eſcaped [e]. The Jews, after this ſucceſs againſt the Syrian governor, ſet themſelves about the propereſt means to carry on the war againſt the Romans, and chuſing ſome of their braveſt chiefs to command in the ſeveral cantons and fortreſſes of Judæa. Joſephus the writer of theſe wars, a brave Jewiſh prieſt, of conſiderable rank, was appointed governor of the two Galilees; Joſeph the ſon of Gorion and the high-prieſt Ananus had the government of Jeruſalem; and Eleazar, the chief of the revolters, that of Idumea; ſoon after which they departed to take care each of their particular commands. All this while there reigned ſuch a diſſenſion among the Jews, that great numbers of the better ſort, foreſeeing the ſad effects of the Romans reſentment, forſook the city, as men do a ſinking veſſel, and the chriſtians, mindful of their Saviour's warning (O), retired into Pella, a ſmall city on the other ſide Jordan, in the tetrarchy of Herod, whither the war did not reach [f].

Eſcapes with loſs.

Jews and Chriſtians leave Jeruſalem.

WHILST the new choſen governors were putting their reſpective cantons in the beſt poſture of defence, the ſon of Gorion in repairing the fortifications of Jeruſalem, Joſephus in fortifying a vaſt number of places in the upper and lower Galilee, and raiſing of forces to the number of a hundred thouſand, preparing arms and ammunition, and Eleazar was doing the ſame in Idumea; the news came to Nero of all [e] cap. 23, 24. [f] cap. 25, & ſeq.

(O) Euſebius aſſures us (12), upon the teſtimony of ſome antient fathers, that God was pleaſed to direct them to this flight even before the beginning of the war; and Epiphanius adds (13), by the miniſtry of an angel ſent on purpoſe to the church of Jeruſalem.

(12) Hiſt. Eccl. l. iii. c. 5. (13) Hæreſ. 29, & ſeq.

Veſpaſian ſent into Judæa.

theſe preparations, as well as of the ill ſucceſs of Ceſtius againſt the Jews. Veſpaſian, who had already ſignalized himſelf in Germany, and England, being then with the emperor in Achaia, was nominated to march with all ſpeed againſt Judæa with a powerful army [g]. He came accordingly into Syria, gathered all his forces and thoſe of his auxiliaries, among whom Agrippa did not fail to meet him at the head of a conſiderable reinforcement of his own, whilſt Titus was ſent by his father to fetch the fifth and tenth legions from Alexandria into Judæa [h]. It is likely, Ceſtius did not long outlive his diſgrace, for we hear no more of him; and the Jews, elated at his defeat, if not alſo at his death, took it into their heads to go and beſiege Aſcalon. Antony, who commanded there, came out againſt them, and killed ten thouſand of them; they made a ſecond attempt, and were ſurpriſed in the way, and cut off to almoſt the ſame number. Niger, who headed the Jews, fled into a tower, to which Antony ſet fire; and not doubting but he was burnt in it, left the place; but upon the Jews coming three days after to bury their dead, they found him in a cave under-ground, where he had ſaved himſelf from the flames [i].

Year of the Flood 3065. Of Chriſt, $\frac{70}{67}$.

Veſpaſian enters Judæa.

Veſpaſian, on the very beginning of the next year, having ſent Placidus to ſuccour the inhabitants of Sephoris (P) againſt the Jews, advanced towards Ptolemais with Agrippa, and was there joined by Titus at the head of another body of troops, with whom he had marched thither even in the very depth of winter, and came much ſooner than was expected. Their whole forces of horſe and foot conſiſted now of upwards of ſixty thouſand men, beſides ſervants, all excellently diſciplined, with which they entered Galilee, and having burnt Gadara, were marching to beſiege Jotapa. Joſephus, now governor of that province, having timely notice of it, went into that place, and defended it with great bravery and vigour forty ſeven days, in ſpite of all the Roman efforts and bravery. It was at length taken by aſſault about the beginning of July (Q), and Jotapa taken by Veſpaſian.

[g] Lib. iii. c. 1. [h] Cap. 2, & 3. [i] Ibid. c. 1, & ſeq.

(P) We have already obſerved, that this city was the metropolis of Galilee, and was very conſiderable for its ſtrength, ſituation, bigneſs, and opulence. It was now become obnoxious to the revolted Jews, by reaſon of its adherence to the Romans, ſo that it would have undergone a dreadful fate, had not Veſpaſian ſent timely ſuccours to it (14).

(Q) The reader may ſee the ſtrength of this place in Joſephus

(14) Bell Jud. l. iii. c. 3.

(15)

and put to fire and ſword; not one Jew eſcaped to carry the dreadful news, but they were all either murdered, or made priſoners. There were reckoned forty thouſand of the former, and but twelve hundred of the latter, among whom was Joſephus, who had hid himſelf in a deep cavern, but was at length diſcovered, and by Veſpaſian's generous offers and intreaties, though much againſt the conſent of thoſe Jews that were with him (R), went and ſurrendered himſelf priſoner to him. When he was brought before Veſpaſian, the whole army crouding about to ſee him, he was put under a guard, with a deſign to be ſent to Nero; which when the Jewiſh general underſtood, he deſired to have the liberty to ſpeak to him; which being granted, he addreſſed himſelf to him in words to this effect: My meſſage to you being from the God of heaven, is of much greater concern to you, than the diſpoſal of me as your priſoner, or ſending me to the emperor; and, as a Jew- (15), with the many other remarkable particulars of this obſtinate ſiege (16), wherein the Romans were terribly peſtered by the valour and conduct of the beſieged, and the general himſelf wounded in the heel (17). This ſtout reſiſtance occaſioned the great ſlaughter he made of them, and the vaſt diſproportion between the number of the ſlain and of the priſoners, the latter being in all probability only women and children.

Joſephus ſurrenders himſelf.

His ſpeech to Veſpaſian.

(R) This cavern was cut into the rock by the ſide of a well, and well ſtored with proviſion; and there Joſephus found forty of his own men. He went out the firſt night to ſee whether there was any poſſibility of eſcaping; but finding none, he reſolved to abide there as long as he could. He was diſcovered on the third day by a woman, and Veſpaſian, who had a great deſire to ſee him, ſent him two of his tribunes to promiſe him his life and friendſhip. Upon his refuſal to ſurrender himſelf, he ſent a third, named Nicanor, and an old acquaintance of his; but he returning likewiſe without him, the Romans were for burning him and his men out of it, but were hindered by their brave general.

At length finding it dangerous to reſiſt any longer, he propoſed to the reſt to accept of Veſpaſian's generous offer; for which they upbraided him with treachery and baſeneſs, and threatened to kill him, if he preſumed to ſtir out. He tried once more to remonſtrate to them the unlawfulneſs of ſelf-murder, which he ſaw them now fully bent upon; he was forced at laſt to propoſe to them to draw lots, who ſhould kill the next, and ſo on, till the laſt man; which being agreed to by the reſt, providence ſo ordered it, that there were but two left, viz. Joſephus and one more; ſo that being loth either to kill him, or be killed by him, he at length perſuaded him to a ſurrender, which was accordingly done (18).

(15) Ubi ſupra, c 7. (16) Ibid c. 8. ad 13. (17) Ibid. c. 14. (18) Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, c 14.

iſh commander, I ſhould have preferred death to this ſurrender, had it not been to deliver his divine commiſſion to you. The interval between Nero's end and your ſucceeding him is ſo ſmall, that I already look upon you as emperor, and your ſon Titus as your happy ſucceſſor. Keep me only as your priſoner, and if you find I have abuſed God's name in promiſing you from him the empire of the world, then puniſh me with the ſevereſt death. Veſpaſian took him at his word, uſed him with great reſpect and generoſity, but cauſed him to be kept cloſe priſoner, having a deſign to make ſome further uſe of him in his war againſt the Jews [k]. This prediction of the Jewiſh hiſtorian to the Roman general, is likewiſe confirmed by Suetonius [l] and Dion Caſſius [m]. Something like this, but with a more dreadful proſpect to the Jews, Lactantius tells us [n], had been foretold at Rome about the ſame time, by the two great apoſtles Peter and Paul; the ſubſtance of which the reader will find in the margin (S). As ſoon as the news of Kept cloſe priſoner.

A prophecy of St. Peter and Paul.

[k] Id. ibid. cap. 12, 13, & 14. [l] In vit. Veſpaſ. [m] Lib. lx. [n] Lib. iv. c. 21. Vid. Usser. ſub an. Chr. 67.

(S) That God ſhould in a little time ſend a prince againſt the Jews that ſhould overcome them, and level their metropolis with the ground: that during the ſiege of it, they ſhould pine with hunger and thirſt, even to the eating of one another: that after it was taken, they ſhould ſee their women grievouſly tormented before their eyes, their virgins deflowered, their young men torn aſunder, and their babes daſhed in pieces, themſelves reduced to the loweſt miſery, their country waſted with fire and ſword, and the whole nation baniſhed out of their own land, becauſe they had exalted themſelves above the moſt gracious and approved Son of God.

Theſe two apoſtles, according to the records of both eaſtern and weſtern churches, ſuffered martyrdom on the twenty ninth of June, the laſt day of which month falls within the reign of Nero (19); and an antient father affirms, that the day of St. Paul's death was more certainly known than that of Alexander the great (20); and Dionyſius biſhop of Corinth tells us, that St. Peter ſuffered death on the ſame day (21). St. Paul was beheaded; but St. Peter was, according to our Savour's prediction (22), crucified, but with his head downward at his own deſire, and out of reſpect to his divine maſter (23).

(19) Uſſe. annal. ſub an. Chr. 67. (20) Homil. 26. in 2 Corinth. ap. eund. (21) Ap. Euſeb. Eccl. hiſt. l. ii. c. 24. (22) John xxi. 18, & ſeq. (23) Origin. com. in Gen. tom. 3. Vid. Euſeb. ubi ſupra, l. iii. c. 1.

Jotapa's

Jotapa's being taken had reached Jeruſalem, the Jews, who heard alſo that Joſephus had been killed in it, made the greateſt mourning and lamentations for him for a whole month; but when they came to hear that he had ſurrendered himſelf priſoner to the Romans, they, who had till then retained a ſingular eſteem and regard for him, began now to look upon him as a baſe betrayer of his country, and to perſecute him with the moſt irreconcileable hatred and diſdain, of which they gave him many ſingular proofs, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel.

Jotapa and other cities taken.

WHILST Veſpaſian was beſieging Jotapa, Trajan (T) had been ſent to form that of Japha, in the neigbourhood, and took it on the twentieth of June, but complimented young Titus with the honour of it, who came accordingly upon the laſt aſſault. Upon their entering the place, the Japhians held out a bloody and obſtinate ſtreet fight during ſix whole hours; but being at length overpowered, all the men were put to the ſword, and the women and children carried away priſoners [o]. A week after, the Samaritans, who had aſſembled upon mount Garizzim, with a deſign of defending themſelves, having been cloſely ſurrounded by Cerealis at the head of a Roman detachment, were ready to periſh for want of water. Many of them ſuffered themſelves to die with thirſt, and thoſe who refuſed to ſurrender, were all butchered to one man [p]. Joppa, which had been lately laid waſte by Ceſtius, being again repeopled by a great number of ſeditious Jews, who infeſted the countries about, Veſpaſian ſent ſome troops to take it, which they ſoon atchieved. Above four thouſand Jews endeavouring to eſcape the maſſacre, by betaking themſelves to their ſhips, a ſudden tempeſt drove them back, ſo that they were all either drowned, or put to the ſword. Tarichea and Tiberias were taken next (U): the former of theſe, being ſituate on an eminence and by the lake [o] Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, c. 11. [p] Ibid. c. 12.

(T) Probably the ſame, who was afterwards emperor; but at preſent he was only a colonel of one of the legions.

(U) Theſe two cities belonged to Agrippa, but had revolted; the latter was divided; ſome of the citizens, being for peace, were oppoſed by the ſeditious party. Veſpaſian ſent ſome officers to perſuade them to ſubmit, but they were repulſed, and forced to flee for their lives; for which he would have burnt the city, but the peaceable citizens having repreſented their caſe to Agrippa, he interceded for them, and obtained their pardon (24).

(24) Bell. Jud. l. iii. c. 16.

of

of Genezareth, was beſieged by land and by water, and made a deſperate defence, till a diſſenſion happened within; which being overheard by Titus, who commanded at the ſiege, the town was taken by ſtorm, and all the ſeditious condemned to die [q].

Galilee reduced.

After the reduction of thoſe two places, all the other cities of Galilee ſubmitted themſelves to the Romans, except thoſe of Giſchala and Gamala, and the mountain of Itabyr (W.) Againſt Gamala, which was ſituate over-againſt Tarichea, on the ſame lake, as Agrippa, had in vain carried on a ſiege of near ſeven months, the Romans were forced to come and aſſiſt him. He tried, however, by a ſet ſpeech to perſuade them to ſurrender, before they were reduced to greater ſtreights. The only anſwer they made him was with ſtones from their engines, one of which wounded him in the arm. The Romans, provoked to behold the little regard which thoſe wretches paid to their monarch, made ſuch a deſperate aſſault againſt them, that they had got poſſeſſion of the town; but being inferior in number, they were ſoon driven out of it with conſiderable loſs. It was renewed afreſh with greater fury, and as obſtinately oppoſed by the beſieged, who put the Roman courage and ſtrength to the ſevereſt proof they had as yet felt. At length three ſtout Romans having beaten down one of the towers, the army entered in at the breach, and put all they met to the ſword, to the number of four thouſand. But a much greater number periſhed by their own hands, flinging themſelves down from the rocks, walls, and by other violent means. During this ſiege, Placidus was ſent to take Itabyr mentioned in the laſt note. He went and ſlily drew the Jews down into the plain by a pretended flight, faced about, and defeated them, and got poſſeſſion of the mountain [p].

[q] Ibid. c. 15, & ſeq. Ibid. l. iv. c. 1, & ſeq.

(W) The ſame with Thabor, ſpoken of in a former volume (25), with a ſpacious plain near twenty ſtades in ſquare on the top, with a city of the ſame name upon it. The area was incompaſſed with a large wall, built by Joſephus in about forty days (26).

As for the town of Sephoris, which was extremely rich and ſtrong, it never once rebel ed during all this war, but kept conſtant to their ſubjection to the Romans, ſo that Gamala and Giſchala were the two laſt towns in Galilee to be reduced.

(25) Vol. III. p. 101. (26) Bell. Jud. l. iv. c. 2.

After

AFTER this ſtout ſiege was over, Veſpaſian ſent his ſon Giſchala Titus to form that of Giſchala; and this laſt, who was now taken. beginning to relent at the great ſlaughter made at Gamala, earneſtly exhorted them to prevent, by a timely ſurrender, involving themſelves in the ſame fate. The citizens were inclinable enough to take his advice; but a ſeditious Jew of that town, named John, the ſon of Levi, head of the faction and a vile fellow, oppoſed it, and, having the mob at his beck, overawed the whole city. That day being the ſabbath, this wretch begged but of Titus to forbear hoſtilities till the morrow, and then he would accept of his offer; but inſtead of that fled to Jeruſalem, where he committed an infinite deal of miſchief. On the morrow the citizens came and ſurrendered themſelves, and told the Roman general of John's flight, begging of him that he would ſpare the guiltleſs, and only puniſh the factious, which he readily conſented to, and only ſent ſome of his horſe after the fugitives. But John had reached Jeruſalem, before they could overtake him; they killed, however, near ſix thouſand of his followers on the road, and brought back three thouſand women and children priſoners. The taking and gariſoning of this laſt place completed the conqueſt of Galilee, and Titus rejoined his father at Cæſarea, where they gave their troops ſome reſpite before they went to beſiege Jeruſalem[f].

THE Jewiſh nation by this time was divided into two very oppoſite parties: The one, foreſeeing, that this war, if continued, muſt end in the total ruin of their country, were for putting an effectual end to it, by a ſpeedy ſubmiſſion to the Romans: The other, which was the ſpawn of the Gaulonitiſh incendiary, and breathed nothing but war, confuſion, and cruelty, oppoſed all peaceable meaſures with an invincible obſtinacy. This party, which was by far the more numerous and powerful, conſiſted of men of the vileſt and moſt abandoned profligate character that ever hiſtory could parallel. They were proud, ambitious, cruel, rapacious, and committed the moſt horrid and unnatural crimes, under pretence of religion. In a word, if Joſephus's character of them may be credited, they acted more like incarnate devils, than like men, who had any ſenſe left of goodneſs and humanity. They covered, however, their helliſh brutality with the ſpecious title of zeal for the glory of God, affirming every-where, that it was offering the greateſt diſhonour to him to ſubmit to any earthly potentate, much more to Ro-

Two parties in Judæa.

A character of the zealots.

[f] Ibid. c. 4.

MAT'S

mans and heathens; and that this was the only motive that induced them to take up arms, and to bind themſelves, under the ſtricteſt obligations, not to lay them down, till they had either totally extirpated all foreign authority, or periſhed in the attempt [t] (X). This obliged the contrary party to riſe up likewiſe in arms in their own defence againſt thoſe hell-hounds, from whom, however, they ſuffered unſpeakably more, than they did even from the exaſperated Romans, as we ſhall ſoon ſee.

Their horrid butcheries. Year of the Flood 3065, Of Chriſt 70.

THE zealots began to exerciſe their cruelty in robbing, plundering, and maſſacring all that oppoſed them in the countries round about; after which they eaſily entered Jeruſalem, with Zechariah and Eleazar at their head. Here they were, at firſt, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the late high-prieſt Ananus (Y), whoſe zeal upon this occaſion Joſephus highly commends. That pontiff made a pathetic ſpeech to the people, exhorting them to take up arms againſt thoſe factious villains, who had by this time ſeized upon the temple and made it

[t] Bell. Jud. l. iv. c. 6. ad fin. l. v. c. 1, & ſeq.

(X) This dreadful diſſenſion was not confined to Jeruſalem, but had infected all the cities, towns, and villages of Paleſtine. Even houſes and families were ſo divided againſt each other, that, as our Saviour had, expreſsly foretold in the dreadful picture he made of this final war (26), a man's greateſt enemies were often thoſe of his own family and houſehold (27).

(Y) He had been depoſed about ſix years before, as we have already ſeen, and ſucceeded by ſeveral others. Matthias the ſon of Theophilus was now in that dignity, to which he had been raiſed a year or two before by king Agrippa (28); but the ſeditious in the temple took it into their heads to chuſe another in his ſtead, which they did by caſting lots firſt for the twenty four claſſes, in which the twelfth was taken, and in that, upon one Phannias, a man wholly unfit for it, and whom they were forced to teach the manner of performing his office.

This unprecedented boldneſs, joined to their maſſacres and other pollutions of the temple, and even of the very ſanctuary, gave ſuch offence, not to the prieſts only, but to all the religious Jews, that they ſought from that time for ſome means of ridding themſelves of their tyranny, whilſt the zealots crew made a jeſt of them, and of every thing that was ſacred, ſerious, or humane.

(26) Matth. xxiv paſſ Mark xiii. Luke xxi. 5, & ſeq. (27) Matth. x. 36. Luke xii. 52, & ſeq (28) Bell. Jud. l. iv. ult.

than their garison, from which they sallied out to commit the vilest outrages and butcheries. He easily persuaded them to follow his advice, upon which they went and armed themselves, and returned in a strong body, and made a vigorous attack against them. The engagement was fierce and obstinate on both sides, and lasted a considerable time. At length, Ananus forced them out of the outer cincture of the temple, whence they retired into the inner, where he held them closely besieged. We have already taken notice of a vile demagogue, John of Giscbala, who had fled lately from this last place to Jerusalem, and was at the head of the seditious; this wretch, under pretence of taking the interest of the peaceable party, was actually betraying them to the zealots. Ananus, not suspecting his treachery (Z), sent him to offer the besieged some fair terms of accommodation; instead of which, when he came to them, he persuaded them to hold out, and call the Idumeans to their assistance. They did so, and procured twenty thousand of them to come to their relief; but when these approached the metropolis, Ananus refused them entrance, and exhorted them in a civil and friendly manner to retire into their own country; at which they were so exasperated, that they accused him of being in the Roman interest, and just going to betray the city to them. They set down before the walls for that day, threatening Ananus and Jesus the son of Gamaliel, another deposed high-priest, in the severest terms, if they did not open their gates to them [u].

Seize the temple.

Invite the Idumeans.

ON that very night there happened such a dreadful storm, accompanied with thunder and lightning, and a violent earthquake, that the zealots, from within the inner court, sawed the bolts and hinges of the temple gates, without being heard, forced the guards of the besiegers, and sallied into the city, and let in the Idumeans [w]. These two parties, thus joined and strengthened, began to commit the most horrid and unheard-of murders and butcheries on the opposite side.

Horrid butcheries committed.

[u] Ibid. l. iv. c. 5, 6. [w] Cap. 7.

(Z) Such was their infatuation, that this wretch, who had screwed himself into all their councils, and betrayed them to the zealots, had behaved with such an affected integrity, that few of them suspected him; and when some of the council began to question his counterfeited zeal, they were over-ruled by the rest, who contented themselves with making him swear, that he would be true to them; which gave him all the opportunity of ruining them that he could desire.

Barely to put them to any ſpeedy death, was what they thought too mild a puniſhment; they muſt have the pleaſure to murder them by inches; ſo that they made it now their diverſion to put them to the moſt exquiſite tortures that could be invented, neither could they be prevailed upon to diſpatch them, till the violence of their torments had rendered them quite incapable of feeling them. Twelve thouſand perſons of noble extraction, and in the flower of their age, were butchered in that horrid manner, and among them the brave Ananus (A) and Jeſus the ſon of Gamaliel, who had ſo nobly oppoſed them. In a word, the zealots fury and cruelty was grown to ſuch a height, that the whole nation trembled at their very name; none dared be ſeen or heard to weep or cry for the murder of their neareſt relations, nor even to give them burial [x].

The Idumeans crying out ſhame at length at the maſſacring of ſuch numbers of worthy perſons indiſcriminately, the zealots began to ſet up a kind of court of judicature, to judge thoſe they ſhould think guilty with ſome ſhew of juſtice. Zechariah the ſon of Baruch (B) was one of the firſt who [x] Lib. v. c. 1.

(A) We have obſerved elſewhere, that he was the ſon of Annas mentioned in the goſpel: It was he that cauſed St. James to be caſt down from the battlements of the temple, and to be put to death. In other caſes, he was a brave man, and the only perſon almoſt that had courage and conduct enough left to ſtem the tide, and to reſtore peace to the nation; and it was for this reaſon that the zealots cut him off.

(B) This brave and worthy perſon is by many chriſtian commentators ſuppoſed the ſame with the Zechariah the ſon of Barachiah, ſaid by our Saviour to have been murdered between the temple and the altar (29). It is indeed objected, that he ſpeaks there of him, as of a perſon long ſince put to death; but it is replied, that he ſpake prophetically, and, according to the prophetic ſtyle, made uſe of the preſent for the future. And it muſt be owned, that unleſs theſe two hiſtorians ſpeak of the ſame perſon, it will be difficult to find out the Zechariah mentioned in the goſpel; the laſt of thoſe juſt perſons, the ſhedding of whoſe blood was to fill up the meaſure of the Jews iniquities.

We ſhall not enter into the merit of the controverſy, but refer our readers to thoſe who have writ upon it, and which the reader will find in the margin (30).

(29) Matth xxiii. 35. (30) Vid. Grot. Hamm. Le Clerc, Beza, Tremel. L. de Dieu, & Fabric. Apocr. N. T. not. in Protevang. Jacob.

W.

was brought before this mock court, which consisted of seventy two persons. They brought a black catalogue of accusations against him, which he not only refelled with great ease and plainness, but reminded them of their own black and hellish crimes, with such noble courage and in such lively colours, that the consciousness of their guilt made them pronounce him innocent; at which the zealots were so exasperated, that they murdered him on the spot, bidding him at the same time to take that absolution at their hands, which would prove surer to him than that of his judges; after which they drove these out of their seats as persons unfit for their purpose. They threw the body of Zechariah out of the temple down into the deep valley that was by the side of it; and the Idumeans, ashamed to act any longer in concert with such bloody assassins, retired into their own country, after having set at liberty two thousand of their prisoners; and left the zealots to reign in their cruelties without any further restraint. From this time these bloody hell-hounds, who were glad at heart to see their backs turned upon them, gave themselves a loose to all manner of barbarities; and as nothing rendered a man more dreadful to them than the bare suspicion of his being honest or virtuous, so they made the greatest havock among all that had the least pretence to that character [y].

Zechariah murdered in the temple.

THEIR rage did not stop there; but after having butchered all the persons of any distinction or character, they began to wreak it on the common people. It was a capital crime to have once seemed to oppose them: to be unactive, was to be a spy on them; and not to applaud their vilest actions, was to be disaffected; and to be either rich, or suspected to be so, or even having the misfortune of being disliked by them, was crime enough to deserve death [z]. This obliged many of the Jews to forsake Jerusalem and take shelter under the Romans, though the gates and avenues of the city were so closely guarded, that it was extremely hazardous to retire to them, and as many as were caught doing so were put to immediate death. All this while Vespasian, who was at Cæsarea, remained a kind of idle spectator afar off of the dismal condition of the Jewish nation. His officers amazed, at this so unusual inaction, took the liberty to remind him, what pity it was he should thus neglect the most favourable opportunity of making himself master of Jerusalem and all Palestine. Vespasian, who had a longer head than they, soon made them sensible, that his continuing thus idle in Cæsarea was the most probable means of effecting the conquest they were speaking of, with Vespasian stays at Cæsarea.

[y] Ibid. [z] Ibid. in fin.

the leaſt difficulty and hazard of his own troops; ſince the Jewiſh ſtrength dwindled daily more and more by their inteſtine broils and maſſacres, whilſt his own men, after enjoying ſo long a refreſhment, would be the better able to cruſh them into ſubmiſſion or death [a] (C).

The zealots divided into two factions.

EVERY thing ſucceeded to his wiſh. The zealots, after having maſſacred or driven away the oppoſite party, began to turn their bloody ſwords againſt each other. John of Giſchala, a wretch of unparalleled ambition, could not brook that any ſhould ſhare the command with him; and, in order to make himſelf abſolute, drew the moſt profligate of the zealots into his party. The other chiefs, who oppoſed him with no ſmall heat, made another faction, ſo that they were ever either ſkirmiſhing with each other, or plundering the poor remains of the people. Whilſt things went thus on from bad to worſe in the city, there aroſe a new gang of ſicarii in the country, who having ſeized the ſtrong fortreſs of Maſſada, made it their place of retreat. Theſe plundered, burned, and maſſacred every-where, and carried their plunder into that place. They had at their head one Simon the ſon of Gorias, a bold ambitious young man, a native of Gelaſa, who, to increaſe his party, cauſed a proclamation to Simon head of the ſicarii.

[a] Ibid. c 2.

(C) The event ſhewed that he reaſoned like a conſummate general; for thoſe cruelties did not only thin the enemy, but forced a vaſt many of the zealots away to the Romans, by reaſon of ſome diſſenſions which began to reign among them, and in ſpight of the danger of being caught in the way.

Among their cruel executions on theſe, there was one Niger a Peraite or native of Perea, a perſon of diſtinction, who had ſignalized himſelf in their former wars againſt the Romans; who together with the brave Gorion, was ſeized, and dragged ſhamefully out of the city; where the former, finding his death inevitable, only begged that his body might be afterwards buried. But the mercileſs wretches refuſing to grant him even that, he addreſſed himſelf to heaven, and prayed, that the Romans might at length come, and wreak their direct vengeance on thoſe murderers. His words were looked upon as prophetical; but Joſephus mentions ſome other oracles, which had long ago foretold the total ruin of that nation, as well as deſtruction of the city and temple. Whoever reads the eleventh and following chapters of Zechariah, will be apt enough to think, that the Jewiſh hiſtorian had an eye to them (31), among the many others we could name to the ſame purpoſe.

(31) Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, in fin cap. 1.

be

be diſperſed, in which he promiſed free liberty to all the ſlaves, and proportionable encouragements to all the freemen, that ſhould come over to him. This ſtratagem had the deſired effect; and he ſaw his party in a very little time ſwelled into a conſiderable army, and himſelf as reſpected and obeyed, as if he had been a monarch. Many Jews of diſtinction, as well as others of a meaner rank, were glad thus to put themſelves under his protection from the cruelties of the other parties [b].

WHILST theſe things were thus tranſacting in Judæa, Nero, having being declared an enemy to Rome by the ſenate, left both it and the world to avoid the more ſhameful puniſhment decreed againſt him [c], as ſhall be further ſhewn in the Roman hiſtory. Veſpaſian, who was yet ignorant of it, and did not give great heed to Joſephus's prediction of his becoming emperor, was making great preparations againſt the revolted Jews and for the ſiege of Jeruſalem, whilſt Simon, at the head of a good army, was making war againſt the zealots. Theſe laſt, having notice what great magazines of arms and ammunition Simon had got, in order to come and inveſt them, began to think it high time to try to diſperſe his forces by a vigorous ſally. They did ſo, and were defeated and put to flight; but Simon, not thinking himſelf ſtrong enough yet to beſiege Jeruſalem, went to invade Idumea with an army of twenty thouſand men. The Idumeans marched againſt him with twenty five thouſand, which was all they could get in that ſhort time. A fierce battle enſued, which laſted from morning till night, by which time it could ſcarcely be gueſſed which ſide had had the better. But Simon found means ſoon after to have that country betrayed to him by a treacherous Idumean (D), who having got the command of their forces, delivered them up to him, as had been

Nero's death. Year of the Flood, 3066. Of Chriſt, 71

Idumea invaded by Simon.

Betrayed to him.

[b] Ibid. c. 3, & ſeq. [c] SUETON. in Neron. c. 40. TACIT. hiſt. l. i.

(D) This miſcreant, whoſe name was James, was one of the Idumean chiefs, and was ſent by the reſt to reconnoitre the enemy, and know the number of their forces. He ſet out from the Idumean camp at Olura, and privately agreed with Simon to deliver up the army and country to him, on condition he ſhould be treated with honour; which being promiſed, he returned to his camp, and there repreſented the enemy's army as vaſtly more numerous and ſtrong than it really was; by which means he eaſily obtained the command, and compaſſed his treacherous deſign (32).

(32) Bell. Jud. l. 7. c. 7.

agreed

agreed between them. Simon put all to fire and sword, and, by the conquest of that province, became more dreadful than ever to the zealots; who from that time did not dare to come out against him, but contented themselves with laying ambushes against him in all the passes, in one of which they took his wife prisoner. They were on the sudden strangely elated at their success, not doubting but they should now easily force him to lay down his arms, in order to get her released to him. But it happened quite otherwise; for Simon no sooner heard the news, than he posted with his army to the very gates of Jerusalem, where he committed such cruelties, and threatened the enemy into such a fright, that they were glad to send him his wife again, after which he left them to go and ruin the sad remains of Idumea. These miserable wretches, seeing the devastations and butcheries which he committed there, left the country to his mercy, and went to take shelter at Jerusalem, and were pursued by his troops to the very walls of that metropolis [d].

Thus Simon without, and John within, seemed to strive which should outdo the other in cruelties and in the most unheard-of crimes; whilst those that fell into either hands were sure to be butchered without mercy; insomuch, that there was no safe place either in city or country. John had hitherto tyrannised within at the head of his blood-hounds with uncommon success, when the Idumeans, who were left in the city and were of his party, not being longer able to bear his tyranny, revolted against him, killed a great number of his men, plundered his palace (E), and forced him to retire into the temple. In the mean time, the people, having taken a notion that he would sally out in the night and set fire to the city, called a council, in which they pitched upon a remedy far worse than the disease, which [d] Bell. Jud. ubi supra, c. 7.

(E) This palace had, it seems, been built there by the princess Grapta, cousin to Izates king of Adiabene, of whom we have had occasion to speak in the last volume *

As for the horrid crimes and bestialities of the zealots within, as well as of Simon without, they are of so shocking a nature, that we shall pass them by in silence. Those that can read them without horror, may see them in the Jewish historian (33).

* Vol. IX. p. 484, & seq.

(33) Bell. Jud. ibid. & seq. ad c. 9.

was

was to open the city gates, and let in Simon with his troops to oppose those of John and his zealots. Matthias, the then high-priest, against whom these last had set up an obscure priest into that dignity, promoted the design, without troubling himself about the consequences of it, and was sent to acquaint Simon with it. Simon was accordingly admitted into the city, where his chief care now was to render his strength as great, and authority as absolute, as he could. To this end he looked indifferently on those that had invited him in, and those against whom he was called, and soon began to exert his cruelty against them equally, though the former had received him, with great honours and universal acclamations, as their future deliverer. But ingratitude and breach of faith were crimes of too light a nature to scare a wretch that had discarded all natural and civil virtues, to abandon himself to the most monstrous vices. He made, however, a bold assault against John and his party; but being as stoutly repulsed, he contented himself for the present with keeping them closely besieged in the temple [e].

THE Romans on the other hand had not stood idle all this last year; but being invited by the inhabitants of Gadara, one of the strongest places on that side Jordan, had sent Placidus to take possession of it. He was forced to fight his way through several stout bodies of the factious who opposed him. He killed about fifteen thousand of them, as they were endeavouring to pass that river, besides a great number of others, whom he defeated at several encounters, and many more made prisoners. In a word, Placidus bestirred himself so well, that he soon reduced all that part of Judæa which lies on the east side of the Jordan, except the castle of Macheron. All this was done in the winter. In the beginning of the spring, Vespasian marched out of Cæsarea, and penetrated near half of Idumea, plundering and burning every place he came through, except such as he thought expedient to leave with a Roman garison to keep the country in awe [f].

Gadara surrendered.

Idumea wasted.

SOME months before this time, Vespasian received the news of Nero's death, and of Galba's being chosen his successor; upon which he immediately dispatched his son Titus to Rome, to compliment the new emperor, and to receive his orders concerning the reduction of Judæa. Agrippa desired to bear him company, but the winter not being quite over, and their ships being of a large bulk, they sailed so slowly,

[e] Ibid. c. 9. [f] Ibid. cap. 3.

that

that they were got no farther than Achaia, when they received the news of Galba's being murdered, after a seven months reign, and Otho's being proclaimed in his room. Agrippa resolved to continue his voyage, but Titus, as by some divine impulse, was now come back to rejoin his father at Cæsarea, whither he was returned after his Idumean expedition [g]. They left Cæsarea on the fifth of June, and led their army towards Jerusalem, and took every place in their way thither, except Herodion, Macheron, and Massada, whilst Cerealis, one of their chief generals, was laying waste the upper Idumea with a considerable number of troops.

Year of the Flood 3066. Of Christ, $\frac{7}{6}\frac{1}{8}$

WHILST Judæa was thus miserably torn with a foreign, and with their intestine wars, the Roman empire was in as bad a plight with their own. We shall not anticipate on the Roman history, so far as to enter into the particulars of the murder of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius. Suetonius [h] compares Rome to a vessel tossed about by contrary winds, and ready at every moment to sink, when Vespasian was happily chosen emperor, and restored a calm to the empire. Josephus now reaped the benefit of his former predictions, and that emperor recalling them to mind, thought it high time now not only to give him his liberty, but recompense him for his faithfulness to him with many signal favours [i] (F). As soon as Vespasian had received the news that his election had been con-

Vespasian chosen emperor.

Josephus set at liberty.

[g] TACIT. SUETON. ubi supra. bell. Jud. ubi supra, c. 8, & seq.
[h] In vit. Vespas. [i] Ubi supra, cap. 12.

(F) Vespasian was then at Berytus, where vast numbers of embassadors came crouding to compliment him on his election, and to offer him the usual crowns and letters of submission. Here he held a grand council, wherein having highly extolled the courage of the Jewish chief, he related to them how he had foretold his coming to the empire even during Nero's life.

Titus, who was there present, and had conceived a great esteem for him, declared, that it would be an action worthy his goodness and justice to grant him his liberty, to knock off his fetters, and to restore him to the rank and condition which he enjoyed before his captivity; it being the custom of the Romans to break the bonds of those who had been unjustly detained in them. Vespasian approved his proposal, and caused it to be put in execution out of hand; and Josephus not only gained his liberty by it, but got the reputation of a prophet, and was in high credit in the Roman army ever after (34).

(34) Bell. Jud. l. vi. c. 2.

Armed

firmed at Rome, he left the beſt of his troops with his ſon, with orders to go and beſiege Jeruſalem and to deſtroy it utterly; after which he prepared himſelf to return to the capital of his empire.

Three factions in Jeruſalem.

ALL this while the Jewiſh diſſenſions increaſed, and Eleazar, the ſon of another Simon, a perſon of the ſacerdotal order and of great ſenſe and courage, found means to form a new party, and to draw a conſiderable number of John of Giſchala's men to him, under pretence, that this laſt was become ſo inhuman and tyrannic, that it was dangerous to let him lord it any longer over them. With this new party he ſeized on the court of the prieſts, and confined John into that of the Iſraelites. Eleazar kept the avenues ſo well guarded, that none were admitted to come into that part of the temple, but thoſe who came thither to offer ſacrifices, and it was by theſe offerings chiefly that he maintained himſelf and his men. John by this means found himſelf hemmed by two powerful enemies, Eleazar above (G), and Simon, who was maſter of the city, below. He defended himſelf againſt the former by his engines (H), out of which he kept ſtill throwing of ſtones into his court; and when he ſallied out againſt the latter, he ſet all on fire where-ever he could reach, by which he deſtroyed

(G) We have formerly obſerved in our deſcription of this ſtately building, that the innermoſt court was raiſed conſiderably above the reſt, having a terrace and nineteen ſteps to aſcend to the area of it *.

(H) John had luckily found a great quantity of large cedar trees, which king Agrippa had cauſed to be brought from Lebanus at a vaſt charge, to raiſe the temple twenty cubits higher than it was, or perhaps that part which we obſerved in the note laſt quoted to have been ſunk that number of cubits through the weakneſs of the foundation; but his project was ſet aſide by reaſon of the war

John, having poſſeſſion of this court, ſoon put this timber to other uſes, and cauſed towers and other engines to be made with it, in order to beſiege his competitor within; and indeed he ceaſed not harraſſing him, but whilſt he was forced to defend himſelf againſt Simon, who beſieged him from without. The flight of ſteps and terrace mentioned in the laſt note not permitting him to bring his towers near enough to the wall of the inner cincture, he was projecting to have removed them towards the weſtern ſide, where the ground was all plain; but providence ſo ordered it, ſtroyed great quantities of corn and other proviſions, with which they might otherwiſe have held out a ſiege ſeveral years. Thus were theſe three factions ever watching all advantages againſt each other. Simon had the greateſt number of troops and a ſtore of arms and proviſions, his army conſiſting of ten thouſand zealots and five thouſand Idumeans; but he was the moſt diſadvantageouſly ſituated of the three. John had the advantage over him in this laſt reſpect, but had but ſix thouſand men, and was forced to get proviſions for them by his conſtant ſallies. He was ſuperior to Eleazar in number of men; this laſt having but about two thouſand four hundred. But he was more ſtrongly ſituated, and was continually ſupplied with proviſions, by the continual offerings which the people brought to the temple, and which they often abuſed by luxury and drunkenneſs [k].

* See before, pag. 185 ſub not.

Their condition and advantages,

This was the ſad diſtracted ſtate of Jeruſalem, when Titus marched his army againſt it. He had, beſides the three legions which had ſerved under his father, the fifth legion, which had been ſo ſadly handled by the Jews in Ceſtius's time, and now burned with a deſire of revenge. Beſides theſe, Agrippa, Soemus, and Antiochus, the two former of whom accompanied him in perſon, and ſome allied cities, had furniſhed him with twenty regiments of foot and eight of horſe, beſides vaſt multitudes of Arabs, and a choice number of perſons of diſtinction from Italy and other places, who came to ſignalize themſelves under his ſtandards. Titus ordered the fifth legion to take the road of Emmaus, the tenth that of Jericho, the other two legions marched after him in the order, which the reader will find in the margin [l] (I). It was that Titus began the ſiege of the city before he could compaſs it, which made him ſet his project aſide.

[k] Bell. Jud. l. 6. c. 1.

[l] Ibid. in fin. & cap. 2.

(I) Joſephus, who was an eye-witneſs of it, becauſe he was ſtill ordered to follow the emperor, gives it to us as follows *:

'The auxiliaries marched firſt, and were followed by the pioneers, whoſe buſineſs was to level the ground as they went. After them came the general quarter maſters, who marked out their incampments, and were followed by the baggage of the chiefs of the army under a ſufficient eſcort.

* Ibid. c. 1 in fin.

Titus

was now the beginning of April, and near the feaſt of the paſſover, to which there was a greater reſort of Jews this year than had ever been known, even from beyond the Euphrates (K).

Titus

'Titus came next, attended with his guard, and a ſelect body of troops, followed by a body of horſe, who marched juſt before the warlike engines; and after theſe came the tribunes and chiefs of the cohorts, attended with a choſen number of troops. Then appeared the Roman eagle, ſurrounded with the enſigns of the ſeveral legions, and preceded by a number of trumpets ſounding, and followed by the main body, which marched in rank and file ſix in a front. Laſtly, came the ſutlers, handicrafts, &c. attended with a ſtrong guard of ſoldiers, which cloſed the whole march. In this order they came to Gophna, which had a Roman gariſon, and on the next day to Gibbeath-Saul, about thirty ſtades, or three miles and a half from Jeruſalem.

(K) The chiefs of the Jews in Paleſtine had written, it ſeems, to invite all their brethren every-where, not doubting but their preſence and great concourſe would contribute to quell the factions within, as well as oppoſe the Romans without; ſo that they came flocking to this ſolemnity from all parts of the world.

But it ſeems as if they were directed thither by the hand of providence, to ſuffer the puniſhment of their ſins, the bulk of the nation being there, as it were, ſhut up in a priſon, to add to that of the deſtroying ſword, the dreadful plagues of famine and peſtilence, which ſhortly after devoured them. Joſephus reckons eleven hundred thouſand that died during the ſiege.

They neither wanted arms, warlike engines, men, or courage, or any thing but experience to make a brave defence; but this they made up by their invincible obſtinacy and deſpair. Their city was ſtrongly ſituate by nature, ſurrounded with three ſtout walls, and many a ſtately and ſtrong tower The firſt, or old wall, which, by reaſon of its vaſt thickneſs, was looked upon as impregnable, had ſixty of theſe towers, very lofty, firm, and ſtrong. The ſecond had fourteen, and the third eighty. The former of theſe, beſides its extraordinary height and thickneſs, was raiſed on a high and ſteep mountain, and had a valley beneath it of a prodigious depth. The other two were high and ſtrong in proportion. The circuit of the city was thirty three ſtades, or four thouſand one hundred and twenty five geometric paces, or near four of our miles.

Beſides theſe vaſt fortifications, there were ſeveral other caſtles of extraordinary ſtrength, ſuch as thoſe of Hippicos, Phaſael, Mariamne, and Antonia; to ſay nothing of the royal, and ſome other ſtately and well-fortified palaces. The temple ſtill exceeded all the reſt in ſtrength, both for ſituation, its walls, towers, and other buildings, and was at leaſt equal to the beſt citadels then in being Titus's army. Year of the flood, 3066. Of Christ, 71 or 68.

Titus being advanced so near the city, went himself to reconnoitre its strength and avenues, attended only with six hundred horse; he seemed even to flatter himself, that, upon his first appearance the peaceable part of the Jews would open the gates to him; but, to his surprize, the factious made so sudden and vigorous a sally against him, that he found himself quite surrounded with enemies, in a narrow defile, his cavalry severed from him, so that he had no other way left to escape their fury, but to make a desperate push, and break his way through them; which he at length, almost by a miracle, happily accomplished, even without receiving any wound, or losing more than two of his men [m]. After this narrow escape he caused his army to draw nearer to Scopas, within seven stades of the city, in order to besiege it in form, whilst the factious within were applauding themselves for their late advantage, which they vainly interpreted as a good omen of their future success. His legion, which had come by the way of Jericho, being arrived, he ordered it to incamp on the mount of Olives, which was parted from the town on the east by the brook Cedron, and where they were on the sudden so furiously assaulted by the besieged, that they were in danger of being cut all in pieces, had not Titus come timely to their rescue (L).

Jerusalem besieged.

It was then that the three factions, seeing themselves besieged by so powerful an army, and so brave a general, began to think of laying aside all private feuds, and join together in a vigorous defence against the common enemy. This union, however, proved but short lived; for on the four-

[m] Ibid. ad fin.

(35). Yet how insufficient did all these, and the vast quantities of arms, ammunition, &c. prove, to save a nation, whom the divine justice had doomed to the most dreadful destruction! Well might Titus, after he had taken the city, and came to view the incredible strength of it, cry out, that God must certainly have fought for him, since no human power or strength was equal to that which they had now overcome.

(L) Dio adds to what we read in Josephus, that Titus had many such bloody encounters with the besieged under the walls, in which both sides fought so valiantly, that it was not easy to say which had the better; but that the Jews were at length repulsed, and gave thereby an opportunity to the enemy to open the siege (36).

(35) See Josephus, ibid. ch. 6.

(36) Lib. lxvi. Vid. & Tacit. hist. l. v. c. 11.

teenth

teenth of April, which was ushering in the passover, when Eleazar had opened the avenues of his court to the great concourse that came thither to sacrifice, John of Giscbala found means to slide in some of his men with swords hid under their cloaks among them, who immediately drew their weapons, fell on Eleazar's party, and the rest of the people, filled the court of the priests with blood and horrid outcries, and took possession of the place. By this bloody and impious stratagem the three factions were reduced to two, Eleazar's men being all either cut off, or, after their flight, were returned with their chief, and had submitted themselves to John, who had now no enemy but Simon within the walls. From that time this last renewed his hostilities against him with greater vigour: he held now the whole temple, some of the out-parts of it, and the valley of Cedron. Simon had the whole city to range in, in some parts of which John had made such devastation, that they served them for a field of battle; from which they sallied unanimously against the common enemy, whenever occasion served, after which they returned to their usual hostilities, turning their arms against each other, as if they had sworn to make their ruin more easy to the Romans. These in the mean time were drawing still nearer to the walls, having, with great labour and pains, levelled all the ground between Scopas and them, by pulling down all the houses and hedges, cutting down the trees, and even cleaving the rocks that stood in their way, from Scopas to the tomb of Herod and Bethara, alias the pool of serpents; in which work so many hands were employed, that they finished it in four days[n].

John and Simon join against the enemy, and then fight against each other.

WHILST this work was doing, Titus sent the besieged some offers of peace; Josephus was pitched upon to be the messenger of them, but they were rejected with indignation. On the morrow they made a shew of accepting them, insomuch that some of the Romans, believing them in earnest, ventured, contrary to their general's order, to enter the city, and narrowly escaped with their lives. He sent a second time Nicanor and Josephus with fresh offers, and the former received a wound in his shoulder; upon which Titus resolved to begin the assault in good earnest (M), and ordered

The siege began in form.

Offers of peace rejected.

his

[n] Ibid cap 7.

(M) The place which Titus, after having taken a full view round the city, chose to begin his attack, was towards the tomb of the high-priest John, both because it stood on the lowest ground, and because his men to raze the ſuburbs, to cut down all the trees, and uſe the materials to raiſe platforms againſt the wall. Every thing was now carried on with invincible ardour, the Romans began to play their engines againſt the city in good earneſt, and it was by one of theſe that Jeſus the ſon of Ananus, who had ſo long foretold the deſtruction of the Jewiſh nation, was killed [o].

The Jews had likewiſe their machines upon the walls, which they plyed with uncommon fury: they had taken them lately from Ceſtius, when he retired ſo ſhamefully from them, but they were ſo ignorant in their uſe, that they made little execution with them, till they were better inſtructed by ſome Roman deſerters. Till then their chief ſucceſs was rather owing to their frequent ſallies; but the Roman legions, which had all their towers and machines before them, made terrible havock. The leaſt ſtones they threw were near a hundred weight, and theſe they could throw the length of two ſtades, or two hundred and fifty paces, and with ſuch force, that having overthrown thoſe that ſtood in the firſt rank, they could ſtill do miſchief on thoſe that ſtood at ſome diſtance behind them. Titus had reared three towers fifty cubits high on the terraſs above-mentioned; one of which happening to fall in the middle of the night, did greatly alarm the Roman camp, which ran immediately to arms at the noiſe of it; but Titus, upon knowing the cauſe, diſmiſſed them, and cauſed it to be ſet up again. Theſe towers being plated with iron, the Jews tried in vain to ſet fire to them, and were at length forced to retire out of the reach of their ſhot; by which the battering rams were now at full liberty to play againſt the wall. A breach was ſoon made in it, at which the Romans entered, and the Jews, abandoning this laſt incloſure, retired behind the next. This happened about the twenty eighth of April, a fortnight after the beginning of the ſiege [p].

The firſt wall broken and entered.

John defended the temple and the caſtle of Antonia, and Simon the reſt of the city. Titus marched cloſe to the ſecond wall, and plied his battering rams againſt it ſo furiouſly, that one of the towers, which looked towards the north, gave a [o] Ibid. [p] Ibid. c. 8, & 9.

cauſe the outer wall was low, and not defended on that ſide by the middlemoſt; ſo that when the breach was made on the former, it was eaſy to penetrate to the latter, and ſo come up to, and make themſelves maſters of the upper city, and next of the temple, by means of the fortreſs Antonia.

prodigious

prodigious ſhake. The men that were in it made a ſignal to the Romans, as if they would ſurrender, and at the ſame time ſent Simon word to be ready to give them a warm reception. Titus having ſmelt their ſtratagem, plied his work more furiouſly, whilſt the Jews that were in the tower ſet it on fire, and flung themſelves into the flames. The tower being fallen gave them an entrance into the ſecond incloſure, five days after the gaining of the firſt; and Titus who was bent on ſaving the city, would not ſuffer any part of the wall or ſtreets to be demoliſhed, which left the breach and lanes ſo narrow, that when his men were furiouſly repulſed by Simon, they had not room enough to make a quick retreat, ſo that there was a number of them killed in it. This overſight was quickly rectified, and the attack renewed with ſuch vigour, that the place was carried four days after their firſt repulſe [q]. The ſecond wall taken

THE famine raging in a terrible manner in the city, was ſoon followed by a peſtilence, and as theſe two dreadful judgments increaſed, ſo did the rage of the factious, who, by their inteſtine feuds, had deſtroyed ſuch quantities of proviſion, that they were forced to prey upon the people with the moſt unheard of cruelty. They forced their houſes, and if they found any victuals in them, they butchered them for not appriſing them of it; and if they found nothing but bare walls, which was almoſt every-where the caſe, they put them to the moſt ſevere tortures, under pretence that they had ſome proviſion concealed [r]. I ſhould, ſays Joſephus, undertake an impoſſible task, were I to enter into a detail of all the cruelties of thoſe impious wretches; it will be ſufficient to ſay, that I do not think, that ſince the creation, any city ever ſuffered ſuch dreadful calamities, or abounded with men ſo fertile in all kind of wickedneſs [s]. Famine and peſtilence.

Titus, who knew their miſerable condition, and was ſtill willing to ſpare them, gave them now four days to cool; during which he cauſed his army to be muſtered, and proviſions to be diſtributed to them in ſight of the Jews, who flocked upon the walls to ſee it; and it is thought, that even the moſt flagitious among the zealots were ſo frighted at the ſight of it, that they would have agreed to a ſurrender, could they have depended upon that pardon, which their black and horrid deeds made them quite deſpair of. Joſephus was ſent to ſpeak to them afreſh, and to exhort them not to run themſelves into an inevitable ruin, by obſtinately perſiſting in the defence of a place which could hold out but a very little while, Joſephus's ſpeech to the beſieged.

[q] Ibid. cap. 10. [r] Cap. 11. [s] Ibid. in fin.

and

and which the Romans looked upon already as their own. The reader may see his elaborate and pathetic speech in the chapter last quoted, and which, he tells us, drew a flood of tears from him. His stubborn people, after many a bitter invective, fell a darting their arrows at him, at which not at all discouraged, he went on with greater vehemence; but all the effect it wrought on them was only, that it prevailed on great numbers to steal away privately to the Romans, whilst the rest became only the more desperate, and resolute to hold out to the last, in spite of Titus's merciful offers.

The city immured.

To hasten therefore to their destined ruin, he caused the city to be surrounded with a strong wall, to prevent their receiving any succours or provision from abroad, or their escaping his resentment by flight (N). There was now nothing to be seen through the streets of Jerusalem, but heaps of dead bodies rotting above ground, walking skeletons, and dying wretches. As many as were caught by the Romans in their sallies, Titus caused to be crucified in sight of the town, to inject a terror on the rest; but the zealots gave it out, that they were those that fled to him for protection, which when Titus understood, he sent a prisoner with his hands cut off to undeceive and assure them, that he spared all that voluntarily came over to him; which encouraged great numbers to accept his offers, though the avenues were closely guarded by the factious, who put all to death who were caught going on that errand [t]. A greater mischief than that was, that even those, who escaped safe to the Roman camp, were miserably butchered by the soldiers, from a notion which these had taken, that they had swallowed great quantities of gold: insomuch, that two thousand of them were ripped up in one night to come at their supposed treasure [u]. When Titus was apprised of this barbarity, he would have condemned all those butchering wretches to death; but they proved so numerous, that he was forced to spare them, and contented himself with sending a proclamation through his camp, that as many as should be suspected thenceforward of that horrid villainy, should be put to immediate death; yet did not this deter many of them:

Horrid butcheries within and without.

[t] Ibid. c. 12, & seq. [u] Cap. 15.

(N) This wall, which was near forty stades, or five miles in circuit, was yet carried on with such speed and by so many hands, that it was finished in three days; by which one may guess at the ardour of the besiegers to make themselves masters of the city (37).

(37) Ibid c. 13.

from

from it, only they did it more privately than before; ſo greedy were they of that bewitching metal. All this while the defection increaſed ſtill more through the inhumanity of the faction within, who made the miſeries and dying groans of their ſtarving brethren the ſubject of their cruel mirth, and carried their barbarity even to the ſheathing of their ſwords in ſport on thoſe poor wretches, under pretence of trying their ſharpneſs.

Falſe prophets ſet up.

WHEN they found therefore, that neither their guards nor ſeverities could prevent the people's flight, they had recourſe to another ſtratagem equally impious and cruel; which was to hire a pack of vile pretenders to prophecy, to go about and encourage the deſpairing remains of the people to expect a ſpeedy and miraculous deliverance; and this impoſture proved a greater expedient with that infatuated nation, than their other precautions. We ſhall not ſo far diſguſt our readers, as to mention what miſerable ſhifts theſe poor wretches made uſe of to prolong the ſad remains of a life, which ought to have been more loathſome under ſuch circumſtances, than the filthy and unnatural aliments they picked up to ſupport it [w]. It was upon this ſad and pinching juncture (O), that an unhappy mother was reduced to the extremity of butchering and eating her own child. This lady, whoſe name was Miriam or Mary, had taken refuge with a vaſt number of others in this accurſed city from the beginning of the war. As the famine increaſed, the factious zealots, who, as we obſerved before, lived now altogether upon the plunder of the helpleſs, had

A mother eats her own child.

[w] Ibid. l. vii. c. 7.

(O) Nothing could be more dreadful than the famiſhing condition they were now reduced to. The poor, having nothing to truſt to but the Romans mercy, or a ſpeedy death, ran all hazards to get out of the city; and if, in their flight and wandering out for herbs, or any other ſuſtenance, they fell into the hands of any of Titus's parties, ſent about to guard the avenues, they were unmercifully ſcourged, and crucified, if they made the leaſt reſiſtance.

The rich within the walls were now forced, though in the privateſt manner, to give half, or all they were worth, for a meaſure of wheat, and the middling ſort for one of barley. This they were forced to convey into ſome private place in their houſes, and to feed upon it as it was, without daring to pound or grind it, much leſs to boil or bake it, leſt the noiſe or ſmell ſhould draw the rapacious zealots to come and tear it from them. Not that theſe were reduced to any real want of proviſions, but they had a double end in this barbarous plunder, viz. the ſtarving what they cruelly ſtyled all uſeleſs perſons, and the keeping their own ſtores in reſerve often forced into her houſe, and carried off ſuch proviſions as ſhe had been able to procure. She had often tried either by prayers to prevail on them, or by the bittereſt curſes to provoke them, to put an end to her miſerable life; but thoſe inhuman monſters ſtill thought it too great a mercy to be granted to her. Filled at length with fury and deſpair, ſhe ſnatches her ſucking child from her boſom, cuts his throat, and broils him; and having ſatiated her preſent hunger, ſhe hid the reſt. The ſmell of it ſoon drew thoſe voraciou carrions again to her houſe; they threatened to put her to the moſt excruciating tortures, if ſhe did not diſcover her proviſions to them; upon which ſhe goes and fetches them the ſad relicts of her mangled infant, and ſets it before them, bids them eat heartily, and not be ſqueamiſh, ſince ſhe, the once tender mother of it, had made no ſcruple to butcher, dreſs, and make a meal of it. At the ſight of this horrid diſh thoſe bloody hell-hounds, who never had till then felt the leaſt ſpark of remorſe or humanity, were ſeized with ſuch ſudden dread, that they went off trembling out of the houſe, and left the aſtoniſhed mother in full poſſeſſion of her diſmal fare [x].

Titus ſwears the ruin of the city.

WHEN this news was ſpread thro' the city, the horror and conſternation was as univerſal as it was inexpreſſible. It was then, that they began to think themſelves forſaken by the divine providence, and to expect the moſt terrible effects of his anger againſt the poor remains of their nation; inſomuch that they began to envy thoſe that had periſhed before them, and to wiſh their turn might come before the ſad expected cataſtrophe. Their fears were but too juſt; ſince Titus, at the very firſt hearing of this inhuman deed, ſwore the total extirpation of the city and people. Since, ſaid he, they have ſo often refuſed my proffers of pardon, and have preferred war to peace, rebellion to obedience, and famine, ſuch a dreadful one eſpecially, to plenty, I am determined to bury that curſed metropolis under its ruins, that the ſun may never ſhoot his beams on a city, where the mothers feed on the fleſh of their children, and the fathers, no leſs guilty than they, choſe to drive them to ſuch extremities, rather than lay down their arms. In the like manner did that good-natured general expoſtulate with the Deity for the other cruelties which he ſaw and heard were committed in that wretched metropolis, eſpecially at the ſight of ſuch vaſt numbers of dead bodies, which, for want of burying-room, they were forced to throw down from their walls into the adjacent vallies; taking heaven to witneſs, that he was innocent of all thoſe horrid calamities which that infatu-

[x] Cap. 8.

ated

ated nation had brought upon themſelves, and might have prevented by a timely ſubmiſſion [y] (P).

THIS dreadful action happened about the end of July, by which time the Romans, having purſued their attacks with freſh vigour, made themſelves maſters of the fortreſs Antonia; which obliged the Jews to ſet fire to thoſe ſtately galleries which joined it to the temple, leſt they ſhould afford an eaſy paſſage to the beſiegers into this laſt [z]. About the ſame time Titus with much difficulty got materials (Q) for raiſing new mounds and terraces, in order to haſten the ſiege, and ſave, if poſſible, the ſad remains of that once glorious city and nation; but his pity proved ſtill worſe and worſe beſtowed on thoſe obſtinate wretches, who only became the more furious and deſperate by it. Titus at length cauſed fire to be ſet to the gates, after having had a very bloody encounter, in which his men were repulſed with loſs. The Jews were ſo terrified at it, that they ſuffered themſelves to be devoured by the flames without putting a helping hand, either to extinguiſh them or ſave themſelves [a]. About the ſame time Matthias the high-prieſt, who had encouraged the people to introduce Simon into the city, met with a requital worthy of that monſter of cru-

Fort Antonia taken.

Gates ſet on fire.

[y] Ibid. in fin. [z] Ibid. cap. 5, & ſeq. [a] cap. 9.

(P) We have thus epitomized at one view what Joſephus has ſcattered in ſeveral chapters of this and the foregoing book, of the dreadful effects of this famine, that it might not for the future interrupt the thread of the ſiege, and deſtruction of the city, temple, and nation, which we ſhall now haſten to bring to a concluſion.

All that needs be added to make up the ſad account of this calamity is, that even thoſe, who, at the hazard of their lives, got ſafe to the Romans and were well received of them, did for the generality meet with their deaths in the plenty of proviſions which they found there. Many of them expired with the meat in their mouths; others fell into dropſies and other diſtempers, or quite loſt the uſe of their limbs.

(Q) The greateſt part of thoſe that had ſerved hitherto for the ſiege, were either conſumed, or rendered unfit for ſervice. The ſuburbs and adjacent parts of Jeruſalem, which abounded with the moſt beautiful gardens, orchards, and greateſt variety of fruit and other trees, had been already ſtripped of all their ornaments to ſerve for the ſiege, and were now reduced into a wilderneſs. Titus therefore could not carry on his works with the ſame ſpeed and vigour, becauſe he was forced to ſend his men for freſh timber and other materials, at a great diſtance, even ſo far as ninety ſtades, or between eleven and twelve miles off.

Matthias put to death.

elty, being first tortured, and then condemned to death, together with three of his sons, the fourth having happily conveyed himself out of reach. The pretence was, their holding correspondence with the Romans, and the reverend old pontiff only begged as the last favour, that he might be put to death before his sons, but was denied both that and common burial. Ananias with about seventeen persons more of rank and merit, were put to death after them [b]; besides many more, for having been caught weeping for their deceased friends. All this while Josephus did not cease exhorting them to surrender, to represent to them the dreadful consequences of an obstinate resistance, and to assure them, that it was out of his mere compassion to them that he thus hazarded his own life to save theirs: he received one day such a wound in his head by a stone from the battlements, as laid him for dead on the ground. The Jews sallied out immediately to have seized on his body, but the Romans proved too quick and strong for them, and carried him off [c] (R).

Josephus wounded.

The temple plundered.

By this time the two factions within, but especially that of John, having plundered rich and poor of all they had, fell foul also on the treasury of the temple, whence John took a great quantity of golden utensils he found there, together with those magnificent gifts that had been presented to that sacred place by the Jewish kings, by Augustus, Livia, and many other foreign princes, and melted them all to his own use. The repositories of the sacred oil, which was to maintain the lamps, and of the wine, which was reserved to accompa-

[b] cap. 15. [c] Ibid.

(R) Josephus, by his own account, seems to have led but a sad life between the Romans and his own countrymen. These looked upon him as a vile apostate, a traytor to his God and country: had imprisoned his (the Greek says, father, but the sequel shews it to have been his) mother, and made her suffer many hardships; and would have spared no cruelties against him, if they could have caught him in their hands.

On the other side, the Roman officers looked upon him as a faithless wretch, who, under pretence of going to exhort the besieged to surrender, did what he could to encourage them to hold out to the last extremity; insomuch, that several of them did not scruple to accuse him before Titus of this double dealing; but happily for him, the general had conceived too good an opinion of him, to harbour any such suspicion, and still vindicated him against his accusers (38).

(38) In vita sua.

ny

ny the uſual ſacrifices, were likewiſe ſeized upon, and turned into common uſe, and the laſt of theſe to ſuch ſucceſs, as to make himſelf and his party drunk with it. All this while not only the zealots, but many of the people were ſtill under ſuch an infatuation, that though the fortreſs Antonia was loſt, as we have hinted already, and nothing left but the temple, which the Romans were making ready to batter down, yet they could not perſuade themſelves, that God would ſuffer that holy place to be taken by heathens, and were ſtill expecting ſome ſudden and miraculous deliverance. Even that vile monſter John, who commanded there, either ſeemed confident of it, or elſe endeavoured to make them think him ſo. For when Joſephus was ſent, for the laſt time, to upbraid his obſtinately expoſing that ſacred building, and the miſerable remains of God's people, to ſudden and ſure deſtruction, he only anſwered him with the bittereſt invectives, adding that he was defending the Lord's vineyard, which he was ſure could not be taken by any human force. Joſephus did in vain remind him of the many ways by which he had polluted both city and temple, and in particular of the ſeas of blood which he cauſed to be ſhed in both thoſe ſacred places, and which, he aſſured him from the old prophecies, were a certain ſign and fore-runner of their ſpeedy ſurrender and deſtruction (S). John remained as inflexible as if all the prophets had aſſured him of a deliverance, which ſhews the ſad effects of a judicial infatuation. However, a great number of the people were ſo moved by Joſephus's diſcourſe, that they fled preſently after to the Romans, and amongſt them ſome perſons of rank and figure, particularly Joſeph the ſon of Cabbi and Jeſus the ſon of Damneus, who had been both high-prieſts. Titus gave them a gracious reception, and ſent them to Gophna, a place ſituated between Samaria and Lydda, till the concluſion of the war; but he was forced to ſend for them

The beſieged ſtill infatuated.

Joſephus's ſpeech to them.

(S) He alluded probably to the eleventh and following chapters of Zechary, of which we have given ſome hint a little higher; or it may be perhaps that he had an eye to the doom which Chriſt had pronounced againſt that murdering and apoſtate city, of which he ſaw the far greater part already accompliſhed, enough to aſſure him of the reſt. For, as we have elſewhere obſerved, it is ſcarcely to be ſuppoſed, but that ſuch a man as Joſephus had more than once converſed with ſome chriſtians, who might have appriſed him of it, or, as an hiſtorian, he might have read it in ſome one of the goſpels.

them

them back, to contradict a report, which the factious had cunningly spread, of their having been put to death[d].

At length Titus, foreseeing the inevitable ruin of that stately edifice, which he was still extremely desirous to save, vouchsafed even himself to speak to them, and to persuade them to surrender. But the factious, looking upon this condescension as the effects of his fear rather than generosity, only grew the more furious upon it, and forced him at last to come to those extremities, which he had hitherto endeavoured to avoid. That his army, which was to attack the temple, might have the freer passage towards it through the castle Antonia, he caused a considerable part of the wall to be pulled down and levelled, which proved so very strong, that it took him up seven whole days, by which time they were far advanced in the month of July.

The daily sacrifice interrupted

IT was on the seventeenth day of that month, as all Josephus's copies have it (T), that the daily sacrifice ceased for the first time, since its restoration by the brave Maccabitish chief, mentioned in a former section †, there being no proper person left in the temple to offer it up. Titus caused [d] Cap. 16. † Sect. III. p 11.

(T) A modern critic supposes an error to be in that date, and that it was originally written the seventh or tenth of that month (39). But besides, that it is seventeen in all copies of Josephus, the Jews have kept their fasts in memory of this cessation on that very day ever since (40).

This daily sacrifice called by the Jews תָּמִיד Thamid, by the Greeks ἐνδελεχισμος, and by the Latins juge, consisted of two lambs, the one of which was offered in the morning towards sun-rising, after the burning of the sacred incense, and the other in the evening, or, as the Hebrew hath it, between the two evenings, that is, between three in the afternoon and sun-setting It was a burnt-offering, and was therefore set on a slow fire, that it might be the longer a burning. We have spoken of it in a former volume †, to which we refer.

All that we need to add is, that if the Jews have appointed their fasts right, the ceasing of it here was on the same day on which Moses broke the two tables, the city of Jerusalem was destroyed, the book of the law burnt by Aphsathomos (Epistemon) and the statue of Jupiter set up in the temple, as the reader may see in the three authors last quoted, (39) Tillemont. not. in ruin. Jud. 35. (40) Vid. Mebillath, Tahanith, c 12 part. ult. Maimon, Helcath, Tahanith, c. 5. Buxt. Synag. Jud c. 30. † See Vol. III. p 212, 225, & (N).

the

the factious to be severely upbraided for it, exhorted John to set up who he would to perform that office, rather than suffer the service of God to be set aside; and then challenged him and his party to come out of the temple and fight on a more proper ground, and thereby save that sacred edifice from the fury of the Roman troops [e]. When nothing could prevail on them, they began to set again on fire the gallery, that yielded a communication between the temple and the castle Antonia. The Jews, as we have hinted before, had already burnt about twenty cubits of it in length; but this second blaze, which was likewise encouraged by the besieged, consumed about fourteen more; after which they beat down what remained standing. On the twenty seventh of July, the Jews, having filled part of the western portico with combustible matter, made a kind of a flight, upon which some of the forwardest of the Romans having scaled up to the top, those set fire to it, whch flamed with such sudden fury, that many of them were consumed in it, and the rest, venturing to jump down from the battlements, were crushed to death. Artorius was the only one that escaped by a stratagem [f] (U).

Romans outwitted.

ON the very next day, Titus having set fire to the north gallery, which inclosed the outer court of the temple, from fort Antonia to the valley of Cedron, got an easy admittance into it, and forced the besieged into that of the priests. He tried in vain six days to batter down one of galleries of that precinct with an Helepolis (W); he was forced to mount his battering rams on the terrace, which was raised by this time; and yet the strength of this wall was such, that it eluded the force of these also, though others of his troops were busy in sapping it. When they found that neither rams nor sapping could gain ground, they bethought themselves of scaling, but were vigorously repulsed, and with the loss of some colours and a number of men. When Titus therefore Fire set to the temple gates.

[e] Ibid. l. vii. c. 4. [f] Bell. Jud. lib. vii. c. 6.

(U) This soldier observing one of his companions below, named Lucius, promised to make him his heir, if he would catch him in his fall. He did so, and saved Artorius, but was himself crushed by his weight (41).

(W) This was a kind of battering engine, its name signifies a Town-taker. We have described it in a former volume *.

(41) Bell. Jud. lib. vii. c. 6.

* Vol. VII. p. 327, &c.

found

found that his desire of saving that building was like to cost so many lives, he set fire to the gates, which being plated with silver, burnt all that night, whilst the metal dropped down in the melting. The flame soon communicated itself to the porticoes and galleries, which the besieged beheld without offering to stop it, but contented themselves with sending whole vollies of impotent curses against the Romans. This was done on the eighth of August, and on the next day, Titus, having given orders to extinguish the fire, called a council, to determine whether the remainder of the temple (X) should be saved or demolished. That general was still for the former, and most of the rest declared for the latter, and alledged, that it was no longer a temple, but a scene of war and slaughter, and that the Jews would never be at rest, as long as any part of it was left standing; but when they found Titus stiffly bent on preserving so noble an edifice, against which he told them he could have no quarrel, they all came over to his mind. The next day, August the 10th, was therefore determined for a general assault, and the night before the Jews made two desperate sallies on the Romans, in the last of which, these, being timely succoured by Titus, beat them back into their inclosure [g].

Titus calls a council.

The temple set on fire.

But whether this last Jewish effort exasperated the besiegers, or which is more likely, as Josephus thinks, pushed by the hand of providence, one of the Roman soldiers of his own accord took up a blazing fire-brand, and, getting on his comrade's shoulders, threw it into one of the apartments that surrounded the sanctuary, through a window, and immediately set the whole north side on a flame up to the third story, in the second year of Vespasian, the twenty first of king Agrippa, and on the same fatal day and month in which it had been formerly burnt by Nebuchadnezzar [h]. Titus, who was gone to rest himself awhile in his pavilions was awaked at the noise, and ran immediately to give order, to have the fire extinguished. He called, prayed, threatened, and even caned his men in vain; the confusion was so Titus enters into the sanctuary.

[g] Ibid. c. 9. & 10. ubi supra, c. 9. in fin.

[h] Conf. 2 Kings xxv. & Joseph.

(X) That is, the sanctuary and most holy place, with all the chambers, galleries, &c. thereto belonging, as the reader may see them described in a former section. Among those who were for destroying it was Tiberius Alexander, probably the same apostate Jew, who had been prætor of Judæa, and was now commander of the Roman legions.

great,

great, and the ſoldiers ſo obſtinately bent upon deſtroying all that was left, that he was neither heard nor minded. Thoſe that flocked thither from the camp, inſtead of obeying his orders, were buſy, either in killing the Jews, or increaſing the flames. When Titus obſerved, that all his endeavours were vain, he entered into the ſanctuary and the moſt holy place, in which he found ſtill ſuch rich and ſumptuous utenſils and other riches, as even exceeded all that had been told him of it. Out of the former he ſaved the golden candleſtic, the table of ſhew bread, the altar of perfumes, all of pure gold, and the book or volume of the law, wrapped up in a rich gold tiſſue; but in the latter, he found no utenſils, becauſe, in all probability, they had not made a freſh ark, ſince that of Solomon had been loſt. Upon his coming out of that ſacred place, ſome other ſoldiers ſet fire to it, and obliged thoſe who had ſtayed behind to come out; they all fell foul on the plunder of it, tearing even the gold plating off the gates and timber work, and carried off all the coſtly utenſils, robes, &c. they found in it, inſomuch, that there was not one of them that did not inrich himſelf by it [i].

A horrid maſſacre.

A HORRID maſſacre followed ſoon after, in which a great many thouſands periſhed, ſome by the flames, others by the fall from the battlements, and a greater number by the enemy's ſword, which deſtroyed all it met with, without diſtinction of age, ſex, or quality. Among them were upwards of ſix thouſand perſons, who had been ſeduced thither by a falſe prophet, who promiſed them, that they ſhould find a ſpeedy and miraculous relief there on that very day. Some of them remained five whole days on the top of the walls, and afterwards threw themſelves at the general's mercy; but were anſwered, that they had outſtayed the time, and were led to execution (Y). They carried their fury to the burning of all the treaſure-houſes of the place, though they were full of the richeſt furnitures, plate, veſtments, and other things of value, which had been laid up in thoſe places for ſecurity. In a word, they did not ceaſe burning and butchering, till they

[i] Ibid. & ſeq.

(Y) Probably to be crucified; for Joſephus tells us there, that in his return from Tekoah, he obſerved a number of them faſtened each to a croſs, and ſtill alive; among whom were three of his acquaintance, whoſe lives he obtained of Titus, and ordered them immediately to be taken down, and their wounds to be put under the care of able ſurgeons. He adds, that only one of them outlived it, the other two died under their phyſicians hands.

had deſtroyed all, except two of the temple gates, and that part of the court which was deſtined for the women †. In memory of this deſtruction, and of that of Nebuchadnezzar, they keep a ſolemn faſt on the ninth of the month Ab, anſwering in part to our Auguſt, which laſts full twenty four hours, during which time they neither eat, drink, or uſe the leaſt refreſhment; but the ſtricteſt of them keep themſelves barefoot, in prayers and tears, from ſun-ſetting to the next ſun-ſet [k].

The factious ſuit rejected.

In the mean time the ſeditious having made ſuch a vigorous puſh, that they eſcaped the fury of the Romans, at leaſt for the preſent, and retired into the city, they found all the avenues of it ſo well guarded every-where, that there was no poſſibility left for them to get out; which obliged them to ſecure themſelves as well as they could on the ſouth-ſide of it, from whence Simon and John of Giſchala ſent to deſire a parley with Titus. They were anſwered, that though they had been the cauſe of all this blood-ſhed and ruin, yet they ſhould have their lives ſpared, if they laid down their arms, and ſurrendered themſelves priſoners. To that they replied, that they had engaged themſelves by the moſt ſolemn oaths never to ſurrender, and therefore only begged leave to retire into the mountains with their wives and children; which inſolence did ſo exaſperate the Roman general, that he cauſed a herald to bid them ſtand to their defence; for that not one of them ſhould be ſpared, ſince they had rejected his laſt offers of pardon. Immediately after this, he abandoned the city to the fury of his ſoldiers, who fell forthwith on plundering it, ſetting fire every-where, and murdering all that fell into their hands (Z); whilſt the factious that were left went and † De hoc vid ſect. v. p. 185, not. [k] Vid. Mehilath, Tahanith, ſub Menſ. Ab. Maimon, Buxtorf, & al. ſup. citat.

(Z) Joſephus tells us (42), however, that he ſpared the family of Izates, king of Adiabene, of whom we have already ſpoke, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, who came and ſurrendered themſelves to his mercy, but he kept them ſtill priſoners.

He likewiſe diſmiſſed above forty thouſand of the inferior ſort, who came and implored his pardon, and gave them leave to go and ſettle where they would. The truth is, that they had already gorged themſelves with ſo much blood, that the ſtreams which ran along the ſtreets did even put the fire out. And as for the priſoners, (42) In vita ſua.

they

and fortified themſelves in the royal palace, where they killed eight thouſand Jews, who had taken refuge there [1].

IN the mean time great preparations were making for a vigorous attack on the upper city, eſpecially on the royal palace; and this took them up from the twentieth of Auguſt to the ſeventh of September, during which time great numbers came and made their ſubmiſſion to Titus, among whom were the forty thouſand citizens mentioned in the laſt note, ſome of the Edomites, and two prieſts, who, upon promiſe of being ſpared, diſcovered to him a private place in the wall of the temple, where they found two candleſtics, ſome tables, cups, and other veſſels of maſſive gold, with many precious ſtones, rich garments, and other coſtly things. By this time the warlike engines plied ſo furiouſly on the factious, that they were taken with a ſudden panic, and inſtead of fleeing into the towers of Hippicos, Phaſael, or Mariamne, which were yet untaken, and ſo ſtrong, that nothing but famine could have reduced them; they run like madmen towards Siloah, with a deſign to have attacked the wall of circumvallation, and to have eſcaped out of the city; but being there repulſed, they were forced to go and hide themſelves in the public ſinks and common ſewers, ſome one way, and ſome another. All the reſt the Romans could catch were put to the ſword, and the city was ſet on fire. This was on the eighth of September, when the city was taken and entered by Titus. He would have put an end to the maſſacre, but his men killed all, except the moſt vigorous, whom they ſhut up in the porch of the women, mentioned a little higher. Fronto, who had the care of them, reſerved the youngeſt and moſt beautiful for Titus's triumph, and ſent all that were above ſeventeen years of age into Egypt, to be employed in ſome public works there;

The high city taken.

Year of the flood, 3068. Of Chriſt 73 or 70.

The number and diſpoſal of the priſoners.

[1] Bell. ubi ſupra, c. 13.

they were ſo very numerous already, that they could not find buyers for them, tho' they offered them at the loweſt prices 43); ſo that one would have thought it high time for a prince of that excellent character to have wreaked his fury only on the factious zealots, and to have ſpared the reſt. But in all this he was acting more like a ſcourge ſent from above againſt a rebellious nation, than according to his own natural inclination; and it is what he rightly acknowledged, when his army congratulated him on this arduous and glorious conqueſt *.

(47) Bell Jud. ubi ſupra, c. 15. * Vid. Philoſtrat. in vit. Apollon. l. vi. c. 14.

and a great number of others were ſent into ſeveral cities of Syria and other provinces, to be expoſed on the public theatres, to exhibit fights, or be devoured by wild beaſts [m]. The number of thoſe priſoners amounted to ninety ſeven thouſand, beſides about eleven thouſand more of others, who were either ſtarved through neglect, or ſtarved themſelves through ſullenneſs and deſpair (A).

WE have already had occaſion to mention the number of the ſlain, as well as of the priſoners, according to Joſephus. Suetonius and Cornelius Tacitus do indeed make the former a great deal leſs; they reckon but ſix hundred thouſand of them in all; but conſidering the diſtance of time and place in which they wrote, it will be eaſily granted, that they could not be ſo well acquainted with it as Joſephus, who was a Jew and an eye-witneſs. Whether this laſt has exaggerated it in compliment to Titus and the Romans, we will not pretend to ſay. A curious author has ſince taken the pains to make a freſh computation out of him of all that periſhed in the ſeveral places, throughout that kingdom and out of it, from the beginning to the concluſion of the war †; in which we believe our readers will be glad to ſee the whole amount of the ſeveral bloody articles, as it were, at one view. They are as follows:

Jews killed in and out of Judæa.

At Jeruſalem, by Florus's order	630
By the inhabitants of Cæſarea in hatred to the Jews	20,000
At Scythopolis in Syria	30,000
By the inhabitants of Aſcalon in Paleſtine	2,500
By thoſe of Ptolemais	2,000
At Alexandria in Egypt under Tiberius Alexander, an apoſtate Jew	50,000
At Damaſcus	10,000
At the taking of Joppa	8,400
In the mountain of Cabulo	2,000
In a fight at Aſcalon	10,000
In an ambuſh	8,000

[m] Ibid. c. 16, & 17. † JUSTUS LIPSIUS de Conſtantia, lib. ii. c. 21.

(A) Joſephus was by this time in ſuch high favour with Titus, that he obtained the liberty of ſeveral of his friends and relations, and in particular of his brother Matthias, without any ranſom. That emperor had likewiſe given him leave to ſave what he thought fit out of the ruins of the city and temple, but he contented himſelf with the volume of the ſacred writings.

A:

At the taking of Apheck	15,000
Upon mount Garizzim	11,600
Drowned at Joppa by a ſudden ſtorm	4,200
Slain at Tarichæa	6,500
Slain or killed themſelves at Gàmala, where none were ſaved but two ſiſters	9,000
Killed in their flight from Giſchala	2,000
At the ſiege of Jotapa, where Joſephus commanded	30,000
Of the Gadarenes, beſides vaſt numbers that drowned themſelves	13,000
In the villages of Idumæa	10,000
At Geraſium	1,000
At Macheron	1,700
In the deſart of Jardes	3,000
Slew themſelves at Maſſada	960
In Cyrene by the governor Catulus, of which we ſhall ſpeak by and by	3,000
Periſhed at Jeruſalem by ſword, famine, peſtilence, and during the ſiege	1100,000
According to this account the whole amounts to	1337,490

Beſides a vaſt multitude that died in the caves, woods, wildernеſſes, common-ſewers, in baniſhment, and many other ways, of whom no computation could be made; and ten thouſand that were ſlain at Jotapa, more than our author has reckoned. For Joſephus mentions expreſly forty thouſand, but he only thirty thouſand.

To theſe if we add the ninety ſeven thouſand priſoners, doomed in all appearance to a captivity infinitely worſe than death, and the eleven thouſand, which, as we hinted above, periſhed either through the neglect of their keepers, or their own ſullen deſpair, the amount will be above one million, four hundred and forty five thouſand. What ſtill more aggravates this deſtruction is, that the far greateſt part of them were ſtrangers, that is, were Jews, who, as we obſerved a little higher, were written to, and invited from remote parts of the world, even from beyond the river Euphrates, by their brethren at Jeruſalem, to come and aſſiſt them in the defence of their religion and liberties; their country, city, and temple; inſtead of which they met with the moſt dreadful deaths there, and ſhared in the common ruin. Thus did the divine providence order it, that they, who, by their ſtrenuous oppoſition of the goſpel in all the parts of their diſperſion, had ſhared in the guilt of the crucifiers of its divine author ſhould be involved in their puniſhment.

Titus,

Titus, as we have ſeen, acknowledged more than once the hand of providence, both in his extraordinary ſucceſs againſt them, and in the invincible obſtinacy with which they, to the laſt, preferred their total deſtruction to his oft repeated proffers of mercy. Joſephus hath ſcarce a chapter in which he doth not aſcribe all theſe dreadful calamities, and the final ruin of his nation, city, and temple, to an over-ruling power, to the offended deity, or to the ſins of the people: but nowhere more pathetically than in that chapter, in which, beſides the old prophecies, he ſums up a number of dreadful warnings ſent before-hand, not ſo much to reduce them to obedience, as to let them diſcern the almighty hand, that was now pouring down the moſt dreadful phials of his anger againſt them. We have already taken notice of that extraordinary country-fellow Jeſus, who had kept pronouncing woe and deſtruction to them, during ſeven whole years. It will not be amiſs to cloſe this ſad cataſtrophe with ſome other ſignal ones, out of the ſame Jewiſh hiſtorian, which were no leſs remarkable than dreadful.

Strange prodigies.

OF this claſs was that ſtrange comet, which hung over Jeruſalem one whole year, in the ſhape of a ſword: the extraordinary light that was ſeen round the altar at the ninth hour of the night, upon the celebrating of the paſchal feaſt, and which was looked upon by the ignorant as a good omen, but by the wiſer ſort as a forerunner of a dreadful war: a cow delivered of a lamb, as ſhe was led to the altar to be ſacrificed: the eaſtern gate of the temple made of ſolid braſs, and ſo heavy, that it required twenty pair of ſtout hands to open and ſhut it, and was flung open in the middle of the night, though faſtened with ſtrong bolts and bars: the air before ſun-ſet filled with chariots and armed men, which paſſed all over that country, and for the truth of which Joſephus appeals to ſeveral living witneſſes, who beheld the dreadful ſight; and laſtly the voice, which, after a kind of rumbling noiſe, was diſtinctly heard by the prieſts, who were going to officiate on the feaſt of pentecoſt, and uttered theſe words articulately, Let us depart; let us depart *. In ſpight of all which, the Jews, as we have ſeen, continued as hardened as ever, and liſtened only to thoſe lying prophets, who flattered them with the hopes of a ſudden and miraculous deliverer. But to return to the ſiege:

Simon and John taken.

WHILST the ſoldiers were ſtill buſy in burning the remains of the city, and viſiting all the ſinks, jakes, and com-

* Bell. Jud. ubi ſupra, c. 12.

mon

mon ſewers, where they found and killed numbers of other poor creatures who had hid themſelves, Simon and John, the two grand rebels, were found and brought to Titus, who ordered them to be reſerved for his triumph. John, being pinched with hunger, came out firſt, and having begged his life, obtained it, but was condemned to perpetual impriſonment. Simon, whoſe retreat was better ſtored, held out till towards the end of October, when neceſſity forced him out. He appeared on the ſudden on the ruins of the temple, in a white robe and a purple cloak. The Romans were at firſt ſurpriſed at him; but underſtanding ſoon after who he was, Terentius Rufus, who was left commander, ſeized on him, and ſent him to Cæſarea, whither Titus was got by this time, and from whence he was conveyed with his bloody collegues to Rome, to adorn the conqueror's triumph [n].

As ſoon as the Romans had ended their deſtructive work of burning and maſſacring, Titus ſet them on to demoliſh the city, with all its noble ſtructures, palaces, towers, walls, and other ornaments and fortifications, down to the level of the ground, according to Chriſt's expreſs prediction. He left nothing ſtanding but a piece of the weſtern wall, and the three towers of Hippicos, Phaſael, and Mariamne, the former to ſerve as a rampart to his tenth legion, which he left there, and the three latter to give future ages ſome idea of the ſtrength of the whole city, and of the ſkill and valour of its conqueror. His orders were ſo punctually executed, that, except thoſe few buildings above-mentioned, there was not ſo much as any remains left, that could ſerve as an index, that that ground had been once inhabited (B). Inſomuch that when he came to paſs through it, in his way from Cæſarea to Alexandria, in order to embarque for Rome, he could not refrain himſelf from ſhedding plenty of tears at the ſight of ſo dreadful a devaſtation, and curſing the wretches who had forced him to be the author of it [o].

The city razed to the ground.

[n] Ibid. & ſeq. [o] Cap. 18, & ſeq.

(B) The Jewiſh tradition adds, that Titus cauſed the plow to be driven over it; which ceremony, according to the Roman law, condemned the ground to perpetual deſolation But that, as well as Joſephus's account, ſeems exaggerated, ſince there is great reaſon to believe, there were ſtill many conſiderable ruins to be ſeen even in the emperor Adrian's time, as we may have occaſion to ſhew in the Roman hiſtory.

Titus's triumph.

It is not our business to follow that emperor to his capital, or to describe the magnificence of his triumph, the greatest which that city ever saw: that will be best done in the ensuing Roman history. All that is proper to be said on that head here is, that John and Simon, at the head of seven hundred of the handsomest Jewish captives, were made to adorn the triumphal chair; after which Simon, having been dragged through the streets, with a rope about his neck, and severely scourged, was put to death with some other Jewish leaders, and John was sent into perpetual imprisonment [p] (C).

Simon and John's fate.

Titus had left three castles still untaken, namely those of Herodion and Massada on this, and that of Macheron on the other side Jordan. The first of them was soon after [p] Cap. 24.

(C) Titus's triumph was further adorned with a great number of trophies brought from Judæa; among the principal of which were those which had been taken out of the sanctuary, such as the golden table of the shew-bread, which weighed several talents; the seven branch candlestic, a rich and curious piece of art; the roll or volume of the law, covered with a costly gold cloth, which was carried the last of the three, as the most venerable of all the trophies. The two former Titus caused to be placed in the temple of Peace, which his father had built; the latter, together with several curious and costly veils of the temple, and other rich furniture, he conveyed into his own palace (45).

There are still some coins extant of that emperor, stamped with a trophy and triumphant chariot, and of his father, with the image of a woman sitting sorrowful under a palm-tree, with the inscription of Judæa capta; with some others coined in the twenty first year of king Agrippa, with these words in Greek, Vespasian emperor, and Cæsar. Judæa was taken in the twenty first of Agrippa

To these medals we may add some fragments in bass-relief, representing Vespasian and his son Titus's triumph, and on which is still to be distinguished the seven branch candlestic, with other sacred utensils; some have pretended also to discover the ark in it; but we have already seen, that there was no such thing in the most holy place; and it is most likely to be only the table of the shew-bread, which was not altogether unlike it; but the misfortune is, that time has so defaced this noble monument, that it is not easy to discover any thing in it with any certainty, except the candlestic above mentioned.

(45) Bell. Jud. l. vii. c. 24.

taken by capitulation by Lucilius Baſſus, who had been appointed lieutenant of Judæa. He went preſently after at the head of a good number of troops to beſiege that of Macheron, which was a very ſtrong place, and likely to have held out a long time. But a lucky accident, which the reader may ſee in the margin (D), obliged the beſieged to ſurrender, upon condition that they ſhould have liberty to retire whither they pleaſed; which being readily granted to them, they went and joined ſome of their revolted brethren, who had ſheltered themſelves in the foreſt of Jardes. Hither Baſſus came, and attacked them, and, after a deſperate combat on both ſides, totally defeated them, with Judas their chief, who had ſaved himſelf out of Jeruſalem, through one of the aqueducts of that city [q].

DEATH having prevented Baſſus from putting an end to the war, Flavius Silva, his ſucceſſor, aſſembled all his forces to attack Maſſada, now the only remaining fortreſs in the rebels hands. The place was prodigiouſly ſtrong both by art and nature, well ſtored with all proviſions, and defended with a good number of ſicarii and aſſaſſins; at the head of whom was one Eleazar, the grandſon of Judas the Gaulonite, often mentioned in this and a former ſection. Silva having in vain tried his engines and battering rams againſt it, bethought himſelf of ſurrounding it with a high and ſtrong wall, and then ordered fire to be ſet to the gates. The wind favouring him, puſhed the flame ſo fiercely againſt the Jews, that Eleazar, in a kind of deſpair, perſuaded them firſt to [q] Cap. 25.

(D) There was in that caſtle a young nobleman highly eſteemed for his valour, who, after having given the beſiegers a ſtout repulſe in a ſally, unfortunately ſtrayed out of the gates to ſpeak to the people on the wall by way of bravado. An Egyptian then in the Roman army, came ſwiftly behind him unperceived, took him up in his arms, and carried him off

When Baſſus had got the noble youth in his power, he cauſed him to be ſtripped naked, and ſeverely ſcourged in the view of the beſieged, who filled immediately the air with their cries. Baſſus perceiving them ſo moved at the ſight, cauſed a croſs to be erected, and gave them to underſtand that he would crucify him, unleſs they prevented it by a timely ſurrender. The ſtratagem had the deſired effect; and the Jews, not being proof againſt ſo doleful a ſpectacle, choſe to capitulate, and ſoon after ſurrendered the place, on the conditions above-mentioned [46].

(46) Cap 25, ad fin.

kill all their wives and children, and next to chuſe ten men by lot, who ſhould kill all the reſt; and, laſtly, one out of the ſurviving ten to diſpatch them and himſelf, which was accordingly executed out of hand; only this laſt man was ordered to ſet fire to the place before he finiſhed this bloody tragedy. On the next morning the Romans, who were preparing to ſcale the place, were ſtrangely ſurprized to ſee and hear nothing move; upon which they made ſuch a hideous outcry, that two women, who had concealed themſelves from the maſſacre in ſome aqueduct, came out, and told them the tragical end of the beſieged, which put an end to that dreadful war [r]. Veſpaſian ordered the Jewiſh lands to be ſold to his own uſe (E), and all the Jews within the Roman empire to pay the uſual tribute of half a ſhekel, or two drachms, to his treaſury, which they were before obliged to pay to that of the ſanctuary [s].

The temple and holy city thus deſtroyed and levelled with the ground, and the whole nation either miſerably buried under its ruins, or diſperſed into other countries, might, one would think, have opened the eyes of the poor remains of that once favoured people, and cruſhed at once all hopes and expectations of any other deliverer, but him whom they had rejected and crucified. Many of them did indeed do ſo, but the far greater part remained in their infatuated ſtate, and according to Chriſt's own prediction, have been diſperſed ever ſince over all the world, to atteſt his truth, and their own obdurate blindneſs, till the happy time comes, when the veil ſhall be taken off their eyes. When that will be, is one of thoſe ſecrets which God has been pleaſed to leave as yet unrevealed; and which it would be vain and preſumptuous to ſearch too curiouſly after. Euſebius adds to their ſad cataſtrophe, that, after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, Veſpaſian cauſed all the remaining ſprouts of the houſe of Judah to be cut off [t], to deprive them at once of all hopes of a deliverer or future Meſſiah. Notwithſtanding which, the zealots made ſeveral attempts to regain their power, firſt in Egypt, where it coſt ſome their heads, and cauſed their tem-

[r] Cap. 28. [s] Ibid. c 26. in fin. [t] Eccleſ. hiſt. l. iii. c. 12.

(L) He only reſerved the town of Emmaus, which he beſtowed on eight hundred of his beſt veterans, to plant a new colony there, and from that time that place took the name of Nicopolis (47).

(47) Cap 26.

ple

ple at Alexandria, mentioned in a former section †, to be quite shut up [u] (F). Next in Cyrene of Libya, where one of them, named Jonathan, set up for a prophet, and persuaded about two thousand of his brethren there to follow him into the desert, where he promised to shew them wonders, and where Catullus, the then governor, caused them to be pursued and defeated [w] (G).

FROM that time the Jewish nation has been dispersed through, despised and hated by, all the world, hath gone † See before, p. 48, & (T). [u] Bell. ubi supra, c. 30, ad fin. [w] Ibid. cap. 31. pass.

(F) These wretches, which were undoubtedly the relics of the Gaulonitish faction, since even their children suffered the severest torments, rather than acknowledge Cæsar for their lord (48), met at first with a kind reception from their brethren of Alexandria. But they quickly became obnoxious to them by sowing their leaven of sedition. To prevent the ill effects of which, they were delivered up to the Romans, and six hundred of them put to death

Vespasian being apprised of it, and fearing lest their Alexandrian temple should afford them a fresh pretence of assembling themselves, and raising some new sedition in Egypt, sent orders to Lupus, his governor there, to demolish it. But he contented himself with shutting it up. Paulinus, who succeeded him soon after, stripped it of all its ornaments and rich furniture, and caused the gates of it to be quite shut up, to prevent any further worship being offered up in it (49).

(G) Jonathan was taken presently after, and brought to Catullus, before whom he accused many of the richest Jews of having instigated him into this imposture, and whom that greedy governor caused to be put to death to the number of three thousand, and confiscated all their wealth.

He afterwards obliged that wretch to prefer the same indictment against those that were at Rome, among whom was Josephus the historian; whom he accused to have furnished him with arms and money. Vespasian made such a strict inquiry into the matter, that he easily found out the cheat, caused Jonathan to be cruelly whipped, and then burnt alive, and acquitted the persons accused.

Catullus, though deep in the guilt, was yet pardoned by that emperor; but providence did not suffer him to go unpunished; for he was soon after seized with a panic phrensy, which made him fancy himself surrounded with the dreadful spectres of those whom he had unjustly put to death He was at length seized with an inward intolerable heat, which consumed his very entrails, and he died in that miserable condition unpitied (50).

(48) Ibid cap 29 (49) Cap. 30, ad fin. (50) Cap. 31.

from one age to another through a ſeries of the greateſt miſeries and perſecutions. We have innumerable inſtances of crowned heads, and even commonwealths, who have ſpared neither the ſevereſt edicts, nor the cruelleſt butcheries againſt them. In a word, Pagans and Mahometans, as well as Chriſtians, tho' ſo oppoſite in other things, have yet, as it were, joined their efforts in vain, to exterminate that unhappy people, whom the divine providence hath nevertheleſs upheld under all thoſe diſadvantages by a kind of miraculous power, and no doubt for a more glorious purpoſe; inſomuch, that, according to a late learned hiſtorian, there are ſtill above three millions of them diſperſed through almoſt every nation and kingdom of the world, and ſtill impatiently ſighing after that glorious time, when god ſhall reſtore them to their priſtine ſtate. But this and ſome other particulars relating to their diſperſions, writings, and the like, will be fully ſeen in the appendix.

AFTER the reduction of Jeruſalem and Judæa, Agrippa and his ſiſter retired to Rome, probably with Titus, who was exceſſive fond of both, but eſpecially of Berenice. We have ſeen through the courſe of this laſt war, how ſerviceable the brother had been to that general, accompanying him in perſon, and aſſiſting him with men and ammunition, for which we are told Titus got his kingdom inlarged by the emperor, and procured him prætorian honours. But his extraordinary friendſhip for that prince flowed chiefly from his ſpecial fondneſs for his ſiſter, who now lived with him in his palace, and ruled every thing as if ſhe had been his real wife. We have hinted ſome former reports publicly ſpread concerning her inceſtuous intrigues with her brother, and for which ſhe had given but too good a foundation. Titus could hardly be ignorant of it; but her beauty had ſo captivated him, that he overlooked every thing elſe; inſomuch, that he had promiſed her marriage, and would in all probability have kept it, had he not found that the Romans were wholly averſe to it, partly on account of her being a Jeweſs, and partly on that of her royal deſcent. To pave himſelf therefore the way to the empire, he was forced to diſcard her, invitus invitam [x], as Suetonius expreſſes it. What became of her afterwards, is not worth inquiring. As for Agrippa, he was the laſt of the Herodian race that bore the royal title, and is ſuppoſed to have died at Rome about the ſeventieth year of his age, [x] Vid. SUETON in vit Tit. & Xiphil. ex Dione. JUSTUS TIBERIUS apud Phot. bibl. cod. 33.

and

and in the ninetieth of Jesus Christ [y]. Josephus has this remarkable saying on the Herodian line, that they all failed within a hundred years [z], though they were at first so numerous, as we have seen them in the genealogy of Herod the Great.

THIS was the end of the Herodian family, and of the Jewish nation and polity, and is so much the more remarkable, considering, that the succinct account we have of it is written by a Jew of such extraordinary character, and that the destruction of the city and people, especially of their temple, is found upon the whole so exactly conformable to the prophecies of Christ, denounced against them so long before. One might have expected, that this should have opened their eyes, to acknowledge these as well as the many others we have mentioned in the course of this and the last section, which prove him the Messiah, since they had seen their sacrifices, ceremonial law, their temple, their royal stock of Judah, &c. which they till then thought were to last for ever, buried, as it were, under the ruin of their metropolis. Instead of which, their chief aim and study has been to find salvos against these pregnant proofs against them; to depart from the expositions of their antients, give a new sense to the prophets, and to invent new sceptres for their royal tribe in some unknown parts of the world, and in a word, to oppose every thing that we urge against them, as we shall shew in the appendix.

IN the mean time, it will not be amiss to take notice, that the Jews are no less at variance with Josephus, than the Christians have admired him. St. Jerom, among other praises he gives him, calls him the Livy of the Jews [a]. Photius and others have been equally lavish of their incense; and Eusebius adds to the rest, that he had a statue reared to him in consideration of his writings [b]. We shall not repeat what we have often observed of his partiality to his nation and sacerdotal order, both in this chapter and our first volume. But his countrymen have trumped up another Josephus, known by the name of Bengorion, whose history is compiled out of the Russian version of the true Josephus; for he doth not seem to have seen the original, and has stuffed it with the most absurd falshoods and contradictions to him; and yet the Jews give him the largest encomiums. In particular Rabby Than, who has published his history, is not ashamed to affirm, that all he wrote was just and true, without the least falshood; that his writings come nearer to those of the prophets, than those of any other Jewish author; that the hand of God was upon him, whilſt he compiled his work, with ſome other commendations, which amount almoſt to blaſphemy [c]. That fabulous author is ſo well known to the learned, that we ſhall ſpend no time in expoſing him. The readers may ſee enough of them in that mutilated edition which Munſter has given us of it; though he has concealed a great number of them. But thoſe that have ſeen the full editions that have come out ſince, will find them ſo full of them, that they will readily own, nothing but the greateſt degree of infatuation and perveſeneſs could induce the Jews to prefer him to the true one, who, ſetting aſide his partiality above-mentioned, hath all the marks of a judicious and exact hiſtorian.

[y] Tillemont, Ruin des Juifs, Art 83, & not. 41. [z] Antiq. l. xviii. c. 7. [a] De vir. illust. c. 13 [b] Hist. eccles. l. iii. c. 9.

[c] Præf. in Josip. Bengorion, edit. Conſtantinop. 1490.

CHAP.

CHAP. XII.

The History of the Parthians, from Arsaces, to the recovery of the kingdom by the Persians.

PARTHIA, properly so called, was bounded on the east by Aria; on the south by Carmania Deserta; on the west by Media; and on the north by Hyrcania. Ptolemy divides it into five districts or provinces, viz. Caminsine, or Camsine, Parthyene, Choroane, Atticene, and Tabiene. The antient geographers enumerate a great many cities in Parthia; but those of most note were, Calliope, Issatis, Europium, known also by the names of Ragæ, Europos, and Arsace, Apamea, Heraclea, Crenonia, Charax, Artacana, Aspa, Marriche, Rhagæa, and Hecatompylos. The latter was the metropolis of Parthia, and the place where the first kings of that country resided; for after they had made themselves masters of Assyria, they abandoned Hecatompylos, passing the winter at Ctesiphon, and the summer at Echatan, or in Hyrcania. The city of Ctesiphon stood on the Tigris, a little below Seleucia, and on the opposite bank, in the province of Chalonitis, which was the most southerly of all Assyria. This city was founded, according to Ammianus Marcellinus [a], by one Vardanes, and embellished and fortified by Pacorus. Who Vardanes was, we know not; but Valesius takes Pacorus here spoke of to have been the son of Orodes, whom Ventidius defeated. Polybius [b], Tacitus [c], Herodianus [d], and Strabo [e] speak of Ctesiphon as the metropolis of the whole Parthian empire; whereas Hecatompylos was only the metropolis of Parthia properly so called, but nevertheless a place of great note, and about nine miles in compass. It had a hundred gates, whence it borrowed the name of Hecatompylos, as Polybius informs us[f]. Moſt of our modern travellers are of opinion, that it ſtood on the very ſpot where the preſent city of Iſpahan ſtands. Parthia is at preſent known by the name of Arach or Erach, and may be called the royal province of Perſia, ſince the king always reſides in it. The chief cities it contains at preſent are, Caſbin or Caſwin, built on the ruins of the antient Arſace; Sawa or Sava, Kom, Hamadan, Kaſhan, and Iſpahan, which Holſtenius[g] takes to be the ancient Aſpa, contradicting therein moſt of our modern geographers and travellers. The air of Parthia was anciently, and is ſtill, very clear and healthy; but the ſoil barren, and not yielding wherewithal to maintain the inhabitants, who were once very numerous, and therefore obliged to tranſplant themſelves into other countries. Upon the death of Alexander the Great, it was almoſt intirely neglected, and left as an appendant to Media, none of that prince's commanders caring for the government of ſo poor and barren a province. But we ſhall ſee this ſmall and obſcure province make a great figure in hiſtory, eclipſe all the kingdoms of the eaſt, and become formidable to the Romans themſelves, while they were at the height of their glory. But we muſt not here confound Parthia, or, as others call it, Parthyæa and Parthyene, with what the ancients underſtand by the Parthian empire. The former was comprized within the narrow bounds which we have deſcribed above; whereas the latter was of vaſt extent, being bounded on the eaſt by the Indus; on the weſt by the Tigris; on the ſouth by the Red-ſea; and on the north by mount Caucaſus[h]; ſo that it comprehended Arachoſia, Parthia, Aſſyria, Perſis, and Media. Theſe wide-ſpreading dominions, were, according to Pliny[i], divided by the Parthian monarchs into eighteen kingdoms, which they diſtinguiſhed by the names of the upper and lower kingdoms. The former were eleven, extending from the confines of Armenia and the Caſpian ſea, to the borders of Scythia. The other ſeven comprehended the remaining provinces ſubject to the crown of Parthia, and were known by the name of the lower kingdoms.

Parthia described.

[a] Ammian. Marcell. l. xxiii. c. 20. [b] Polyb. l. v. c. 45. [c] Tacit. l. vi. c. 42 [d] Herodian. l. iii. c. 9. [e] Strabo, l. xvi. p. 512.

died

Inhabitants

SOME writers are of opinion, that this country was firſt peopled by the Phetri or Pathri, often mentioned in ſcripture[k], and will have the Parthians to be deſcended from [f] POLYB. l. x c. 25. [g] HOLSTEN. in Orth. [h] Vide OROS. l. i. c. 2 [i] PLIN. l. vi. c. 25 [k] Vide JEREM. c. xliv. EZECH. c. xxix.

Parthia

Phetruſim the ſon of Mizraim. This may perhaps be true with relation to the firſt inhabitants of Parthia; but thoſe Parthians, who are ſo famous in hiſtory, were, without all doubt, originally Scythians, as we are told by all the ancients who ſpeak of them. 'Tis true, there is a great diſagreement among authors as to the particular nation or tribe to which they belonged, ſome taking them to be originally Daæ; others to be Getæ, Maſſagetæ, or European Scythians. Strabo tells us, that Arſaces, the founder of this kingdom, was by birth a Scythian, and king of the Daæ or Dahæ. Curtius ſays, that the Scythians, known by the name of Parthians, came out of Europe [l]. Jornandes will have them to be originally Goths or Getæ; for theſe, according to him, are one and the ſame people [m]. They were, according to Juſtin, driven out of their own country, and, finding no other place to ſettle in, obliged to take up with this barren and inhoſpitable region. They called themſelves, on their firſt ſettling here, Parthians, that is, in the old Scythian language, exiles; and hence came the name of Parthia.

Manners, cuſtoms, &c. of the Parthians.

THE Parthians were a courageous and warlike people, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory, and not undeſervedly eſteemed the beſt horſemen and archers in the world. They were accuſtomed from their infancy, ſays Dionyſius [n], to the warlike and manly exerciſes of managing a horſe and handling a bow; and in both excelled all other nations. They had an art or method peculiar to themſelves, of diſcharging their arrows with incredible addreſs, dexterity and order, while they were retiring full ſpeed, which gained them many victories, and rendered their retreat far more formidable to the enemy than their onſet (A). To their great ſkill in archery alluded the conſul Craſſus,

[l] CURT. l. vii. [m] JORNAND. de reb. Goth. [n] DIONYS. in poem. de ſitu orb.

(A) This art, peculiar to the Parthians, of diſcharging their arrows with great dexterity, while they were retiring full ſpeed, is much ſpoke of by the Latin writers, eſpecial y the poets.

Fidentemque fuga Parthum, verſiſque ſagittis (1).
Et verſis animoſum equis Parthum dicere (2).
Ut celer averſis utere Parthus equis (3).
Quid tibi nunc mitti ſolitæ poſt terga ſagittæ, Quid loca, quid rapidi profuit uſus equi (4)?

(1) Virgil. georg. l. iii. (2) Horat l. i. carm. od. 19. (3) Ovid l. iii. de arte. (4) Idem faſt. v.

Craſſus, when being told by an aſtrologer, that his expedition againſt the Parthians would prove unſucceſsful, by reaſon of the ominous aſpect of the conſtellation Scorpio, the Roman returned anſwer, That he feared not Scorpio, but Sagittarius. To theſe exerciſes of horſemanſhip and archery the air and nature greatly contributed; for the dry air, as Dion obſerves, ſeaſoned their bows; and their large plains afforded them ſufficient room for the training up of their horſes. From the age of twenty to fifty, they were all, without exception, obliged to ſerve in war, to attend the muſters, learn the military exerciſes, and be ready, at a very ſhort warning to take the field [o]. Perſons of any rank or diſtinction among them never appeared in public a-foot, but always on horſeback and armed with ſcymetars [p]; which cuſtom ſeemed ſtrange to the Romans, who uſed to lay down their arms when they quitted the ſagum or military habit [q]. In war they did not uſe trumpets like other nations, but large hollow veſſels of braſs, covered with ſkins, ſuch as our kettle-drums, which, being beat with hammers, yielded a very warlike ſound [r] (B). They are ſaid to have been very ſpare in their diet,

[o] Strabo, l. xv. [p] Justin. l. xii. [q] Ovid. Triſt. l. v.
[r] Plut. in Craſſo.

Nil opus eſt equis,
Nil armis, & inertibus
Telis, quæ procul ingerit
Parthus, cum ſimulat fugas (5).
Vidit & verſas equitis ſagittas, Terga fallacis metuenda Parthi (6).
Rupis Achæmeniæ ſcopulis, ubi verſa ſequentum Pectoribus figit ſpicula pugna fugax (7), &c.

(B) Lucretius tells us, that the Parthians carried lions about with them in war, which, in the beginning of the engagement, they uſed to let looſe againſt the enemy.

Et validos Parthi præ ſe miſere leones
Cum ductoribus armatis, ſæviſque magiſtris, Qui moderarier his poſſent, vincliſque tenere:
Nequicquam; quoniam permixta cæde calentes
Turbabant ſævi nullo diſcrimine turmas, Terrificas capitum quatientes undique criſtas (8).

(5) Senec. in Thyeſt. (6) Idem in Oedip. (7) Boet. l. v.
(8) Lucret l. v.

But

diet [r], their country not affording any ſuperfluities; but at the ſame time to have been great lovers of wine, and much addicted to all manner of lewdneſs, not reſpecting even their ſiſters or mothers, whom they were allowed to marry, and as many wives beſides as they pleaſed, nothing being deemed more honourable among them than to have a numerous iſſue [t]. They intirely neglected agriculture, navigation, trade, and all other callings, being wholly taken up in learning the arts of war, which alone were of any repute among them [u].

Religion.

THEIR religion was much the ſame with that of the Perſians; they worſhipped the ſun under the name of Mithras [w]; believed, that thoſe who fell in battle enjoyed a perpetual and uninterrupted happineſs, a tenet well ſuited to the genius of a warlike nation; and in moſt other points of religion intirely agreed with the Perſians, of whoſe religion we have ſpoke at length in the hiſtory of Perſia. They were moſt religious obſervers of their word, thinking it highly diſhonourable not to perform their engagements, or to deceive thoſe who had truſted them on their parole [x], whereof we ſhall give a glaring inſtance in the reign of Artabanus.

Government.

As to their government, it was, as is well known, monarchical, and abſolute in the higheſt degree, no tyrants having ever required a more ſervile and blind ſubmiſſion from thoſe who had the misfortune to live under them. They treated their ſubjects, ſays Herodianus [y], as the meaneſt of ſlaves and ſcarce as men, while they put themſelves on a level with the immortal gods. Their uſual title was, the king of kings, the great monarch, the brother of the ſun and moon, &c. Theſe haughty titles they not only aſſumed in all the laws and edicts they enacted, but in their letters to other princes.

[r] JUSTIN. l. xii. c. 3, & 9. [t] Idem, l. xvi. AGATH. l. ii. PHILO de ſpecial. legib. p. 778. TERTUL. in Apologet. [u] DIONYS ubi ſupra. [w] STRABO, l. xv. SUID. HESYCH. DIONYS. AREOPAGIT. epiſt 7. ad Polycarp. CYRIL. catech. 7. [x] JOSEPH. Antiq. l. xviii. c. ult. [y] HERODIAN. l. iv. c. 3.

But herein the poet deſerves no more credit, than ſome too credulous hiſtorians mentioned by Lucian, who, miſtaking the dragons which the Parthians carried in their colours for real dragons, wrote that the king of Parthia was always attended in war with a great number of dragons, which made a dreadful havock among the enemies troops (9).

(9) Lucian. in lib. de conſcrib. hiſtor.

Thus Vologeſes II. in writing to the emperor Veſpaſian, uſed the following ſuperſcription: Arſaces, king of kings, to Flavius Veſpaſian. The emperor could not help ſmiling when he read it; and, to ſhew how little he valued ſuch pompous and high ſounding titles, he anſwered him in his own ſtrain thus: Flavius Veſpaſian to Arſaces king of kings, giving the Parthian the titles he had aſſumed, but deſpiſing them himſelf. The ſame haughty ſtile Phrahates IV. uſed in writing to Auguſtus; and Phrahates III. ſent embaſſadors to Pompey, on purpoſe to expoſtulate with him for omitting in his letter to him the title of king of kings, and giving him only that of king. Their whole conduct was anſwerable to the ſublime and lofty titles they aſſumed; for, not ſatisfied with the reſpect paid to other crowned heads, they obliged all thoſe whom they vouchſafed to ſee, to kiſs the threſhold on their firſt entering the royal palace, to proſtrate themſelves before them with their faces on the ground, and acknowledge their majeſty with ſome offering, as if they appeared, to uſe the expreſſion of Dion, before the great Jupiter [z] (C).

WE can give no particular account of the ſtate of Parthia before Arſaces I. the works of Apollodorus, Artemiſius, Creperius, Calpurnianus, Quadratus, Rhianus, and Seleucus Emiſenus, who wrote of the Parthian affairs and are quoted by Strabo [a], Athenæus [b] Lucian [c], Stephanus, and Suidas, not having reached our times. All we know of them is, that they were firſt ſubject to the Medes, afterwards to the Perſians, and laſtly to Alexander the Great, upon whoſe death

[z] DION, l. iv. JUSTIN. l. xvi. STRABO, l. xv. [a] Idem, l. ii, & xv. [b] ATHEN. l. xv. c. 12. [c] LUCIAN. de conſcrib hiſtor.

(C) To this Martial alludes in the following epigram:

Fruſtra blanditiæ venitis ad me, &c.
Ad Parthos procul ite pileatos,
Et turpes, humileſque, ſuppliceſque, Pictorum ſola baſiate regum (10).

And Virgil:

Præterea regem non ſic Ægyptus, & ingens
Lydia, nec populi Parthorum, aut Medus Hydaſpes Obſervant, &c. (11).

(10) Mart. l. x. epig. 71. (11) Virgil. georg l. iv.

Parthia

Parthia fell to the ſhare of Seleucus Nicator, whoſe ſucceſſors held it till the reign of Antiochus Theus, when Arſaces, ſhaking off the Macedonian yoke, ſet up for himſelf, and founded a new kingdom, which, in proceſs of time, became by far the moſt powerful in the eaſt, and was held by his ſucceſſors for the ſpace of four hundred and ſeventy five years; at the end of which the empire was transferred anew from the Parthians to the Perſians, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

Kings of Parthia.

Arſaces I. the founder of the Parthian monarchy, was, according to ſome writers, of the race of the Achæmenidæ; acording to others, by birth a Parthian. Strabo ſays, that he was king of the Dahæ before the revolt of Parthia; and Georgius Syncellus, that he was a nobleman of Bactria. We have related elſewhere [d] on what provocation he ſolicited the Parthians to revolt from Antiochus Theus, and what ſucceſs attended him in his wars with Seleucus Callinicus, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Antiochus Theus [e], whom he not only defeated, but took priſoner, and from that time aſſumed the title of king, having founded, and by that victory firmly eſtabliſhed, an empire in the eaſt, which in proceſs of time counterbalanced the over-grown power of the Romans in the weſt. He reduced Hyrcania and ſome other neighbouring provinces, and was at laſt killed in a battle againſt Ariarathes IV. king of Cappadocia [f]. From him all thoſe who reigned after of the ſame race, took the name of Arſaces, as the kings of Egypt did that of Ptolemy, and the Roman emperors that of Cæſar.

Arſaces I. Year of the Flood 2699. Before Chriſt, 300.

HE was ſucceeded by his ſon Arſaces, who entering Media, made himſelf maſter of that country, while Antiochus the Great was engaged in a war with Ptolemy Euergetes king of Egypt. But Antiochus was no ſooner diſengaged from that war, than he marched with all his forces againſt Arſaces, drove him quite out of Media, and, entering Parthia, obliged him to retire into Hyrcania, whence he ſoon after returned with an army of an hundred thouſand foot and twenty thouſand horſe. With theſe he put a ſtop to Antiochus's further progreſs; ſo that the Syrian, finding he could not overpower ſo valiant an enemy, began to give ear to the overtures which were made him for putting an end to ſo troubleſome a war; and a treaty being ſet on foot, it was agreed, that Arſaces ſhould hold Parthia and Hyrcania, on condition of his aſſiſting An-

Arſaces II.

[d] Vol. VIII. p. 463, & ſeq. [e] Ibid p. 472. [f] JUSTIN. l. xli. c. 5, &c.

tiochus

tiochus to recover the other provinces which had revolted [g], as we have related at length in the history of Syria [h].

Priapatius. Priapatius, the son of Arsaces II. succeeded his father; but all we know of him is, that he reigned fifteen years, and left three sons behind him, viz. Phrahates, Mithridates, and Artabanus.

Phrahates. The crown he bequeathed to Phrahates his eldest son, who overcame the Mardi, one of the most warlike nations of the east, and never conquered before the reign of Alexander, who, with much ado, reduced them, as well as the other nations inhabiting Media [i]. Phrahates left a numerous issue; but having more at heart the welfare of his kingdom than the advantage of his children, he left the crown

Mithridates I. to his brother. Mithridates, on account of his extraordinary merit; for he had given many instances of an uncommon wisdom, probity, and courage. He reduced the countries of the Bactrians, Persians, Medes, and Elymæans, and overran in a manner all the east, extending his dominions into India, beyond the boundaries of Alexander's conquests. Demetrius Nicator, who then reigned in Syria, endeavoured to recover the provinces of the east, which Mithridates had taken; but his army was intirely cut off, and himself taken prisoner, as we have elsewhere related at length [k]. After this victory, Mithridates got possession of all Babylonia and Mesopotamia; so that he was now master of all the provinces lying between the Euphrates on the west, and the Ganges on the east [l]. He entertained his royal captive with great humanity, allowed him a maintenance suitable to his rank, and, sending him into Hyrcania to reside there, gave him Rhodagune, one of his sisters, in marriage [m]. However, he kept him still in captivity, tho' with as much freedom as was consistent with the state of a captive; and at his death, which happened in the thirty seventh year of his reign, left him in this condition to his son Phrahates, who succeeded him in the kingdom [n]. The reign of Mithridates is looked upon by authors as the epoch of the Parthian grandeur; for under him that empire was by far the most powerful and most extensive in the east, all the countries that lie between the Euphrates and mount Caucasus receiving law from him, and most of the princes of Asia being either subdued by him, or obliged to enter into an alliance with him on his own terms. He was a prince

[g] Idem ibid. [h] Vide Vol. VIII. p. 495, & seq. [i] JUSTIN. l. xli. c. 5. [k] Vide Vol. IX. p. 10, & seq. [l] JUSTIN. l. xli. c. 6, OROS. l. v. c. 4 [m] JUSTIN. ibid & l. xxxviii. c. 9. [n] Idem, l. xxxviii. c. 9. & l, xlii. c. 1.

a prince of great courage and resolution, and at the same time had a sweetness of temper, which rendered him amiable to all who approached him. As he conquered many nations, he is said to have carefully examined their various constitutions, and, out of the whole collection, to have formed a body of excellent laws for the regulation of his empire; so that he was both a great warrior and wise lawgiver [o].

Phrahates II. had scarce taken possession of the throne, when Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, marched against him at the head of a numerous army, under pretence of delivering his brother Demetrius, who was still kept in captivity. Phrahates marched out against him, but was overcome in three successive battles, stripped of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and all the other countries which his father had reduced, and confined within the narrow limits of the first Parthian kingdom. However, he had the good luck at last to retrieve his affairs, and cut off Antiochus with his whole army, in the manner we have related at length in the history of Syria [p]. Phrahates, flushed with this victory, resolved to invade Syria; but while he was making the necessary preparations for this enterprize, he found himself engaged in a war at home with the Scythians his neighbours. He had called them to his assistance against Antiochus; but that prince being overcome, and his army intirely defeated before their arrival, he refused to pay them the sum which had been promised them. Hereupon the Scythians, falling upon the country which they were come to defend, commited every-where most dreadful ravages [q]. Phrahates, having thus drawn upon himself a war with the Scythians, in order to strengthen his army against so brave and powerful an enemy, took into his service all the Greek mercenaries, who, having followed Antiochus king of Syria in his Parthian expedition, had been taken prisoners in the late overthrow of that prince. As these Greeks had been treated by the Parthians with great haughtiness and cruelty during their captivity, they no sooner got arms into their hands, but they resolved to be revenged on them; and accordingly, in the first engagement, they went all in a body over to the Scythians, and, in conjunction with them, falling upon the Parthians, cut their army to pieces, killed their king, and laid waste their country [r]. After this, both the Phrahates II.

[o] DIODOR. SICUL. in excerpt Valesii, p. 361. [p] Vol. IX. p. 15, & seq. [q] JUSTIN. l. xlii. c. 1. [r] Idem ibid.

Greeks

Greeks and Scythians returned to their own countries; and[d], on their departure, Artabanus, the third ſon of Pampatius, and uncle to the deceaſed king, took poſſeſſion of the crown, which he held a very ſhort time, being killed a few days after in battle by the Thogarians, another nation of the Scythian race[f].

Artabanus I.

Pacorus I. Artabanus was ſucceeded by his ſon Pacorus I. who, hearing of the great exploits of the Romans, ſent embaſſadors to Sylla, who was then in Cappadocia, to deſire the friendſhip and alliance of ſo powerful a people. The Parthians, tho' the moſt warlike and wealthy nation in Aſia, were at that time ſcarce known at Rome. Sylla therefore was overjoyed to hear, that their king had reſolved to ſend embaſſadors to him, and looked upon it as one of the moſt fortunate occurrences of his life, that he ſhould be the firſt Roman, to whom ſo great and gallant a nation ſhould apply for an alliance with the people of Rome. He was then only prætor, and had been ſent by the ſenate to reſtore Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, to the throne, whence he had been driven by Tigranes king of Armenia. However, to dazzle the eyes of the embaſſadors with an air of grandeur, he took great ſtate upon him in the audience he gave them; for in the place where he received them, he ordered three ſeats to be put; one in the middle for himſelf, that on the right hand for king Ariobarzanes, and the other on the left for Oromazes, the chief of the embaſſy. This compliance of the Parthian embaſſador coſt him his life, Pacorus having cauſed him to be beheaded on his return, for debaſing the majeſty of the Parthian monarchy, by giving place to a Roman prætor[t]. However, Pacorus afterwards ſent embaſſadors to Lucullus, to renew the alliance he had concluded with Sylla. He was ſucceeded by his ſon

Phrahates III. Phrahates III. who taking under his protection Tigranes, the ſon of Tigranes the Great, king of Armenia, gave him his daughter in marriage, and invading Armenia laid ſiege to Artaxata, with a deſign to drive the father from the throne, and place the ſon on it in his room. But, on the approach of Pompey, he thought fit to withdraw, and, by a ſolemn embaſſy, to renew the alliance which his father had concluded, firſt with Sylla, and afterwards with Lucullus[u]. He was, not long after, murdered by his own children, Mithridates and Orodes, Orodes. in the twelfth year of his reign. Upon his death, Orodes, who was the elder brother, took poſſeſſion of the throne; but was

[f] Idem ibid. [t] PLUT. in Syll. VEL. PATERCUL. l. ii. 24.
[u] DION, l. xxxvi. p. 22. LIV. epit. l. 100.

was soon driven out by Mithridates, who, making himself odious to the Parthians by his cruelties, was, in his turn, obliged to abandon the kingdom, and shelter himself with Gabinius governor of Syria. On his flight Orodes was replaced on the throne, by means of one Surenas, who, next to the king, held the first place of honour and power in the kingdom, and had always adhered to the interest of Orodes. Gabinius was easily prevailed upon to undertake the restoring of Mithridates; for as his heart was intirely bent upon gain, he wanted only a pretence to invade Parthia, knowing that it was at that time a wealthy nation. Accordingly he set out on his march, taking Mithridates along with him for his guide; but after he had passed the Euphrates, being accosted by Ptolemy Auletes king of Egypt, who offered him ten thousand talents on condition he restored him to his kingdom, the corrupt governor, dropping his former enterprize, repassed the Euphrates, and marched directly into Egypt, leaving Mithridates to shift for himself. The Parthian, seeing himself thus abandoned by Gabinius, raised what troops he could, and, returning into Babylonia, seized Seleucia, where he was closely besieged by Orodes, and in a short time reduced to such straits, that he was obliged to surrender at discretion. Orodes no sooner got him into his power, but, considering him as an enemy, and not as a brother, he caused him to be put to death, and was himself an eye-witness of that cruel execution [w]. We must not confound, as Justin has done, this Mithridates with Mithridates II. of whom we have spoke above, it being plain from Plutarch, Dion, Florus, Xiphilinus, and from the very prologue of the forty second book of Trogus Pompeius, whom Justin has epitomized, that Mithridates II. and Mithridates the brother of Orodes, were two different princes. The former, by his many conquests and noble exploits, acquired the surname of Great; whereas the latter did nothing worth mentioning.

Mithridates II.

Mithridates put to death by his brother Orodes.

Orodes, by the death of his brother, became sole master of the whole Parthian empire; but did not long enjoy it in peace, a violent storm breaking out at a time, and from a quarter he least expected it. M. Licinius Crassus had been lately created consul at Rome the second time with Pompey; and in the partition of the provinces, had obtained, in virtue of a law made by C. Trebonius tribune of the people, Syria, with the neighbouring provinces. To Pompey the two Spains were assigned, with all the provinces of Africa. By the

[w] DION, l. xxxix. APPIAN. in Parthic. p. 134, 140, 141, & in Syriac. p. 120. JUSTIN. l. xlii. c. 4.

Treboniau law they were both impowered to hold their provinces for the ſpace of five years, to raiſe what forces they ſhould think proper, and to make peace or war with whom they pleaſed, according to their own judgment, without having recourſe to the ſenate or people of Rome, as all other governors had ever before been obliged to do [x]. Craſſus was, according to Plutarch [y], a man of known valour and great experience in war, and had, on many occaſions, given ſignal proofs of both in the armies of Sylla, under whom he had learnt the military art. He was likewiſe an eloquent orator, well verſed in hiſtory, acquainted with Ariſtotle's philoſophy, and deemed one of the beſt antiquaries of his time. His obliging behaviour, his wonderful addreſs and affability, prejudiced people at firſt in his favour, and gained upon their affections; but his inſatiable avarice made all his good qualities in a manner overlooked; for though he was born of a rich family, and heir to a great eſtate, yet he let no means of increaſing his revenues eſcape him, and often uſed ſuch as were wholly unworthy his birth and rank, being of opinion, as he himſelf declared, that no citizen was to be accounted a rich man, till he was able to maintain an army at his own expence. As he had therefore uſed all his intereſt to obtain the province of Syria, ſo he was overjoyed when it was conferred upon him for ſuch a term of years, and with ſo unbounded a power and authority, being reſolved to carry the war into Parthia, in hopes of enriching himſelf with the ſpoils of that nation, which was deemed very rich, as never having been ſubdued by any foreign enemy. He was ſo tranſported with joy at the thoughts of the immenſe treaſures, which, he took for granted, he was to bring back with him from Parthia, that he could not forbear talking of his intended expedition in a manner unworthy of his age and character, even with perſons whom he ſcarce knew. He did not confine his view to Syria alone, or Parthia, but flattered himſelf with atchieving ſuch things, as ſhould eclipſe the great exploits of Lucullus, Pompey, and Sylla himſelf, whoſe names had ſpread terror over all the nations of the eaſt. He fancied himſelf already on the banks of the Indus and the Ganges, and over-ran in his thoughts Bactria, India, and the moſt remote provinces of Aſia, beyond the boundaries of Alexander's conqueſts. Intoxicated with theſe hopes, he began, towards the end of his conſulſhip, to make his levies, and form the legions, which were to attend him into Syria.

M. Licinius Craſſus reſolves to make war on the Parthians.

[x] Liv. l. cv. Plut. in Craſſo, Pomp. & Cat. Min. Appian. bell. civil. l. ii. p. 437, 438. Dio, l. xxxix. [y] Plut. in Craſſo.

ria. But ſome of the tribunes of the people, diſapproving his deſign of making war upon the Parthians, who had entered into an alliance with Rome, and religiouſly obſerved their engagements, did all that lay in their power to reverſe the plebiſcitum or decree of the people, paſſed at the inſtigation of Trebonius, who was now out of office. Ateius Capito, one of the tribunes, having ſtirred up the people, by repreſenting to them how baſe and ſhameful a thing it was to diſturb the tranquillity of a peaceable nation, who had done the Romans no injury, would have arreſted Craſſus, though conſul, if eight other tribunes had not oppoſed the violence of their collegue, and reſcued Craſſus out of the hands of the officer who had ſeized him. When the conſul, after performing, as uſual, his vows in the capitol, was ready to ſet out for his province, Ateius aſſembled the people, prepared to obſtruct his departure; which Craſſus being alarmed at, deſired Pompey to accompany him to the gates of the city; which he did accordingly, keeping in awe by his preſence, as he was greatly revered by the people, thoſe who had moſt zealouſly oppoſed the conſul's expedition. Ateius, ſeeing he could not prevent the departure of Craſſus, haſtened to the gate of the city, through which he was to paſs; and there having ordered a fire to be kindled, as ſoon as Craſſus appeared, he threw ſome perfumes into it, and, invoking the infernal gods, uttered a thouſand imprecations againſt Craſſus, which made all thoſe, who heard them, tremble with horror [z]. Tho' Craſſus took no notice of theſe curſes, yet the ſuperſtitious Romans aſcribed to them all the misfortunes and calamities which befel him, and thoſe who attended him in this fatal expedition (D); whereas they were owing, as we ſhall ſee anon, to a quite different cauſe.

Is oppoſed in vain by Capito, tribune of the people.

Craſſus

[z] DIO. & Plut. ibid. Flor l. iii. c. 11. VELL PATERCUL. l. ii c. 46. APPIAN. bell. civil. p. 438.

(D) Florus tells us, that Craſſus, on his ſetting out from Rome, was curſed by Metellus tribune of the people (12); and Velleius Paterculus (13), Appian (14), and Dion (15), that he was curſed by all the tribunes, but eſpecially by Ateius, who ſignalized himſelf on that occaſion.

(12) Flor. l iii. c. 11. (13) Vell. Paterc. l. ii c. 46. (14) Appian. de bell. civil. l. ii. p. 438. (15) Dio, l xlix.

Sets out from Rome. Year of the flood, 2944. Before Christ 55.

Craſſus having, with the aſſiſtance of Pompey, got ſafe out of Rome, purſued his march to Brunduſium; where he immediately embarked his men on board ſeveral tranſports, and, notwithſtanding the wind blew then very high, ſet ſail for Aſia, and, with much ado, reached the ports of Galatia, having loſt many ſhips in his paſſage. Soon after his landing he had an interview with Dejotarus king of Galatia, who, though ſtricken in years, was at that time employed in building a new city. Craſſus, thinking this an unſeaſonable undertaking, ſaid pleaſantly, You begin, O king, full late to build a city at the twelfth hour of the day. The twelfth hour was, with the Romans, the laſt of the day. As Craſſus was upwards of ſixty, and looked older than he was, Dejotarus replied, And you, O general, are not too early in your expedition againſt the Parthians [a].

Plunders the temple of Jeruſalem.

FROM Galatia Craſſus purſued his march into Syria, the province allotted to him; and being there informed, that immenſe treaſures were lodged in the temple of Jeruſalem, which Pompey had not ventured to touch, he marched thither with part of his army, in order to ſeize them. Eleazar, one of the prieſts and at that time keeper of the ſacred treaſure, had under his charge, beſides many other things of an ineſtimable value, a rafter of maſſy gold, weighing three thouſand Hebrew pounds, or ſeven hundred and fifty common pounds. This, for the better ſecuring of it, he had incloſed into a beam made hollow for that purpoſe, and placed the beam over the entrance from the holy place into the holy of holies, hanging from it the veil which parted thoſe two places. Eleazar, who was apprized of the motive of Craſſus's march to Jeruſalem, to ſave the other ornaments of the temple, and the riches which were depoſited there by private perſons, diſcovered the golden rafter to Craſſus, and ſuffered him to take it away, after [a] PLUT. ibid.

——— Craſſumque in bella ſecutæ Sæva tribunitiæ moverunt prælia diræ, ſays Lucan (16). Craſſus the night before he ſet out for his province, ſupped with Cicero, in the gardens of his ſon-in-law Craſſippes (17). From thence Cicero removed to Tuſculanum, and Craſſus haſtened to Brunduſium in his military habit, being reſolved, in ſpite of the tribunes, to make war on the Parthians (18).

(16) Lucan. l. iii. (17) Cic. epiſt familiar. l. i. epiſt. 9. (18) Idem, l. iv. ad Attic. epiſt. 12. & l. ii. de divinat.

having

having made him ſolemnly promiſe with an oath, that he would meddle with nothing elſe. But Craſſus no ſooner received it, than forgetting his oath, he ſeized on the two thouſand talents which Pompey had left there untouched; and rummaging the temple, plundered it of every thing elſe which he thought worth taking away, to the value of eight thouſand talents more; ſo that the whole booty, which he ſacrilegiouſly took from thence, amounted to ten thouſand talents [b]; that is, to two millions and upwards of our money. Joſephus, who relates this, thinking it would ſcarce be credited by other nations, alledges the authority of Strabo and other writers to prove, that immenſe treaſures had been depoſited in the temple, by the Jews of Europe, Aſia, and Cyrenaica [c]; but the hiſtorical writings of Strabo, which he quotes, have not reached our times.

Craſſus, thinking himſelf now ſufficiently furniſhed for his intended expedition, marched to the Euphrates, and having croſſed that river on a bridge of boats, which he threw over it, entered the Parthian territories, and began hoſtilities, without any other motive than his inſatiable avarice, and an eager deſire of inriching himſelf with the plunder of a country, which was generally eſteemed very rich. The Romans had, by Sylla, Lucullus, and Pompey, made peace, and entered into alliances with the nation he thus invaded, and no complaints of any infraction or injuries had ever been heard, which might give juſt reaſon for a war; ſo that the Parthians, expecting nothing leſs than ſuch an invaſion, and having made no preparations for their defence, were eaſily driven out of all Meſopotamia. The city of Zenodotia, which Stephanus places near Nicephorium, was the only place that made any oppoſition. Apollonius, who was governor, or rather tyrant, as Dio calls him, of that city, ſent deputies to Craſſus, acquainting him, that he was willing to ſurrender up the place to him; but as ſoon as the detachment ſent to take poſſeſſion of it had entered the gate, he ſurrounded them, and cut them in pieces. But both he and the inhabitants paid dear for their treachery; for Craſſus having immediately inveſted the city with his whole army, and taken it by aſſault, reduced the inhabitants to ſlavery, confiſcated their goods, and ſold their perſons to the beſt bidder. For this conqueſt and an inconſiderable advantage gained over one Talymenus Ilaces, or Syllaces, governor of Meſopotamia, who, having engaged the Romans with a ſmall body of horſe, was Begins hoſtilities with the Parthians.

And ſeizes great part of Meſopotamia.

[b] JOSEPH. Antiq l. xiv. c. 12.

[c] Idem ibid.

overcome

overcome and wounded, Craſſus ſuffered himſelf to be ſaluted by the ſoldiery with the title of imperator, which was uſually given after ſome ſignal victory. This turned to his diſgrace, the whole army laughing at his vanity, and expecting little from a general who was thus elated with the leaſt ſucceſs [d]. The other cities made no reſiſtance; ſo that he over-ran all Meſopotamia, and might, if he had taken advantage of the conſternation the Parthians were in, have penetrated as far as Seleucia and Cteſiphon, and made himſelf maſter of Babylonia as well as Meſopotamia; but, inſtead of purſuing the career he had begun, in the beginning of the autumn he repaſſed the Euphrates, and, leaving only ſeven thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe to gariſon the places he had taken, put his army into winter-quarters in the cities of Syria. This was undoubtedly the greateſt fault Craſſus committed in his Parthian expedition, after that of his undertaking it upon moſt unjuſt motives; for his haſty retreat gave the enemy time to recover from the terror which his arms had ſpread all over the eaſt, and to raiſe an army againſt the enſuing year, which the Romans could not withſtand. On his return into Syria, he was joined by his ſon, at the head of a thouſand choſen horſe. This young Roman had ſerved under Cæſar in Gaul, in quality of his lieutenant, and had been honoured with ſeveral military crowns, which generals uſed to beſtow on ſuch as diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their valour. When Cæſar underſtood that his father had begun the war with the Parthians, he gave him leave to go into the eaſt and ſerve under him; and indeed Cæſar had all along preſſed Craſſus to break with the Parthians, to force his way into Bactria, and from thence into India, knowing, that the farther that general, of whoſe power he was jealous, penetrated into the eaſtern countries, the more able he himſelf ſhould be to put in execution his deſign of ſubverting the republic; but the unfortunate young Craſſus came into Aſia, only to be a witneſs of his father's ill conduct, and to partake of his father's misfortunes [e].

His extortions in Syria.

In Syria Craſſus ſpent his time more like a publican than a general, being wholly taken up with examining into the revenues of that province, and improving them by the moſt ſhameful methods, in order to amaſs new treaſures. The plunder of the temple of Jeruſalem was not the only ſacrilege he was guilty of; he robbed in like manner all the temples of Syria, appropriating to his own uſe their rich ornaments and furniture.

[d] Dio, l. xl. Plutarch. ubi ſupra. [e] Plutarch. & Dio, ibid.

furniture. The temple of the Syrian goddeſs, named Atargetis, at Hierapolis, which ſome writers call Bambyces, others Edeſſa, and the Syrians Magog, was famous all over the eaſt, on account of the immenſe treaſures laid up there, as being the collection of many years. Theſe the avaricious proconſul ſeized; and leſt any of the rich vaſes and ornaments ſhould be embezzled, he ſpent a great deal of his time in ſeeing the money counted, and the gold and ſilver veſſels weighed before him [f]. Having thus ranſacked all the temples and ſacred places within the limits of his province, which Gabinius himſelf, his predeceſſor, had ſpared, he began to load the Syrians with ſuch taxes as reduced them to beggary. He commanded all the cities of his province to furniſh him each with a certain number of men, and then diſcharged them for a ſum of money. No one could obtain juſtice without a large bribe, nor redeem themſelves from the inſolence of the ſoldiers, without advancing a large ſum to the general. In ſhort, there was not any means of amaſſing money, how unjuſt or oppreſſive ſoever, which he did not uſe, as if he had been ſent, not to govern, but to plunder, the province. In the mean time, the military diſcipline was entirely neglected, the ſoldiers lived in their quarters without any order, and the whole army gave themſelves up to idleneſs, debauchery, and all manner of effeminate pleaſures. We are told, that as Craſſus was going out of the temple of Hierapolis, which he had plundered, his ſon, who walked before, ſtumbled at the threſhold, and falling pulled down his father with him. This was interpreted by the ſoothſayers as a very bad omen; but the intire neglect of military diſcipline was the ſureſt preſage of the misfortunes, which afterwards befel both his ſon and the whole army.

His interview with the Parthian embaſſadors.

Craſſus having thus ſpent the winter, early in the ſpring drew together his troops out of their ſeveral quarters, in order to purſue the war which he had begun with the Parthians. As Orodes their king was a very warlike prince, he had, during the winter, aſſembled a numerous army; but, before he entered with it upon action, he ſent embaſſadors to the Roman general, to know for what reaſon he made war upon him. The embaſſadors arrived in Syria while Craſſus was aſſembling his troops, and being introduced to him, firſt put him in mind of the alliance which the Parthians had concluded with Sylla and Pompey, and then told him, that if he was ſent a-

[f] STRABO. l. xvi. p. 748 PLIN. l. v. c. 23 PLUT. & DIO. ibid.

gainſt

gainſt the Parthians by the people of Rome, they did not pretend he ſhould diſobey his orders, ſince in that caſe a war muſt enſue, which could not be terminated but by the final ruin of one of the empires; but if Craſſus, as they had been informed, had undertaken this war, contrary to the inclinations of the people of Rome, to ſatiate his private intereſt, that the king their maſter, pitying his old age, would ſuffer the Romans he had left in Meſopotamia, where they were rather beſieged than in gariſon, to retire unmoleſted. Craſſus, without alledging any pretence for his invading the Parthian dominions, anſwered this ſpeech with a rodomontade, ſaying, that they ſhould have his anſwer at Seleucia. Hereupon the chief of the embaſſadors, by name Vageſes or Vabiſes, ſmiling and ſhewing him the palm of his hand, ſaid, You ſhall ſooner, O Craſſus, ſee hair grow here, than be maſter of Seleucia; and, without adding a word more, retired, and acquainted his maſter, that he muſt prepare for war [g].

Orodes finding, on the return of his embaſſadors, that the proconſul was bent on a war, immediately took the field, and, dividing his troops into two bodies, marched in perſon with one to the frontiers of Armenia, to make a diverſion there, the king of that country having raiſed a conſiderable army to reinforce the Romans. The other he ſent into Meſopotamia, under the command of the brave Surena, or Surenas. This general, if we may depend on the character Plutarch gives us of him [h], had all the qualifications that form a conſummate hero. He was deſcended from one of the moſt ancient and illuſtrious families of Parthia, and had derived from his anceſtors the right of putting the crown on the king's head at his coronation: To this illuſtrious birth he is ſaid to have joined an extraordinary wiſdom and diſcretion, though he was but thirty years of age, and to have ſurpaſſed in valour and proweſs all men of his time. His valour kept the princes and nations of Aſia in awe, and prevented their entering into a confederacy againſt the formidable power of Parthia. Orodes was indebted to him, as we have hinted above for his crown. The taking of Seleucia, when held by Mithridates, was chiefly owing to him; for he was the firſt who mounted the ramparts of that capital, ſtruck terror into the enemy's troops, and made them fly before him. His ſtature was majeſtic, his air graceful, and his behaviour towards all extremely obliging. In wealth, power, and authority, he was, next to the king, the firſt man in the kingdom.

The character of Surenas the Parthian general.

[g] Flor. l. iii c. 11. Plut. Dio, ibid.

[h] Plut. in Craſſo.

dom. His equipage, when he travelled, consisted of a thousand camels to carry his baggage, two hundred chariots for the service of his wives and concubines, a thousand horse men completely armed for his guard, and besides a great number of light-armed troops, which with his domestics, amounted to ten thousand more. He is said to have united the luxury of an Asiatic with the intrepidity of a conqueror; for he carried with him whatever could contribute to his pleasures; and at the same time was ready to expose himself to the greatest dangers, being always at the head of the troops he commanded in the most perilous and desperate enterprizes. Though his courage was such as to brave death in a breach or battle, yet he was not ashamed to paint his face and perfume his hair, after the manner of the effeminate Medes; whereas the Parthians marched against the enemy with their hair in disorder, and making as hideous a figure as they could, to strike the more terror [1].

Surenas retakes most of the cities of Mesopotamia.

BUT, to resume the thread of our history, Orodes having divided his army into two bodies, Surenas marched with that which was under his command into Mesopotamia, where he soon retook most of the cities which Crassus had made himself master of the year before. Hereupon several Roman soldiers, who garisoned the other places, making their escape out of Mesopotamia, fled to Crassus, and filled his camp with a terrible report of the number, power, and strength of the enemy. They told their fellow-soldiers, that the Parthian troops were very numerous, brave, and well disciplined; that it was impossible to overtake them when they fled, or escape them when they pursued; that their defensive arms were proof against the Roman darts, and their offensive weapons so sharp, that no buckler was fence against them, &c. Crassus looked upon this account only as the effect of a panic and cowardly fear; but the common soldiers, and many of the chief officers, were so disheartened at it, that the quæstor Caius Cassius, the same who afterwards conspired against Cæsar, and most of the legionary tribunes, advised Crassus to suspend his march, and deliberate with more leisure on the enterprize, before he proceeded farther in it. But Crassus obstinately persisted in his former resolution, contrary to the opinion of all his officers, being confirmed therein by the arrival of Artabazes king of Armenia, who brought with him six thousand horse, which were only his guard, and promised to send to the proconsul ten thousand cuirassiers and thirty thousand foot, whenever he should stand in need of them.

[1] PLUT. ibid & APPIAN in Parthic.

At the ſame time he adviſed him by no means to march his army through the plains of Meſopotamia, but to take his rout over the mountains of Armenia. The reaſons with which he ſupported this advice were, that as Armenia was a mountainous country, the Parthian horſe, in which the main ſtrength of their army conſiſted, would prove there intirely uſeleſs; and beſides, that if he took this rout, his army ſhould be plentifully ſupplied with all neceſſaries: whereas, if he marched by the way of Meſopotamia, he would be perpetually haraſſed by the Parthian horſe, and often be obliged to lead his army through ſandy deſerts, where he would be diſtreſſed for want of water and all other proviſions. This was the beſt advice that could be given him, and the reaſons for it were unanſwerable; but Craſſus, deſpiſing all that was ſaid to him, told Artabazes, that as he had left many valiant Romans to garriſon the towns, which he had made himſelf maſter of the laſt year in Meſopotamia, he was obliged to take that rout, leſt they ſhould be abandoned to the mercy of the enemy; but as to the auxiliaries the king of Armenia had offered him, he willingly accepted them, and deſired Artabazes to ſend them to him with all poſſible expedition. Thus Craſſus, hearkening to no advice but what tended to his ruin, ſet out on his march for Meſopotamia. Dion Caſſius, a judicious hiſtorian and at the ſame time an experienced warrior, obſerves here, that the Romans under the command of Craſſus were on all occaſions, either ignorant of what was neceſſarily to be done, or in no condition to execute it; and adds, that one would have thought they had been blinded and perſecuted by ſome divinity, ſince they could neither make uſe of their minds nor bodies. This divinity was, no doubt, the true God, tho' unknown to Dion, who thus revenged the robbing and profaning his holy temple at Jeruſalem.

Craſſus deſpiſes the advice of the king of Armenia.

Enters Meſopotamia, contrary to the advice of all his officers.

The proconſul, being greatly encouraged by the proſpect of the reinforcement promiſed him by the king of Armenia, began his march, and, contrary to the advice of his chief officers, advanced to the frontiers of Meſopotamia. He had under his command ſeven legions, four thouſand horſe, and a great many auxiliaries, the whole army amounting to forty thouſand men and upwards. With theſe he paſſed the Euphrates, near the city of Zeugma, in the province of Comagene (E), and again entered Meſopotamia. Plutarch, Dion Caſſius,

(E) Strabo and Pliny place the city of Zeugma in Comagene, a province of Syria, and tell us, that it was ſo called from a bridge built here over the Euphrates, the word Ζευγμα in the Greek tongue ſignifying a bridge. This bridge was, according to Dion Caſſius and Caſſius, and Julius Obſequens ſpeak of many prodigies, by which the gods declared before-hand, that they did not approve of this expedition, and gave him warning of the ill ſucceſs that would attend it. While the troops were paſſing the Euphrates, the ſky was all on a ſudden overcaſt, and ſo dreadful a ſtorm aroſe, that the ſoldiers were filled with fear and conſternation. The inceſſant claps of thunder, the flaſhes of lightning that followed one another, and the violent wind which blew in the ſoldiers faces, ſeemed to have been ſent by the gods, on purpoſe to put a ſtop to their march. Part of the bridge was broke down by the wind and lightning while the army was paſſing. The horſe which Craſſus uſed to ride in battle, fell into the river, and was drowned with the groom who led him. The golden eagle, which was the chief ſtandard of the army, is ſaid to have turned about of it ſelf on the ſtaff on which it was fixed. Many other ſtandards were, by the violence of the wind, blown into the river, and loſt. While Craſſus was offering the uſual ſacrifices for the purifying of the troops, he let fall the entrails of the victim, which the prieſts had, according to cuſtom, put into his hands. From this event the ſoldiery drew bad preſages; but the general, deriding their ſuperſtition, told them, That they had no occaſion to be afraid, for his arms ſhould not ſlip out of his hands in the ſame manner [k].

THE army having thus croſſed the Euphrates, and entered the enemy's country, Caſſius adviſed the proconſul to advance to ſome of the towns in which he had left gariſons, and there reſt and refreſh his troops, till he had got certain intelligence of the number, ſtrength, and power of the enemy; but, if he did not approve of this counſel, he thought the beſt thing he could do was to march along the Euphrates to Seleucia; for, by keeping cloſe to that river, he would avoid being ſurrounded by the Parthians, and at the ſame time be plentifully ſupplied, by means of his ſhips, with all neceſſary proviſions. Craſſus ſeemed to approve of this advice, and was ready to come into it, when Abgarus king of Edeſſa, of whom we have ſpoke in a former volume, arrived at the

[k] PLUT. & DION. ibid.

and Stephanus, the work of Alexander the Great. But it is not at all probable, that Alexander ſhould have gone ſo far as Comagene to croſs the Euphrates; and beſides, Arrian tells us, that he led his army over that river at Thapſacus, after having repaired a bridge there, which had been deſtroyed by the Perſians, in order to prevent him from entering Meſopotamia.

Betrayed by Abgarus king of Edeſſa.

Roman camp, and prevailed upon the proconſul to follow a quite different plan. Abgarus, as he had formerly ſerved under Pompey, was well known in the Roman army, and looked upon by the ſoldiery as a friend; but in reality was a traitor, and ſent by Surenas, with whom he kept a private correſpondence, on purpoſe to bring about the deſtruction of Craſſus; and this part he acted ſo well, that the ruin of the Roman army was chiefly owing to him. In the firſt interview he had with the Roman general, he told him, that he wanted wings and feet more than arms againſt a nation that was ready, on his approach, to withdraw with their moſt valuable effects into Scythia and Hyrcania; that they had not courage enough to look the Romans in the face; that the name of Craſſus had already ſpread a general terror among their troops, and that there wanted no more for the obtaining of a complete victory, than to march directly up to them, and give them battle. He offered himſelf for a guide to lead them the ſhorteſt way to the enemy; and Craſſus, blinded with his flattering ſpeeches, gave intirely into the ſnare, and followed the traitor, who had ſo ſtrongly inſinuated himſelf into his favour, that he would hearken to no-body but him.

The painful march of the Roman army.

Under the conduct of this crafty and treacherous guide, they firſt entered into a vaſt green plain, divided by many rivulets; and their march proved very eaſy croſs this delicious country: but the farther they advanced, the worſe the roads grew, inſomuch that they were obliged at laſt to climb up mountains and rocks, which brought them to a dry and ſandy plain, where they could neither find food to ſatisfy their hunger, nor water to quench their thirſt. Then Abgarus began to be ſuſpected by the tribunes, and other officers, who earneſtly preſſed their general to follow him no longer, but to retreat to the mountains. At the ſame time an expreſs arrived from Artabazes, acquainting Craſſus, that Orodes had invaded his kingdom at the head of a mighty army, and that he was obliged to keep his forces at home for the defence of his own dominions. The ſame meſſenger adviſed the proconſul, in his maſter's name, to avoid by all means the barren plains, where his troops would periſh with hunger, and to take to the mountains, and approach Armenia, that they might join their forces againſt the common enemy; but all was to no purpoſe, for Craſſus, inſtead of giving ear either to the wiſe counſels of his own officers, or of a king, who was a ſincere and hearty friend to the Romans, blindly and obſtinately followed the advice of the treacherous Abgarus, or rather his own ill fate; nay, he flew into a violent paſſion againſt the meſſenger ſent him by Artabazes, for the treacherous advice he had given him [1]. Caſſius could not hear this mad anſwer without the greateſt indignation; but Abgarus endeavoured to ſoften him, by promiſing to lead the army very ſoon into a delicious and fruitful country beyond the deſerts, which would make them amends for the fatigue they had undergone. As to Craſſus, he gave no other anſwer to the complaints of his troops, than that they could not expect to meet with the delights of Campania in the moſt remote parts of the world.

treacherous

THUS they continued their march for ſome days croſs a deſert, the very ſight of which was ſufficient to throw them into the utmoſt deſpair; for they could not perceive either near them, or at a diſtance, the leaſt tree, plant, or brook, not ſo much as a hill, or a ſingle blade of graſs; nothing was to be ſeen all around them but huge heaps of burning ſand. The Romans had ſcarce got through this deſert, when word was brought them by their ſcouts, that a numerous army of Parthians was advancing full march to attack them; for Abgarus, under pretence of going out on parties, had often conferred with Surenas, and concerted meaſures with him for deſtroying the Roman army. Upon this advice, which occaſioned great confuſion in the camp, the Romans being quite exhauſted, and tired out with their long and troubleſome march, Craſſus drew up his men in battalia, following at firſt the advice of Caſſius, who was for extending the infantry as wide as poſſible, that they might take up the more ground, and by that means prevent the enemy from ſurrounding them; but Abgarus aſſuring the proconſul, that the Parthian forces were not ſo numerous as was repreſented, he changed this diſpoſition, and believing only the man who betrayed him, drew up his troops in a ſquare, which faced every way, and had on each ſide twelve cohorts in front. Near each cohort he placed a troop of horſe to ſupport them, that they might charge with the greater ſecurity and boldneſs. Thus the whole army looked more like one phalanx, than troops drawn up in manipuli, with ſpaces between them, after the Roman manner. The general himſelf commanded in the centre, his ſon in the left wing, and Caſſius in the right. In this order they advanced to the banks of a ſmall river called the Baliſſus, the ſight of which was very pleaſing to the ſoldiers, who were much haraſſed with drought and exceſſive heat. Moſt of the officers were for encamping on the banks of this river, or rather rivulet, to give the troops time to refreſh themſelves after the fatigues

The imprudent conduct of Craſſus.

[1] PLUT. DION. ibid. APPIAN. in Parthic.

of

of so long and painful a march, and in the mean time to procure certain intelligence of the number and disposition of the Parthian army; but Crassus, suffering himself to be hurried on by the inconsiderate ardour of his son, and the horse he commanded, only allowed the legions to take a meal standing; and, before this could be done by all, he ordered them to advance, not slowly, and halting now and then, after the Roman manner, but as fast as they could move, till they came in sight of the enemy, who, contrary to their expectation, did not appear either so numerous or so terrible as they had been represented. But this was a stratagem of Surenas, who had concealed his men in convenient places, ordering them to cover their arms, lest their brightness should betray them, and, starting up at the first signal, attack the enemy on all sides. The stratagem had the desired effect; for Surenas no sooner gave the signal, than the Parthians, rising as it were out of the ground, with dreadful cries and a most frightful noise, advanced against the Romans, who were greatly surprized and dismayed at that sight, and much more so, when the Parthians, throwing off the covering of their arms, appeared in shining cuirasses and helmets of burnished steel, finely mounted on horses, covered all over with armour of the same metal. At their head appeared young Surenas in a rich dress, and was the first who charged the enemy, endeavouring with his pike-men to break through the first ranks of the Roman army; but finding it too close and impenetrable, the cohorts supporting each other, he fell back, and retired in a seeming confusion; but the Romans were much surprized, when they saw themselves suddenly surrounded on all sides, and galled with continual showers of arrows. Crassus ordered his light-armed foot and archers to advance and charge the enemy; but they were soon repulsed, and forced to cover themselves behind the heavy-armed foot.

The Roman army attacked by the Parthians.

The Romans galled by the arrows of the Parthians.

Then the Parthian horse advancing near the Romans, discharged showers of arrows upon them, every one of which did execution, the legionaries being drawn up in such close order, that it was impossible for the enemy to miss their aim. As their arrrows were of an extraordinary weight, and discharged with incredible force and impetuosity, nothing was proof against them. The two wings advanced in good order to repulse them, but to no effect; for the Parthians shot their arrows with as great dexterity when their backs were turned, as when they faced the enemy; so that the Romans, whether they kept their ground, or pursued their flying enemy, were equally annoyed with their fatal arrows.

THE

THE Romans, as long as they had any hopes that the Parthians, after having ſpent their arrows, would either betake themſelves to flight, or engage them hand to hand, ſtood their ground with great reſolution and intrepidity; but when they obſerved that there were a great many camels in their rear loaded with arrows, and that thoſe who emptied their quivers wheeled about to fill them anew, they began to loſe courage, and loudly to complain of their general for ſuffering them thus to ſtand ſtill, and ſerve only as a butt to the enemy's arrows, which, they well ſaw, would not be exhauſted till they were all killed to a man. Hereupon Craſſus ordered his ſon to advance at all adventures, and attack the enemy with thirteen hundred horſe, five hundred archers, and eight cohorts. But the Parthians no ſooner ſaw this choice body, for it was the flower of the army, marching up againſt them, but they wheeled about, and betook themſelves, according to their cuſtom, to flight. Hereupon young Craſſus, crying out as loud as he could, They fly before us, puſhed on full ſpeed after them, not doubting but he ſhould gain a complete victory; but when he was at a great diſtance from the main body of the Roman army, he perceived his miſtake, for thoſe, who before had fled, facing about, charged him with incredible fury. Young Craſſus ordered his troops to halt, hoping that the enemy, upon ſeeing their ſmall number, would not be afraid to come to a cloſe fight; but herein he was likewiſe greatly diſappointed, for the Parthians, contenting themſelves to oppoſe his front with their heavy-armed horſe, ſurrounded him on all ſides, and, keeping at a diſtance, diſcharged inceſſant ſhowers of arrows upon the unfortunate Romans, thus ſurrounded and pent up. The Parthian cavalry, in wheeling about, raiſed ſo thick a duſt, that the Romans could ſcarce ſee one another, much leſs the enemy; nevertheleſs they found themſelves wounded with arrows, tho' they could not perceive whence they came. In a ſhort time the place where they ſtood was all ſtrown with dead bodies. Some of the unhappy Romans finding their entrails tore, and many overcome by the exquiſite torments they ſuffered, rolled themſelves on the ſand with the arrows in their bodies, and expired in that manner. Others endeavouring to tear out by force the bearded points of the arrows, only made their wounds the larger, and increaſed their pain. Moſt of them died in this manner, and thoſe who outlived their companions, were no more in a condition to act; for when young Craſſus exhorted them to march up to the enemy, ſome ſhewed him their wounded bodies, others their hands nailed to their bucklers, and ſome their feet pierced through and pinned to the Young Craſſus advances againſt the enemy.

Is reduced to great ſtraits.

the ground; so that it was equally impossible for them either to attack the enemy, or defend themselves. The young commander therefore, leaving his infantry to the mercy of the enemy, advanced at the head of the cavalry against their heavy-armed horse. The thousand Gauls, whom he had brought with him from the west, charged the enemy with incredible boldness and vigour; but their lances did little execution on men armed with cuirasses, and horses covered with tried armour. However, they behaved with great resolution; for some of them taking hold of the enemies spears and closing with them, threw them off their horses on the ground, where they lay without being able to stir, by reason of the great weight of their armour; others dismounting crept under the enemies horses, and thrusting their swords into their bellies, made them throw their riders. Thus the brave Gauls fought tho' greatly harassed with heat and thirst, which they were not accustomed to bear, till most of their horses were killed, and their commander dangerously wounded. They then thought it advisable to retire to their infantry, which they no sooner joined, than the Parthians invested them anew, making a most dreadful havock of them with their arrows. In this desperate condition, Crassus spying a rising ground at a small distance, led the remains of his detachment thither, with a design to defend himself in the best manner he could, till succours should be sent him from his father. The Parthians pursued him, and, having surrounded him in his new post, continued showering arrows upon his men, till most of them were either killed or disabled, without being able to make use of their arms, or give the enemy proofs of their valour.

YOUNG Crassus had two Greeks with him, who had settled in the city of Carrhæ. These touched with compassion in seeing so brave a man reduced to such straits, pressed him to retire with them to the neighbouring city of Ischnes, which had declared for the Romans; but the young Roman rejected their proposal with indignation, telling them, that he would rather die a thousand times, than abandon so many valiant men, who sacrificed their lives for his sake. Having returned this answer to his two Greek friends, he embraced and dismissed them, giving them leave to retire and shift for themselves in the best manner they could. As for himself, having now lost all hopes of being relieved, and seeing most of his men and friends killed round him, he gave way to his grief, and not being able to make use of his arm, which was shot through with a large barbed arrow, he presented his side to one of his attendants, and ordered him to put an end to his unhappy life.

His

His example was followed by Censorinus a senator, by Megabacchus an experienced and brave officer, and by most of the nobility who served under him. Five hundred common soldiers were taken prisoners, and the rest cut in pieces. His death.

THE Parthians having cut off or taken the whole detachment commanded by young Crassus, marched without delay against his father, who upon the first advice that the enemy fled before his son and was closely pursued by him, had taken heart, the more because those, who had remained to make head against him, seemed to abate much of their ardour, the greatest part of them having marched with the rest against his son. Wherefore having encouraged his troops, he had retired to a small hill in his rear, to wait there till his son returned from the pursuit. Young Crassus, had dispatched frequent expresses to his father, to acquaint him with the danger he was in; but they had fallen into the enemies hands, and been by them put to the sword. Only the last, who had escaped with great difficulty, arrived safe, and informed him that his son was lost, if he did not send him an immediate and powerful reinforcement. This news threw Crassus into the utmost consternation; a thousand affecting thoughts rose in his mind, and disturbed his reason to such a degree, that he scarce knew what he was doing. However, the desire he had of saving his son and so many brave Romans, who were under his command, made him immediately decamp and march to their assistance; but he was not gone far, before he was met by the Parthians, who, with loud shouts and songs of victory, gave, at a great distance the unhappy father notice of his misfortune. They had cut off young Crassus's head, and, having fixed it on the point of a lance, were advancing full speed to fall on the father. As they drew near Crassus was struck with that dismal and affecting sight, but on this occasion behaved like a hero; for tho' he was under the deepest concern, he had the presence of mind to stifle his grief, for fear of discouraging the army, and to cry out to the dismayed troops, This misfortune is entirely mine; the loss of one man cannot affect the victory: let us charge, let us fight like Romans; if you have any compassion for a father who has just now lost a son, whose valour you admired, let it appear in your rage and resentment against these insulting barbarians. Thus Crassus strove to reanimate his troops; but his efforts were unsuccessful: their courage was quite sunk, as appeared from the faint and languishing shout which they raised, according to custom, before the action. When the signal was given, the Parthians keeping to their old way of The whole Parthian army falls upon Crassus.

fighting discharged clouds of arrows on the legionaries, without drawing near them, which did such dreadful execution, that many of the Romans, to avoid the arrows, which occasioned a long and painful death, threw themselves like men in despair, on the enemy's heavy-armed horse, seeking from their spears a more quick and easy kind of death. Thus the Parthians continued plying them incessantly with their arrows till night, when they left the field of battle, crying out, that they would allow the father one night to lament the death of his son.

Desperate condition of the Romans.

This was a melancholy night for the Romans. Crassus kept himself concealed from the soldiery, lying not in the general's tent, but in the open air, and on the bare ground, with his head wrapped up in his paludamentum or military cloke, and was, in that forlorn condition, says Plutarch, a great example to the vulgar of the instability of fortune; to the wise a still greater of the pernicious effects of avarice, temerity, and ambition. Octavius, one of his lieutenants, and Cassius, approached him, and endeavoured to raise him up and console him; but seeing him quite sunk under the weight of his affliction and deaf to all comfort, they summoned a council of war, composed of all the chief officers, wherein it was unanimously resolved, that they should decamp before break of day, and retire, without sound of trumpet, to the neighbouring city of Carrhæ, which was held by a Roman garison. Agreeable to this resolution, they began their march as soon as the council broke up; which produced dreadful outcries among the sick and wounded, who, perceiving that they were to be abandoned to the mercy of the enemy, filled the camp with their complaints and lamentations; but their cries and tears, though very affecting, did not stop the march of the others, which indeed was very slow, to give the straglers time to come up. There were only three hundred light horse, under the command of one Egnatius, who pursued their march without stopping. These arriving at Carrhæ about midnight, Egnatius, calling to the centinels on the walls, desired them to acquaint Coponius governor of the place, that Crassus had fought a great battle with the Parthians; and without saying a word more, or letting them know who he was, continued his march with all possible expedition to the bridge of Zeugma, which he passed, and by that means saved his troops, but was much blamed for abandoning his general.

Crassus gets to Carrhæ.

However, the message he sent to Coponius was of great service to Crassus; for that commander, wisely conjecturing, from the manner in which the unknown person had given him

that that intelligence, that ſome misfortune had befallen Craſſus, immediately ordered his gariſon to ſtand to their arms, and marching out met Craſſus, and conducted him and his army into the city; for the Parthians, though informed of his flight, did not offer to purſue him, obſerving therein the ſuperſtitious cuſtom which obtained among them and the Perſians, not to fight in the night; but when it was day, they entered the Roman camp, and having put all the wounded, to the number of four thouſand, to the ſword, diſperſed their cavalry all over the plain in purſuit of the fugitives. One of Craſſus's lieutenants, named Vargunteius, having ſeparated in the night from the main body of the army, with four cohorts, miſſed his way, and was overtaken by the enemy, at whoſe approach he withdrew to a neighbouring hill, where he defended himſelf with great valour, till all his men were killed, except twenty, who made their way through the enemy ſword in hand, and got ſafe to Carrhæ [m]; but Vargunteius himſelf loſt his life on this occaſion.

IN the mean time Surenas, not knowing whether Craſſus and Caſſius had retired to Carrhæ, or taken a different rout, in order to be informed of the truth, and take his meaſures accordingly, diſpatched a meſſenger, who ſpoke the Roman language, to the city of Carrhæ, injoined him to approach the walls, and acquaint Craſſus himſelf or Caſſius, that the Parthian general was inclined to enter into a treaty with them, and demanded a conference. Both the pro-conſul and his quæſtor Caſſius ſpoke from the walls with the meſſenger, and accepting the propoſal with great joy, deſired that the time and place for an interview might be immediately agreed upon. The meſſenger withdrew, promiſing to return quickly with an anſwer from Surenas; but that general no ſooner underſtood that Craſſus and Caſſius were in Carrhæ, than he marched thither with his whole army, and, having inveſted the place, acquainted the Romans, that, if they expected any favourable terms, they muſt deliver up Craſſus and Caſſius to him in chains. Hereupon a council of the chief officers being ſummoned, it was thought expedient to retire from Carrhæ that very night, and ſeek for another aſylum. It was of the utmoſt importance, that none of the inhabitants of Carrhæ ſhould be acquainted with their deſign till the time of its execution; but Craſſus, whoſe whole conduct evidently ſhews that he was blinded, as Dion Caſſius obſerves, by ſome divinity, imparted the whole matter in confidence to one Andromachus, calling him for his guide, and relying injudiciouſly on the fidelity of a man whom he ſcarce knew. Andromachus immediately acquainted Surenas with the deſign of the Romans, promiſing at the ſame time, as the Parthians did not engage in the night, to manage matters ſo, that they ſhould not get out of his reach before day-break. Purſuant to his promiſe, he led them through many windings and turnings, till he brought them into deep marſhy grounds, where the infantry were up to the knees in mire. Then Caſſius, ſuſpecting that their guide had led them into thoſe bogs with no good deſign, refuſed to follow him any longer, and returning to Carrhæ, took his rout towards Syria, which he reached with five hundred horſe. Octavius, with five thouſand men under his command, being conducted by truſty guides, gained the mountains, called, by Plutarch and Appian, Sinnaci, and there intrenched himſelf before break of day. As for Craſſus, he was ſtill entangled in the marſhes, when Surenas, at the riſing of the ſun, overtook him, and inveſted him with his cavalry. The proconſul had with him four cohorts and a ſmall body of horſe; and with theſe he gained, in ſpite of all oppoſition, the ſummit of another hill within twelve furlongs of Octavius, who, ſeeing the danger that threatened his general, flew to his aſſiſtance, firſt with a ſmall number of his men, but was ſoon followed by all the reſt, who, being aſhamed of their cowardice, quitted their poſt, tho' very ſafe, and, charging the Parthians with greatfury, diſengaged Craſſus, and obliged the enemy to abandon the hill. Upon the retreat of the enemy, they formed themſelves into a hollow ſquare, and, placing Craſſus in the middle, made a kind of rampart round him with their bucklers, reſolutely proteſting, that none of the enemy's arrows ſhould touch their general's body, till they were all killed fighting in his defence. Surenas, loth to let ſo fine a prey eſcape, ſurrounded the hill, as if he deſigned to make a new attack; but finding his Parthians very backward, and not doubting but the Romans, when night came on, would purſue their march and get out of his reach, he had recourſe again to artifice, and declared before ſome priſoners, whom he ſoon after ſet at liberty, that he was inclined to treat with the proconſul of a peace, and that it was better to come to a reconciliation with Rome, than to ſow the ſeeds of an eternal war, by ſhedding the blood of one of her generals. Agreeable to this declaration, Surenas, as ſoon as the priſoners were releaſed, advanced towards the hill, where the Romans were poſted, attended only by ſome of his officers, and, with his bow unbent and open arms, invited Craſſus to an interview. So ſudden a change ſeemed very ſuſpicious to the Caſſius gets ſafe into Syria.

[m] PLUT. & APPIAN. ibid. EUTROP. l. vi. OROS. l. vi. c. 13.

Craſſus betrayed by his guide, is overtaken by the enemy

Invited by Surenas to an interview.

the proconsul, who therefore declined the interview, till he was forced by his own soldiers to intrust his life with an enemy, whose treachery they had all experienced; for the legionaries, flocking round him, not only abused him in an outragious manner, but even menaced him, if he did not accept of the propofals made him by the Parthian general. Seeing therefore that the troops were ready to mutiny, he began to advance, without arms or guards, towards the enemy, after having called the gods and his officers to witness the violence his troops offered him, and intreated all who were present, but especially Octavius and Petronius, two of the chief commanders, for the honour of Rome their common mother, not to mention, after his death, the shameful behaviour of the Roman legionaries. Octavius and Petronius could not resolve to let him go alone, but attended him down the hill, as did likewise some legionaries keeping at a distance. Crassus was met at the foot of the hill by two Greeks, who, dismounting from their horses, saluted him with great respect, and desired him in the Greek tongue to send some of his attendants, who might satisfy him, that Surenas, and those who were with him, came without arms. Hereupon Crassus sent two brothers of the Roscian family; but Surenas having caused them to be seized, advanced to the foot of the hill mounted on a fine horse, and attended by the chief officers of his army. Crassus, who waited for the return of his two messengers, was surprised to see himself prevented by Surenas in person, when he least expected it. The Parthian general, perceiving as he approached Crassus, that he was on foot, cried out in a seeming surprise, What do I see? a Roman general on foot, and we on horseback! Let a horse be brought for him immediately. You need not be surprised, replied Crassus, we are come only to an interview, each after the custom of his country. Very well, answered Surenas, there shall be henceforth a lasting peace between king Orodes and the people of Rome; but we must sign the articles of it on the banks of the Euphrates; for you Romans do not always remember your conventions. Crassus would have sent for a horse; but a very stately one, with a golden bit and richly caparisoned, was brought to him by a Parthian; which Surenas presenting to him, Accept this horse from my hands, said he, which I give you in the name of my master king Orodes. He had scarce uttered these words, when some of the king's officers, taking Crassus by the middle, set him up upon the horse, which they began to whip with great violence before them, in order to make him quicken his pace. Octavius, offended at this insult, took the horse by the bridle; Petronius, and the few Romans who were present, seconded seconded him, and flocking all around Crassus, stopped his horse. The Parthians endeavoured to repulse them and cleared the way for the proconsul; whereupon they began to justle and push one another with great tumult and disorder. At last Octavius, drawing his sword, killed one of the king's grooms; but at the same time another coming behind Octavius, with one blow laid him dead at his feet. Both parties fought with great resolution, the Parthians striving to carry off Crassus, and the Romans to rescue him out of their hands. In this scufle most of the Romans, who came to the conference, were killed, and among the rest Crassus himself; but whether by a Roman or a Parthian is uncertain. Some writers tell us, that he fell by the hand of one Promonæthes or Manarthes, the Parthians; but others, with Livy [n], Florus [o], and Sextus Rufus [p], leave it in doubt, whether he was killed by his own men, to prevent his falling alive into the enemy's hands, or by a Parthian. However that be, his head and right hand were immediately cut off, in order to be sent to Orodes in Armenia, and his mangled body left unburied, to be devoured by the wild beasts. Upon his death, the rest of the army either surrendered to the enemy, or, dispersing in the night, were pursued and put to the sword. The Romans lost in this campaign at least thirty thousand men, of which twenty thousand were killed, and ten thousand taken prisoners. The latter continued in captivity among the Parthians, and contracting ignominious marriages, to the shame of Rome, as Horace emphatically expresses it (F), grew old on the lands, and under the standards of the barbarians. The standards of the vanquished legions were carried to Seleucia, and there shew-

Insulted by the Parthians.

And killed.

His whole army destroyed.

[n] Liv. l. cvi. [o] Flor. l. iii. c. 11. [p] Sext. Ruf. in brev.

(F) The words of Horace are.

Milesne Crassi conjuge barbara Turpis maritus vixit? & hostium (Proh Curia inversique mores!)
Consenuit socerorum in armis

Sub rege Medo Marsus & Appulus, Anciliorum, nominis, & togæ Oblitus, æternæque Vestæ, Incolumi Jove & urbe Roma (19)?

(19) Horat. carm. l. iii. od. 5.

ſhewn for many years as ſights; and from this time the Romans looked upon the war with the Parthians as the moſt important of all their wars, the revenging of the death of Craſſus and the recovering of their enſigns being ever after the chief object of their application; but how they ſucceeded herein, we ſhall ſee in the ſequel of this hiſtory. This battle is called by the Latin authors the battle of Carrhæ, becauſe it was fought at a ſmall diſtance from that city, and was, without all doubt, the moſt terrible blow, after the battle of Cannæ, which the Romans ever received.

Surenas, having thus intirely defeated the Roman army, ſet out on his march to Seleucia, ſpreading a report, that Craſſus was ſtill alive, that he intended to ſhew him to the numerous inhabitants of that great metropolis. His deſign was to entertain them with a comical ſcene, which he projected on his march. There was among the Roman captives one Caius Paccianus, who greatly reſembled the proconſul Craſſus. This man Surenas cauſed to be dreſſed after the Parthian manner, and having placed him on a ſtately horſe, made him enter Seleucia at the head of the army, with twelve lictors carrying before him their faſces and axes. The guards of this mock conſul were mounted on camels, each of them having an empty purſe hanging at his girdle. The bloody heads of ſeveral Roman ſoldiers, ſtuck on ſpears, ſerved for trophies, and revived in the minds of the citizens of Seleucia, the joy which the firſt news of the late victory had occaſioned in that city. This odd train was followed by a company of lewd women, who with looſe ſongs ſtigmatized the memory and character of Craſſus. When the ſhew was over, Surenas produced, in the preſence of the ſenate of Seleucia, a collection of laſcivious tales, then known by the title of the Mileſian fables, which a Parthian ſoldier had found in rifling the baggage of a young Roman, whom Plutarch calls Ruſtius. The general took occaſion from thence to inveigh againſt the debauchery of the Romans, who put ſuch infamous books into the hands of their youth, and corrupted their minds with lewd fables, inſtead of forming their bodies for the exerciſe of war [q].

WHEN the battle of Carrhæ was fought, king Orodes was, as we have hinted above, in Armenia, where he had concluded a peace with Artabazes; for the king of Armenia, on the return of the expreſſes he had ſent to Craſſus, perceiving by the falſe meaſures he had taken, that the army under his command muſt have been infallibly loſt, had entered into a treaty

[q] PLUT. ibid.

ty of friendſhip with the Parthian, and cemented it by giving one of his daughters in marriage to Pacorus the ſon of Orodes. While the two kings were ſolemnizing their new alliance with expenſive and public feaſts, Styllaces or Syllaces, a Parthian officer, whom Surenas had ſent with the news of his late victory, and the head of Craſſus as a proof of it, arrived in the capital of Armenia. The two kings were at table, and Jaſon a tragedian of Trallis, was ſinging ſome ſongs out of the Bacchis of Euripides, when the meſſenger was introduced, and preſented Orodes with the head of Craſſus, ſaying, Surenas ſends you the head of the Roman general, who has been cut in pieces with his whole army. The tranſports of joy which Orodes felt, at this ſight and theſe words, are not to be expreſſed. The lords of both kingdoms, who attended their ſovereigns, raiſed loud and repeated ſhouts of joy; and Syllaces was ordered to give a more particular and diſtinct account of that memorable action: which when he had done, Orodes commanded melted gold to be poured into Craſſus's mouth, reproaching him thereby with avarice, which had been always his predominant paſſion [r].

The head of Craſſus ſent to Orodes.

Surenas did not long enjoy the pleaſure of his victory; for Orodes, growing jealous of his glory and great authority among the Parthians, cauſed him to be put to death ſoon after [s], placing Pacorus, his favourite ſon, at the head of the army in his room. The young prince, agreeable to his father's directions, marched into Syria, which the Parthians expected to find without defence, after the late defeat of the Roman army; but Caſſius, the only general officer who ſurvived the defeat of Craſſus, meeting them on the frontiers, at the head of five hundred horſe, who had eſcaped with him out of Meſopotamia, and ſome Aſiatic levies, gave them ſo warm a reception, that they thought it adviſeable to retreat to their own territories, and there raiſe more forces for a ſecond invaſion. Accordingly they repaſſed the Euphrates, and, having ſpent the winter in making new preparations, early in the ſpring they croſſed the Euphrates anew, and reentered Syria with a very numerous army, under the conduct of Orſaces, an old and experienced commander; for Pacorus the king's ſon, being then but fifteen years of age, had only the name of general. Orſaces reduced, without oppoſition, ſuch places as lay in his way; and being maſter of all the country between the Euphrates and the city of Antioch, cloſely beſieged that metropolis, Caſſius having ſhut himſelf Surenas put to death.

The Parthians invade Syria.

[r] Flor. l iii. c. 11. Sext. Ruf. in brev. Dio. Cass. l. xl.
[s] Dio. Cass. ibid.

up

up in it, as not having ſufficient forces to keep the field and make head againſt ſo powerful an enemy. In the mean Cicero, to whom the province of Cilicia had been aſſigned, being informed by Antiochus king of Comagene, that Caſſius was beſieged in Antioch by the Parthians, and that the king of Armenia was ready to fall upon Cappadocia, drew together what forces he could, and with them marched to the eaſtern borders of his province lying next to Armenia, with a deſign to prevent the Armenians from invading Cappadocia, and to be at the ſame time near at hand to aſſiſt Caſſius, in caſe the Parthians ſhould purſue the ſiege of Antioch with vigour. He likewiſe ſent another body of troops to mount Amanus with the ſame view, which falling in with a great party of Parthian horſe, that had entered Cilicia through the ſtreights of that mountain, cut them all off to a man. The news of this defeat and of Cicero's approach to Antioch, greatly encouraged Caſſius and his men to make a vigorous defence, and ſo diſheartened the Parthians, that deſpairing to carry the place, they raiſed the ſiege, and marching to Antigonia, another city in that neighbourhood, attempted to reduce it, but as they were quite unacquainted with the manner of managing ſieges, their chief force conſiſting in cavalry, they were attended with no better ſucceſs there, and were ſoon obliged to retire. Caſſius, who was appriſed of the rout they would take, drew them into an ambuſcade, in which great numbers of them were cut off, with Orſaces their leader. Thoſe who had the good luck to eſcape repaſſed the Euphrates with Pacorus; but returned again with new forces towards the end of the ſummer, and wintered in Cyrrheſtica, a northern province of Syria [t].

But are driven out with great loſs by Cicero and Caſſius.

As ſoon as the ſeaſon was proper for action, the Parthians took the field, and marching to Antioch, beſieged that city a ſecond time, and M. Calpurnius Bibulus with all his forces in it; for the province of Syria had been allotted to him, and Caſſius, who had defended it before without any legal commiſſion, was now returned to Rome. As Bibulus was no warrior, he did not ſo much as make one ſally, but kept his troops within the walls, ſuffering the enemy to carry on their works without the leaſt moleſtation. He would not even acquaint Cicero, who was ſtill in Cilicia, with the danger he was in; nay, he was heard to ſay, that he had rather be reduced to the utmoſt extremity, than ſeem to ſtand in need of his aſſiſtance. However, his lieutenants wrote both to Cicero, and to Thermus prætor of Aſia, ſoliciting them to haſten to their relief; but, before their arrival, Bibulus effected by craft what he dared not attempt by force; for having by his emiſſaries encouraged Ordonopantes, a nobleman of Parthia, who had been diſguſted by Orodes, to raiſe a rebellion in the heart of the kingdom, the army before Antioch was recalled to ſuppreſs it; by which means the ſiege of Antioch was raiſed, and all Syria delivered from the danger it was in of falling under the power of the Parthians [u].

Return, and beſieges Antioch.

[t] JOSEPH. Antiq. l xiv. c. 12. & de bell. Jud. l i. c. 6. DIO. CASS. l. xl. PLUT. in Cicer. & Cic ad familiar. l. iii epiſt. 2. & l. xv. epiſt. 1, 2, 3, 4. & l. v. ad Attic epiſt. 18, 20.

The ſiege raiſed.

We find no further mention made of the Parthians from this time to the breaking out of the civil war between Cæſar and Pompey, when the latter ſent embaſſadors to ſolicit ſuccours from Orodes; which that prince was willing to grant, on condition that Syria was delivered up to him; but Pompey refuſing to comply with his demand, he not only denied him the ſuccours he required, but, after the battle of Pharſalia, put in irons Lucius Hirtius, whom Pompey had ſent to him to implore his aſſiſtance anew, or at leaſt to obtain for him leave to ſhelter himſelf in the Parthian dominions [w]. But, for all this, Cæſar had no ſooner got the better of Pompey's party, and ſettled his affairs at Rome, than he began to make great preparations, with a deſign to invade Parthia, and revenge the defeat and death of Craſſus at Carrhæ; but when all things were ready for his expedition, Cæſar was killed, and the Parthians by his death delivered from a war, which, in all likelihood, would have proved fatal to them [x]. Not long after, the eaſtern provinces being allotted to Marc Antony, in the famous partition of the Roman empire between him, Octavianus, and Lepidus, the cities of Syria, being grievouſly oppreſſed with the taxes Marc Antony laid on them, roſe up in arms, and, having killed thoſe who were ſent to gather them, invited the Parthians to their aſſiſtance, aſſuring them that they were all to a man ready to join them and drive out the Romans. On this invitation the Parthians paſſed the Euphrates with a mighty army, under the command of Pacorus and Labienus, a Roman general of Pompey's party. He was the ſon of Titus Labienus, who had been

The Parthians invade Syria, under the command of Pacorus and Labienus.

[u] Cic. ad famil. l. ii. epiſt 17 & l. xii. epiſt. 19. & ad Attic. l. vi. epiſt. 6. l. vii. epiſt. 2. &c. Dio. Cass ibid. [w] Dio, l. xli, xlii. [x] Plut. in Cæſ. Appian. de bell civil. l ii. Dio, Cass. l. xlii. & xliii.

Cæſar's

Cæsar's lieutenant in Gaul, and one of his chief favourites; but afterwards siding with Pompey, became one of his most inveterate enemies, and was slain fighting against him in the battle of Munda. His son, pursuing the same interest, had been sent by Brutus and Cassius, a little before the battle of Philippi, to beg succours of the Parthian king, which he was soliciting when that battle happened. The bad success which attended his friends on that occasion having discouraged him from returning, he continued in Parthia; and, having prevailed on Orodes to undertake this war, was sent with Pacorus to command under him [y]. On his entering Syria, he was met by Saxa, Antony's lieutenant, whom he overthrew in a pitched battle, obliging him to shelter himself in Cilicia. After this victory, having divided his army into two bodies, he marched with one after Saxa into Cilicia, where he killed him, over-ran all Asia Minor; and having obliged Plancus, Antony's other lieutenant in those parts, to fly to the islands, subjected all the places as far as the Hellespont and the Ægean sea [z]. At the same time Pacorus, with the other part of the army, reduced all Syria and Phœnice, as far as Tyre, which was the only city that held out against him, being defended by the Romans, who from all parts had flocked thither as to a place of refuge. Thus the Parthians made themselves masters of all Syria, Asia Minor, and Phœnice, except Tyre, and exercised their power even in Judæa, where they plundered Jerusalem, drove Hyrcanus from the throne, and placed Antigonus on it in his room, in the manner we have related in the history of the Jews.

Their conquests in Syria, Phœnice, and Asia Minor, &c.

BUT they did not long enjoy their new conquests; for Antony, after his reconciliation with Octavianus, having sent Ventidius, one of his lieutenants, against them, that general was attended with such success, that the Parthians were soon obliged to quit all they had taken and repass the Euphrates; for Ventidius managed matters with such expedition, that, arriving in Asia much sooner than expected, he surprized Labienus before he was in a condition to withstand him, having no Parthian troops with him, but only a few Roman deserters, and a small body of raw and undisciplined Asiatics, gathered up in Cyria, Phœnice, and Asia Minor; wherefore, not daring to stand the approach of a Roman army, he retired as fast as Ventidius advanced, till he got to mount Taurus, where he encamped so advantageously, that he could not be forced to a battle, and then sent to Pacorus for assistance. Pacorus sent immediately the flower of his army to the relief of Labienus; but the Parthians, despising the Romans on account of their late victories over them, engaged Ventidius before Labienus could join them, and were intirely defeated. The news of this defeat so disheartened those who were with Labienus, that they all abandoned him, every one shifting for himself in the best manner he could. Ventidius pursued them, slew some of them, and took the rest into his service. As for Labienus, he made his escape in a disguise; but after having sculked about for some time in Cilicia, from one hiding place to another, he was at last discovered by Demetrius, governor of Cyprus, taken, and put to death [a]. After this victory, Ventidius, having made himself master of all Cilicia, marched to mount Amanus, which parted that province from Syria; and there met another army of Parthians, who, under the command of Pharnapates, one of Pacorus's lieutenants, had seized the passes leading into Syria, in order to obstruct his further progress; but, Ventidius falling upon them, cut most of them in pieces, killed their general, and having gained a second victory as considerable as the former, pursued his march, without any further opposition, into Syria. Hereupon Pacorus, having assembled all his forces, made what haste he could to the Euphrates, which he repassed, leaving the Romans masters of all the countries on this side of that river [b].

Ventidius sent against them.

[y] DIO. CASS ibid. EUSEB. in chron. APPIAN. in Parthic. PLUT. in Anton. [z] DIO CASS. ibid. VELL. PATERCUL. l. ii. c. 5.

Gains great advantages over them.

Labienus taken and put to death.

Antony, who in the mean time was diverting himself with his new wife Octavia at Athens, being informed of the victories gained by Ventidius, made great rejoicings in that city; but hearing at the same time that Pacorus was making vast preparations for another invasion, he resolved to head his army in person, and not suffer his lieutenant to reap the whole glory of the war: wherefore early in the spring he left Athens with all his forces and marched towards the east; but, before he got thither, Ventidius had gained a third victory over the Parthians, far more glorious than the other two. It was obtained in the following manner: Ventidius fearing left the Parthians, whose preparations were much advanced, should pass the Euphrates before he had time to draw all his troops together from their different quarters,

[a] DIO, l. xlviii. p. 380, 381. APPIAN. in Parthic.
[b] DIO, APPIAN. ibid. LIV. epit. l. cxxvii. FLOR. l. iv. c. 9. PLUT. in Anton.

had had recourſe to the following ſtratagem: there was a petty eaſtern prince in his camp, under the character of an ally, who was intirely addicted to the intereſt of the Parthians, with whom Ventidius well knew he kept a private correſpondence, communicating to them all the intelligence he could get of the counſels and deſigns of the Romans. This man's treachery Ventidius reſolved to improve to his own advantage; for taking the firſt opportunity that offered of converſing with him, and ſeeming to repoſe in him an intire confidence, he told him, that he had heard with much concern that the Parthians did not deſign to paſs the Euphrates at Zeugma, as uſual, but to enter Syria another way, at a paſſage much below the former; for if they paſs at Zeugma, ſaid he, the country on this ſide the Euphrates is ſo mountainous, that the cavalry, in which the whole force of their army conſiſts, can do us no great hurt; but, in caſe they take the lower paſſage the country being there all plain and level, they will have ſo great an advantage over us, that it will be impoſſible for us to make head againſt them. This conference was no ſooner over, than the treacherous Chaunæus, for ſo he is called by Appian, conveyed a full account of it to the Parthians, with whom it had the deſired effect; for Pacorus, inſtead of keeping the road to Zeugma, took the other rout, and in that march loſt forty days; during which time Ventidius being joined by Silo, Antony's lieutenant in Paleſtine, and by all the legions which were quartered on the other ſide mount Taurus, found himſelf in a condition to give them a warm reception when they entered Syria. As they met with no oppoſition either in paſſing the river or advancing into Syria, they aſcribed that inactivity to fear, and therefore, with great boldneſs went directly to attack the Romans in their camp, on the top of a ſteep hill. This Ventidius expected, and therefore ſallying out upon them at the head of his legionaries, as they were aſcending the hill, eaſily put them in diſorder, by the advantage of the ground, and purſued them with great ſlaughter into the plain, where they rallied and made a moſt vigorous reſiſtance, the victory being doubtful, till Pacorus was killed, fighting with incredible bravery at the head of the Parthian horſe. His death was followed by the flight of the whole army, every one ſtriving to regain the bridge, in order to retire into their own country; but Ventidius, with a ſtrong detachment of horſe, getting to the Euphrates before them, cut off their retreat; ſo that only a ſmall number of them eſcaped by flight, and retired into the dominions of Antiochus king of Comagene; the reſt reſt were all put to the ſword [c]. This victory, which fully revenged the death of Craſſus, and the Romans who were killed with him, was gained on the ſame day of the year, on which, fourteen years before, the famous battle of Carrhæ was loſt.

Pacorus killed, and his army intirely cut off by Ventidius.

Orodes, when he heard of the defeat of his army and the death of his ſon, was ſo overwhelmed with grief, that, for ſome days, he abſtained from all food, not being able to utter a ſingle word the whole time; and when he recovered the uſe of his tongue, he acted and ſpoke in ſuch a manner, as plainly ſhewed, that ſorrow had got the better of his reaſon; for nothing was heard from him but the name of Pacorus, his dear Pacorus; ſometimes he talked to him as if he had been preſent, commended his gallant behaviour, and launched out on the happineſs of a father who was bleſſed with ſuch a ſon. At other times, remembering that he was dead, he burſt into a flood of tears, and was ready to lay violent hands on himſelf: and indeed never was grief more juſt; for this was the moſt terrible blow the Parthian monarchy had ever received, and the loſs of the young prince was as great as that of the army, he being commended by all the antients as the moſt worthy perſon for juſtice, clemency, valour, and all other princely qualities, that the royal family of Arſaces ever produced. He ſo endeared himſelf to the Syrians, during the ſhort time he lived among them, that they never expreſſed more affection for any of their native ſovereigns, than they did for him, tho' deſcended from a family, which had brought many calamities on their country [d].

Had Ventidius purſued the advantages of this victory, he might have driven the Parthians quite out of Meſopotamia and Babylonia, and extended the boundaries of the Roman empire to the Tigris; but, as he was afraid of giving umbrage to Antony, with whoſe jealous temper he was well acquainted, he contented himſelf with reducing thoſe places in Syria and Phœnice, which had revolted from the Romans in the late war. Purſuant to this plan, he was with his whole army in Comagene, making war upon Antiochus king of that country, for ſiding with the Parthians, when Antony arriving took the command of the army upon himſelf and diſmiſſed Venti- dius.

[c] Liv. l. cxxviii. Flor l. iv. c 9. Strabo, l. xvi. p. 751. Vell. Patercul. l. ii. c. 78 Joseph. l. xiv. c. 27. A. Gell. l. xv. c. 4. Justin. l. xlii. c. 4. Plut. in Anton. Frontin. ſtratagem. l. i. c. 1. & l. ii. c. 2. Dion, l. xlix. [d] Justin. l. xlii. c. iv.

dius. His pretence for this was, that Ventidius deſerved a triumph, and ought to go to Rome to aſk it of the ſenate; but the true motive that prompted him to act in this manner was, that he envied him the great glory he had acquired, and the reputation he was in with the army; for Antony was one of thoſe, who cannot bear to be ſerved by perſons of ſuch talents as are capable of eclipſing their own; he was therefore glad to get rid of him, and never employed him afterwards, tho' he often ſtood in need of ſo able and experienced a general. Ventidius, on his return to Rome, was received there with all poſſible marks of honour, and granted a triumph, with the general applauſe of the whole city. In his triumph two very remarkable circumſtances concurred; the one, that he was the only Roman who ever triumphed over the Parthians, no one having, either before or after him, attained to that honour. The other circumſtance, no leſs remarkable, was, that he triumphed after having been led in triumph himſelf; for in the ſocial war, being made a captive, at the taking of Aſculum, the chief city of Picenum, by Strabo the father of Pompey the Great, he was, with his father and mother who carried him in her arms, led before the triumphal chariot of that general. Afterwards his family being brought to poverty by the ruin of their city, he was obliged, when grown up, to betake himſelf to a mean and ſordid employment for his livelihood; for at firſt he was only a muleteer, and being uſed to provide mules to carry the baggage of ſuch Roman magiſtrates as were ſent to govern foreign provinces, Cæſar employed him in this capacity when he firſt went into Gaul; and having on that occaſion obſerved in him a great quickneſs of apprehenſion and activity, took him with him into his province, and put him in the way of riſing to great preferments; for he firſt gave him a ſmall command in the army, from which he raiſed himſelf, by his diſtinguiſhed merit, through all the ſtations of the camp to the higheſt poſt in the army, and became one of Cæſar's chief generals in all the wars he waged afterwards. Upon his death he ſided with Antony, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at Mutina and Peruſia, and was at laſt ſent as Antony's lieutenant into the eaſt, where he gained the victories over the Parthians which we have mentioned [c].

Antony diſmiſſes Ventidius, and takes the command of the army on himſelf.

Ventidius obtains a triumph.

[c] PLUT. APPIAN. DION CASS. ibid. A. GELL. l. xv. c 4. VELL. PATERCUL. l. ii c 03. VAL. MAX. l. vi. c 9. PLIN. l. vii. c. 43.

IN

IN the mean time Orodes, being in some degree recover from the distraction of mind, which the death of his son Pacorus had occasioned, appointed Phrahates the eldest, but the most wicked of all his children, to succeed him in the throne, admitting him at the same time to share the regal power with himself. Phrahates no sooner saw himself vested with the sovereign authority, than he caused all his brothers by the daughter of Antiochus Eusebes, king of Syria, to be put to death, for no other reason, but because they were of a more noble descent than himself. As this was highly resented by his father, he attempted to put him to death also, by giving him a potion of the poisonous juice of hemlock; but that proving only a medicine against the dropsy, which grief had brought upon the king, the cruel and unnatural son caused him to be stifled in his bed, and soon after dispatched all his brothers, who were thirty in number. The same cruelty he exercised over the nobility, and all the rest of the royal family, not sparing his eldest son, lest the discontented Parthians should place him, as he was already of age, on the throne. Hereupon many of the chief lords of Parthia, quitting their own country, took refuge in Syria, under the protection of Antony. Among these was one Monæses, a man of great distinction, who, having gained the confidence of Antony, prevailed upon him to engage in a war with the Parthians his countrymen f.

Orodes barbarously murdered by his son Phrahates.

As Antony had, by means of his lieutenant Publius Canidius, reduced the Armenians, Albanians, and Iberians, and carried his victorious arms as far as mount Caucasus, he was easily persuaded to embark in a war, which he had long designed, all the Romans, who served under him, earnestly pressing him to revenge the death of Crassus and their countrymen, who had perished with him at Carrhæ. Accordingly he began to make vast preparations for so great an undertaking; and as he formed all his schemes for the carrying of it on by the advice of Monæses, in order to attach him the more to his service, he allowed him the revenues of three cities for his maintenance, imitating therein the generosity of Xerxes towards Themistocles; and moreover promised to place him on the throne of Parthia, on his conquering that country. But in the mean time Phrahates, dreading the advantage which the enemy might draw from the advice of so wise and able a counsellor, who was well acquainted with the country, sent a Antony undertakes a war against the Parthians. Year of the Flood 2963. Before Christ, 36.

f JUSTIN. l. xlii. c. 4. DIO. CASS. l. xlix. PLUT. in Crass.

solemn

ſolemn embaſſy to invite him home, on ſuch terms as the baniſhed Parthian thought fit to accept. This greatly provoked Antony; but nevertheleſs he did not think it adviſeable to uſe any violence with him, for fear of diſcouraging others from revolting: He therefore diſmiſſed him with great civility, and ſent embaſſadors with him to Phrahates to treat of a peace, hoping by that means to divert him from making the neceſſary preparations for a war, and to fall upon him before he was in a condition to withſtand him; but herein he was greatly diſappointed, for, on his arrival at the Euphrates, which he intended to paſs and enter the Parthian dominions on that ſide, he found all the paſſes ſo well guarded on the other bank, that he thought it adviſeable to march off to the left, with a deſign to reduce Media, and from thence invade Parthia. This plan had been ſuggeſted to him before by Artabazes king of Armenia, who, falling out with Artavaſdes king of Media, had preſſed Antony to take that rout, with no other view but to diſtreſs the Median his rival. Antony had rejected it when firſt propoſed, intending to invade the Parthian dominions by the neareſt cut over the Euphrates; but not ſucceeding in that, he fell in with the propoſal of the Armenian, who in the end betrayed him; for, inſtead of conducting him the ſtraight way from Zeugma on the Euphrates to the river Araxes, which parted Media from Armenia, and was about five hundred miles diſtance from the place whence he firſt ſet out, he led him over rocks and mountains ſo far about, that the army had marched a thouſand miles and upwards, before they reached the borders of Media[ε], where they intended to begin the war; ſo that they were not only greatly fatigued, but had not ſufficient time, the year being already far ſpent, to put in execution the deſign on which they were come. However, as Antony was in great haſte to get back to Cleopatra, he left behind him moſt of the baggage of the army, and three hundred waggons loaded with battering rams and other military engines for ſieges, ordering Statianus, one of his lieutenants, with a body of ten thouſand men, to guard them, and bring them by ſlower marches after the army. With the reſt of the forces he haſtened forward, and marched three hundred miles more, without allowing his men any reſpite, till he arrived at Praaſpa, or, as others call it, Phraata, the capital of Media, which he immediately inveſted; but as the place was well fortified, he was ſoon made ſenſible of his miſtake in leaving behind him his battering rams Invades Media.

His long and fatiguing march.

Beſieges Phraata.

[ε] DIO. CASS. & PLUT. ibid. STRABO, l. xi. & xvi.

and other military engines; for without them he could make no progress in the siege: and when the Median and Parthian forces came up with him, they did not think it worth their while to attack him, but pursued their march, with a design to prevent Statianus from joining him with the heavy carriages, without which, they well knew, he could never make himself master of the city. Statianus did not expect them, and therefore, being attacked before he had time to draw up his men, was cut off, with the whole body under his command, which amounted to ten thousand men. All the baggage and military engines were taken, and among the rest a battering ram eighty foot long. Polemo, king of Pontus, was made prisoner, and with him a few Romans, to whom the Parthians gave quarter in the end of the slaughter; but all the rest were put to the sword [h].

Statianus cut off, with ten thousand Romans.

Statianus, on his first discovering the enemy, had dispatched an express to Antony, who made all the haste he could to his assistance; but nevertheless came too late, and found, on his arrival, Statianus and all his men dead on the field of battle: but as no enemy appeared, he took courage, imagining they had fled at his approach, and returned to the siege, where he was daily harassed by the garison within, and by the enemy's army without. If he sent out small parties to forage, they were generally cut off by the Parthian cavalry; and if he detached large bodies, those who remained were not able to stand the repeated sallies of the numerous garison. To obviate these inconveniences, Antony attempted to draw the enemy to a general engagement, and twice succeeded therein, but without reaping from thence any advantage; for tho' he put the enemy to flight in both engagements, yet the loss they sustained was very inconsiderable, the Parthians preventing, by the swiftness of their horses, the evil consequences which generally attend such defeats. In the last he thought his victory complete, and pursued it to the utmost; but in the end found that he had killed only eighty of the enemy's men, and taken thirty prisoners during the whole action. However, he continued before Phraata till his provisions were near spent, and the forage round the country quite consumed; when he began to think of a retreat, seeing he had lost all hopes of making himself master of the besieged city; but as he was to march three hundred miles through the enemy's country, for at that distance Phraata lay from the borders of Armenia, before he raised the siege

[h] STRABO, l. xi. p. 523. DION. CASS. p. 407. VELL. PATERC. l. ii. c. 82. PLUT. in Anton.

he

he ſent embaſſadors to Phrahates to acquaint him, that the Roman people was willing to grant him a laſting peace, provided he would return the ſtandards and priſoners taken at Carrhæ. Phrahates received the embaſſadors ſitting on a golden throne, and, after having bitterly inveighed againſt the avarice and unbounded ambition of the Romans, told them, that he would not by any means part with the ſtandards and captives taken at Carrhæ, but would allow Antony to retire unmoleſted, provided he withdrew immediately from before Phraata. Antony, who was reduced to great ſtraits, no ſooner received this anſwer, than he raiſed the ſiege, and began his march towards Armenia, hoping that Phrahates would be as good as his word; but he was therein greatly diſappointed, for the Parthian army haraſſed him the whole way, and fell upon him eighteen times with all their forces, before he reached the Araxes, which was the boundary of the Median territories. 'Tis true, he always repulſed them, but not without great loſs on his ſide; whereas that of the Parthians, as being all horſemen, was very inconſiderable, by reaſon of their quick retreats. The Romans were very fortunate in their guide, who, being a native of Mardia, a country bordering on Media and Armenia, was well acquainted with the roads and by-ways, and conducted them with great fidelity. However, the army was thrice in imminent danger of being intirely cut off by ambuſcades, which they could not poſſibly have eſcaped, had they not received notice of them from the enemy's quarters. Monæſes twice forewarned Antony of them by a meſſenger ſent to him for that purpoſe, in return for the kindneſs ſhewn him during his baniſhment. The other time he had his intelligence from an old Roman ſoldier, who had continued among the Parthians ever ſince the battle of Carrhæ, and came to the Roman camp to acquaint his countrymen with the danger. This painful march laſted twenty ſeven days, during which time they were not only inceſſantly haraſſed by the Parthian arrows, but greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, the parties that went out to forage being generally cut off, and their beaſts of burden either dead, or employed in carrying the ſick and wounded. A quart of wheat was ſold in the camp for fifty drachmas, and barley-loaves for their weight in ſilver. At laſt they were reduced to live upon ſuch roots and herbs as they found in the fields, which occaſioned many diſtempers among them. When the famine firſt began to rage in the camp, ſome, to avoid it, fled to the enemy; but were by the Parthians cruelly murdered in the ſight of the reſt; which put a ſtop to their deſerting, and proved very advantageous to Antony, who would have been left alone, had the enemy treated kindly ſuch as took refuge with them. Antony, ſeeing his men dying every day in great numbers, was often heard to cry out, O, the ten thouſand! admiring the conduct of Xenophon, who marched a far longer way through the enemy's country, and, in ſpite of all oppoſition, led his men ſafe home. At length the army began to mutiny, and, falling upon thoſe who had any gold or ſilver, plundered and murdered them, rifled Antony's baggage, ſeized on his money and plate, and committed many other diſorders. Hereupon the general, quite diſheartened, retired to his tent, and, calling one of his freed-men, ordered him to kill him, and, after his death, to cut off his head, and conceal it, leſt it ſhould fall into the enemy's hands, and be inſulted as that of Craſſus had been; but the Mardian guide, coming into his tent in the mean time, prevailed upon him to forbear uſing any violence on himſelf, by aſſuring him, that the worſt of the march was over, and that he was at a ſmall diſtance from the river Araxes, beyond which the Parthians would not purſue him. Accordingly he arrived a few days after at that river, and croſſed it, without being diſturbed in the leaſt by the enemy. The ſoldiers, ſeeing themſelves at length out of the enemy's reach, and in a place of ſafety, fell down on the ground, and kiſſed it, embracing one another with tears of joy *.

Antony raiſes the ſiege of Phraata. Haraſſed by the Parthians in his retreat.

Reduced to great ſtraits.

Antony committed, without all doubt, many miſtakes in the management of this war, but none in his retreat; for all the antients do him the juſtice to own, that he conducted it with as much art and ſucceſs as it was capable of. He loſt indeed a great many men; for on his reviewing his forces after he had paſſed the Araxes, he found twenty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe miſſing; but the greater part of theſe had periſhed by the hardihips of the campaign, and very few by the enemy's ſwords. The greateſt error he committed in this fatal undertaking, was his obſtinately purſuing his march, after he had, with the utmoſt difficulty, got back into Armenia; for, inſtead of putting the remainder of his army into winter-quarters, and allowing them time to refreſh themſelves after ſo long and fatiguing a march, as he was in haſte to get back to Cleopatra, he continued his march, tho' winter was far advanced, through Armenia, which was then covered with ſnow, and, in that mountainous country, loſt eight thouſand more of his men, who periſhed by reaſon of the hard ſeaſon and exceſſive cold; ſo that, according to the * Plut: Dio. Cass. Justin. Flor. ibid.

moſt

most moderate calculation, he lost in all two and thirty thousand men [i]. Florus tells us [k], that he did not bring back the third part of his army, which, at his first setting out on this destructive undertaking, consisted of an hundred thousand men. He was not indeed overcome in battle, as Crassus had been; but, if we compare the losses of both generals, we shall find Antony's expedition to have been the most unfortunate of the two; and yet, on his return into Egypt, he had the confidence to assume such honours as were due only to conquerors. His great loss.

Antony was scarce returned from this expedition, when the kings of Media and Parthia, falling out about the booty they had taken on the defeat of Statianus, the former sent an embassy to him, offering to join him with all his forces against the latter. Antony accepted this offer with great joy, the more because he was informed at the same time, that the Parthians, not able to endure the tyranny and cruelty of their king, had taken up arms against him, and were greatly divided among themselves. These circumstances offered him a favourable opportunity of making amends, by a new expedition, for the miscarriages of the former. Accordingly he resolved to lay hold of it, and, leaving Egypt, hastened into Syria, there to make the necessary preparations for a second invasion; but Cleopatra feigning that his absence had thrown her into a languishing distemper, and that she could not live without him, he was so infatuated as to believe her, and giving over all thoughts of revenging his late losses, to drop the enterprize and return to the embraces of his beloved queen [l]. However, he sent such a body of Romans to the assistance of Artavasdes, king of Media, as enabled him to gain a complete victory over Phrahates king of Parthia; but the ensuing year a war breaking out between Antony and Octavianus, the former not only recalled the troops he had sent to the assistance of Artavasdes, but also retained those which Artavasdes had sent him in their room; by which means the king of Media was intirely defeated in a second battle, and taken prisoner by Phrahates, who, pursuing his victory, reduced all Media and likewise Armenia, restoring to that throne Artaxias the son of Artabazes, who had been driven from it by Antony, as we have related in the history of Armenia. Resolves on a second expedition against the Parthians; but is diverted from it by Cleopatra. Media reduced by Phrahates.

Phrahates, elated with this success, began to oppress his subjects in a most cruel and tyrannical manner; whereupon Civil dissensions among the

[i] PLUT. & DIO. CASS. ibid. [k] FLOR. l. iv. c. 10. [l] PLUT. Parthians in Anton. DION CASS. l. xlix. p. 411.

the

the Parthian nobility, conſpiring againſt him, drove him from the throne, and placed on it in his room Tiridates, one of their own body; but the next year Phrahates returned into Parthia at the head of a numerous army, and, having overcome his rival in a pitched battle, recovered his crown. Tiridates took refuge in Syria, where Octavianus found him after the death of Antony, and was warmly ſolicited by him to lend him his aſſiſtance againſt Phrahates. At the ſame time embaſſadors arrived from Phrahates on the ſame errand. Octavianus received them both in a very friendly manner, without intending to help either, but rather to egg them on againſt each other with fair promiſes, and by that means to waſte and weaken the power and ſtrength of that formidable empire. With this view he gave Tiridates leave to continue in Syria, till he ſhould be in a condition to make head againſt his rival, accepting from him a ſon of Phrahates, who had fallen into his hands. This ſon he carried with him to Rome, where he kept him as a hoſtage [l]. Not long after, Tiridates returned into Parthia and drove out Phrahates; but was ſoon driven out again by him in his turn. Phrahates was aſſiſted by the Scythians, who not only reinſtated him in his kingdom, but ſupported him in it with a mighty army. Hereupon Tiridates with the leading men of his party, fled to Rome, to implore the aſſiſtance and protection of Auguſtus, promiſing to hold the kingdom of him, provided he was reſtored to it by his means. Phrahates hearing he had fled to Rome diſpatched embaſſadors thither after him, to obviate his deſigns, and to demand of Auguſtus the delivery of his rebellious ſubjects and the releaſe of his ſon, whom Tiridates had put into his hands. Auguſtus received Tiridates, as well as the embaſſadors, with particular marks of eſteem; but anſwered, that he would not deliver Tiridates into the hands of Phrahates, nor lend either of them aſſiſtance againſt the other. However, to gratify both in ſomething, he gave Tiridates leave to continue at Rome, ordering him out of the public treaſury a maintenance ſuitable to his rank; and ſent back to Phrahates his ſon, on his promiſing to reſtore the captives and ſtandards that had been taken from Craſſus and Antony [m]. This Phrahates then promiſed to do, but could not prevail upon himſelf to perform, till the coming of Auguſtus into Syria, which happened three years after; when dreading a foreign war, as he was greatly hated by his ſubjects on account of his cruelty, cruelty, he ſent embaſſadors to him, to conclude an alliance with the people of Rome; and on this occaſion it was that he ſent back all the captives and enſigns, which the Parthians had taken in their wars with Craſſus and Antony. At the ſame time he agreed to ſuch terms of peace as Auguſtus thought fit to propoſe, and gave four of his ſons with their wives and children, as hoſtages for the performance of them [n]. The enſigns Auguſtus cauſed to be hung up in a temple, which he built and conſecrated to Mars twice the revenger, and appointed Circenſian ſports to be annually ſolemnized in memory of his victory at Philippi, (for before that battle he had vowed the temple to Mars) and of his recovering the Roman enſigns from the Parthians [o]. Juſtin obſerves here [p], that Auguſtus did more by the greatneſs of his name, than any other could have done by a long and expenſive war; but Tacitus [q] tells us, that Phrahates, was induced to comply with the demands of Auguſtus, not for fear of him, but becauſe he diſtruſted his own ſubjects. Strabo [r] and Joſephus [s], agreeing with Tacitus, relate the matter in the following manner: A very beautiful Italian woman, by name Thermuſa, having been formerly ſent by Auguſtus to Phrahates as a preſent, the king kept her at firſt as his concubine; but afterwards, on her bringing him a ſon, married her and declared her queen. In this ſtation ſhe gained an abſolute aſcendant over him, which ſhe made uſe of to ſecure the ſucceſſion to her ſon. With this view ſhe propoſed to Phrahates the delivering up of his other ſons, who were four in all, to the Romans; and he readily came into the propoſal, as not thinking himſelf ſafe againſt his diſcontented ſubjects, ſo long as there were any of the royal race of Arſaces of an age fit to govern. On this conſideration, when hoſtages were demanded by Auguſtus, for ſecuring the terms of their agreement, he delivered up to him his four ſons, Saraſpades, Ceroſpades, Phrahates, and Vonones, two of their wives, and four of their ſons. Theſe were all carried to Rome, where they remained many years; but Thermuſa's ſon, by name Phraatices, was bred up at home, and appointed to ſucceed his father. The Parthians were ſo ſuperſtitiouſly addicted to the family of Arſaces, that Phrahates reſtores to Auguſtus the enſigns and priſoners taken from Craſſus and Antony.

[l] Dion Cass. l. li. p. 456. Plut. ibid. Justin. l. xlii. c. 5.
[m] Justin. ibid. Dion Cass. l. liii.

[n] LIV. l. CXXXIX. FLOR. l. iv. c. ult. STRABO, l. ii. p 288. & l. xvi p 748. VELL. PATERCUL. l. ii. c. 91. JUSTIN. l. xlii c. ult. DIO, l. liv p. 52. EUTROP. l. vii. OROS. l. vi c 21. [o] Vide OVID. faſt. l v. & HORAT. l. iv. od. ult. [p] JUSTIN l. xlii. c. 5. [q] TACIT annal. l. ii. c. 1, [r] STRABO, l. vi. p 288. [s] JOSEPH. antiq l. xviii. c. 3.

Phrahates

Phrahates well knew they would bear with him, notwithstanding their hatred to him, as long as they had no other of the same race to set up in his room; and therefore, not for fear of Augustus, but for his own safety, readily yielded up to him his four sons, who, being of an age to govern, gave him no small jealousy. But what he thus projected for his Phraatices safety, proved at last his ruin; for as soon as Phraatices was of age, Thermusa, impatient to see him on the throne, poisoned her husband, to make room for him the sooner[t]. But he was scarce seated on the throne, when the Parthians, disdaining to be governed by so wicked a parricide, rose up in arms, and drove him from it into banishment, where he pe-Orodes II. rished some years after[u]. In his room they placed one Orodes, who was of the royal family of Arsaces; but generally hated on account of his cruel and savage temper. However, they preferred him to the sons of Phraatices, who, by their father, were descended from the Italian concubine Thermusa; but not being able to bear his unheard of cruelties, they killed him soon after at a banquet[w]. Upon his death they dispatched embassadors to Rome, intreating Augustus to send one of the sons of Phrahates to rule over them. The emperor rea-
Vonones. dily granted them Vonones, who was received at first with great demonstrations of joy; but, as he betrayed a great inclination to the Romans and affected their dress and manners, the Parthians grew soon weary of their new king; and disdaining to obey, as they expressed it, a Roman slave, had recourse to Artabanus king of Media, who was likewise of the race of Arsaces, inviting him to take possession of the Artabanus crown of Parthia. Artabanus willingly complied with their request; but being met on the frontiers by Vonones, was by him defeated, tho' he had a considerable army with him, and obliged to fly back into Media, where he raised new forces, and in a second engagement obtained a complete victory over Vonones, who took shelter in Armenia, where he was kindly received, and entertained by some of the chief lords of that country. But Artabanus threatening to invade Armenia, Vonones thought fit to retire from thence, after having solicited in vain the assistance of Tiberius, by a solemn embassy sent to Rome for that purpose. From Armenia the unhappy prince withdrew into Syria, and there delivered himself up to Creticus Silanus governor of that province, who,

[t] STRABO, l. xvi. p 749. JOSEPH. antiq. l. xviii. c. 3. [u] JOSEPH. ibid. [w] Idem ibid.

who, in regard he had been brought up at Rome, ſuffered him to live at Antioch, with the pomp and title of a king. He was afterwards removed by Germanicus from Antioch to Pompeiopolis in Cilicia, whence he made his eſcape, tho' kept under a ſtrict guard; but being ſoon after retaken, he was killed by one Remmius a Roman ſoldier [x]. Germanicus had removed him from Antioch to Pompeiopolis at the requeſt of Artabanus, and alſo becauſe he was in high favour with Cneius Piſo, to whoſe wife Plancina he made rich preſents, having brought with him into Syria immenſe treaſures [y].

Artabanus, having now no competitor to contend with, began to treat his ſubjects with great cruelty, whereupon ſome Parthian lords, among whom were Sinnaces, a man of great power and credit, and an eunuch named Abdus, entering into a plot againſt him, ſent privately to Rome for Phrahates, the ſon of king Phrahates, who, as we have related above, had been delivered by his father to Auguſtus as a hoſtage. The deputies repreſented, that the Parthians were ready to revolt; that they wanted only a leader; that a deſcendant of Arſaces ſupported by Rome and ſeen on the banks of the Euphrates, would occaſion an immediate and general inſurrection. Tiberius, who had ſucceeded Auguſtus, was glad of ſo favourable an opportunity of raiſing new diſturbances in Parthia; for Artabanus, elated with the ſucceſs that attended him in his wars with the neighbouring nations, had not only ſeized on Armenia, and appointed his eldeſt ſon Arſaces king of that country, but ſent a proud meſſage to the governor of Syria, demanding the treaſures which Vonones had left there and in Cilicia, and claiming all the countries which had been poſſeſſed by Cyrus, and ſince by Alexander. Tiberius therefore, overjoyed at the thoughts of humbling the haughty Parthian, immediately diſpatched Phrahates to recover his father's kingdom; but that prince arriving in Syria, and there diſuſing the Roman way of living, to which he had been many years accuſtomed, and reſuming the Parthian cuſtoms, was ſeized, on that ſudden change, with a violent diſtemper, which put an end to his life. At the ſame time the plot was diſcovered, and the chief promoters of it either privately put to death, for Artabanus was afraid to uſe open violence, or ſo narrowly watched, that they could not meet, without being obſerved, to conſult together about the neceſſary meaſures. However, Tiberius did not abandon the enterprize; terprize; but putting Tiridates, another prince of the royal family of Parthia, in the room of Phrahates, wrote to Mithridates Iberus, requeſting him to invade Armenia with his brother Pharaſmanes king of Iberia, and by that means to draw Artabanus out of his own kingdom. Mithridates, purſuant to the directions of Tiberius, entered Armenia, at the head of a numerous army of Iberians, and made himſelf maſter of Artaxata, the metropolis of that kingdom. At the ſame time his brother Pharaſmanes, having recourſe to treachery, ſuborned ſome of the ſervants of Arſaces to murder him. Artabanus no ſooner heard of the invaſion of Armenia and the death of his ſon, but he diſpatched his other ſon Orodes, with a mighty army, againſt the enemy, and at the ſame time ſent to hire auxiliaries in Sarmatia, and the neighbouring countries. Pharaſmanes, on the other hand, having joined the Albanian forces to his own, and received great ſupplies from Sarmatia, marched to the aſſiſtance of his brother, and meeting with Orodes, offered him battle; which he declining, Paraſmanes beſieged him in his camp, and reduced him to ſuch ſtraits, that he was obliged at laſt to put all to the iſſue of an engagement, which proved very bloody, the Parthians behaving with their uſual bravery. The victory was long doubtful; but in the end Pharaſmanes having attacked and wounded Orodes, and a report being thereon ſpread through the Parthian army that he was killed, the Parthians retired in diſorder, and left Pharaſmanes maſter of the field. This victory was attended with the conqueſt of Armenia, which Pharaſmanes over-ran without oppoſition, the Parthians flying every where before him. In the mean time, Artabanus, having raiſed another army, marched in perſon againſt the united forces of Mithridates and Pharaſmanes; but was attended with no better ſucceſs than his ſon Orodes, his army being intirely defeated, and himſelf obliged to abandon his kingdom, and take refuge among the Carmanians and Hyrcanians [a].

[x] SUET in Tiber. & Octav. c. 21 JOSEPH. ibid. TACIT. annal. l. ii. c. 2 & 4.

[y] TACIT. ibid.

Artabanus driven from the throne.

Upon the retreat of Artabanus, Lucius Vitellius, governor of Syria, advanced with his legions to the banks of the Euphrates; and having croſſed that river on a bridge of boats, cauſed Tiridates, whom he had brought with him, to be proclaimed king of Parthia. The new king was immediately joined by a great many Parthian lords, among whom were Ornoſpades, Sinnaces, and Abdageſes. Ornoſpades brought with him a ſtrong body of horſe, and Abdageſes all the enſigns of royalty, which had been committed to his care. When Vitellius found the Parthians inclined to receive Tiridates, thinking it enough to have countenanced them, he repaſſed Tiridates.

[a] Tacit. annal. l. vi. c. 36. Joseph. antiq. l. xviii. c. 6.

the

the Euphrates with his legions, and retired into Syria. He was no sooner gone, than Phrahates and Hiero, two men of great power and authority among the Parthians, out of envy to Abdageſes, who governed the new king and his whole court, returned to their old allegiance, and recalled Artabanus, who was, at his firſt appearing, joined by all thoſe who hated Abdageſes. The Scythians likewiſe, the Dahæ and the Sacæ, declared in his favour, and ſent him powerful ſupplies; ſo that he was ſoon in a condition to take the field; which he did accordingly, at the head of a very numerous and well-diſciplined army. Tiridates, who had ſpent his whole time in beſieging a fortreſs, whither Artabanus had conveyed his treaſures and concubines, did not think it adviſeable to put the whole to the iſſue of a battle; and therefore retired into Meſopotamia, with a deſign to recruit his army in the country of the Elymæans and Armenians, and then try the fortune of a battle; but in his march he was abandoned by the greateſt part of his troops, who either retired home, or fled to Artabanus; inſomuch, that not thinking himſelf any longer ſafe within the Parthian dominions, he retired into Syria, leaving his competitor in quiet poſſeſſion of the crown [a]. But it was not long ere new diſturbances obliged Artabanus to quit the kingdom a ſecond time. The nobility, not being able to bear his cruelties and haughty behaviour, conſpired anew againſt him, and taking up arms, obliged him to ſhelter himſelf in the dominions of Izates king of the Adiabenians, who not only received and entertained him in a manner ſuitable to his rank, but, by his kind offices, prevailed upon the Parthian nobility to receive him again, after he had, by a ſolemn oath, promiſed to forgive all thoſe who had taken up arms againſt him. The Parthians had placed one Cinnamus on the throne in his room; who was by the ſame Izates perſuaded to reſign, of his own accord, the regal power and authority, to the baniſhed prince. Artabanus, being thus reſtored to his kingdom by the mediation of Izates, in acknowledgment of the favours he had received at his hands, beſtowed on him the rich country of Niſibis, and allowed him to wear a ſtrait tiara, and to lie in a golden bed; which were privileges peculiar to the kings of Parthia [b]. From this time he governed with great equity and moderation, and, after a reign of thirty years, died greatly lamented by all his ſubjects, leaving behind him ſeven ſons, viz. Darius, Bardanes, Gotarzes, Orodes, Vologeſes, Pacorus, and Tiridates. By his laſt will he appointed Bardanes to ſucceed him, who, forgetful of the obligations his family owed to Izates, made war upon him, for no other reason, but because he refused to join him against the Romans [c]. His monstrous ingratitude towards a prince who had so well deserved of the Parthian nation, was highly resented by the chief lords of his kingdom, who taking up arms against him, killed him, and raised his brother Gotarzes to the throne [d]. This is the account which Josephus gives us, in a few words, of the accession to the crown, and reigns of Bardanes and Gotarzes; but Tacitus, disagreeing with that writer, relates the matter in a quite different manner [e]. According to him, Gotarzes and Bardanes were not the sons, but the brothers of Artabanus, who was succeeded by Gotarzes, a most cruel prince, and therefore so hated by his subjects, that they called Bardanes to the throne. Bardanes, as he was a man of great resolution and activity, marched in two days three thousand furlongs, and arriving at Ctesiphon, surprized and drove Gotarzes from the throne. With the same expedition he over-ran the chief provinces of the Parthian empire, and was every-where received with loud acclamations. Seleucia was the only city that refused to submit to him, which he closely besieged; but while he was wasting his time before that place, Gotarzes unexpectedly arrived at the head of a numerous army of Dahans and Hyrcanians, which obliged Bardanes to raise the siege, and retire to the plains of Bactria, where he encamped with a design to venture a battle in the open fields. Gotarzes followed him; but while the two armies were ready to engage, Gotarzes received private intelligence of a conspiracy formed by the chief men of the kingdom against himself, and also his brother, to whom he immediately imparted it. Hereupon the two competitors had an interview, in which, tho' at first distrusting each other, they were at last thoroughly reconciled, both of them swearing on the altars not to molest one another, but to turn their arms against their common enemies; nay, Gotarzes, judging Bardanes more worthy of the crown than himself, an instance of equity and moderation seldom to be met with, resigned it to him; and, in order to remove all ground of jealousy, retired into the most remote parts of Hyrcania. Bardanes, leaving Bactria, returned to the siege of Seleucia, which voluntarily submitted to him, after he had attempted in vain to reduce it by force. Being now sole master of the whole Parthian empire, he formed a design of re-

Artabanus reſtored.

Bardanes.

[a] TACIT. ibid. c. 41, 42, 43, 44. JOSEPH. ibid c. 6. DION. CASS. l. lviii. p. 537. SUET in Tiber. c. 66. [b] JOSEPH ibid.

Gotarzes

Gotarzes driven out by Bardanes.

Gotarzes resigns the crown to his brother Bardanes.

[c] Idem ibid. Zonar. l. iii. Philostrat. l. i. & iii de vita Apollon. [d] Joseph. ibid. [e] Tacit. annal. l. xi. c. 8.

covering

covering Armenia; but Vilius Marsus, or, as we read in Josephus, Cassius Longinus, governor of Syria, threatening him with war, in case he made any attempts upon that kingdom, he thought it adviseable to drop the enterprize [f].

IN the mean time, Gotarzes, repenting his resignation, and being recalled by the nobility, who, in time of peace, were ever plotting changes in the government, raised new forces, and advanced at the head of a powerful army as far as the river Charinda, where he was met and intirely defeated by Bardanes, who, elated with that victory, attacked and reduced all the countries lying between that river and the Gindes, which parts the Dahans from the Arians. There he was obliged to halt, the Parthians tho' victorious, refusing to follow him into countries so remote from their own. Having therefore erected monuments with pompous inscriptions, importing, that none of the Arsacidæ, before him, had exacted tributes from those nations, he returned home, loaded with the spoils of the countries he had conquered. The glory he acquired in this expedition inspired him with such pride, that he became quite insupportable to his subjects, especially to the nobility; who thereupon conspiring against him, killed him at a hunting match, when he was not attended as usual by his guards, as not apprehending any treachery or danger. He was, according to Tacitus, a prince endued with excellent qualities, and would have been one of the greatest kings that ever reigned in Parthia had he studied to be as much beloved by his subjects, as he was feared by his enemies [g].

Bardanes murdered.

UPON the death of Bardanes, new disputes arose among the nobility about the electing of a king to succeed him, some declaring for Gotarzes, and others for Meherdates, the grandson of Phrahates, by whom he had been delivered to the Romans as an hostage. At last the party of Gotarzes prevailed, who was no sooner placed on the throne, than he began to use all sorts of cruelty on his subjects, especially on those who had adhered to Meherdates; whereupon they had private recourse to the emperor Claudius, soliciting him to send them Meherdates, since they could no longer bear with Gotarzes, whose cruelties had rendered him odious to all his subjects. Claudius readily complied with their request, and having exhorted Meherdates to govern with equity and moderation, blessings, said he, unknown to barbarians, and thence the more likely to please them, he dismissed him, toge-

Gotarzes.

Meherdates set up against him by the Parthian nobility, and supported by the emperor Claudius.

[f] TACIT. ibid. c. 8, & 9. JOSEPH. ibid. [g] TACIT. ibid.

ther

ther with the embaſſadors, and at the ſame time wrote to Caius Caſſius, governor of Syria, injoining him to attend the young prince to the banks of the Euphrates. As ſoon as Meherdates arrived in Syria, Caſſius, agreeable to his inſtructions, drew together his legions, and marched with them to Zeugma, where the river was then fordable. There he encamped, and being joined by Abgarus king of Edeſſa and ſuch of the Parthian chiefs as privately favoured Meherdates, he exhorted, in their preſence, the new king to preſs on the execution of his deſign without delay, leſt the Parthians ſhould in the mean time change their mind, as it had often happened, and cooling in their affections to him, retire home, or join his competitor. This advice, the beſt that could be given him, was fruſtrated by the treachery of Abgarus, who had, in appearance, eſpouſed the intereſt of Meherdates, but was in reality intirely attached to Gotarzes; and therefore detained the young king many days at Edeſſa, tho' Carrhanes a leading man among the Parthians, and a ſincere friend to Meherdates, preſſed him, by frequent meſſages, to advance with all poſſible expedition, and aſſured him, that if he only ſhewed himſelf, he would be joined by great multitudes; but Meherdates, neglecting the advice of his friends, followed that only of the treacherous Abgarus, who prevailed upon him to march a great way about, and, inſtead of entering Meſopotamia, tho' he was on the borders of that country, to paſs through Armenia, which, as winter was already begun, was in great part covered with ſnow. As they came down into the champain country, wearied with the deep ſnow and ſteep mountains, Carrhanes joined them with his forces. Thence they croſſed the Tigris, paſſed thro' the country of the Adiabenians, and advancing to the city of Ninos, the antient ſeat of the kings of Aſſyria, made themſelves maſters of that place, as they did likewiſe of the ſtrong caſtle of Arbela, ſo famous in hiſtory on account of the ſignal victory gained there by Alexander over Darius. In the mean time Gotarzes, having offered ſacrifices on mount Sambulos to the gods of the place, eſpecially to Hercules, came and incamped in the plain, with the river Carma between him and the enemy. Meherdates endeavoured by daily inſults and haughty meſſages, to draw him to a battle; but he declined it, ſoliciting in the mean time by his emiſſaries, the friends of Meherdates to abandon and betray him: and herein he was atended with all the ſucceſs he could have wiſhed for; for firſt Izates king of the Adiabenians, and afterwards Abgarus king of the Edeſſans went over to him, with all the forces under their command.

Meherdates betrayed by Abgarus king of Edeſſa.

mand. Meherdates seeing himself thus forsaken by his allies, and mistrusting those who remained, resolved, as his only recourse, to commit the issue to chance, and risque a battle, which Gotarzes no longer avoided, his army being now as much strengthened as his enemy's was weakened. Both parties engaged with the utmost fury, and the victory continued doubtful, till Carrhanes, having put to flight one of the enemy's wings and pursuing it too far, was surrounded by a body of reserve, which prevented him from returning to the assistance of Meherdates; who thereupon, being intirely defeated, and so hemmed in that he could not make his escape, surrendered himself to one Parrhaces, a dependent of his father's, by whom he was immediately loaded with fetters, and delivered up to the conqueror. Gotarzes looking upon him not as one of the race of Arsaces, but as a Roman and foreigner, ordered his ears to be cut off, in contempt of the Romans, but granted him his life to shew his clemency [h].

His army defeated, and himself taken prisoner.

NOT long after Gotarzes died, and was succeeded by Vonones, at that time governor of Media, whose reign was short and inglorious; for he did nothing which writers have thought worth transmitting to posterity. Upon the death of Vonones, the crown of Parthia devolved upon Vologeses, the son of Gotarzes according to Josephus, of Vonones according to Tacitus. In the very beginning of his reign he invaded Armenia with a powerful army, and having, without opposition, made himself master of Artaxata and Tigranocerta, the two chief cities of that kingdom, he obliged Rhadamistus the Iberian, who had usurped the crown, to save himself in Iberia. Upon his retreat, Vologeses declared his brother Tiridates king of Armenia, having before appointed his other brother, by name Pacorus, king of Media; for Tiridates and Pacorus had yielded the crown of Parthia to him, tho' born of a Greek concubine; whence he thought it incumbent upon him to procure a crown for those, who had so generously parted with one for his sake. But while he was in Armenia, a plague breaking out in his army, occasioned chiefly by want of provisions, he was forced to relinquish his conquests, and retire into his own dominions. Hereupon Domitius Corbulo entering Armenia, drove out Tiridates, with the few Parthian forces that had continued with him, and placed on that throne Tigranes the Cappadocian, as we have related in the history of Armenia. This affront Vologeses could not brook, and therefore having publickly and with great solemnity, Vonones.

Vologeses

His wars with the Romans.

[h] Idem ibid. & l. xii. c. 14.

crowned

crowned Tiridates king of Armenia, he dispatched Monæses, one of his generals, with a strong body of chosen horse and Adiabenian auxiliaries, injoining him to drive out Tigranes, and recover Armenia, which had been long held by, and therefore belonged to, the princes of the family of Arsaces. As for himself, he dropped his expedition against the Hyrcanians, who had lately revolted; and, having drawn together a mighty army, began to make the necessary preparations for a descent on the Roman provinces. Corbulo, whom Nero had charged with the defence of Armenia, was no sooner acquainted with the measures taken by Vologeses, than he sent two legions to the assistance of Tigranes, under the command of Verulanus Severus and Vettius Bolanus, with private injunctions to act rather with caution than eagerness and dispatch; for he was more desirous, as Tacitus observes, of keeping a war on foot, than bringing it to a speedy conclusion; besides he had wrote to Nero, that another general was necessary to defend Armenia, since Syria was threatened with a terrible storm from Vologeses. In the mean time, he posted the remaining legions along the banks of the Euphrates, and having raised new forces in the province, placed guards at all the passes, and erected forts over the several fountains to prevent the enemy from having any water in that dry and sandy country.

WHILE Corbulo was thus busied in securing Syria, Monæses advanced by long marches towards Armenia, hoping to surprize Tigranes: but with all his expedition, he found that prince well guarded against him; for he had furnished the strong city of Tigranocerta with all manner of provisions and warlike stores, and retired into it with all his forces. Monæses, after having attempted in vain to reduce it, withdrew, and began to lay waste the country. Hereupon Corbulo, who was unwilling to engage in a war with the Parthians, lest he should lose the reputation he had hitherto gained, sent embassadors to Vologeses, to expostulate with him for falling upon a Roman province, for besieging a king who was a friend and ally of the Roman people, and for ravaging a country which Rome had taken under her protection. At the same time he gave him to understand, that if he did not forthwith abandon the siege of Tigranocerta, he would look upon it as an infraction of the treaties subsisting between the Parthians and Romans, and in his turn invade the Parthian territories. Vologeses, as he did not care to provoke Corbulo, who had acquired great fame by his military exploits, answered with great moderation, that he would send embassadors to Rome, to to beg of Nero the kingdom of Armenia, and to renew the alliance made by his anceſtors with the people of Rome. Agreeable to this anſwer he immediately diſpatched meſſengers to Monæſes, ordering him to raiſe the ſiege of Tigranocerta; and retired himſelf with all his forces into the heart of his dominions, to wait there for the return of the embaſſadors he had ſent to Rome. The emperor Nero received them in a very obliging manner, but refuſed to renew his antient alliance with the Parthians, unleſs they renounced all pretenſions to the crown of Armenia. This anſwer ſo incenſed Vologeſes, that he immediately drew again all his forces together, with a deſign to invade Syria; but finding the banks of the Euphrates ſtrongly guarded by Corbulo, he turned all his efforts againſt Armenia; where he gained thoſe advantages over Ceſennius Petus, which we have related at length in the hiſtory of that kingdom. However, he conſented at laſt, dreading the conſequence of a war with the Romans, that his brother Tiridates ſhould go in perſon to Rome, and there receive the crown of Armenia as a gift from Nero; which he did accordingly. By this means the antient alliance between the two empires was renewed, and the affairs of the eaſt ſettled in peace [i]. From this time no further mention is made of Vologeſes, till the beginning of the reign of Veſpaſian, to whom he ſent embaſſadors, offering to aſſiſt him with forty thouſand Parthian horſe [k]. Veſpaſian, as he was already ſettled on the throne, did not accept of the ſuccours offered him; but, renewing all the antient treaties with the Parthians, diſmiſſed the embaſſadors, loaded with preſents, and maintained, during the reign of Vologeſes, a good underſtanding with the Parthian nation. Vologeſes, being now diſengaged from all foreign and domeſtic wars, applied himſelf to the building of a city, which, from his own name, he called Vologeſocerta, or, the city of Vologeſes; but was prevented by death from completing the work he had begun.

HE was ſucceeded by his ſon Artabanus III. who, falling out with Veſpaſian, eſpouſed the cauſe of the counterfeit Nero, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the hiſtory of Rome. However, the emperor did not think it adviſeable to reſent the affront, for fear of kindling a new war in the eaſt, the kingdom of Parthia being at that time in a very flouriſhing condition, and the Roman provinces greatly weakened by a late irruption of the Alani, a barbarous people of Scythia, inhabiting the countries bordering on the Artabanus III.

[i] TACIT. ibid. [k] TACIT. hiſt. l. vi.

river Tanais and the lake Meotis. Artabanus had formed a deſign of invading Armenia; but died before he could put it in execution [l]. Upon his death, his ſon Pacorus II. was raiſed to the throne; but all we know of him is, that he entered into an alliance with Decebalus king of the Daci, and maintained, during the whole time of his reign, which is ſaid to have been very long, a ſtrict friendſhip with the Romans [m].

Pacorus II.

He was ſucceeded by his brother Coſdroes, who invading Armenia, drove out Exadares, who had been appointed king of that country by the emperor Trajan, and in his room placed his eldeſt ſon Parthamaſiris on the throne. As this was an open infraction of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two empires, Trajan haſtened into the eaſt, with a deſign to humble the Parthians, who, relying on their victories formerly gained over the Romans, were daily raiſing new diſturbances in Syria and Armenia, and making incurſions into the Roman provinces bordering on their dominions. His arrival in Armenia was ſo ſudden and unexpected, that he reduced the whole country, almoſt without oppoſition, and took Parthamaſiris himſelf priſoner. Animated with theſe ſucceſſes, he entered Meſopotamia; and having there beſieged and taken the ſtrong city of Niſibis, after many ſkirmiſhes and encounters, he made himſelf maſter of that opulent country, never before ſubject to Rome. From Meſopotamia, which he reduced to a Roman province, he returned, in the beginning of the winter, into Syria, whence he acquainted the ſenate with the ſucceſs that had attended his arms againſt the Parthians, and was by them honoured with the ſurnames of Armenicus and Parthicus [n].

Coſdroes.

Early in the ſpring, he took the field again; but was warmly oppoſed by Coſdroes, whom he found encamped on the banks of the Euphrates, with a deſign to diſpute his paſſage; which he did with ſuch vigour, that the emperor, after having ſeveral times attempted to ford that river, and been always repulſed with great ſlaughter, was obliged to cauſe boats to be built on the neighbouring mountains, which he privately conveyed from thence on carriages to the water ſide; and having in the night-time formed a bridge with them, he paſſed his army the next day, but not without great loſs and danger, the Parthians haraſſing his men the whole time with inceſſant ſhowers of arrows, which did

[l] Xiphilin. in Othone. [m] Suidas, voce Ουηταν. Plin. epiſt. l. x. [n] Sext. Ruf. in breviar. Theodos. Min. Spartian. in Trajan.

grea

great execution. Having gained the oppoſite bank, he advanced boldly into Aſſyria, the Parthians flying every-where before him, and made himſelf maſter of Arbela. Thence he purſued his march, ſubduing, with incredible rapidity, countries, where the Roman ſtandards had never been diſplayed before. Babylonia, or the province of Babylon, voluntarily ſubmitted to him. The city itſelf was, after a vigorous reſiſtance, taken by ſtorm; by which means he became maſter of all Chaldea and Aſſyria, the two richeſt provinces of the Parthian empire. From Babylon he marched to Cteſiphon, the metropolis of the Parthian monarchy, which he beſieged and at laſt reduced. But as to the particulars of theſe great conqueſts, we are quite in the dark, this expedition, however glorious to the Roman name, being rather hinted at, than deſcribed by the writers of thoſe times. While Trajan was thus making war in the heart of the enemy's country, Coſdroes, having recruited his army, marched into Meſopotamia, with a deſign to recover that country, and cut off all communication between the Roman army and Syria. On his arrival in that province, the inhabitants flocked to him from all parts, and moſt of the cities, driving out the gariſons left by Trajan, opened their gates to him. Hereupon the emperor detached Lucius and Maximus, two of his chief commanders, into Meſopotamia, to keep ſuch cities in awe as had not revolted, and to open a communication with Syria. Maximus was met by Coſdroes, and having ventured a battle, his army was intirely defeated and himſelf killed. But Lucius, being joined by Euricius and Clarius, two other commanders ſent by Trajan with freſh ſupplies, gained conſiderable advantages over the enemy, and retook the cities of Niſibis and Seleucia, which had revolted. And now Trajan, ſeeing himſelf poſſeſſed of all the beſt and moſt fruitful provinces of the Parthian empire, but at the ſame time being well appriſed that he could not, without a vaſt expence, maintain his conqueſts, nor keep in awe ſo fierce and warlike a people at ſuch a diſtance from Italy, reſolved to ſet over them a king of his own chooſing, who ſhould hold the crown of him and his ſucceſſors, and acknowledge them as his lords and ſovereigns. With this view he repaired to Cteſiphon, and having there aſſembled the chief men of the nation, he crowned one of the royal family, by name Parthanaſpates, king of Parthia, obliging all who were preſent to pay him their allegiance. He choſe Parthanaſpates, becauſe that prince had joined him at his firſt entering the Parthian dominions, conducted him with great fidelity, and ſhewn on all occaſions an extraordinary attachment to the Romans. Thus the Parthians were at laſt ſubdued, and their kingdom made tributary to Rome. But they did not long continue in this ſtate of ſubjection; for they no ſooner heard of Trajan's death, which happened ſoon after, than, taking up arms, they drove Parthanaſpates from the throne, and recalling Coſdroes, who had retired into the country of the Hyrcanians, openly revolted from Rome. Adrian, who was then commander in chief of all the forces in the eaſt, and ſoon after acknowledged emperor by the army, did not care, tho' he was at that time in Syria with a very numerous army, to engage in a new war with the Parthians; but contented himſelf with preſerving the antient limits of the empire, without any ambitious proſpects of farther conqueſts: therefore, in the beginning of his reign, he abandoned thoſe provinces beyond the Euphrates, which Trajan had conquered, withdrew the Roman gariſons from Meſopotamia, and, for the greater ſafety of other places, made the Euphrates the boundary of, and barrier in, thoſe parts, poſting his legions along the banks of that river. Some writers are of opinion, that he did this out of a ſecret envy to his uncle Trajan's glory and reputation; but others commend it as a very politic and prudent action, the maintaining of thoſe diſtant conqueſts being attended with many inconveniences, and no advantages, to the empire. Before he left Antioch to return to Rome, in order to keep the Parthians quiet, he diſmiſſed their priſoners without ranſom, and among the reſt, the daughter of Coſdroes, who had been taken by Trajan. Coſdroes, in return for theſe favours, never offered to diſturb the Romans in the poſſeſſion of the provinces bordering on his dominions; but ſhewed himſelf always ready to aſſiſt them, as his beſt friends and allies [o].

Vologeſes II.

Coſdroes died after a long reign, and was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Vologeſes; in whoſe reign the Alani breaking into Media, then ſubject to the Parthians, committed there great devaſtations; but were prevailed upon, with rich preſents ſent them by Vologeſes, to abandon that kingdom and return home. Upon their retreat, Vologeſes, having no enemy to contend with at home, fell unexpectedly upon Armenia, ſurprized the legions there, and having cut them in pieces all to a man, entered Syria, defeated, with great ſlaughter, Ati-

[o] Theodos. Min. in frag. Spartian. Xiphilin. ibid. Paul. Diacon. hiſt. miſcell.

tilius

tilius Cornelianus, governor of that province, and advanced, without oppoſition, to the neighbourhood of Antioch, putting every-where the Romans, and thoſe who favoured them, to the ſword. Hereupon the emperor Verus, by the advice of his collegue Antoninus, ſurnamed the Philoſopher, leaving Rome, haſtened into Syria, and, having driven the Parthians out of that province, ordered Statius Priſcus to invade Armenia, and Caſſius, with Martius Verus, to enter the Parthian territories, and carry the war into the enemy's country. Priſcus made himſelf maſter of Artaxata, and, in one campaign, drove the Parthians, though not without great loſs on his ſide, quite out of Armenia. Caſſius, on the other hand, having in ſeveral encounters defeated Vologeſes, though he had an army of four hundred thouſand men under his command, reduced, in four years time, all thoſe provinces which had formerly ſubmitted to Trajan, took Seleucia, burnt and plundered the famous cities of Babylon and Cteſiphon, with the ſtately palaces of the Parthian monarchs, and ſtruck terror into the moſt remote provinces of that empire. On his return he loſt above half the number of his forces by ſickneſs and famine; ſo that after all the Romans, as Spartianus obſerves, had no great reaſon to brag of their victories and conqueſts. However, Antoninus Verus, who had never ſtirred, during the whole time of the war, from Antioch and Daphne, took upon him the lofty titles of Parthicus and Armenicus, as if he had juſtly acquired them in the midſt of his pleaſures and debaucheries [q]. We are told, that ſome of Caſſius's ſoldiers, in pillaging the temple of Apollo at Babylon, found under ground a ſmall golden coffer, which, upon their opening it, caſt forth ſuch peſtilential vapours as infected all thoſe who were preſent, and by their means the reſt of the army. As Verus, on his return to Italy, took Caſſius's forces along with him, he carried the plague into all the provinces through which he paſſed, and ſpread the infection through Italy, whence it was communicated to the moſt remote parts of the empire, and every-where attended with great mortality. After the revolt and death of Caſſius, which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of in the hiſtory of the Roman emperors, Antoninus the Philoſopher repaired into Syria, to ſettle the affairs of that province, and was, on his arrival, met by embaſſadors from Vologeſes, who, having recovered moſt of the provinces ſubdued by Caſſius, and being unwilling unwilling either to part with them, or engage in a new war, ſolicited the emperor to confirm him in the poſſeſſion of them, promiſing to hold them of him, and to acknowledge the ſovereignty of Rome. To theſe terms Antoninus readily agreed, and a peace was accordingly concluded betweeen the two empires, which Vologeſes did not long enjoy, being ſoon after carried off by a diſtemper, and not murdered by his own ſubjects, as we read in Conſtantinus Manaſſes, who calls him Belegeſes.

[q] EUSEB. in chron. ZOSIM. l. iv. OROS. hiſt. miſcel. THEODOS. MEN. ibid.

Vologeſes III.

Upon his death Vologeſes III. the ſon of his brother Sanatruces, and grandſon of Coſdroes, was raiſed to the throne. He ſided with Niger againſt the emperor Severus, who thereupon, having ſettled matters of home, marched with all his forces againſt him, and, advancing to the city of Cteſiphon, whither he had retired, laid cloſe ſiege to that metropolis. Vologeſes made a moſt gallant defence; but the city, after a long ſiege, and much bloodſhed on both ſides, was at length taken by aſſault. The king's treaſures, with his wives and children, fell into the emperor's hands; but Vologeſes himſelf had the good luck to make his eſcape, which was a great diſappointment to Severus, who immediately diſpatched an expreſs, to acquaint the ſenate with the ſucceſs that had attended him in his expedition, againſt the only nation that was then formidable to Rome. He ſent likewiſe a particular deſcription of the countries, cities, rivers, and mountains he had paſſed, and of the battles he had fought, all drawn and painted upon tables; for which the ſurnames of Parthicus, Arabicus, and Adiabenicus, were decreed him. But he had no ſooner croſſed the Euphrates, than Vologeſes recovered all the provinces, except Meſopotamia, which he had reduced. Theſe expeditions were very chargeable to the Romans, and coſt them much blood, without their reaping any advantages from them; for as they had not ſufficient forces to keep in awe the provinces they had ſubdued, the inhabitants, greatly attached to the family of Arſaces, never failed to return to their antient obedience, as ſoon as the Roman armies were withdrawn. Vologeſes was ſoon after engaged in a war, ſtill more troubleſome and deſtructive, with his brother Artabanus, who, encouraged by ſome of the diſcontented nobles, attempted to rob him of the crown, and place it on his own head. Vologeſes gained ſeveral victories over his brother and rebellious ſubjects; but died before he could reſtore the empire to its former tranquility.

Artabanus, who had a numerous army at his devotion, did not meet with any oppoſition in ſeizing the throne vacant by the death of his brother, though Tiridates had a better title to it, as being his elder brother. He had ſcarce ſettled the affairs of his kingdom, when the emperor Caracalla, deſirous to ſignalize himſelf, as ſeveral of his predeceſſors had done, by ſome memorable exploit againſt the Parthians, ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to him, deſiring his daughter in marriage. Artabanus, overjoyed at this propoſal, which, he thought, would be attended with a laſting peace between the two empires, received the embaſſadors with all poſſible marks of honour, and readily complied with their requeſt. Soon after Caracalla ſent a ſecond embaſſy, to acquaint the king, that he was coming to ſolemnize the nuptials: whereupon Artabanus went to meet him, attended with the flower of the nobility, and his beſt troops, all unarmed, and in moſt pompous habits; but this peaceable train no ſooner approached the Roman army, than the ſoldiers, on a ſignal given them, falling upon the king's retinue, made a moſt terrible ſlaughter of the unarmed multitude, Artabanus himſelf eſcaping with great difficulty. The treacherous Caracalla, having gained by this exploit great booty, and, as he thought, no leſs glory, wrote a long and boaſting letter to the ſenate, aſſuming the title of Parthicus for this piece of treachery, as he had before that of Germanicus, for murdering in like manner ſome of the German nobility. Artabanus, reſolving to make the Romans pay dear for their inhuman and barbarous treachery, raiſed the moſt numerous army that had ever been on foot in Parthia, croſſed the Euphrates, and entered Syria, putting all to fire and ſword; but Caracalla being murdered before this invaſion, Macrinus, who had ſucceeded him, met the Parthians at the head of a mighty army, compoſed of many legions, and all the auxiliaries of the ſtates of Aſia. The two armies no ſooner came in ſight of each other, but they engaged with the utmoſt fury. The battle continued two days, both Romans and Parthians fighting ſo obſtinately, that night only parted them, without any apparent advantage on either ſide, though both retired, when night had put an end to the conteſt, crying, Victory, victory. The field of battle was covered all over with dead bodies, there being already above forty thouſand killed, including both Romans and Parthians; nevertheleſs Artabanus was heard to ſay, that the battle was only begun, and that he would continue it till either the Parthians or Romans were all to a Artabanus IV.

Treachery of the emperor Caracalla.

Artabanus invades Syria.

An obſtinate engagement between the Parthians and Romans.

man

man cut in pieces. But Macrinus being well appriſed, that the king came highly inraged againſt Caracalla in particular, and dreading the conſequences which would attend the deſtruction of his army, ſent a herald to Artabanus, acquainting him with the death of Caracalla, and propoſing an alliance between the two empires. The king, underſtanding that his great enemy was dead, readily embraced the propoſals of peace and amity, upon condition that all the priſoners, who had been taken by the treachery of Caracalla, ſhould be immediately reſtored, and a large ſum of money paid him to defray the expences of the war. Theſe articles being performed without delay or heſitation, Artabanus returned into Parthia, and Macrinus to Antioch [q].

The Perſians revolt.

As Artabanus loſt on this occaſion the flower of his army, Artaxerxes, a Perſian of a mean deſcent, but of great courage and experience in war, revolting from the Parthians, prevailed upon his countrymen to join him, and attempt the recovery of the ſovereign power, which, he ſaid, they had been unjuſtly deprived of, firſt by the Macedonians, and afterwards by the Parthians, formerly their vaſſals. Artabanus, upon the news of this revolt, marched with the whole ſtrength of his kingdom to ſuppreſs it; but being met by Artaxerxes, at the head of a no leſs powerful army, a bloody battle enſued, which is ſaid to have laſted three days. At length the Parthians, though they behaved with the utmoſt bravery, and fought like men in deſpair, were forced to yield to the Perſians, who were commanded by a more experienced leader. Moſt of their troops were cut off in the flight, and the king himſelf taken priſoner, and ſoon after put to death by Artaxerxes's orders. The Parthians, having loſt, in this fatal engagement, both their king and their army, were forced to ſubmit to the conqueror, and become vaſſals to a nation which had been ſubject to them for the ſpace of four hundred and ſeventy five years. Thus was this gallant and warlike nation ſubdued at laſt, and the empire once more transferred to the Perſians; whoſe kings reigns, till they were in their turn reduced by the Arabs, will be the ſubject of the following ſection. However, the royal family of Arſaces did not end in Artabanus, but continued to reign in Armenia till the time of the emperor Juſtinian, holding that kingdom of the Perſian monarchs, to whom the Arſacidæ

Defeat the Parthians, kill their king, and put an end to the Parthian empire.

[q] Theodos Min. ubi ſupra. Zonar. l. iv. Sozomen. hiſtor. tripart. l. ii. c. 1.

of

of Armenia were tributaries. Among these we find the following princes mentioned in history, Arsaces, Teridates, Artavasdes, Teridates II. Arsaces II. Paras, Tigranes, and Arsaces III. all descended from Arsaces, brother to Artabanus IV. the last king of Parthia. But of Armenia, and the princes who reigned there, after that country became subject to the Persians, we shall have occasion to speak in the next section.

CHAP. XIII.

SECT. I.

The Hiſtory of the Perſians, from their recovering the empire from the Parthians, to their being ſubdued by the Arabs.

According to the Greek and Latin authors.

THE reader hath before ſeen, after what manner, and how long, the Perſians were ſubject to the Parthian princes. We are here to ſpeak of their atchievements after they had again rendered themſelves independent; and not only ſo, but lords alſo of many ſpacious provinces, and the firſt nation in the eaſt. As we have no regular hiſtory of Perſia by any Greek or Latin writer, what we offer to the reader in this ſection, is collected, as carefully as might be, from ſuch as have occaſionally mentioned the Perſian affairs. Theſe paſſages we have digeſted into their natural order; and, if there be any omiſſions, they will be ſupplied in the next article, wherein we ſhall treat of the ſame period from the oriental hiſtorians (A).

A

(A) There is no branch of the Univerſal Hiſtory which more clearly evinces the general uſefulneſs of this work, or the peculiar ſymmetry of its parts, than this before us. All the general hiſtories, that have been publiſhed in our own, or in other modern languages, are ſtrangely deficient in this article. We have either a looſe, unſatisfactory account of the paſſing of the empire of the eaſt from the Parthians to the Perſians, and from them to the Arabians;

A TABLE of the Perſian kings.

	Years.	Months.
Artaxares	14	10
Sapores	31

Ormiſdates

Arabians; or we have ſuch a chronological table of their kings, as that inſerted in our text, with a few remarks thereon from Scaliger's Chronicon, or ſome other collection; and ſo we are hurried to another ſubject. It muſt be owned, that there are ſome particular relations which promiſe fairer, and perform more, than is either expected or done by the compilers of general hiſtories; but then we can very truly affirm, that even theſe fall very far ſhort of the following account. The learned 1) Bizarus, whoſe hiſtory of the Perſian affairs is deſervedly eſteemed the beſt extant, takes all that he hath relating to this period from a very few Latin and Greek authors; ſo that, for very want of materials, he is forced to draw in the Roman affairs, and other matters ſtill more foreign; nay, he once digreſſed ſo far as to mention William the Conqueror and compliment queen Elizabeth 2. One might ſay much more as to other compendiums of Perſian hiſtory (3); but we deſire not to prejudice the works of others, or to give any more than a fair account of our own.

We have divided the hiſtory of this period into two parts. The firſt is compoſed of ſuch materials as the Latin and Greek writers furniſh, particularly that noble collection which goes under the name of the Byzantine Hiſtorians, whence we have taken ten times as much as hath appeared in any modern language, and, by aſſembling a multitude of divided paſſages, have preſented the public with ſomething that looks like a connected hiſtory. Whereas Bizarus found himſelf ſo deſtitute of matter, that in his hiſtory of the Perſian affairs, he makes the reigns of the Roman emperors his rule, and refers the ſeries of Perſian monarchs to a table. The ſecond part is truly taken from Oriental writers; but more eſpecially from Mirkhond, and what is related therein is ſo neceſſary a ſupplement to what the firſt part contained, that, without it, there would not only have remained a viſible imperfection, but, in many places, it would have been unintelligible; becauſe, the Greek writers, out of a perverſe humour, wilfully miſrepreſent the manners, cuſtoms, and literature of the Oriental nations. The compariſon

(1) Rerum Perſicarum hiſtoria, initia gentis, mores, inſtituta, reſque geſtas ad hæc uſque tempora complectens: auctore Petro Bizaro Sentinate. fol Francofurti, A D. 1601. (2) Hiſt. rer Perſic. l v. p 137. (3) Bartholm. Keckermannus. de monarch. Perſar. Tom. II Oper. ejuſd author. in fol Genev 1614 Reinec. comment. de reb. Perſic. ap hiſt. Jul. Schicard. catal reg. Perſar.

	Years.	Months.
Ormiſdates	1	10 days.
Varanes	3
Varanes II.	17
Varanes III.	00	4
Narſes	7	9
Miſdates
Sapores II.	70
Artaxerxes	4
Sapores III.	5
Varanes IV. or Cermanſaa	11
Iſdigertes	21
Varanes V.	20
Varanes VI.	17	4
Perozes	20
Valens	4
Cavades	11
Zambades	8
Cavades II.	30
Coſroes	48
Hormiſdas	8
Coſroes II.	39
Siroes	1
Adheſyr	00	2
Sarbaras	00	6
Bornarim	00	7
Hormiſdas	10

Artaxares, Year of Chriſt 230. Artaxares, or, as he is ſometimes called, Artaxerxes, the reſtorer of the Perſian kingdom, was not only a private perſon, but of ſpurious birth, as we are informed by Agathias (B). His mother was married to one Pabecus or Pabec, who was therefore of theſe diſtinct hiſtories will illuſtrate each of them, and enable the intelligent reader perfectly to comprehend both; whereby this wide chaſm will be in ſome meaſure filled up, and this period of Perſian hiſtory no longer remain, as it hitherto hath done, under an impenetrable obſcurity.

(B) As we have taken the foregoing table chiefly from Agathias, and as we have generally preferred his authority, where-ever he ſpeaks deciſively, it is neceſſary we ſhould ſay ſomething of the merit of this author. He was a native of Marina, and addicted himſelf to the ſtudy of the law; and as thoſe who dedicated their time to the acquirement of that ſcience, ſtudied moſtly in colleges, he was either a tanner or a shoemaker, but withal a person well skilled in judiciary astrology. It happened, that one Sasanus, or Sasan, a military officer, travelling through the country of the Cadusians, took up his lodging in the house of this Pabec, tho' it was a very mean one. Pabec, by his art, perceiving, that a person begotten by this stranger, would become the head of a most potent family, and also arrive at regal honours, he began to fret within himself, because he had neither sister, daughter, nor cousin in the house. At length, his ambition getting the better of his sense of shame, he caused his wife to go to bed to Sasan, who begat on her Artaxares. When afterwards Artaxares came to be king, Pabec and Sasan each claimed him for a son; whereupon the story became public, and it was agreed, that he should be styled the son of Pabec of the seed of Sasan [a]. Artaxares from his youth addicted himself to a military life, and having attained to great skill and no less reputation in the wars, he projected the delivery of he came from thence to be called Scholasticus (4), which the learned Vossius will have to signify the same as Advocatus (5). He was a poet and a historian; but it is in his last capacity only that we have to do with him. He was, it seems, so pleased with Procopius's memoirs of the Persic wars, that he resolved to continue them, which he did in the history we yet have, divided into five books. In the fourth of these he takes occasion to mention one Sergius, who was so well skilled in the Persian tongue, as to be on that account in great favour with Cosroes the first. This man making several journies into Persia, and having many opportunities of conversing with the learned of that nation, procured, by their favour, the perusal of the royal annals from whence he made many extracts, which, at his earnest desire, he communicated to Agathias. These were, in that historian's opinion, of so great weight, that he preferred them to the memoirs of Procopius, differing from him to follow them; which shews, that he was thoroughly convinced of their authority. From these extracts he drew up a short, but very perspicuous and exact, account of all the Persian monarchs from Artaxares, who recovered the kingdom from the Parthians, to Cosroes, with whom himself was cotemporary (6). It is from this short account that we have taken the dates, and such other material circumstances, as, we thought, could not be had with the same probability of exactness from other historians, who wrote from later and less authentic memoirs.

[a] AGATH. SCHOLAST. hist. de reb. gest. Justinian, imperat. edit. Paris. l. ii. p. 65. l. iv. p. 134.

(4) Agath. Scholast præfat. ad hist. (5) De histor. Græc. l. ii. p. 270. (6) Agath. Schol. hist. l. 4. p. 140, 141 his countrymen from the Parthian yoke. In purſuance of this deſign, he wrought them to a general revolt; and having in three battles routed, and in the laſt ſlain, the Parthian monarch, he aſſumed the double diadem and the pompous title of king of kings. He was, as all authors agree, a man of great abilities and undaunted ſpirit, or, in other words, a perſon of great courage and unbounded ambition [b].

In

Aſſerts his right to all the provinces of the antient Perſian empire.

He was no ſooner ſeated on the throne, than he formed a deſign of reſtoring the Perſian empire to its antient glory; and having cauſed the neceſſary preparations to be ſet on foot, he gave notice to the Roman governors of the provinces bordering on his dominions, that he conceived himſelf to have a juſt and unqueſtionable title, as the ſucceſſor of Cyrus, to all the Leſſer Aſia, which he commanded them immediately to quit, as well as the provinces on the frontiers of the antient Parthian kingdom, which was already his. Alexander Severus was at this time the poſſeſſor of the Roman empire, a very youth, under the tutelage of his mother, and one who had hitherto dwelt always at Rome; he was therefore unwilling to engage in a war, eſpecially if it might be avoided; and for that reaſon ſent letters to Artaxares, importing that he would do wiſely to keep within bounds, and not, out of vain hopes of conqueſt, to enterprize new wars, which might not be attended with the ſame ſucceſs as formerly; that, in the preſent caſe, he ought to conſider he was not to deal with barbarians, or with a nation unuſed to war, but with the Romans, whoſe emperors, Auguſtus, Trajan, and Severus, had often vanquiſhed the Parthians. The Perſian king had little regard to theſe letters, on the contrary he began to raiſe a great army, and to attack the fortified poſts of the Romans, on the river Euphrates, making ſuch a progreſs in the reduction of the adjacent provinces, that the emperor Alexander, how unwilling ſoever he might be, was conſtrained to raiſe an army, and to march towards Meſopotamia, in order to give a check to the Perſian power [c].

Sends an inſolent meſſage to the emperor Alexander.

Artaxares was employed in the ſiege of Niſibis or Antiochia, when he received the news of Alexander's marching towards him; upon which he thought proper to raiſe the ſiege, that he might recruit and refreſh his army. He ſent, however, deputies or embaſſadors, if we may be allowed to call four hundred perſons by that title, whom he ſelected for their extraordinary stature and great strength; and having furnished them with rich habits, and fine horses, he gave them commission, when they should be introduced to the emperor's presence, to speak thus: The great king Artaxares commands the Romans and their prince to depart out of all Syria and Asia Minor, and to restore to the Persians all the countries on this side of the Ægean and Pontic seas, as of right descending to them from their ancestors [d].

[b] Herodian. hiſt. l. vi. Æl Lamprid. in vit. Aurel Alexand Sever. Oros. hiſt. l vii c. 11. Nicephr. hiſt. eccl. l i.c.6. Gregor. Abul Phar hiſt. dynaſt. dyn 7. p. 186. Herodian & Æl. Lamprid. ubi ſupra.

dinary

THESE heralds or embassadors performed their commission very exactly; which so highly irritated Alexander, who was otherwise a prince of the gentlest disposition, that he ordered all their equipage to be taken from them, and sent them into Phrygia, where he assigned them farms, which they might cultivate for their subsistence. This done, he advanced into Mesopotamia, which he recovered in a great measure without fighting. Historians differ so much in the accounts they give us of the subsequent parts of this war, that it is almost impossible to reconcile them. We shall, however, relate what appears to us most probable, and give our readers our reasons in a note [e].

His messengers rigorously treated.

Artaxares advanced with his forces into Mesopotamia, as soon as he thought himself strong enough to give the enemy battle. His army consisted of a hundred and twenty thousand horse, ten thousand heavy armed soldiers, eighteen hundred chariots with scythes, and seven hundred elephants. Alexander, however, did not decline fighting. An engagement ensued, in which the Romans were victorious, and Artaxares was compelled to retire into the heart of his dominions, where, with great assiduity, he applied himself to the recruiting and restoring of his army. On the other hand, the Roman emperor divided his forces into three bodies, the first, marching through Armenia, had orders to penetrate into Media; the second marched over the marshes, to enter the Parthian dominions on the other side; the third, which was the greatest, and which the emperor commanded in person, was to have fallen into the heart of Artaxares's dominions; and if this scheme had been thoroughly executed, in all probability, the Persian power would not only have been weakened, but even brought to the very verge of destruction [f].

Gives battle to, and is beaten by the Romans.

THE body of troops which passed through Armenia, underwent great difficulties, and with very much fatigue arrived at last in Media. Artaxares quickly marched against them with a formidable army; but was not able to do much, for the Restores his affairs by firmness and vigilance.

[d] ZONAR. hist ad. A C 230 [e] HERODIAN & Æ. LAMPRID. ubi supra. [f] ZONAR. ubi supra. HERODIAN. l vii.

country

country being uneven, the Roman foot had the better of his cavalry. While he was considering how these evils might be surmounted, he received advice of the other body of Romans breaking into his territories, which, in some measure, frustrated all his designs; however, having left guards sufficient to secure the passes, he marched with his forces against the new invaders. These troops finding no enemy to oppose them, plundered all the country, and proud of their spoils, would no longer be restrained under discipline; nay, at last they became so scandalously licentious, that they slew their commander in chief, Flavius, for endeavouring to restrain them, and for being more careful of their safety than they were themselves. In this situation the Persian king fell upon them, and rather destroyed than defeated them. The Roman emperor in the mean time, being under feminine counsels, failed to perform the share he had taken to himself in this enterprize; which was the ruin of his army, the remains of which having joined the corps under his command, he returned first to Antioch and then to Rome, where he triumphed, and was styled Parthicus and Persicus, with very little reason (C). Artaxerxes

(C) Nothing can be more opposite than the account given by Herodian and Ælius Lampridius of the Persian war. We will give a concise account of what is said by each of them, and leave it to the intelligent reader to decide as he pleases. Herodian affirms, that in the fourteenth year of Alexander Severus, letters came from the presidents of Syria and Mesopotamia, purporting, that Artaxerxes king of Persia had made an inroad into Mesopotamia, and threatened to invade Syria, claiming all the continent opposite to Europe, from the Ægean sea to the Propontis, as the antient patrimony of the Persians. Upon this, after writing letters to no purpose to persuade the Persian to be quiet, the emperor Alexander marched into the east, where he divided his army, as we have related in our text, and by failing to perform what himself had undertaken, brought them all into a miserable situation; for which the army was so grievously offended with the emperor, that they openly said, he had most foully betrayed them. Upon this he led them back to Antioch, where he refreshed the remains of them, distributed amongst them large sums of money; and perceiving, that the Romans who were slain in Persia, by selling their lives dear, had exceedingly weakened the enemy, he had thoughts of invading their territories again, when he had advice of the German rebellion, which compelled him to return into Italy (7). On the other hand, we are expressly told by the writer of the life of Alexander Severus, addressed to Constantine the Great, that the Persians were intirely defeated, ares made the best use of his absence, recovering what he had lost, restoring the glory of the Persian name; and having reigned with much reputation, died with honour and in peace, after enjoying the kingdom twelve years, or, as others say, fifteen years, abating two months [g].

(7) Herodian. hist. l. vi. c. 6——16.

Sapores. Year of Christ 242.

HE was succeeded in the throne by his son Sapores or Sapor, a prince equally famous for strength of body and abilities of mind, fierce and intractable in his nature, covetous of glory, haughty, insolent, and cruel. He was no sooner seated on the throne, than he began to meditate a new war with the Romans, to which he was encouraged by a traitor, who dwelt in his court. The name of this man was Cyriades, the son of another Cyriades, an eminent commander in the Roman army. This profligate son of whom we are speaking, began his exploits with robbing his own father. He was naturally a voluptuous man; and therefore, as soon as he had possessed himself of this treasure, he withdrew into Persia, where he lived in that splendor and luxury, for which he had sacrificed his honour. In conjunction with Odomastes, a Persian gene-seated, and a great number made prisoners. He likewise informs us, that he transcribed from the journal of the senate, a speech of the emperor's after his return, which hath abundance of extraordinary particulars. Amongst others, the emperor assures the senate, that Artaxerxes was not improperly styled the great king; that he brought seven hundred elephants into the field, of which three hundred were taken and two hundred killed; that the Romans had cut to pieces an army of one hundred and twenty thousand horse, had sold a multitude of Persian prisoners, and that he had defeated the Persians in the plains where Crassus had been overcome by the Parthians. He affirmed the same thing in gross to the people of Rome, and was thereupon complimented with the title of Conqueror of the Parthians and Persians (8). This author mentions Herodian's account, and also some other accounts less favourable to the emperor Alexander than his; but he thinks the authorities cited by himself sufficient to weigh down all they say. However Herodian, we know, wrote only of such things as happened within his own life-time, and made it a rule with him to make every thing give way to truth. As for the author of this life addressed to Constantine, some will have him to be Ælius Lampridius, and again others attribute it to Spartianus (9); but, whoever writ it, it has much the air of a panegyric, or at least of an apology.

[g] AGATH. SCHOLAST. l. iv. p. 134.

(8) Æl. Lamprid. in vit. Alex. Seve. (9) G. J. Voss. de Hist. Latin. l. ii. p. 192.

ral, he wasted the adjoining provinces; and having at last prevailed on the king himself to take the field, Cyriades, with the deserters, who, for the sake of plunder, followed him, attacked the cities of Antioch and Cæsarea Philippi, both of which they were so lucky as to make themselves masters of; whereupon Cyriades took first the title of Cæsar, and then called himself emperor, acquiring by degrees, dominions, revenues, and forces, not altogether unworthy of that title [h].

His dominions invaded by the Romans.

The young emperor Gordian, when he had settled the affairs of the empire in the west, resolved to rescue the east also from the tyranny of pseudo-emperors, as well as from the terror of the Persian arms. With this view he marched into Syria at the head of a great army; and as long as his father-in-law, whom some writers call Mysitheus, others Timesocles, lived, every thing went well. The Persian found himself constrained to withdraw into his own dominions, whither the emperor followed him, taking Charra or Haran in Mesopotamia; but while he was preparing to push his conquests still farther, he was murdered by the treachery of Philip, whom he had made captain of his guards, on the death of his father-in-law [i].

Makes an advantageous peace.

This Philip, having possessed himself of the sovereign authority, made peace with Sapor, and abandoned Mesopotamia and Armenia to him again. Part of these provinces, on the news of the senate's disapproving his conduct, he recovered again, without shewing any regard to his treaty; and, leaving a sufficient number of troops to secure the frontiers, marched back into Italy. As soon as the Roman army was withdrawn, Sapor and Cyriades renewed their incursions; and the latter, growing stronger than ever, began in all respects to be treated as an emperor. Indeed the Roman affairs were in such miserable confusion, that many, who would otherwise have opposed Cyriades, were now glad to be sheltered under his protection. At length, however, things began to take a new turn. Valerian, though he was seventy years old when he was advanced to the empire, yet spared he no pains to reduce all the numerous provinces thereof to a proper degree of obedience. While he was thus employed, first in the west, and then in the north, Sapor, with a numerous army, broke into the Roman territories, burnt and pillaged the country; and at length advancing as far as Edessa, besieged it [h] Trebell. Pol. in hist. trigint tyran. [i] Herodian. hist. l. vii. Jul. Capitolin de vita Gordian. tert. Zosim. hist. A. C. 243 Zonar. hist. A C. 244.

in

in form, one Demoſthenes, who commanded therein, making a gallant reſiſtance [k].

Valerian no ſooner received advice of this, than he poſted with the troops about his perſon to its relief. His approach gave new ſpirits to the diſtreſſed inhabitants of the Roman provinces, and diſpoſed them to take all the neceſſary ſteps for compelling the Perſians to retire into their own dominions. The ſoldiers of Cyriades mutinied againſt him, put him to death, and declared for Valerian. Sapor, however, confiding in the ſtrength of his army, continued ſtill before Edeſſa, in the neighbourhood whereof an action happened, in which Valerian was taken priſoner, whether by his own temerity, or the treachery of one of his commanders, cannot be well determined. This gave a mortal wound to the Roman affairs in the eaſt, where Sapor gained continual advantages, and uſed his fortune with an inſolence not to be endured. This at length drove the people to deſpair; ſo that, firſt under the command of Calliſtus, afterwards under that of Odenatus, prince of Palmyrene, they took arms, and not only protected themſelves from any further inſults, but alſo under the command of the laſt-mentioned general, defeated the Perſian, and took part of his baggage, with all his concubines, which determined him to retire into his own dominions. In his march he is ſaid to have made uſe of the bodies of his unfortunate priſoners to fill up the hollow roads, and to facilitate the paſſages of his carriages over ſuch rivers as lay in his way. On his return into Perſia he was ſolicited by the kings of the Caduceans, Armenians, Bactrians, and other nations, to ſet the emperor Valerian at liberty, but to no purpoſe. On the contrary he uſed him the worſe, treated him daily with indignities, ſet his foot upon his neck when he mounted his horſe, and, as ſome writers ſay, after ſeveral years confinement cauſed him to be be flay'd alive [l] (D).

Takes the emperor Valerian priſoner.

FROM

[k] JUL. CAPITOLIN. in vita Gordian. TREBELL. POL. hiſt. trigint. tyran. ZONAR. hiſt A. C. 253. ZOSIM. hiſt. A.C. 252. [l] TREBELL. POL. in vita Valerian. AGATH. SCHOL. l iv. p. 133. GREGOR. ABUL PHAR. dynaſt. vii. p. 128.

(D) There is nothing more confuſed, nothing for which it is more difficult to account, than the manner by which Valerian fell into the hands of Sapor, and his treatment afterwards. Trebellius Pollio, who wrote the life of this emperor, expreſſes himſelf doubtfully as to the conduct of Marcianus, whether it was treacherous, or unfortunate only; but, as to the emperor himſelf, he is poſitive, that, after he was made priſoner, Sapor made uſe of him as a Treats him inhumanly, and is ever after unfortunate.

From this time forwards the affairs of Sapor wore but an indifferent aspect. Odenatus, flushed with victory at the head of a gallant army, and cloathed with the character of president over the Roman provinces in the east, bridled the Persians, and made them frequent visits in their own territories. Twice this general advanced as far as the city of Ctesiphon, seated on the banks of the Tigris, all the countries between Palmyra and that river being under his obedience. On his death his wife, the celebrated Zenobia, continued to oppose the Persians, and with success, till she was conquered and made prisoner by the emperor Aurelian, who vindicated the honour of the Romans on this side, and took ample vengeance for the ill treatment of Valerian. Much spoil, many prisoners, and one of the king's chariots, Aurelian carried with footstool when he mounted his horse. The same writer hath preserved three letters; one from king Belsotus; another from Balenus king of the Caduci; and a third from Artabazes king of Armenia, to the Persian monarch, in favour of Valerian, who, he says, died in his captivity at a very advanced age (10). Zonarus affirms, that however Valerian was taken, whether fighting in his own defence, or voluntarily yielding himself up, he was afterwards treated with the utmost indignity. He likewise says, that he was carried into the heart of Persia, and was so unhappy as to be an eye-witness of the massacring the Romans, in order to fill up the hollow ways with their carcasses; and this, says he, was the end of Valerian (11). Zosimus relates things more particularly. He informs us, that Valerian, finding his army much weakened by sickness, and distrusting the fidelity of most of his officers, endeavoured first to negotiate, and then to buy a peace from Sapor: who, refusing to treat with any but the emperor, he imprudently went to confer with him, attended only by his ordinary guards, and so was surprized, put into chains, and carried away prisoner into the inland parts of Persia, where he died of extreme old age (12). Agathias asserts, that Valerian was not only treated with the utmost ignominy, after he was made prisoner by Sapor, but that at length he ordered him to be flay'd alive; which was accordingly performed (13). Cedrenus says, that Valerian, with twenty thousand men, were made prisoners by Sapor at the battle of Cæsarea; and that his skin being pulled over his ears, he died in miserable torture (14). To cite more authors would be tedious, as well as to no purpose; for we do not pretend to ascertain any fact, but to shew, that the death of Valerian is very uncertain; and this we have already sufficiently done.

(10) Invita Valerian. (11) Hist. A. C. 259. (12) Hist. A. C 259, 260. (13) Agath. Scholast. l. iv. p. 133. (14) Hist. comp. p. 104.

him

him into Italy, and with them graced his triumph at Rome[k]. Sapores, however, continued to inlarge his dominions at the expence of his barbarous neighbours, and having reigned, with great variety of fortune, thirty one years, died, and left the kingdom to his son. An eastern writer informs us, that Aurelian made peace with Sapores, and gave him his daughter in marriage, in whose train were two Greek physicians, who first brought the writings of Hippocrates into the east[l]. In the reign of this monarch flourished, according to the same writer, the famous heretic Manes, whose opinions so long disturbed the church[m] (E).

Hormisdas

[k] TREBELL. POL. in vita Gallien. Odenat. & Saturn. [l] GREGOR. ABUL PHAR. dynast vii. p. 138. [m] AGATH. SCHOL. l. iv p. 134. FLAV. VOPISC. in vita Aurelian. GREGOR. ABUL PHAR. dynast 7. p. 130.

(E) The ecclesiastical historians are not agreed at what time Manes flourished However, as Cedrenus (15), who wrote his compend of histories from good memoirs, places him under the reign of Sapor, we may as well speak of him here as any-where else. Concerning him and his doctrines we are told in general, that one Terebinthus, an arch heretic, having fled out of Palestine into Persia, and being there received into the house of a widow, took the name of Buda, pretended to have been born of a virgin, to have been brought up in the mountains, and to have received a command to teach men a new religion, or at least new notions in religion. He being either killed by the people, or by an evil spirit that he conversed with in this woman's house, left behind him in her hands four treatises, containing the sum of his doctrines. This woman having bought a slave called Cabricus, when a boy of seven years old, caused him to be carefully educated, and, when she died, left him all she had. By this means the writings of Terebinthus or Buda coming into his hands, he read, considered them, and resolved to pass for somebody as well as his master. The first thing he did, was to change his name from Cabricus to Manes; then he began to propagate his opinions, which were taken principally from the writings of Zoroaster and the Gnostics. Part of the scriptures he rejected, part he retained; but magnified his own writings above all. He asserted two principles, the one good, and the other evil. He spoke respectfully of Jesus Christ, yet denied that he suffered, and rose again, affirming that the Jews crucified a phantom. He gave himself sometimes out for the Messiah, at others for the Comforter. He chose twelve apostles, and seventy two disciples, who discharged their offices faithfully, spreading his notions far and wide,

(15) Idem, p. 259.

Hormisdas Year of Christ, 273.

Hormisdas succeeded Sapores, of whom we have little to say. It was during his reign that the Palmyrenians were fooliſh enough to take arms again, in order to free themſelves from the Romans, or rather, as other parts of the Roman empire had done, to aſſert a right of making emperors. They caſt their eyes on one Antiochus, whom they arrayed in purple, and ſaluted emperor; but Aurelian did not leave them long at liberty to carry on this ſcheme He returned with his victorious army, reduced Palmyra, and dyed the cloaths of his ſoldiers, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, in the blood of its inhabitants. As for Antiochus, he took no notice of him at all. And for Hormiſdas, he had not interfered, and therefore Aurelian did not trouble his country; he had the good fortune conſequently to die in peace, after having ſat on the throne a year and ten days [n].

Varanes I. Year of Christ, 274.

Varanes the firſt ſucceeded him. Of him we know very little more than that he reigned three years, during which ſpace we find not that he enterprized any thing againſt the Romans, or they againſt him. In truth, the empire was at this time in a very indifferent condition; for, after the death of Aurelian, the Roman forces in Syria and Meſopotamia were very unquiet. At length Saturninus ſet himſelf up for em-wide, ſome of them penetrating into China (16). As for Manes himſelf, he was, according to the manner of thoſe times, a perſon of conſiderable learning; for he drew a map of the world, and wrote a treatiſe of its uſe. He likewiſe compoſed a large book of enigmatical figures, which, he pretended, contained a ſeries of revelations to the end of the world (17). In the end he is ſaid to have loſt himſelf in that whirlpool which ſwallows up moſt impoſtors, the affectation of working of miracles. He would needs undertake to cure the king of Perſia's ſon, who laboured under a mortal diſeaſe; but he failed in his attempt, the young prince died, and he was impriſoned. He made his eſcape afterwards, and for ſome time wandered about, and was concealed by his diſciples. At length he was apprehended by the king of Perſia's officers, and, as ſome ſay, was crucified by the order of Sapor, though, as others affirm, he was flay'd alive (18). However, his opinions did not periſh with him; for his ſect flouriſhed afterwards in Perſia, and was encouraged by ſome of its kings.

[n] Agath. Schol. hiſt. l. iv. p. 134. Flav. Vopisc. in vita Aurelian. Zosim. hiſt. A. C. 274.

(16) Epiphan. hær. 6. Auguſt. hær. 46. Theodoret. lib. hær. fab. 10. Gregor Abul-Phar. dinaſt vii p. 130. 17) Herbelot. Artic. Ettenk. Giagraſiah. (18) Cedren. compend. p. 260. Gregor. Abul-Phar. ubi ſupra.

percr,

peror, but with no great good luck; yet as he was a man of probity, and an excellent commander, he kept the Perſians within their limits; ſo that the prince, of whom we are ſpeaking, never had any opportunity of exerting himſelf [o].

Varanes the ſecond aſcended the throne on the death of the former king of the ſame name. He had at firſt ſome thoughts of invading the Roman provinces; but he quickly found, that the ſtate of things was changed; for, on the firſt motion of his troops, the emperor Probus advanced in perſon into the eaſt. Upon this Varanes deſiſted from his enterprize, and, hearing of the emperor's great ſucceſs, ordered Narſes, who commanded for him in Armenia, to ſend deputies to compliment Probus, to make him preſents, and to treat of peace. The emperor received them very haughtily, refuſed the preſents they brought him, and wrote an anſwer to the letter of Narſes to this purpoſe: That all he had was his; that he wondered how he could ſend him ſuch trifles: wherefore, to him, who might perhaps eſteem them, he had ſent them back, as well knowing how to have all that he poſſeſſed, when the Romans ſhould deſire it. However, he granted them peace at this time, and terrified them ſo much with his power, that the Perſians were afraid to make their uſual excurſions for ſome time [p]. At length Varanes took heart, and began to think of recovering ſome of the provinces which his anceſtors had loſt; but, before he was able to do any thing, he found himſelf diſturbed by domeſtic ſeditions; and, before theſe were calmed, Probus aſſembling a great army, began his march towards the eaſt. Varanes conceived himſelf delivered from this misfortune, when he heard that the army, in a ſedition, had killed the emperor; but he was miſtaken, for Carus his ſucceſſor, after ſubduing ſeveral barbarous nations, ſhortly after entered Meſopotamia, and carrying all before him, advanced beyond Cteſiphon, as if he intended an abſolute conqueſt of that province. The fears of the Perſians were, however, ſoon over; for the emperor Carus died in the firſt march he afterwards made, either by an illneſs under which he had long laboured, or by his tent's being ſet on fire by lightning. What was ſtill more happy for the Perſians was a notion, the Romans took from thence, that fate had aſſigned Cteſiphon for the bounds of their empire, which they were never never to paſs but to their hurt (F). Soon after Numerianus, the ſon of Carus, was alſo ſlain; and the Roman army, under the command of Dioclesian, returned into Italy. Varanes gained hereby ſome reſpite, which he employed in ſtrengthening his frontiers; but when, on the news of the diſturbances

Varanes II. Year of Chriſt 277

[o] AGATH. SCHOLAST. ubi ſupra. FLAV. VOPISC. in vita Saturnin. GREGOR. ABUL-PHAR. dynaſt. vii. p. 134. [p] FLAV. VOPISC. in vita Prob. EUTROP. hiſt. Rom. l. ix. M. A. CASSIODOR. chron. xxxi.

(F) There is nothing ſo valuable in an hiſtorian as truth, and yet there is nothing more frequently wanting. We generally eſteem thoſe authors moſt, who lived neareſt the times of which they wrote; and yet we are as often deceived by them as by any others. A deſire of praiſing immoderately thoſe of whom they write, too often influences hiſtorians to repreſent things otherwiſe than they apprehended them Vopiſcus, in his life of the emperor Carus, affects a great deal of candour and impartiality, eſpecially in reſpect to the death of that emperor, which had been generally ſuppoſed ominous to the empire. He expired in his camp before Cteſiphon, blaſted, as the report went, by lightning; whence it was inferred, that the Romans ſhould never penetrate farther than this city. It was built by the Parthians on the eaſt bank of the Tigris, and was a very populous place; and beſides, the country beyond it was quite unknown to the Romans, as well as very improper for their manner of making war, which probably gave birth to this opinion. However, Vopiſcus was reſolved to deſtroy it, in order to which he produces a letter from Calphurnius, ſecretary to Carus, wherein he gives a very ambiguous account of that emperor's death. He ſays it happened after the greateſt clap of thunder which was heard during the ſtorm; that his ſervants, for grief, ſet fire to his tent, which occaſioned the report that he was burnt by lightning; whereas, according to the beſt account this writer could get, he died of his ſickneſs. Vopiſcus then mentions the notion that Cteſiphon was fatal to the Roman empire, and that the death of Carus was thought a judgment for attempting to paſs farther. But, ſays he, let cowardice make uſe of ſuch art to cover it; the brave will ever deſpiſe them. The moſt excellent Cæſar Maximian will never believe this; but, on the contrary, will attempt and finiſh the conqueſt of the Perſians, and penetrate beyond them (18) Would it not have been better, if, inſtead of this flouriſh, he had told us, that, immediately after the death of Carus, his army, under the command of his ſon Numerianus, was attacked and beaten by the Perſians, and thereby forced to retire into the Roman provinces again (19)? Yet he ſays nothing of this, either here, or in the life of Numerianus (20), whom ſome writers affirm to have been taken and put to death by the Perſians after their victory (21).

(18) In vita Car. (19) Zonar. hiſt. A. C. 283. (20) Flav. Vopiſc. in vita Numerian. (21) Gregor. Abul. Phar. dynaſt. 7. p. 112 which had happened in the Roman empire, he began to think of invading its provinces, Diocleſian ſuddenly returned into Armenia with a great body of forces, and thereby ſtruck ſuch a terror into the Perſians, that they were afraid to undertake any thing. A little after died Varanes, after an unfortunate reign of ſeventeen years, leaving the kingdom to his ſon [q].

which

Varanes the third reigned no more than four months. He is dignified by hiſtorians with the title of Seganſaa. Agathias hath given us the reaſon of this appellation. He tells us, that it was the cuſtom of the Perſian monarchs to incorporate the nations they ſubdued into the body of their ſubjects, not by removing them hither or thither, but by allowing them to live, as formerly, under their own laws, themſelves adding to their titles that which the antient princes of the country bore. Varanes the ſecond having, a little before his death, overcome this nation, his ſon took the title of Seganſaa or Seganſhâh, which, Agathias expreſly tells us, ſignified king of the Segani or Segeſtani [r]. Varanes III. Year of Chriſt 294.

Narſes ſucceeded next, a prince of high ſpirit, who deſigned, no leſs than Artaxares, the founder of the new Perſian monarchy, had done, the reduction of all the Perſian provinces, held at this time either by the barbarous nations, or conquered by the Romans. It is certain, that never did a fairer opportunity offer for the execution of this vaſt deſign, than at the entrance of this prince's reign. The Roman empire was in ſuch diſtraction, that tho' there were two emperors, yet they found the weight too heavy for them, and therefore created two Cæſars to ſhare the burden of government. War was kindled in every corner of the empire, when Narſes, with a great army, broke into Meſopotamia, and in a ſhort time recovered moſt of the places which had been heretofore in the hands of his anceſtors. But it was not long before Diocleſian ſent Galerius, one of the Cæſars, with a numerous army, to Antioch, to check the progreſs of the Perſian. Narſes did not decline an engagement; but his ſucceſs was not equal to his courage, either in this, or in a ſecond battle. Galerius being conqueror in both, paſſed the river Tigris, and advanced into the very heart of the king of Perſia's dominions. Narſes tho' he retired continually, yet kept a ſtrict eye upon the enemy, beſeeching his own troops Narſes. Year of Chriſt 294.

[q] FLAV. VOPISC. in vit. Prob. & Car. ZONAR. hiſt A C. 283. SEXT. AUREL. VICTOR. in Car. AGATH. SCHOLAST. p. 134. GREGOR. ABUL-PHAR. dynaſt. 7. p. 132. [r] AGATH. SCHOLAST. l. iv. p. 135.

not to look upon his conduct as timorous, but to be assured, that he would take an opportunity of vindicating their honour, and revenging the loss he had sustained. He was as good as his word; for Galerius, elated with success, abating of his usual care and circumspection, Narses took advantage thereof, and falling upon the Roman army while they were upon their march, gave them so total a defeat, that scarce any remains of them could be afterwards drawn together. Galerius himself with much ado escaped, and making haste to the army of Diocletian, prepared to give the emperor the best account he could of his misfortune. Diocletian used him but very indifferently, shewed a high dislike of his conduct, and in a manner refused to trust him with another army. At length, however, the zealous importunities of Galerius prevailed, and, levies being made with all possible expedition, he was sent with fresh forces against Narses. The Persian king had, in this interval, made the best use of his victory, retrieving not only the cities and country which he had lost, but also bringing into the field a numerous army, composed especially of chosen horse, to maintain the conquests he had made, in case the Romans should once more dispute them[r].

Constrained to submit to the Romans.

Galerius acted now as Narses had before; he added prudence to fortitude, and depended no less on his own conduct, than on the courage of his forces. He went with a few of his friends to view the Persian army, and having happily performed this exploit, he returned to his own, which he disposed in such a manner, as to attack the Persians at unawares, whereby he gained a complete victory. Narses himself was wounded, and forced to fly with a small remnant of his army into the mountains. His baggage, treasure, papers, all fell into the hands of Galerius, as did likewise his sisters, his queen, his concubines, and children. In vain he endeavoured to repair his misfortune; the spirits of his subjects were effectually damped by this blow, insomuch, that he found it impossible to collect another army capable of taking the field against the victorious Romans, who were shortly after joined by Diocletian and his army, who, at the time of the engagement lay encamped at Antioch, in order to have sustained Galerius, in case any thing amiss had befallen him. Overcome therefore with the reflection of his misfortunes, Narses, to rid himself of these troublesome neighbours, consented to give up five of his provinces; on which condition peace was granted him, and his queen reſtored; but as for his ſiſters, his concubines, and the other perſons of quality, who were taken in the battle, they were carried to Rome, and there led in triumph. The grief of this broke the heart of Narſes, when he had enjoyed the regal dignity about ſeven years [t].

[r] Zonar. hist. A. C. 297. Eutrop. hist. Rom. l. ix. Agath. Scholast. ubi supra.

tion

HE was ſucceeded by Miſdates, otherwiſe called Hormiſdas the ſecond; who wore the diadem ſeven years and five months, but without doing any thing remarkable. As he was long in a declining condition, and had no iſſue, the nobility of Perſia were under the utmoſt concern for the conſequences of his deceaſe, without a ſucceſſor declared. At length it appeared, that the queen was with child; upon which a council of the magi was ſummoned, and they were required to inform the nobles whether the queen was with child of a ſon or a daughter. The magi anſwered, Of a ſon. Hereupon the diadem was placed upon the queen's great belly, and all the nobility ſwore allegiance on the faith of the foregoing prediction to the ſon ſhe ſhould bear. The king dying in the interim, the public peace was preſerved by this expedient; and at the end of nine months the queen was delivered of a ſon, who was a king before he was born [u]. This was Miſdates or Hormiſdas. Year of Chriſt 301.

Sapores, or Sapor the ſecond, who governed the dominions of his anceſtors long and happily. The account we have given in the laſt reign is ſtrongly controverted, and it muſt be allowed, that there are more teſtimonies alledged againſt it than can be urged in its ſupport. Yet we have given it the preference, for a reaſon which will appear at the bottom of the page, and which we are perſuaded, will induce our readers to be of the ſame mind (G). This prince, if we Sapor II. Year of Chriſt 308.

[t] M. A. CASSIODOR. chron. XXXiii. CEDREN. hiſt. compend. p. 268. GREGOR. ABUL-PHAR. dynaſt vii. p. 132. ZONAR. EUTROP. AGATH. ubi ſupra. [u] AGATH. SCHOLAST. lib. iv. p. 134.

(G) There are ſeveral paſſages in the writings of Ammianus Marcellinus (22), Zoſimus (23), Socrates (24), and other writers, which ſeem to intimate, that Sapor was not a poſthumous child, but born in his father's life-time, and educated by his direction. They alſo ſpeak of one Hormiſdas, who fled to the emperor Conſtantine, as if we may credit an eccleſiaſtical hiſtorian, was educated under the care of an eunuch named Uztazades, who was ſecretly a he had been brother to this prince. Now, if theſe facts were true, it would follow, that what is above related muſt be falſe. But if it be conſidered firſt, that the relations found in theſe authors are ſo worded, as that they may be made to ſuit with either fact: That, ſecondly, there is nothing expreſly ſaid of the manner in which Sapor came to the crown And that, thirdly, theſe writers appear to be frequently very indifferently inſtructed as to the hiſtory of Perſia, and ſcarce at all acquainted with its religion: We muſt confeſs, that no great ſtreſs can be laid on what they deliver, much leſs on what is inferred from their accounts. On the other hand, what Agathias relates, he had from the Perſian records, and the Perſian records are the beſt evidence for Perſian affairs (25). But beſides, there is another reaſon which ſo ſtrongly corroborates what Agathias tells us, that one can ſcarce entertain any doubt of the truth of the fact mentioned by Agathias. Sapor ſucceeded in the Perſian throne about the ſame time that Conſtantine became emperor, and he reigned ſeventy years. In the fifteenth year of his reign, Hormiſdas retired into the Roman dominions. Now, if Hormiſdas had been the brother of Sapor, and had been a man before the death of his father, we muſt conceive that Sapor was within a few years as old as he, otherwiſe he could not have been his rival. But this would ſtretch the life of Sapor to an incredible extent, and would alſo involve us in new difficulties. It is therefore better to acknowledge Agathias's account, which concurs exactly with the moſt remarkable events recorded by other hiſtorians. As to the ſtory of Hormiſdas, it runs thus; he is ſaid to have been a prince of the blood-royal of Perſia, and that coming in when his father celebrated his birth-day feaſt, he obſerved that the nobility did not riſe to ſalute him. Upon which he threatened, that if ever he came to the crown, he would treat them as Marſyas the Phrygian was treated Moſt of the Perſian lords knew not what to make of this; but one of them told the reſt the ſtory of Marſyas, who, for contending with Apollo, was by him flayed alive. This irritated them ſo much againſt the prince Hormiſdas, that they not only excluded him from the ſucceſſion, but cauſed him alſo to be cloſely impriſoned, whence, however, he eſcaped by the contrivance of his wife; and flying to the emperor Conſtantine met with a favourable reception, which he very well deſerved, by the diligence and fidelity which he manifeſted on all occaſions in the ſervice of the Romans (26). There is certainly a ſtrong air of fable in the firſt part of this narration; for that a Perſian prince ſhould

(22) Hiſt. lib. xvii. xviii, xix. (23) Hiſt. lib. ii (24) Hiſt. eccleſ. lib. ii.

(25) De reb. geſt. Juſtian. lib. iv. p. 134. (26) Zoſim. hiſt. lib. ii. A. C. 324.

be a chriſtian. Whoever had the care of his education, certain it is, that he became a very great prince, if we may beſtow that character on one who was no very good man. He was a zealous aſſerter of the dignity of the Perſian diadem, and purſued ſteadily that deſign which Artaxares had firſt ſet on foot, viz. of uniting all the territories of the antient Perſian kings under his obedience. But he did not purſue this deſign, as ſome of his predeceſſors had done, openly, and at the head of armies: if he had, in all probability he would not have been more fortunate than they; for the Perſian militia were by no means able to combat the regular forces of the Romans. This prudent monarch took quite different meaſures; he encouraged the barbarous people dwelling on the frontiers of the Roman provinces to ravage and harraſs them; this he did more openly, when the affairs of the Romans were in confuſion, and with greater ſecrecy, when they were better eſtabliſhed. He extended his own dominions towards the eaſt, and towards the north; he encreaſed his revenues, by encouraging induſtry and trade among his ſubjects; he diſciplined his forces, and above all things affected a mighty eſteem and veneration for the civil and religious conſtitution of his country *.

Perſecutes the chriſtians in his dominions.

THIS laſt-mentioned diſpoſition induced him to perſecute the chriſtians, who were repreſented to him, by the magi and the Jews ſettled in his dominions, as men of deteſtable principles, bad ſubjects to their governors, and avowed enemies of religion; that is, of its fundamental articles. It is ſaid, that he put Simeon biſhop of Cteſiphon, and many other eccleſiaſtics, to death, and that he even cut off the head of the be acquainted with the ſtory of Apollo and Marſyas, muſt appear ſtrange, if not incredible. Again, that ſo raſh and cruel a prince ſhould, in getting out of priſon, leave all his ill qualities behind him, and come a perfect wit and hero (for ſo theſe writers paint him afterwards) to the court of Conſtantine 27); this ſurely is very wonderful alſo; and therefore ſtripping off theſe marvellous appendages, if we credit the bare matter of fact, that Hormiſdas, a prince of the blood-royal of Perſia, fled to the Romans, and behaved well in their ſervice; it will anſwer all reaſonable purpoſes, and the current of our hiſtory receive no interruption.

* AMMIAN. MARCEL. lib. xvii. EUSEB. in vit. Conſtant. SOZOMEN. hiſt. eccleſ. lib ii.

(27) Zonar. hiſt. A. C. 340.

eunuch

eunuch before-mentioned, notwithstanding he had been his governor, and his father's old and faithful servant. One great crime objected to the christians was, their regard for Constantine, then emperor of Rome. His power was too great for Sapores to think as yet of attacking him openly; he therefore sent a solemn embassy to Constantinople to compliment that prince, and to renew that peace which had for so many years subsisted between the two empires, directing his ministers privately to inquire into the strength of the Romans, and to buy up a quantity of arms, of which his subjects stood in great need. The emperor, though well informed of the design of Sapores, received his ministers very graciously, granted their requests, and at their return charged them with a letter for the king of Persia their master. Of this letter there are two copies extant, the one more full and correct than the other. The intent of the epistle was to persuade Sapores to treat the christians with greater lenity. The arguments made use of therein are just and natural, delivered in language becoming the writer, and him to whom it was addressed (H). In all probability, it had its effects; for we are informed by an impartial author, that Sapores treated the christians afterwards with less severity. Indeed, he had never troubled them at all

(H) Sozomen hath given us a long account of the cruel persecution raised against the Persian christians by Sapor; but even this writer intimates, that the whole was not only excited, but managed also, by the magi. Those who are desirous of entering farther into this matter, may find in the works of this historian a very copious account, not only of the general persecution, but of the principal martyrs, their quality, and behaviour (28). Eusebius, in his life of Constantine, affords us a concise view of the persecution; but then, he gives us the letter of the emperor at large; whereas Sozomen gives us only an extract of it. In this letter the emperor first gives a short account of his faith, then of his success and grandeur, which he attributes wholly to God's blessing thereon; he afterwards expatiates on the odious folly of idolatry; but without insinuating any thing of his suspicion that Sapor was an idolater. He then very pathetically represents the miseries which had constantly attended unjust and cruel princes, especially persecutors, of whom he particularizes Valerian; whom he asserts to have been happy in all his undertakings, until he persecuted the christians. Lastly, he warmly recommends the christians in his dominions to the favour of Sapor, and beseeches him for his sake to look upon them as his good and faithful subjects (29).

(28) Hist. eccles. lib. ii. c. 9, 10, 11, 12. (29) In vit. Constant.

if

if he had not been inſtigated by ſome malicious prieſts of his own religion, and the indiſcretions perhaps of ſome chriſtian prieſts.

HOWEVER, he abandoned not the ſcheme he had formed of raiſing himſelf and his ſucceſſors to the ſupreme dominion over the eaſt. When he thought he had brought things to bear, he generouſly acquainted Conſtantine with his intention, tranſmitting to him by his embaſſadors a letter, or rather a manifeſto, wherein he expreſly ſet forth his claim to all the dominions antiently belonging to the Perſian emperors, affirming, that the river Strymon was the legal boundary of his empire. Conſtantine returned him an anſwer, full of dignity and reſolution; and though he was now grown in years, made great preparations for war, aſſembled a numerous army, and reſolved to command it in perſon. When the ſeaſon of the year approached, he joined his forces, and immediately began his march for the eaſtern provinces; but providence prevented his deſign from taking effect, by removing him out of this life, ſo that together with his empire, he left the management of this Perſian war to his ſucceſſors [y]. Sapores did not fail to make uſe of the advantages afforded him by the diſorders which happened in the empire on the death of Conſtantine. He inſtantly entered the Roman provinces, and reannexed to his own dominions what his anceſtors had loſt. It is a very difficult thing to give any account of this war from the Greek and Latin hiſtorians, notwithſtanding the writings of many who lived in thoſe days have come down to our hands, by reaſon of their evident partiality, ſome commending the emperor Conſtans, as a very martial prince, others upbraiding him with puſillanimity, both endeavouring rather to ſuit hiſtory to their own opinions, than to the truth. By making proper allowances, however, for the viſible biaſſes of theſe writers, the truth ſeems to have been, that in pitched battles, and in defending of towns, the Romans were ſuperior to the Perſians; but that in ſwift marches, horſe-combats, and ſurprizes, the Perſians had the advantage.

Reſolves on a war with the Romans.

HENCE it came to paſs, that altho' Sapores reconquered large tracts of country, and was ſucceſsful in many engagements; yet could he not prevail againſt Niſibis, the ſtrongeſt fortreſs the Romans had in thoſe parts, tho' he often beſieged it, and exerted his utmoſt force, in order to deliver his ſub-

Which proves tedious and bloody.

[y] ZONAR. hiſt. A. C. 337. ZOSIM. hiſt. lib. ii. A. C. 338. EUTROP. lib. x. AMM. MARCEL. EUSEB. Sozom. ubi ſupra.

jects

jects from a thorn that continually pricked them; but he was constantly defeated, and constrained after great losses to rise from before it. As to the circumspection of the emperor Constans, when in the field, it might very probably be owing to the situation of those countries, which were the seat of war. In a plain country, such as Mesopotamia, the emperor was forced to act with great circumspection, because the enemy had all advantages, their cavalry having room to extend themselves, to retire, and come back to the charge, which in a mountainous situation they could not have done. We need not wonder therefore, that the Romans were backward in fighting, and more solicitous about fortifying their camps than seeking the enemy. In the battle of Singara, which was fought in the night, Sapores had at first the advantage by reason of the surprize the Romans were under; but when they had recovered themselves a little, they repulsed the enemy so briskly, that in the end Sapores was forced to retire, after having lost his son in the battle, and received a dangerous wound himself. Both parties were in the end tired out with the war; the Roman emperor therefore leaving the care of the eastern provinces to Gallus, whom he had lately created Cæsar, returned into the western provinces of his empire, while Sapores, who perceived that little was now to be got from the Romans, turned his arms upon his eastern neighbours, and left the care of his frontiers towards the Romans to his most experienced generals. In his expeditions against the Barbarians, he was more fortunate than against the Romans. Some he subdued by force, others readily yielded him obedience; with his most powerful and inveterate enemies he made a solid and lasting peace. In the midst of this success, he received advice that overtures had been made to his generals in the west for the conclusion of a peace. To shew therefore his readiness in this point, he dispatched one Narses, a nobleman of great credit in his court, to carry his letters to Constans, with the terms on which he was content to enter on a treaty. This minister proceeded to Sirmium, in order to have an interview with Constans; there he presented him with the letters of the Persian king written in the usual strain of the Persian monarchs, i. e. in a lofty swelling style. The purport was, that notwithstanding Sapor knew himself to have a just claim to all the countries between Persia and the river Strymon, yet he was content for the sake of peace to be satisfied with Mesopotamia and Armenia; which once yielded up, he would willingly become the friend of the Romans. Narses perceiving how ill his master's letter was taken, endeavoured all that in him lay to pacify the Romans, and to obtain from the emperor an account of his demands, with which Conſtans readily complied. He named on his ſide embaſſadors, who were to go to Sapor, and who were charged with letters, importing that, while himſelf was poſſeſſed of but a part of the Roman empire, he had notwithſtanding maintained its antient boundary in the eaſt; and that now being maſter of the whole, it was not reaſonable to expect that he ſhould yield to ſuch conditions as had been propoſed. The Roman embaſſadors found the king of Perſia at Cteſiphon, where they had many conferences with him and his miniſters, though to very little purpoſe, for the Perſian would remit nothing; however, time was gained, in which Conſtans came firſt to Conſtantinople, and then prepared to ſet out for the eaſt [y].

peror

ABOUT this time one Antoninus, an officer of great credit in the Roman army, being perſecuted by ſome of the emperor's favourites, fled to Sapor, by whom he was received with open arms, treated with the utmoſt kindneſs, and immediately admitted into the higheſt confidence. In the mean time, the emperor had been prevailed upon to remove Urſicinus, who was general of the horſe in the eaſt, and to give his command to Sabinian, a very old man, who thought himſelf very cautious, but was by others eſteemedtimid, and moſt unfit for ſupreme command. Antoninus quickly gave the Perſian notice of the incapacity of the Roman general, who thereupon determined, with the numerous army under his command, immediately to enter the Roman provinces, and to advance as faſt as poſſible without embarraſſing himſelf with ſieges, or attempting to divide his forces, in order to gariſon towns. Accordingly, he paſſed the Tigris, and marched with all imaginable diligence towards the Euphrates, intending, if poſſible, to penetrate into Syria, hoping to pillage that fruitful country, which had enjoyed ſo many years peace [z]. But Urſicinus, who was returned again into the eaſt with the title of general of the foot, prevented him by throwing up works on the ſide of the river, and poſting himſelf with his troops behind them. Sapor then, by the advice of Antoninus, turned to the left; and before it was expected, inveſted the city of Amida. In the neighbourhood of this place he took ſeveral ſtrong caſtles, and in one of them a conſiderable number of chriſtian virgins, who had dedicated themſelves to the ſervice of God. The Perſian treated them not only with humanity, but with the utmoſt politeneſs, being deſirous to ſhew that proſperity ſoften-

Antoninus deſerts, and Sapor renews the war.

[y] ZONAR. hiſt. A. C. 350 ZOSIM. hiſt. lib ii. A C 352 AMMIAN. MARCEL. lib. xviii. EUTROP. lib x. [z] AMMIAN. MARCEL. lib. xviii. c. 5.

ed his disposition, instead of rendering him arrogant. Amida made a long defence, and the siege thereof is said to have cost Sapor thirty thousand men. It was at last, however, taken by storm after a siege of seventy three days. The principal officers of the garison he hanged, the men he sent into slavery, after which he put an end to the campaign on this side; he entered, however, afterwards Mesopotamia, where he took the town of Singara, and ruined it; he then attacked Bezabda, and after a siege of some days, took it, and fortified it; then he advanced to Virta, which he likewise invested; but, after a siege of some continuance, was obliged to retire. The emperor Constans in the mean time passed the Euphrates, and came to Amida, over the ruins of which he is said to have wept; he then advanced, in hopes of regaining the places taken by Sapor, and proceeded to besiege Bezabda, but to no purpose; for the rainy season, and a scarcity of provision, obliged him to raise his siege, and return into Syria, where he continued all the winter [a] (I).

Sapor,

[a] Ammian. Marcel. lib. xx. Eutrop. lib. x. Zonaras, A. C. 355. Zosim. hist. lib. iii. Sozomen. hist. eccles. lib. iv.

(I) It would have been very easy to have rendered this part of our history more particular and more entertaining than it is, if there had not been two very cogent arguments offered by the very nature of the work to keep us here much within bounds. For first, as all the accounts we have come from Latin and Greek authors, they especially regard the conduct of the eastern emperors, their ministers and generals, and consequently belong rather to the Constantinopolitan than Persian history. Secondly, they agree so little among themselves, and yet are all of them so partial to their own countrymen, that should we relate exactly what those writers are pleased to say of the Persians, we should rather deceive than inform our readers, as too many historians do. There was a necessity of making these observations, that the nature of this part of our history might be well understood. We have herein stuck close to facts, without scrupulously reporting circumstances, because the latter have frequently appeared to us improbable, or at least violently exaggerated. Ammianus Marcellinus is the author on whom we have principally depended in the history of this reign. He was a man of quality, a soldier, and one who actually served in this very war, of which he writes. Besides all this, he was a native of Antioch, and therefore perfectly well acquainted with the seat of the war. However, as he was a Pagan, he lessens all the christian emperors, that his hero Julian may appear with the greater lustre; and as he was a Roman, he exaggerates the barbarity

Sapor, in the beginning of the next spring, drew together a great army, and made a shew of entering the Roman provinces immediately, which compelled the emperor Constans to prepare also to take the field. As he had by this time not only a very great body of forces, but those too the very best in the empire, his great excellence lying in an exact knowledge of military discipline, in all probability the war would have been both bloody and lasting, if it had not been prevented by the military prudence of the Persian, to whom when an account was brought of the Roman preparations, he instantly determined to put strong garisons into his frontiers, and then to withdraw the remainder of of his forces; which he accordingly did. The Roman emperor perceiving, that, without a peace, the war was at an end, did the like on his side; and having given directions for fortifying the places which were most in danger, he resolved to march away immediately against Julian, who had taken the title of Augustus, and had given just grounds to suspect he aimed at the empire [b].

His prudence saves his forces.

IN this march the emperor fell sick and died; whereby Julian was raised to be absolute lord of the Roman empire, the whole forces of which he intended to make use of in order to destroy the Persians; that is, to break their force so effectually, as that it should be impossible for them ever to trouble

His dominions invaded by the emperor Julian.

[b] AMMIAN MARCEL. l. xxi. EUTROP. ubi supra. ZOSIM. ubi supra. SOZOMEN. hist. eccl. l. v. CEDREN. hist. comp. p. 113.

rity and want of discipline among the Persian troops, who yet held the Romans at bay, and made very long sieges, which tumultuary armies never do (30). Zosimus is by far more outrageous than Marcellinus He was so bigotted a heathen, that he will not allow Constantine the Great to have done the least thing worthy of that title. He censures him for withdrawing the garisons from the frontiers of the empire, and insinuates, that by this means the Persians ravaged the Roman provinces with impunity (31). The christian writers, on the other hand, magnify all the actions of Constantine (32). In such a situation we could do no more than assemble the matters of fact relating to Persia, and deliver them in a plain style, and in their natural order; for had we entered into the comparing of authors and weighing authorities, we should have exceeded all bounds, and, after all, perhaps wasted our time to no great purpose.

(30) Hist. rer. gest. sub. imp Constant. Julian. Jovian &c. (31) Hist l. ii. prop fin. (32) Euseb. in vit. Constant Zonar. hist. Rom. Sozomen. hist. eccles &c.

more the Roman provinces. Full of this great project, he did every thing which might conciliate the minds of the soldiers, raise his own reputation, or by any means contribute to facilitate his enterprize; in which he succeeded so well, that the army discovered an unusual alacrity, and readily followed him into the dominions of Sapor, who contented himself with acting on the defensive, having no hopes at all of defeating the Romans in a pitched battle under so martial a prince. In this expedition Hormisdas the Persian commanded the left wing of the Roman army, and by his advice it was that the emperor regulated most of his designs. As long as he did this, success attended his arms; some strong places he took by force, others yielded through fear; but most were given up to him by treachery. At length he besieged Ctesiphon, which had been the bulwark of the Parthian empire, but without success; for it was well fortified, and had a numerous garison. Here it was that the Romans began to discover how puissant an enemy they had to deal with [c].

Whom he destroys, by drawing him too far into his country.

The Persians skirmished with him every day; the country on all sides was burnt and destroyed, insomuch, that it appeared impracticable to hope any further advantages on this side. Julian therefore resolved to repass the Tigris, on which he had a fleet of transports laden with provisions. A Persian of quality deserting to him assured him, that the method he took would be equally prejudicial to his fame and to his affairs; that hitherto he might be justly styled the conqueror of the Persians, and that he might still better deserve this title, if he would follow his advice; which was, to quit the side of the river, to burn his fleet, and to march through a broad open road, into which he promised to conduct him, where, after three or four days march, he would find an end put to all the difficulties, which he either actually struggled with, or even apprehended. Hormisdas, when the emperor consulted him upon this project, told him plainly, That it was impracticable, and that he would be undone if he pursued it. Julian, however, was inflexible; he ordered his soldiers to furnish themselves with twenty days provisions, and having so done he commanded the fleet to be set on fire, maugre all the solicitations of his friends, who, while it was yet in a flame, convinced him that he was betrayed; whereupon he ordered the Persian nobleman and his attendants to be put to the torture. This was executed upon the servants; but as for their

[c] Eutrop. l. x. Ammian. Marcel. l. xxiii. Zonar. A. C. 303. Socrat. hist. eccles. l. iii. Cedren. hist. comp. p. 307. Zosim. l. iii.

their lord, he was fled. It served only to increase the emperor's disquiet; for the men readily acknowledged, that they came on purpose to mislead him. Orders were then given to save as many of the vessels as was possible, which, however, were but a few; and then, as if he had perfectly lost his senses, Julian threw himself and his army into that road, which had been pointed out to him by his enemies. For three or four days they met with little or no interruption; but afterwards Sapor, with the whole force of Persia, coasted them in their march, and at the beginning of the night continually set upon their rear guard. The weather proving intensely hot, water scarce, and provisions failing, Julian saw plainly that his obstinacy had brought him into difficulties almost unsurmountable. He still continued to bear up against them with great constancy, and the soldiers, encouraged by his example, repulsed the Persians with great slaughter, as often as they attacked them. At length, on the twenty fifth of June in the evening, a mighty cloud of dust arose, occasioned by the advance of the greater part of the Persian horse. On this occasion the Persian noblemen gave full testimony of their valour, making such an impression on the left wing of the Roman army, as obliged the emperor to repair thither in person; whither he was no sooner come, than he received in his body an arrow, whether from the enemy, or from one of his own soldiers, could never be known, of which wound he died the next night. This threw his army into a terrible consternation, notwithstanding they had been victorious in the fight the day before, slain many thousand Persians, and amongst them fifty persons of quality [d].

Sapor, as soon as he was informed of the emperor's death, made proclamation that he would give a great reward to the man by whose hand he fell; which, however, was never claimed. At the same time, to shew his desire of peace, he sent deputies to Jovian, who had succeeded Julian. In four days a peace was concluded, whereby the five provinces in dispute were for ever yielded to the Persians, together with the strong fortress of Nisibis, which had so long been the bulwark of the empire. As soon as the treaty was concluded, Sapor furnished the Romans, for their money, with provisions, and also gave and received hostages for the due performance of the treaty; which was exactly executed, tho' with much reluctancy, by the Romans; yet of the mighty army led by Julian into Persia, scarce a tenth part returned, and even these perhaps had never returned, but by the favour of this peace, which they so much decried [c] (K).

Makes an advantageous peace with the Romans.

[d] AMMIAN. MARCEL. l xxiv, xxv. CEDREN. hist. comp p. 308. ZONAR. ubi supra. GREGOR. AB. l. PHAR. dynast- vii p 140. ZOSIM l. iii. A. C 363.

4V

During

[c] Ammian. Marcel. ubi supra. Socrat. hist. eccles. l. iii. Cedren. hist. comp. p. 308. Eutrop. l. x. Agath. Scholast. p. 136.

(K) The various accounts which are given by different authors of the death of the emperor Julian, belong to the Constantinopolitan history; and therefore we have but just touched upon this subject here. Ammianus Marcellinus and Zosimus afford the highest commendations to their hero Julian, on account of his penetrating farther into the Persian territories than any of his predecessors. The last-mentioned of these authors carries his eulogy so far, as to pretend that Julian conquered the greatest part of the Persian empire; than which nothing can be falser, or more ridiculous. Almost all the Greek historians agree in blaming Jovian for the peace he made; and on this account they degrade him far below his predecessor It may not be amiss to take this opportunity of setting in a true light a point, which hath so generally, and so long, been misunderstood. Julian was, without question, a very gallant man and an excellent soldier; but he was as certainly no general, since there is scarce a maxim in the art of war, against which he did not expressly act in this Persian expedition. All the Roman generals, who had suffered themselves to be dazzled with the reputation of conquering the Persians, had perished in their fooliſh attempts; for, from Crassus to Carus, no Roman had ever penetrated the Persian dominions, but to his own dishonour; and therefore there could be nothing more contrary to reason, than Julian's pushing forwards as he did. Again, he acted without any certain view; he marched he knew not where; he sought he knew not what; he took for guides he knew not whom; he burnt a fleet, when of all things it was most necessary to him; he sacrificed his soldiers, in making them pass rivers almost unpassable in themselves, and in the sight of an enemy perfectly acquainted with the country. In one word, there were five large provinces in dispute: Julian, if he had taken cool and proper measures, might have disposed things so as to have secured them for ever to the Romans; but instead of doing this, he did the single thing he should not have done; he quitted the antient Roman method of making war, to take up that of the Persians; and by engaging Sapor in his own way, and in his own country, sacrificed a numerous and victorious army. But if Julian was not, Sapor certainly was, a general; he managed

(22) Zosim. hist Rom. l. iii. Ammian. Marcel l. xxvi. Agath. Scholast. l. iv. p. 136.

DURING the rest which so advantageous a treaty afforded to the Persians, their monarch neglected no opportunity of settling effectually the bounds of his empire towards Tartary and India. This took him up some time, and served also to exercise his soldiers; but after the death of Jovian the Roman emperor, when the affairs of that people were again disordered, Sapor did not fail to make a new irruption, in breach, as the Latin writers say, of the peace subsisting between the two empires. The issue of this war is no less obscure than its commencement. All we know of it is, that at the beginning, Sapor had great advantages in Armenia, having slain Arsaces, who then reigned in that country, where he also reduced a large territory under his obedience; but, on the arrival of Arinthius, he was constrained to abandon a great part of his conquests. However, being intent on aggrandizing the Persian dominions on this side, he still remained in arms, and transferred the imperial seat to Ctesiphon, the old capital of the Parthian empire, that he might be always at hand to improve such opportunities as might offer (L). It does not, however, managed the war as it ought to have been managed; he retired that he might conquer; and when he had conquered, he thought of nothing but making an advantageous peace. In this he shewed himself a wise king, a great captain, and an able statesman The eloquence of the Greek writers will everlastingly do justice to the military virtues of Julian, and the christian piety of his successor. As we are now writing the Persian history, we thought it but justice to vindicate the character of a Persian monarch, by a short recapitulation of facts, which is all that is intended by this note.

Turns his arms against other enemies.

(L) Ammianus Marcellinus hath given a pretty large account of this Armenian war, wherein he charges the king of Persia with breach of faith to the Romans, and with excessive cruelty and treachery towards the Armenians. He says, that he took advantage of that confusion which overspread the Roman affairs, after the death of the emperor Jovian, to fall upon the Armenians, first by slight incursions, quickly after more openly and with greater force; that in the progress of the war, he, on some pretence or other, prevailed on Arsaces king of Armenia to admit of a personal conference with him; at which he seized him, and instantly caused his eyes to be put out, and himself to be cruelly beaten with silver rods; and a short time afterwards ordered him to be crucified, laying then siege to the capital of Armenia, where the queen, the king's sons, and treasures were; that the Armenians, in this distress, had recourse to the emperor Valentinian, who sent to their assistance Arbitio, with an army which obliged Sapor to retire, tho' he exclaimed however, appear, that, after this time, he gained any great victory; and all we know farther is, that in the beginning of the reign of Gratian, this restless and ambitious monarch ended his days, after having reigned seventy years, or, as some say, seventy two, with great variety of fortune [f].

Artaxerxes. Year of Christ, 380.

To Sapor succeeded Artaxerxes; but who he was is a question. Some writers are positive that he was the son of his predecessor; others are no less positive that he was his brother. Those who will have him to be son of Sapor, give us this account of the matter: They say, that Sapor had four sons, Hormisdas, Adarnasses, and Narses, by great princesses; this Artaxerxes by a lady of exquisite beauty, but of no distinguished family. Hormisdas, by going over to the Romans, forfeited his right to the crown, and so Adarnasses came to be considered as his heir; but this prince threw away his title to the kingdom, by displaying his own unworthiness to possess it; for the inhabitants of Mesopotamia having presented to king Sapor a tent of camels skins, curiously painted, and inriched with gold, the king gave it to his son, and afterwards claimed against it as a breach of the peace (34). It is easy enough to see that this account is perplexed, and altogether favourable to the Romans; but it is not easy to unravel it, or, at this distance of time, to point out all the misrepresentations contained therein. We know, however, that they are not wanting, and that the true ground of the war was this: Julian, when he made his irruption into Persia, compelled Arsaces king of Armenia to attend him with all the forces he could raise, tho' he would not accept the assistance of other princes. This he did, because Arsaces was a christian, and he had a mind to harrass him and his subjects. When Sapor came to treat with Jovian, he excluded the Armenians, intending to revenge himself upon them for the assistance they had given Julian; so that the war was not altogether without pretence, any more than the complaint of the Romans assisting them, since they could not do this according to the letter of their treaty with the Persians. Some time after, when Valentinian suspected Para, who succeeded his father Arsaces, he, by fraud, got him into his hands, and, after very ill usage, caused him to be cruelly put to death; which fact was highly resented by Sapor. Henceforward the peace was ill observed on both sides; and, on the whole, it is most evident, that Sapor did not employ either fraud or force more unjustly than the Romans, with whom he had to deal, tho' the authors of that nation are not always ready to acknowledge as much.

[f] Agath. Scholast. ubi supra. Cedren. ibid. p. 312. Zosim. l. iv. Paul. Diacon. l. xi. Ammian. Marcel. l. xxvii.

(34) Ammian. Marcel. l. xxvii. Socrat. l. iii.

asking

asking him how he liked it; The thing, replied he, is well enough; but when I come to be king, I will have a tent of the skins of men. His actions corresponded so exactly with this barbarous expression, that it was judged proper to set him aside. Narses had the misfortune to offend the king, who therefore disinherited him, whereby the crown came to this Artaxerxes, who least thought of it; a most romantic and incredible tale! But the other opinion, that Artaxerxes was not the son, but the brother, of Sapor, is not at all the more probable, as making the foregoing story inconsistent and unintelligible; we ought therefore to suppose he was his kinsman only. However, our European historians tell us nothing more concerning this prince, than that he maintained the peace with the Romans, and governed his dominions quietly four years [g] (M).

To

[g] AGATH. SCHOLAST. l. iv. p. 137 ZONAR. A. C. 340. GREGOR. ABUL-PHAR. dynast. vii. p. 143.

(M) In this note we are to render a reason for our departing in the text from all authorities, in making the successor of Sapor neither his brother nor his son, but his kinsman only; and this we shall do as briefly as is consistent with the readers satisfaction. For, first, we will shew, that he could not be the brother of Sapor; secondly, we will shew, that he could not be his son; and, thirdly, we will reconcile our conjecture to history. If this Artaxerxes had been the brother of Sapor, he must have been older, or younger; if older, why was he not king before him? or how came so cunning and so cruel a prince, as the Romans make Sapor to be, to spare an elder brother during a reign of seventy years? Younger he could not be, since Sapor himself was a posthumous son (35). If he had been the son of Sapor, then, the historian says, he had three elder brothers, of whom Hormisdas escaped to the Romans, in the twenty fourth year of the reign of Sapor, and he was the second son; how then could this be, especially if, as the Greek historians say, Hormisdas was married? It remains, that we account for the expression of Agathias, who expressly affirms Artaxerxes to have been the brother of Sapor; for we have set the credit of Agathias too high to be unhinged by a slight criticism. We say then, that Agathias, writing after the Persian records, retained the word brother, which the Persians, as other oriental nations do, used only in a large sense; and therefore this does not contradict, but confirm, our conjecture, that Artaxerxes was the near kinsman of Sapor, and no more. The reason of our introducing this notion into our text was, the desire we had to make the history clear, plain, and consistent, which this account does. As to the story of the tent, we

(35) Agath. Scholast. l. iv.

Sapor III. Year of Christ, 385.

To him succeeded his son Sapor, the third of that name, who reigned five years; but what he did in that space, we find not in any Greek author, probably because, adhering to the peace made with his grandfather, he troubled not the Roman empire, then governed by Theodosius the Great [h].

Varanes IV. Year of Christ, 390

Varanes, or, as the Greeks write it, Vararanes, the fourth of that name, succeeded his father Sapor. He is also known by the surname of Cerma Saa, of which we have little or no account as to its meaning. Elsewhere, however, this difficulty will be cleared up, and the title shewn to be Kerman Shâh, which province of Kerman was in his reign added to the Persian empire. He also maintained the peace with the Romans, being otherwise employed; and therefore the Greek historians say very little of him, any more than of his predecessors, tho' he reigned eleven years [i].

Isdigertes. Year of Christ, 401.

Isdigertes succeeded Varanes, a monarch deservedly renowned for his many great virtues. He was cotemporary with Arcadius emperor of the east, with whom he lived not only in terms of peace, but of friendship; insomuch, that at his death the emperor Arcadius declared him protector of his son Theodosius the second, and of the Roman empire. Of this when Isdigertes was informed, he sent Antiochus, one of his eunuchs, a person of great wisdom and experience, to take care of his pupil's education, and by him declared to the senate of Constantinople, that he would turn the whole force of the Persian monarchy upon whomsoever should attempt to disturb the young prince's administration, whereby the empire was preserved, during a minority, in perfect quiet. As the young Theodosius grew up, the ties of friendship became stronger between the two empires, and embassies find it in Zonaras (36), as we found the story of Marsyas in Zosimus (37; and we take them both for fictions. Truth is always uniform, and therefore, as far as these stories are consistent with each other, and with common sense, we acknowledge them to be true; but, where they differ from these, we crave leave to differ from them. In all probability the fact was, that the family of Hormisdas settled at Constantinople, and that Artaxerxes was the next of the blood royal resident in Persia, and in a capacity of succeeding to the crown; for, as we shall see hereafter, the Persians were not scrupulous in setting aside young children.

[h] Agath. Scholast. ubi supra. Gregor. Abul-Phar. ubi supra. [i] Agath. Scholast. ubi supra. Gregor. Abul Phar. dynast. vii. p. 146.

(36) A. C. 340. (37) Lib. ii, iii.

were were more frequent than in former times (N). Amongst other ministers whom Theodosius made use of, Marathas, a (N) This fact is doubted of by Agathias, and he assures us, was not doubted of by him only, but by many of the learned in his time; the reason of which, he says, was the silence of cotemporary authors, and the story's being traced no higher than the writings of Procopius (38). We have, however, made no doubt of inserting this as a fact in our text, and we hope to give the reader satisfaction for so doing in this note. As to Procopius, if he was alone, he would be an inconteſtable witness; for he did not live at any great distance, neither was he one who reported things upon trust. We find this in the introduction to his history, and he says expressly, that Arcadius's will was sent to Isdigertes, and that the nomination of this prince to the tutelage of young Theodosius preserved the empire in peace (39). All the Greek writers own, that, in the space of twenty one years, which this Persian king reigned, he never attempted any thing against the Romans; but, on the contrary, lived with Theodosius in the strictest amity all his days, which seems to be a strong presumption in favour of this account. Zonaras, in his history, relates this fact without the least sign of diffidence or suspicion (40). Cedrenus doth the same with this additional circumstance, that the emperor Arcadius bequeathed the Persian king a great sum of money for his trouble (41). As to Antiochus, all authors agree, that he was the first governor of Theodosius, and that, for a time, the empire was swayed by his counsels (42). The reason Agathias doubted the fact, seems to be his zeal for the Roman glory, which, he thought, was tarnished by the choice Arcadius made of a barbarian for the tutor of his son. Procopius informs us, that it was the high reputation of Isdigertes for wisdom and probity, which induced Arcadius to make choice of him; and for this he commends him (43). Yet Agathias himself yields a higher compliment to Isdigertes than Procopius; for if, without being his tutor, that monarch abstained from any attempts upon his dominions, merely because Theodosius was a child, he was one of the most generous princes that ever lived, and deserved the confidence of all the princes his cotemporaries. The truth seems to be, that Procopius, as a man of business, a courtier, and a soldier, was free from prejudice; whereas Agathias, who was a downright scholar, and lived in an age when it was fashionable to hate the Persians, could not let a story so much to their honour pass, without intimating a doubt about it (44).

(38) Agath Scholast. l. iv. p. 136. (39) Procop. de bell. Pers. l i. c. 2. p. 8. (40) A. C. 423. (41) Hist. comp. p. 3[illegible]. (42) Sozomen. hist. eccles. l ix. Evagr. hist eccl. l i. Cedren. ubi supra. (43) Procop ubi supra. (44) Agath. Scholast. ubi supra.

Meſopotamian biſhop, was one, a perſon equally remarkable for the innocence of his life, and for the winning pleaſantry of his converſation. His ſtay in Perſia quite altered the ſtate of the chriſtian church in that country; for whereas before they were looked upon not only as heretics, but as very bad ſubjects, on account of their inclination to the Roman emperors, who were of their own religion, Marathas ſo fully informed him of the true doctrines of the chriſtian faith, that he began to entertain juſt ideas of the innocency and loyalty of its profeſſors. This alarmed the Perſian prieſts, and they inſtantly began to form ſchemes for the deſtruction of ſo wiſe and good a man. He had, it ſeems, by his prayers cured the king of a fixed and inveterate head-ach, which induced that monarch to reverence him greatly, and for his ſake his religion, without forſaking, however, his own. To drive the biſhop from court, and to revive in the king's mind his antient diſlike to the chriſtians, the Perſian magi contrived a very whimſical expedient, which yet had well nigh effected their purpoſe, ridiculous as it was. They let down a man into a pit behind the ſacred fire in the king's oratory, and having covered the perſon placed therein with carpets, they directed him, when the king came to worſhip, to ſpeak the following words in a ſhrill voice; Impious and ungrateful prince, I will chaſe thee from thy throne, if thou baniſh not that chriſtian, whom thou believeſt to be acceptable to God. Iſdigertes was mightily ſurprized when he firſt heard this; but more ſo, when he heard it conſtantly repeated as often as he went to his devotions. At length he determined to ſend back Marathas, but with the utmoſt civility, as well in reſpect to his maſter as to himſelf; but when he came to break it to the biſhop, that prelate penetrated the contrivance, and adviſed the king, when he next heard the voice, to order certain perſons to dig in the place whence it came. Iſdigertes did ſo; the man was diſcovered, the fraud detected, and the magi decimated. The king moreover granted hereupon free leave to the chriſtians to build churches throughout his dominions, where-ever they thought fit, and freed them in all reſpects from the penal laws enacted againſt them by his predeceſſors [k].

Chriſtians highly favoured by him.

Marathas returned after this to Conſtantinople, and was employed a ſecond time in an embaſſy to Perſia. The magi, hearing of his coming, had recourſe to new frauds; but the king eaſily ſaw through theſe without aſſiſtance. They were therefore ſo far from preventing his giving a favourable reception to the biſhop, that they engaged him to treat this prelate with ſtill greater marks of favour than he had given him before. Marathas had not been long in Perſia before a new opportunity offered for raiſing his credit with the king. The prince of Perſia was thought to be poſſeſſed. This pious prelate, aſſiſted by Abdas, whom he had conſecrated biſhop in Perſia, joined their prayers to God for the prince's recovery; which ſoon after happened, to the joy of the whole court, and to the honour of the chriſtian religion. Iſdigertes governed in the whole twenty one years, and, during that ſpace, lived in perfect peace and friendſhip with the Romans, as alſo with the chriſtians in his own dominions, whom he treated not only with lenity, but indulgence [1].

[k] Socrat. hiſt. eccleſ. l. vii. c. 8

ception

Varanes, or Vararanes the fifth, ſucceeded his father Iſdigertes, and ſeems, notwithſtanding what the Greek writers affirm, to have had, in his own diſpoſition, a great tenderneſs for the chriſtians. He had not, however, been long upon the throne, before he found himſelf provoked to ſuch a degree, as conſtrained him to lay aſide all indulgence, and openly to perſecute them. Thus it came to paſs: Abdas the Perſian prelate, in a high and unwarrantable fit of zeal, burnt a fire-temple to the ground. The king ſent for him, and, having a great reſpect for his perſon, reproved him gently, and adviſed him to rebuild it; which he abſolutely refuſed to do. The chriſtian writers univerſally condemn the raſhneſs of the firſt act, and the prelate's conſtancy in the ſecond. However, the magi reſented this matter ſo warmly, and, by their clamour, ſo incenſed the people, that the king was obliged to proceed to extremities, to order all the chriſtian churches to be demoliſhed, and to put the biſhop Abdas to death. After this a furious perſecution began on the old ſuppoſition, that ſuch as differ in religion from their prince cannot be loyal to his government. As for perſons of quality, they were deprived of their places, had their eſtates confiſcated, but were indulged in life and liberty, in hopes of their coming over. Hormiſdas, a man deſcended of the antient race of Achemenes, after being ſtripped of his fortune, was reduced to keep camels for his bread. Another nobleman had his wife taken from him, and given to his ſlave; but theſe methods wrought no converſions. The meaner ſort of people were ſtill in a worſe way; they were delivered over to the mercy of the prieſts, and conſequently were Varanes V. Year of Chriſt, 421.

[1] AGATH. SCHOLAST. l. iv. p. 137. PAUL. DIACON. l. xvi. GREGOR. ABUL-PHAR. dynaſt. vii p. 140.

ſubjected

ſubjected to an inexpreſſible variety of deaths and torments [m].

War breaks out with the Romans.

These things quickly occaſioned differences to ariſe between the Perſian and Roman monarchs, eſpecially as reaſons of ſtate concurred with theſe religious jars. Theodoſius, in the days of Iſdigertes, had lent a certain number of miners, who were to be employed in working anew ſome ſilver and gold mines, which had been long neglected in Perſia. Theſe miners Varanes refuſed to ſend home; and therefore as well on this account, as becauſe multitudes of chriſtians fled out of Perſia into the dominions of Theodoſius, both parties began to prepare for war. The king of Perſia made choice of one Narſes for his general, and ſent him to his frontiers, where he expected to have found a numerous army; but he was miſtaken; the troops were not come to the place of rendezvous; and, before they could be aſſembled, the Roman general Ardaburius marching through Armenia, fell into Azazene, a Perſian province, and began to waſte it with fire and ſword. Narſes no ſooner received this news, than he inſtantly marched to give him battle with the forces he had about him. The conſequence was, that the Perſian was worſted; but, being an able captain, made a good retreat. He ſaw, that it was now impoſſible to prevent the deſtruction of Azazene by force; and therefore, returning back to the place of rendezvous, whither by this time the Perſian troops were come, he, at the head of a very numerous army, made an irruption into Meſopotamia, a Roman province, which obliged the Roman general quickly to return, and as quickly to block up Niſibis, the principal fortreſs which the Perſians had on that ſide. Narſes finding himſelf diſappointed, for he conceived that the Romans would immediately have given him battle a ſecond time, reſolved, if it was poſſible, to provoke them to fight. With this view he ſent a meſſage to Ardaburius, telling him, That if he would appoint a day, he would be ready to meet him in the field. But Ardaburius wiſely anſwered, That the Romans fought when they pleaſed themſelves, and not when their enemies thought it for their advantage. Varanes, in the mean time, had ſollicited the Saracens to break with the Romans; and they very readily complied, their captain Alamundarus being naturally an enemy to the Romans. This man, having raiſed a prodigious army, promiſed the Perſian king to perform wonders, at leaſt to reduce Antioch and Syria under his power; neither me in-

[m] Theodoret. hiſt eccleſ. l. v. c. 39. Socrat. hiſt eccleſ. l. vii. c. 20. Evagr. l. i. c. 19.

meant he to perform leſs than he promiſed, for, paſſing the Euphrates, he broke, like a torrent, into the Roman province; but beginning to plunder without mercy, the people recovered their ſpirits, and, joining the Roman army, fell upon Alamundarus in his march, and cut to pieces a hundred thouſand men, which forced the remainder of the Saracens to fly with ſhame into their own country. When this news reached the ear of the Perſian monarch, with this further circumſtance, that Niſibis was ſo cloſely preſſed, that it could not long hold out, he determined to put all things to the riſque, and to march to the relief of that city with the whole force of Perſia. This reſolution once taken, Varanes inſtantly put it in execution, directing all his troops in the frontier provinces to rendezvous at a certain time, and marched immediately with an army he had collected from the nine provinces of Perſia, together with his elephants, that his preſence might influence all the neceſſary preparations. His deſign ſucceeded perfectly well; for by that time he entered Meſopotamia, all his generals were arrived; ſo that he advanced towards Niſibis with a prodigious army. The Romans, hearing of his approach, the number of elephants he brought with him, and his mighty ſtrength in cavalry, were ſeized with a ſudden panic, and, without ſtaying for his coming, raiſed the ſiege, and fled. This was highly pleaſing to Varanes, who, thinking now the worſt was over, retired to his capital, and left his generals to manage the war. Herein he acted incautiouſly and unhappily; for the Romans recovering their ſpirits, defeated the Perſians in a pitched battle, repulſed the Saracens a ſecond time, and, under the command of Ardaburius, beat the Perſian forces, with the ſlaughter not only of a great number of men, but of ſeven generals. However, Varanes continued the war, and being himſelf a prince of great firmneſs and much military ſkill, he found means to make even victories diſadvantageous to the Romans; for, by keeping a court on the frontiers, repairing his armies by conſtant ſupplies, and preſerving his magazines in good order, he kept the enemy ſtill on the defenſive; and as they found it difficult to recruit, all actions that were bloody were favourable to the Perſians, tho' they were beaten. The emperor Theodoſius, perfectly ſenſible of the ſituation of things, ſent Helion, a perſon of great diſtinction, with a large body of troops, to reinforce his army, directing him to enter into a negotiation with Varanes, and to conclude a peace, if poſſible. Helion purſuing his inſtructions, and finding the Roman army intrenched, ſent Maximin, the collegue of Ardaburius, to offer Varanes peace, on certain conditions.

Varanes,

Varanes, ordered Maximin to be conducted to the tent of one of his principal officers, and, in the mean time, held a council of war, wherein it was resolved immediately to attack the Romans in their camp; and, in case they were repulsed, to accept the terms offered by Maximin. There was in the Persian army a corps of troops, distinguished by the title of immortal, because their number was continually kept up to ten thousand men, by draughts out of other corps. This body of troops took upon themselves this dangerous piece of service, which, however, they reckoned would prove the less so, if they could take the Romans unprovided. In order to this they divided themselves, and while five thousand attacked the intrenchments, the other five thousand formed behind a hill, waiting there for an opportunity to attack the Romans in flank. But their enterprize miscarried; for Procopius, a Roman general, observing the troops that were formed behind the hill, marched round with a great body of forces, and getting between them and those who attacked the Roman camp, charged them on all sides with incredible fury; so that the victory was quickly determined on the side of the Romans, with a prodigious slaughter of the Persian soldiery. Varanes then condescended to hear Maximin; and when that officer had explained to him his master's demands, he told him, That, for his sake, he would be content to make peace on those terms, and put an end to the severities exercised upon the christians. An accident, however, happened, which carried this matter much farther, and contributed more than the peace between the two empires to the re-establishment of christianity in Persia. It was this: When the province of Azazene was ravaged by the Romans in the beginning of the war, seven thousand Persians were brought prisoners to the city of Amida, where they fell into extreme want. Acases, bishop of that place, having assembled his clergy, represented to them in the most pathetic terms the misery of these unhappy prisoners. He then observed, that as the Almighty preferred mercy to sacrifice, so he would certainly be better pleased with the relief of these his creatures, than with being served in gold and silver vessels in their churches. The clergy entertained this motion not only with readiness, but with applause, sold all the consecrated vessels, and having maintained the Persians during the war, sent the whole seven thousand home, at the conclusion of the peace, with money in their pockets. Varanes was so much astonished at this, that he sent to invite the bishop to his capital, where he received him with the utmost reverence, and did the christians many favour-favours at his request. After this, Varanes enjoyed peace as long as he lived; and, having reigned twenty years, died, beloved and honoured by his subjects [n].

To Varanes the fifth succeeded Varanes the sixth, or, as he is called by some authors, Isdigertes. It is not probable, that he ever broke the peace made by his father with the Romans; inasmuch as we meet with nothing concerning him in any of the Greek historians, further than that he was cotemporary with Theodosius the second, and his successor Martianus, and that he reigned seventeen years and four months [o]. Varanes VI. Year of Christ 442.

Perozes succeeded his father Varanes, or Isdigertes. He was a prince of a restless and turbulent spirit, and could not bear that the Hunns, who at this time began to be terrible, as well to his subjects as those of the Constantinopolitan emperors, should incroach, as they daily did, upon his dominions. Those he had to do with were distinguished by the name of Euthalites or white Hunns, and were much more civilized than the rest, as living in cities, and under a certain form of government; which the rest of their nation did not. To rid himself of those neighbours, Perozes marched at the head of a great army, after having carefully settled the affairs of his empire, and done all that in him lay to secure its peace in his absence. Gonza was the capital of the nation he attacked, and lay directly north of Persia. Perozes marched strait thither, hoping to put an end to the war by a general action. But the Euthalites, or Nephalites, as some authors call them, were wiser. They knew that a wasted country was not lost; and therefore retiring continually, they drew Perozes and his army so far into their territories, as to cut off their retreat, and, at the same time, to hinder them from receiving provisions. The distress of the Persians was so great, and the soldiers were so enfeebled and dispirited, that they were constrained to accept any conditions that were offered them. The king of the Euthalites, being informed of their condition, sent to acquaint Perozes, that if he had a mind to deliver himself and his army, he might do it upon these terms, viz. swearing never to invade the Euthalites, and coming to do homage to him as his lord. To the first of these Perozes readily yielded; but the last seemed intolerable. At last the magi, who were about his person, proposed to him an expedient, which removed all difficulties. This expedient was, that he should go pay his compliments to the king of the Euthalites at sun-rising, when his prostrating himself would be under- Perozes. Year of Christ 458.

[n] SOCRAT. hist. eccles. l. vii. c. 17—21. ZONAR. hist Rom. A C. 435. AGATH. hist. l. iv. p. 137. [o] AGATH. ubi supra.

stood by that king as an act of submission; but by himself would be conceived to be no more than an act of reverence to the sun. This expedient was approved and carried instantly into execution. The king of the Euthalites was satisfied, and Peroses, with the remainder of his army, returned back into Persia. As soon as he had a little settled his affairs, and had leisure to look about him, the Persian monarch, unmindful of his oath, provided for a second expedition against the Hunns. He took, however, more prudent measures than before; that is, he not only raised a very numerous army, but he likewise took care to be well furnished with provisions. He also settled his domestic concerns in the best manner possible; and leaving the prince his son regent of the kingdom, he began his march a second time towards the northern frontiers of his empire. The Euthalites supposing, as they very well might, that Peroses would expect to penetrate, as he did before, into the heart of their country, carried off their effects, but concealed their forces behind certain mountains, from whence issuing suddenly on all sides of the Persian army, they totally routed it, and, at their leisure, killed or made prisoners almost all the soldiers of whom it was composed, amongst whom Peroses himself perished, when he had worn the Persian diadem twenty years [P] (O).

When

[P] Procop. de bell. Persic. l. i c. 24. p. 10 Agath. hist. l. iv. p. 138. Cedren. hist. comp. p. 355.

(O) The story of Peroses is related at large by Procopius, in the beginning of his memoirs of the Persian war. He informs us, that, in his first expedition, the Persian monarch carried with him a certain Roman embassador, whose name was Eusebius, a discreet person, and one equally beloved by the king and by his nobility. Him therefore, when the Persian generals had discovered the miserable situation they were in, they made choice of to break the matter to Peroses, that, before it was too late, some method might be taken, to extricate them out of their misfortunes. Eusebius having artfully drawn the king into a discourse of the presence of mind necessary in great distresses, and being desired to speak his mind freely of the state they were now in, he told Peroses this story: A lion once saw a kid tied at a distance, and pressed by hunger, leaped at it with all his force; but, falling short of his prey, he dropped into a pit, which had been prepared for him, and out of which all his force could not deliver him. Peroses easily comprehended the drift of this fable, and, by the advice of his magi, acted as the reader hath been told above. In his second expedition, Peroses wanted such an adviser, otherwise he had not fallen as he did. The enemy,

WHEN the Perſians had received advice of the diſaſtrous death of their king, they made choice of his brother Obalas, or, as he is uſually called by the Greek writers, Valens, not caring to truſt ſo young a perſon as Cavades then was, with the reins of government, tho' his father had left him regent. This Valens proved an excellent prince, tender, compaſſionate, juſt, affable, and deſirous of aſſuaging, as far as he might, the miſery of his country, almoſt wholly ſubjected by the Euthalites, to whom, for two years, he paid tribute, and with whom, for two others, he held war. At length, worn out with cares, he died, after a ſhort and troubleſome reign of four years, the leſs regretted by his ſubjects, on account of his being a man peaceably diſpoſed, and therefore very unfit to reſtore the ancient luſtre of the kingdom [p] (P).

Valens. Year of Chriſt, 482.

Cavades,

[p] CEDREN. hiſt. comp. p. 356. AGATH. hiſt. l. iv. p. 138.

my, it ſeems, having timely notice of his intention, ſpent many months in digging a vaſt ditch in the midſt of a plain, and in removing all the earth which was thrown out of it In the middle they left a narrow neck of land, and having covered this mighty ditch with hurdles, they ſtrewed theſe with mold, and covered them with graſs plots. This done, they drew all their forces, on the approach of Peroſes, into a line of battle before the ditch, and, as the Perſian troops advanced, they drew off in cloſe order croſs the neck of land. The Perſian cavalry following them with great fury, puſhed each other into the ditch, and ſo became a ſacrifice to this incenſed people. Peroſes is ſaid to have had no leſs than thirty ſons grown up to man's eſtate, who all periſhed with him here, Cavades being left at home, on account of his youth, and that the kingdom might be preſerved to the immediate offſpring of Peroſes (45).

(P) There cannot be any thing more perplexed that the accounts given us by the Greek writers of theſe white Hunns, who, for a time, ſo terribly diſtreſſed the Perſians Procopius, who ſpeaks more at large of them than any other writer, calls them Ephthalites, and ſays, they inhabited a country to the north of Perſia. Their chief city, according to him, was Gorgo, on the very frontiers of Perſia (46). Agathias calls theſe people Nephthalites. They are generally agreed to have been the ſame people, who, in other ancient authors, are called Indo-ſcythæ (47). All this will gave the reader but very little, if any, light at all. From

(45) Procop. de bell. Perſic. l. i. c. 3 p. 9. Agath Scholaſt l. iv. p. 137. Cedren hiſt. comp. p 355, 356. (46) De bell. Perſic l. i. c. 3. (47) Agath. Scholaſt l. iv.

Cavades, Year of Chriſt 486.

Cavades, or, as he it frequently called, Cabades, aſcended the throne on the demiſe of his uncle. He was a prince of a high ſpirit; one who loved war, and underſtood it; ready to undertake any thing for the extending of his dominion, and jealous to the laſt degree of his authority, and the glory of the Perſian name. At firſt theſe qualities were extremely uſeful to his ſubjects; for, in all probability, had they not been governed by ſo warlike and enterprizing a prince, theyhad never recovered theirindependency,but had ſunk under the weight of thoſe continual invaſions made upon them by the Euthalites, whom no tribute could content, nor treaties reſtrain. Againſt theſe enemies Cavades ſet himſelf with great reſolution; and, making uſe of the ſame policy which they had done towards his father, drew them, by ſmall bodies, in hopes of plunder, far into his country, and, in their return, cut them off. When, by this means, they were cured of their practice of invading, he turned his arms upon them; but warily, ſuſtaining one body of troops by another, that by a third; wintering ſometimes in their country, till at laſt he quite broke their ſpirits, and obliged them to own him for their ſovereign, whom they thought to have had for their ſubject. This war finiſhed, Cavades, from being terrible to his enemies, became no leſs ſo to his ſubjects. His enterpriſing, reſtleſs genius, incapable of brooking any reſtraints, put him upon altering the conſtitution of his kingdom, and depriving all the nobility of thoſe privileges and prerogatives, which they had enjoyed under his predeceſſors. He likewiſe became intolerably proud, would ſcarce allow any of them to enter his preſence, or adviſe the Oriental hiſtorians we learn, that their true name was Haiathalites, and that they poſſeſſed a large tract of country between the Indies and Perſia, till they began to make incroachments on the country laſt mentioned, after they had made choice of Balkh for their metropolis (48). This is plain and intelligible to every man that is acquainted with the Oriental geography; and we ſhall make the whole hiſtory of this war much more uniform and perſpicious, when we come to ſpeak of it from the memoirs of the Eaſtern writers. At preſent this is ſufficient to demonſtrate the great utility of theſe compariſons, deſpiſed only by ſuch as either cannot, or are unwilling to be at the pains neceſsary to ſuch an undertaking.

(48) Mirkhond. ſect. 31

him

him in his affairs; but acted with ſuch an arbitrary fierceneſs, as would have given a very bad colour to his proceedings, had they been really juſt in themſelves. At length he puſhed his extravagancy ſo far, as to publiſh an edict, whereby all the women in the empire were declared common to all the men therein. This the Perſian nobility thought too much to be endured; and therefore they inſtantly aſſembled, ſeized on the perſon of the king, depoſed him, and caſt him into priſon, ſuppoſing that leſs than this could not ſecure themſelves in ſafety, or the kingdom in peace. This happened after he had reigned eleven years, and appears to have been as total a revolution as ever happened in any kingdom, there being ſcarce any who adhered to the depoſed prince; and thoſe that did were conſtrained to be ſilent, for his ſake, as well as for their own[r].

Zambades, whom ſome call Blaſes, others Lamaſes, and who is by ſome ſaid to have been the ſon, by others the brother, of Peroſes, conſequently the uncle or brother of Cavades, was elected king in his ſtead. The firſt thing the new king did was, to aſſemble a general council of the nobility, in which he deſired they would conſider and determine what ſhould be done with Cavades. The people had before declared, that they conſidered the perſon of their prince as ſacred; however, the council were very much divided, eſpecially when Guſanaſtades, who was poſſeſſed of the higheſt office in the kingdom, drew a little knife out of his pocket, with which he was wont to pare his nails; and when he had made them take notice of the ſmallneſs of its blade, This, ſaid he, properly applied now, will do what twenty thouſand men will not be able to do, if you let this opportunity ſlip. At laſt it was unanimouſly determined, that the king ſhould, for his unworthy adminiſtration of the government, ſuffer perpetual impriſonment, and be for ever forgotten by his people, whoſe allegiance from thenceforwards was to be transferred to Zambades. This prince had indeed all the properties neceſſary to give luſtre to a crown juſtly attained. He was equally wiſe and indulgent, deſirous of reſtoring order, and of making the people happy; he applied himſelf with great induſtry to remedy thoſe evils, which had taken birth from his predeceſſor's conduct and example. But while he was thus employed a new ſtorm aroſe, which, after throwing the whole kingdom into violent convulſi-

Zambades. Year of Chriſt 497.

[r] AGATH. hiſt. lib. iv. p. 139. PROCOP. de bell. Perſic. lib. i. c. 5. p. 16. CEDREN. hiſt. comp. p. 356. THEOPHYLACT. hiſt. p. 19.

ons, ons, at length produced a second revolution. Thus it happened [f].

The deposed king escapes.

The keeper of the castle, in which Cavades was imprisoned, became enamoured of his queen, who alone remained attached to him in all his misfortunes, and who failed not to bring him necessaries with her own hands, though she was not permitted to see him. With much ado, however, she procured leave to write to him, and having acquainted him with the situation of things, Cavades by letter directed her to sooth the passion of his goaler, in order to get admittance to him. This the lady did so effectually, that she had access to her husband when she pleased, and thereby an opportunity of acquainting him that he had still one friend left, who was ready to undertake any thing for his service. The name of this man was Seoses, a person of quality, who had a great number of dependents, among whom he collected a troop fit to attend the king where-ever he should think fit, when he should be once safely out of the castle. The care of this the queen took upon herself; for staying, as she often did, late in the evening, she dressed the king in her cloaths, wherein he went out, and having put on his, remained in his stead. As she pretended to be sick, and not to leave her bed for some days, the cheat was not discovered, so that Cavades had time enough given him to save himself, which he did in the company of Seoses and his friends, who conducted him quite through Persia into the territories of the Euthalites, whose king received him with great honour, and readily granted him his protection. As for the queen, there is nothing said of her fate with certainty; however, historians intimate, that more of resentment than of pity was shewn in the treatment towards her. As for Cavades, the king of the Euthalites entertained him splendidly, treated him as his good friend and ally, and gave him his daughter in marriage. After this the Persian king began to hold correspondence with some of the nobility, and finding or believing he found in his people a propensity to receive him once more as their sovereign, he persuaded his father-in-law to furnish him with an army; and this favour being readily accorded to him, he no sooner saw the troops in a readiness, than he put himself at their head, and marched directly into Persia [t].

Cavades restored. Year of Christ 501.

Cavades entered first into the province, of which Gusanasfades, who had threatened his life, was governor; where he [f] Agath. Procop. Cedren. Theoph. ubi supra.

[t] Procop. de bell. Persic. lib. i. c. 6. Agath. Cedren. ubi supra.

he instantly caused proclamation to be made, that this man, as a rebel,, stood deprived of his charge, and that himself would instantly confer it on him, who should first pay his duty to him on a day assigned. His friends represented to the king, that this was innovating the established laws, which fixed the governments of provinces in certain houses. Cavades, however, affected to remain firm; but at the day conferred the office of governor upon Adergunabades, a young nobleman next of kin to the deprived governor, who, as it was concerted, paid his compliments to him first. After this he proceeded to the capital of Persia, and repossessed himself of the throne, almost as easily as he had been ejected. His conduct upon this extraordinary change in his affairs was suitable to the fierceness of his temper. Zambades he deprived of sight and imprisoned; after he had for four years worn the royal title. Gusanastades he put to death; and that his restoration might be adorned with one act of generosity amidst so much severity, he erected a new office for his friend Seoses, whom he made lieutenant general of his kingdom [u].

IT was not long before the king of the Euthalites pressed his son-in-law to repay the great sums of money he had lent him. Cavades found he had it not in his power to comply with his demand, and therefore desired Anastasius, then emperor of the east, to accommodate him with the sum he wanted, offering to pay interest for it, which was refused. Cavades readily conceiving that there was now no way to avoid breaking with his father-in-law, but by making war upon the Romans, chose this as the lesser evil of the two; and, having a considerable body of forces about him, made a sudden irruption into Armenia, preventing, by the quickness of his march, the very report of his expedition. By this method he answered his purpose; for the inhabitants having no time to withdraw their effects, he raised excessive contributions; after which he besieged Amida, the principal fortress in those parts, in form. As the province had for many years enjoyed a profound peace, the city was wholly unprovided either of garison or of magazines; however, the citizens refused to open their gates, and prepared to make an obstinate defence. Cavades, who delighted in war, and who understood it perfectly well, practised all the methods then in use for reducing Invades the Roman provinces.

[u] PROCOP. de bell. Persic. lib. i. c. 6. p. 19. AGATH. Hist. lib. iv. p. 139. CEDRIN. H. C. p. 336. THEOPHYLACT. lib. iv. p. 100.

fortified

fortified places, but in vain; at length, however, when he and his principal commanders were almoſt in deſpair, a tower was ſurprized by the ſupine negligence of certain monks, on the eightieth day from the commencement of the ſiege. At firſt Cavades ſuffered his ſoldiers to put the inhabitants to the ſword. A citizen thereupon told him, it was unworthy of a hero to put thoſe to death who were unable to reſiſt, Why then, ſaid the king, did you pretend to treat me as an enemy? Becauſe, ſaid the citizen, It was the will of God to deliver Amida, not to your will, but to your valour. Cavades, charmed with this compliment, ordered the citizens to be ſpared. Some time afterwards he reſtored to them their privileges, directed the walls and public buildings to be repaired, and leaving therein Glones, a Perſian nobleman, with a gariſon of a thouſand men, he treated it afterwards rather as a benefactor than a conqueror [x].

Defeats ſeveral Roman generals.

As ſoon as the news of this invaſion reached Rome, the emperor took the neceſſary precautions for aſſembling an army, which was accordingly done; and orders were given them to march to the frontiers with all imaginable expedition. The Greek writers tell us, that there never were better forces ſent againſt the Perſians, than this army was compoſed of, or generals of greater reputation. Cavades on his ſide took the field early, and being informed that the Roman officers differed among themſelves, and had divided their forces into ſeveral independent corps, he reſolved to attack them as ſpeedily as he could. He firſt fell upon Ariobindus, who, on the approach of the Perſians, ſhamefully abandoned his camp, and fled to an adjacent city. Eight hundred Euthalites, who were the forlorn hope of Cavades's army, in their next march fell in with a conſiderable body of Roman troops, commanded by Hypatius, and were by them intirely cut to pieces on the ſide of a river, the ſtream of which they dyed with their blood. It was not long before the Perſian monarch arrived on its banks, where gueſſing by the colour of the water what had happened, he immediately conceived, that he ſhould find the Romans ſecure and unprovided. Whereupon, inſtead of making a halt, he puſhed on with his cavalry; and, as he conjectured, finding the Romans eating, drinking, and waſhing themſelves in the river, he ſeverely revenged the death of his friends, by putting almoſt this whole body of Romans to death without any reſiſtance [y].

[x] Procop. de bell. Perſic. lib. i. c. 7. p. 20. Cedren. H. C. p. 169. [y] Procop. de bell. Perſic. lib. i. c. 8.

Upon

UPON the heels of this victory, he received advice of the Hunns having broken into the northern provinces of his empire; upon which he was obliged to return with his whole army into Persia, whence he happily expelled those barbarous invaders. While Cavades was thus employed, things on the frontiers went not altogether so well, tho' not at all less honourably for the Persians. After the departure of the army, the Romans in several bodies drew nearer to Amida, in order to straighten its garison, and to prevent its receiving provisions. They likewise found means to betray Glones the Persian commander into an ambuscade, wherein himself and two hundred horse were cut to pieces. This was not only a very unfortunate accident for the garison, in point of the loss they sustained of their governor and a fifth part of their forces, but it was also fatal in its consequences, by reason of its restraining them from making any excursions, in order to fill their magazines. The command devolved upon the son of Glones, a young man but an excellent officer, and one who acquired a greater reputation by losing this city, than his master had done by gaining it. After a long blockade, in which, though the Romans did little, the Persians suffered much, being constrained to feed on the vilest and most nauseous things to satisfy their hunger, while the provisions in their magazines remained untouched, in order to serve another purpose, hopes of succour being lost, the governor entered into a treaty with the Romans for the delivery of the city. During this treaty large distributions were made from the magazines; whence the Roman officers conceiving that the besieged had still plenty of provisions, they agreed to let the garison march out, and to carry with them all that they had, giving also to the governor a vast sum of money for surrendering a place, which in a few days must have fallen into their hands, with all that was in it. Some time after a truce for seven years was concluded between the Romans and Persians, and hostages given on both sides for its being duly kept, which afforded Cavades leisure to pursue his wars against the Hunns [2] (Q).

Makes an advantageous peace.

IN

[2] PROCOP. de bell. Persic. lib i. c. 9. p. 38. CEDREN. H. C. p. 170. AGATH. hist. lib. iv. p. 139.

(Q) While Cavades made use of the peace subsisting between him and the Romans to carry on war in his opposite frontier, in order effectually to quell the barbarous nations inhabiting on that side, the Greek writers tell us, that there happened an event, which effectually reconciled this prince to the christians, to whom hitherto he had Propoſes the adoption of his ſon to the emperor.

In theſe he had his uſual ſucceſs; yet all his foreign victories could not ſecure to him peace or tranquillity in his family. He had three ſons, Caoſes Zames, and Choſroes, the laſt of whom he deſigned for his ſucceſſor. Caoſes the eldeſt is ſaid to have been a prince of merit; neither are we told why his father at firſt diſliked him. But ſo it was, that, conceiving againſt him a moſt violent hatred, he reſolved to deprive him of the ſucceſſion. Zames had the misfortune to be blind of an eye, on which account, by the laws of Perſia, he was incapable of reigning. Choſroes very much reſembled his father in temper, fierce, warlike, and ambitious; he was continually contriving great things, and addreſſed himſelf with as much diligence to atchieve them, as with facility he had planned them in his head: On this young prince Cavades repoſed his hopes, and being deſirous to eſtabliſh him in a more glorious ſituation than any of his predeceſſors, he entered into a negotiation with Juſtin, who had ſucceeded Anaſtaſius in the empire, in order to induce him to adopt Choſroes. At firſt this motion was well entertained at Conſtantinople, but by degrees the emperor was perſuaded that it might be injurious to his family and his ſubjects, which determined him againſt it. However, commiſſioners met on both ſides, to treat of a laſting peace, and to ſettle the boundaries of the two empires. For this important buſineſs, Cavades made choice of Seſoſes, whom he had raiſed to the principal offices in his kingdom, and Mebodes, a military officer of great experience. On the other hand, the emperor not only been averſe, but even an open enemy. Of this remarkable event we have the following account. Cavades came with his army before a certain caſtle on the frontiers of India, called Tzudader. This was filled with immenſe riches of all ſorts, and kept by a gariſon, not of men, but of evil ſpirits. Cavades employed to no purpoſe his own magi, the prieſts of the Jews, and other religious perſons, in exorciſing this infernal guard. At length the chriſtian biſhop undertook and effected what the king deſired; for he expelled the dæmons, and delivered the caſtle, with all its riches, to Cavades. Henceforwards the chriſtian biſhops had acceſs to the king, and, when their preſence was neceſſary, were called to council, inſtead of the Jewiſh and Manichean prieſts, who till then had enjoyed his favour. There is ſuch an air of fable in this relation, that we could not think of inſerting it in our text; and yet, as it is to be found in more than one Greek author, we did not think fit to paſs it over in ſilence (49).

(49) Cedren. hiſt. compend. p. 362.

Juſtin.

Juſtin ſent Hypatius, the nephew of his predeceſſor, and Rufinus, a man of great quality. After frequent conferences, diſputes aroſe; and it being propoſed to adopt Choſroes in a new and particular manner as a barbarian, that prince conceived ſuch a diſpleaſure thereat, as induced him to manifeſt an irreconcileable hatred to the Romans. The conferences being broken off, Mebodes, at their return to court, charged Seſoſes with having contributed to the miſcarriage of their negotiation. He was likewiſe accuſed for burying his wife contrary to the law of Perſia, whereby all dead bodies were expoſed to the fowls of the air. On theſe pretences he was tried, and adjudged worthy of death. Cavades expreſſed a mighty ſorrow for his friend, but was grown ſo tender of the laws, that he would not hinder their courſe. In this manner died Seſoſes, and with him that high office, which had been created on purpoſe to gratify his pretenſions [a].

Juſtinian having ſucceeded Juſtin in the empire of the eaſt, Breaks purſued alſo his politics, in cauſing all the frontiers towards with the Perſia to be ſurveyed, the old fortreſſes repaired, and new Romans ones erected, as the ſituation of the country required. With a freſh this view he ſent inſtructions to thoſe who commanded on the frontiers of Meſopotamia to fortify Mindone, the neareſt place in the Roman territories to Niſibis; and a body of troops, under the command of Cutzes and Buzes brothers, were ſent to protect the workmen. The Perſians, who could not look but with an evil eye on the progreſs of this ſtructure, juſt in their neighbourhood, took a proper opportunity, when the Roman forces did not obſerve exact diſcipline, to fall upon them; and, after defeating, cut moſt of them to pieces, together with many of the workmen, demoliſhed the place, and ſent the priſoners into Perſia, where Cavades employed them in his buildings. This ſtroke opened a new war, for the carrying on of which the Perſians took the field with a very numerous army under the command of Peroſes, who had under him ſeveral generals of reputation. On the other hand, Beliſarius had the command of the Roman forces. After ſome preparatory motions, the armies came to a general engagement, in which, after a very obſtinate reſiſtance, the Perſians were defeated with very great ſlaughter. Yet the Romans gained little ground by this victory; for the Perſian generals, being ſupplied with freſh forces, continued to keep the field; only they contented themſelves with light excur-ſions,

[a] PROCOP. de bell Perſic. lib. i. c. 11 p. 30. CEDREN. AGATH. ubi ſupra. EVAGR. lib. iv. c. 12.

sions, and did not pretend to give the Romans battle a second time [b].

Carries on the war with indifferent success.

IN Armenia things went no better; for Mermeroes, who commanded the Persian forces in chief, was twice defeated by Doritheus the Roman general. Two castles, and certain districts dependent upon them, fell also under the power of the Romans, and in these districts were the gold mines belonging to the king of Persia. The Tzani, a free and barbarous people, were the chief occasion of these losses; for they now embraced the party of the Romans, and, in consequence thereof, possessed themselves of the gold which belonged to the Persian king; at which the Romans were not ill pleased, and Cavades was constrained to be content, his forces not being numerous enough to reduce them; besides, his generals, Narses and Aratius, deserted, and, with all their families, and much wealth, retired to Constantinople. This situation of things did not at all discourage Cavades, who, when Rufinus, the Roman embassador, came to treat with him of peace, adhered to his first demands; and when the embassador had his audience of leave, insinuated to him, that if ever he departed from them, it must be in consideration of a large sum of money. To restore the lustre of his arms, he set several new armies on foot, disgraced Peroses, and gave the command of the army, which he intended to send into the Roman territories, to Azarethas, a very valiant man, and who well understood the duty of his charge. This general made an irruption into the country bordering on the Euphrates, and, finding himself superior in force to Belisarius, wasted all before him with fire and sword. The Roman soldiery saw this with indignation, and, notwithstanding the visible disparity of numbers and other disadvantages, clamorously urged Belisarius to give the enemy battle; he declined it as long as he could; but at length, by the near approach of the enemy, and the obstinacy of his own troops, was forced to fight. The Persian general knew exactly the advantages he had, and improved them to the utmost, so that the Romans were defeated with very great slaughter. However, Belisarius, with the remains of his army, so well covered the country, that the Persians were not able to take any place of importance; for which Azarethas on his return to court, notwithstanding his victory, fell into disgrace [c].

[b] PROCOP. de bell. Persic. lib. i c. 13. p. 36. CEDREN. ubi supra EVAGR. lib. IV c. 13. [c] PROCOP. de bell. Persic. lib. i. c. 15 p. 43. EVAGR. ubi supra.

THE

THE war still continued, Mermeroes had the command of the Persian army given him; and as Belisarius was recalled in order to be employed against the Vandals, he found it not so difficult a matter to deal with his successors; for, after deceiving the Roman generals by certain marches and counter-marches, he at last invested the city of Martyropolis, a place of the last importance to the Roman empire, and in sight of their armies carried on the siege in form. Sittas, who commanded for the emperor Justinian, finding that himself and his collegues were able to do little good by force, began with better success to practise some of the frauds of war; for having found a person fit for his purpose, and having thoroughly taught him his lesson, he sent him into the Persian army, where coming privately to Mermeroes, he acquainted him, that the Massagetæ, whom Cavades had hired to fall into the Roman territories, had accepted a sum of money from Justinian, and were on the point of invading Persia. This greatly intimidated Mermeroes, engaged him first to turn his siege into a blockade, and afterwards to consent to a truce with the Romans; which was the reason that the Massagetæ, who remained firm to the Persian interest, made only a short incursion, and returned without doing much good to themselves, or hurt to the Romans [d].

Makes another peace.

IN the mean time Cavades, who was oppressed with years, and whose activity had drawn upon him in his declining age many infirmities, began to feel the approach of death (R). Upon Provides for the succession of his younger son.

[d] PROCOP. de bell. Persic. lib. i. c. 16. p. 47.

(R) It is evident from this part of the Persian history, which is more entertaining and fuller of events, than the foregoing, that this people were at this time not only numerous and warlike, but prudent also and polite. The Roman authors, for so after the oriental custom we call those who treat of the Roman empire, are not fond of owning this; but affect to attribute all the success of the Persians to their vast armies, their sudden incursions, and the little respect which their monarchs had to treaties and to oaths. One thing, however, is certain, that the Roman emperors paid constantly certain subsidies to the Persian kings; and this seems to be a very strong proof of the prowess of those monarchs, since it was not the custom of those times to pay subsidies for nothing. This was one of the great causes of the wars which so frequently happened between these empires. As often as the Roman empire was in disorder, or had a pacific prince upon the throne, the Persian received these subsidies; but when the Romans were in a good condition, or a martial prince was at their head, then they were stopped,

Upon this he sent for Mebodes, his confident and minister, to whom, having explained the reasons why he desired to have Chosroes for his successor, he put his will, which contained the same things, into his hands, conjuring him to use his utmost endeavours to see it executed; which Mebodes then solemnly promised, and afterwards punctually performed. Thus died Cavades, after reigning thirty years from the time of his restoration, forty one in the whole, and forty five, if we take in the time of his imprisonment and exile. As soon as he was expired Caoses, his eldest son, took upon him the title of king; but Mebodes interposed, representing that the crown of Persia was never to be taken by stealth; that an assembly of the nobles was necessary to recognize his title, and that until this was done, his subjects could not lawfully obey him. Upon this an assembly was called, but whether by Caoses or Mebodes, does not appear. In this assembly the will of the king was produced and read, and such a regard was paid by the nobility to his memory, that the claim of Caoses was set aside, and Chosroes, in virtue of his father's designation, declared monarch of Persia [c] (S).

[c] Procop. de bell. Persic. lib. i. c. 21. p. 65. Agath. lib. iv. p. 140. Cedren. p. 369.

ed, and of course the Persians began their incursions, till either they were beaten by the Roman armies, or bought off again with Roman money. On the other hand, it must be owned, that when ambitious and turbulent princes wore the Persian diadem, scarce any thing could content them. They knew well, that the Constantinopolitan empire cou'd not for any length of time support a war with Persia, because of the immense expence to which it was put, by keeping a great army on the frontiers. Whenever therefore one of these princes wanted money, he began a war, and as soon as the Romans would come up to his price, he sold them a peace. Hitherto we have explained the Persian history and chronology; we intend this note as a key to their politics.

(S) Most of the Greek historians are silent as to the reasons which induced Cavades so vehemently to oppose the succession of his eldest son. It appears from what Procopius says, that it was not any sudden fit of anger, or the effect of the peevishness of old age, but a settled resolution, which he had taken many years before (50). We are obliged to Theophanes for unravelling in some measure this mystery, since from him we learn, that Cavades was jealous of the Zamiches, who were in great favour with this son, and who were supposed to have drawn him to their party; for which great numbers of them, together with their bishop, suffered death

(50) De bell. Persic. lib. i.

(51).

(51). We are likewiſe told elſewhere, that theſe heretics, having once drawn Caoſes to favour them, were next very impatient to hoiſt him to the throne, even before the death of his father; which intrigues of theirs were fatal to them and to him. To them, in drawing on a perſecution, which they might otherwiſe have avoided: To him, in that it deprived him of his birth right, as well as that of his father's affection. It is very probable, that theſe ſchemes were chiefly in the heads of the Manichees and their prieſts, and that Caoſes had very little, if any, knowledge of them; for if it had been otherwiſe, it will be difficult to aſſign a cauſe why he eſcaped, or at leaſt how he came to remain ſtill in the kingdom, nay even at court, and in a condition to appear as a competitor with Choſroes on the death of his father. It has alſo the appearance of reaſon, that the true ground of rejecting him and of exalting Choſroes was, the diffidence the nobility might have of him as to his religion. For it appears from the hiſtory of Agathias, that the magi had not only a great influence in all affairs civil and eccleſiaſtical, but that in the recognition of kings eſpecially, they had a ſort of negative voice. Agathias, and indeed all the Greek writers, cenſure this influence in terms that ſhew that they did not underſtand it (52). The Perſian magi did not interfere as clergymen, but as men of learning and experience. Politics was with them a ſcience, not learned, as amongſt us, by a long obſervance of events, but by contemplation of certain maxims, and by acquiring a ſkill of applying theſe to the management of public affairs. It is not our buſineſs here to enter into any farther detail of this matter, which we mentioned only to prevent the readers being tinged with the prejudice of the Greeks. He that would be further acquainted with this curious ſubject, may conſult the learned book of the preſident Briſſon; as alſo the no leſs learned and curious treatiſe of the celebrated lord Bacon, written in imitation of the magical policy of the Perſians.

(51) Theophan. chronograph. p. 145, 146. Cedren. hiſt. comp. p. 308. (52) Hiſt. lib. iv.

A N

INDEX

TO THE TENTH VOLUME.

The Numbers direct to the Page, and the great Letters to the Notes.

Abdageſes joins with Tiridates, 446.

Abdas conſecrated biſhop in Perſia, 597. His untimely zeal fatal to the chriſtians, ib. Put to death for it, ib.

Abgarus's treacherous advice to Craſſus, 516. Betrays him to Surenas, 517.

Abſalom, the ſon of Hyrcan, 84. His choice of a private life, 87. Death at Jeruſalem, 114, U.

Acaſes, biſhop of Amida's exemplary charity, 600. Chriſtians favoured in Perſia at his requeſt, ib. & ſeq.

Aceldama, Hakeldamah, where ſituate, 376.

Achme's forgery diſcovered, 262, & I.

Acra, the fortreſs of, deſcribed, 13, & X. Signification of the word, ib. Beſieged by Judas Maccabeus, 26. Fortified by Bacchides, 42. Immured by Jonathan, 55. Surrendered to him, 61. Demoliſhed, ib. The time when, 62, C.

Adarnaſſes, why deprived of his ſucceſſion, 593.

Aliba, by whom fortified, 55.

Adrian abandons Parthia, 556.

Ænon, where ſituate, 305, L.

Agabus foretells a general famine, 434.

Agathias, an account of his hiſtory of Perſia, 564, B.

Agrippa's ſplendid reception in Jeruſalem, 187.--- The ſon of Ariſtobulus, Ariſtobulus, 197, ſub not. --- His ſon Agrippa born, 296. Advanced by Caligula, 423. The reſt ſee under Herod Agrippa.

Alamundarus, captain of the Saracens, defeated by the Romans, 599.
Alani, where ſituate, 553. Invade Media, 556. Prevailed on by rich preſents from Vologeſes to return home, ib.
Albinus made prætor of Judæa, 441. His character, 442.
Alcimus promoted to the high-prieſthood, 28. Brings a war on Judæa, 29. Perfidious to the Aſſideans, 30. Dreadful end, 42.
Aleppo taken by Hyrcan, 74.
Alexander Balas courts the Jews, 45. His letter to Jonathan, ib. (Q). Signal favours to him, 47, 50. --- Zebina aſſiſted by the Jews, 77, 78.
——— The ſon of Hyrcan's firſt education, 80, (V). Surnamed Janneus, 87. Impriſoned by Ariſtobulus, 84. Mounts the throne, ib. & ſeq. Fratricide, 87. Character, ib. Ill ſucceſs againſt Ptolemais, ib. Defeated by Lathyrus, ib. By Theodotus, 89. Bloody revenge on the Gazeans, ib. Pelted at the altar, 90, & 91, (E, F). Cruel revenge, 91. On the revolted Jews, 92. Defeated by the Syrians, 93. Cruelty to the rebel Jews, 94. Wars and conqueſts, 95, 96, & (K). Death, 96. Laſt advice to his queen, ib. & ſeq.
--- the ſon of Ariſtobulus eſcapes out of Pompey's hands, 117. Waſtes Judæa, 118. Defeated by the Romans, 119. Beſieged by them, ib. Releaſed, ib. Defeated by Gabinius, 121. By Caſſius, 124. Beheadedby Scipio at Pompey's deſire, ib.
--- The ſon of Herod by Mariamne, 178. Marries Glaphyra, 186. Accuſed by his father, 189. Pleads his own cauſe before Auguſtus, ib. Makes a deſperate confeſſion, 192. Condemned to death, 195. Executed, 196.
--- A pretended ſon of Mariamne, raiſes a Jewiſh party, 289. Diſcovered by Auguſtus, 281.
---- Tiberius an apoſtate Jew made governor of Judæa, 435.
Alexandra, vid. Salome, 87.
---- Queen of the Jews ſtratagem to gain over the Phariſees, 97. Embaſſy to Tigranes, 101. Supplanted by Ariſtobulus, ib. & ſeq. Her death and character, 102, & (M). Falſly confounded with Salome, ib. (M(.
--- Daughter of Ariſtobulus, married to Ptolemy Mennæus, 124.
-- Daughter of Hyrcan, cabals againſt Herod, 158. Reſentment for her ſon's death, 161. Plots againſt Herod, ib. Impriſoned, 163. Confined at Maſſada, 168. Baſe behaviour to her unfortunate daughter, 171, & ſeq. Put to death, 173.

Alexandrian Jews highly courted by Cleopatra, 88. --- Fifty thouſand of them maſſacred by the Romans, 446.
Alexandrion, the fortreſs of, deſcribed, 110, (Q).
Alexas, Salome's huſband, releaſes the Jewiſh chiefs, 267. His ſpeech to the Jewiſh army, 268.
Alpharag it the 12th century, writes in defence of the Sadducees, 233.
Amatha, the noble palace of, burnt, 276, & (T).
Amathus taken by Janneus, 89. Deſtroyed by him, 91. Made one of the five courts of judicature, 119.
Amida taken and razed by Sapor, 586. Taken and preſerved by Cavades, 608. Surrendered to the Romans, 609.
Ammian. Marcellin. an account of his hiſtory, 586, (I).
Ammonius, a writer againſt the Sadducees, 232.
Ananael, an obſcure prieſt, made pontiff, 157. Depoſed, 159.
Ananias, an eminent Jew of Alexandria, 88. His advice to Cleopatra, ib. --- The ſon of Nebedeus, made high-prieſt, 435. Murdered by the zealots, 447.
Ananus, a proud Saducee, made high-prieſt, 441. Puts St. James to death, ib. & (H.) His fatal complaiſance to the Sicarii, 442. Made governor of Jeruſalem, 449. Heads the peaceable party, 456, & (Y.) Oppoſes the Zealots, ib. Betrayed by John de Giſchala, 457. Put to death, 458, & (A).
Andrew called by Chriſt, 297. Made an apoſtle, 317, (Γ).
Andromachus, betrays Craſſus to the Parthians, 524.
Anna, the propheteſs's teſtimony of the child Jeſus, 225.
Annas depoſed from the high-prieſthood, 286. Sends Chriſt to Caiaphas, 373. Five of his ſons ſucceed him in his dignity, 441, (H).
Anthedon taken by Alexander Janneus, 89.
Antigonus, the ſon of Hyrcan, ſent againſt Samaria, 78. Put to death, 84.
——— The ſon of Ariſtobulus, ſent priſoner to Rome, 117. Petition to Cæſar rejected, 126. Invades Judea, 137. Defeated by Herod, 138. Makes a ſecond invaſion, 140. Beſieged in the temple, 141. Inthroned, 143. Cruelty to Hyrcan and Phaſael, ib. & ſeq. Outwitted by Ventidius, 146. Driven from Maſſada, 147. His charge againſt the Roman ſenate, 148. Defeated by Herod, 152. Beſieged at Jeruſalem, ib. Taken priſoner, 153. Put to death by Marc Antony at the ſolicitation of Herod, 154, & (E).
Antioch beſieged by the Parthians, 528. The ſiege twice raiſed, ib. & ſeq.
Antiochus Epiphanes, his death reſpites the Jews, 14.

--- ſon

——— ſon of Alexander, dethrones Demetrius, 52. Allies with the Jews, ib. & ſeq. Grants to the high-prieſt, ib. Perfidy to him, 59. Encourages Ptolemy's treachery againſt the Jews, 69. Invades Judæa, ib. & ſeq. Beſieges Jeruſalem, 70. Makes peace with Hyrcan, 71. Reception into that metropolis, 73. Death, 74.
——— Gryphus's reſentment againſt Hyrcan, 78. Prevented from invading Judæa, ib.
——— Cyzicenus invades Judæa. 79.
——— a Perſian, made tutor to Theodoſius, 594.
——— the valley of, ſeized by Alexander Jannæus, 95.
Antipas, the ſon of Herod by Martace, 197, ſub not.
——— by Cleopatra, ib. Made tetrarch of Galilee, 266. Sugplants his brother Archelaus, 271, & ſeq. The reſt ſee under Herod Antipas, 280, & ſeq.
Antipater, the father of Herod, his deſcent, 100. Character, 105. Cabals with the Phariſees, ib. Carries Hyrcan into Arabia, ib. Pleads the cauſe of Hyrcan before Pompey, 109. Ingratiates himſelf to the Romans, 117. His policy, ib. Services to Gabinius in Egypt, 121. Aſſiſts Cæſar there, 125. His gallant behaviour there, ib. Amply rewarded ib. & ſeq. His ſpeech, 128. Overawes the Jews, ib. His progeny, 129, H. Sends money to Caſſius, 134. Is poiſoned by Malichus, 135.
——— the ſon of Herod, in high favour with him, 188, (D). Cabals againſt his two brothers, ib. & ſeq. Plots againſt his father, 196, & ſeq. Detected, 199. Cabals againſt his other brothers, 255. Decoyed back to Jeruſalem, 256. Tried for high-treaſon, 261. Condemned, 262. Put to death, 266.
——— the ſon of Salome's bitter ſpeech againſt Archelaus, 272.
Antipatris built by Herod, 190.
Antiphilus's treaſon diſcovered, 262.
Antonia, the fort of, taken by the zealots, 446. By the Romans, 475.
Antoninus deſerts the Perſians, 585.
Antony Marc, ſent againſt Alexander, 118. Partiality to Herod, 138, & ſeq. Edict in favour of the Jews, ib. & (O). Procures the Jewiſh crown to Herod, 145. Baſe partiality for him, 161. Defeated by Auguſtus, 166. Marches againſt the Parthians, 534. Sends Ventidius out of Syria, 535. Invades Media, 537. Ill ſucceſs againſt Phraata, 538, & ſeq. Shameful retreat, 539, & ſeq. Bewitched by Cleopatra, 541. Aſſiſts Artavaſdes king of Media, 541.

——— governor of Aſcalon, defeats the Jews, 450.
Apocryphal goſpels trumped up by hereticks, 220, note.
Apollo's temple at Babylon plundered, 557. A remarkable golden coffer found there, ibid.
Apollodotus, the brave governor of Gaza, 89. Murdered by his brother, ib.
Apollonius defeated and killed, 4.
——— governor of Paleſtine, revolts to Demetrius, 49. Defeated by Jonathan, 50.
——— governor of Zenodotia, his treachery to Craſſus, 509. Suffers for it, ib.
Apoſtles, the twelve choſen by Chriſt, 317, (T). Their character, ib. & ſeq. Inſtructions and ſucceſs, 330, & ſeq. Forſake their maſter, 372, & (P). Their ſlowneſs to believe his reſurrection, 392, & ſeq. Receive their commiſſion from him, 395, & ſeq. Aſſemble at Jeruſalem after his aſcenſion, 404, (F). Receive the Holy Ghoſt, 405. The miraculous effects of it proved, 406, H. Their zeal, miracles, doctrine, &c. 410, 411, & (I).
Arabians defeated by Judas Maccabæus, 22. Nomades, who, ib. E. Invaded by Alexander Janneus, 91. Defeated by Herod, 166, & (I).
Arach, the modern name of Parthia, 496.
Arbela, the banditti of, deſtroyed by Herod, 148. Inſtance of their obſtinacy, 149, (Y).
Archelaus's addreſs to pacify Herod, 192, & (I).
——— the ſon of Herod by Martace, 197, ſub not. Succeeds his father, 268. His ſpeech to the Jews, 269. Inſulted by the mutineers, ib. Goes to Rome, 271. Oppoſed by his brother, ib. & ſeq. By a Jewiſh embaſſy, 179. Obtains but part of his kingdom, ib. His tyranny, 282. Baniſhment, 283.
Ardaburius ſent againſt the Perſians, 598. His ſpeech to their general, ib. Defeats them, 599.
Aretas, king of Arabia, defeats the Jews, 95. Invades Judæa in favour of Hyrcan, 106. Defeats Ariſtobulus, ibid. Defeated by Ariſtobulus, 108. Wars with Herod Antipas, 306.
Arimathea, where ſituate, 389, (E).
Ariſtobulus the ſon of Hyrcan's ſucceſs againſt Cyzicenus, 79. Succeeds his father, 84. His parricide, ib. Fratricide, 86 & (C). Dreadful end, ib. & ſeq. Why ſurnamed Philellen, 84, 87, (D).
——— the ſon of Alexander Jannæus, 96. Joins hands with the Sadducees, 98. Sent into Syria, 101. Makes ſure of the Jewiſh crown, ib. & ſeq. Depoſes his brother, 103.

Defeated

Defeated by Aretas, 106. Beſieged in the temple, ibid. Applies to Pompey, 108. Pleads his own cauſe before him, 109. Parts from him in a huff, 110. Impriſoned by him, 112. Carried priſoner to Rome, 117. Eſcapes to Judæa, 120. Defeated and taken priſoner, ib. Releaſed by Julius Cæſar, 124. Poiſoned by Pompey, ib.

——— grandſon of Hyrcan, his title to the Jewiſh crown, 145, (U). Made high-prieſt by Herod, 158, 159, & (B), (C). Murdered in a bath, 160.

——— the ſon of Herod, married to Berenice, 187. Accuſed by Salome, ib. & ſeq. Condemned and put to death, 195, 196.

——— the ſon of Agrippa, deprived of his ſucceſſion, 435.

Arſaces I. founds the Parthian monarchy, 501. From him the common name of the Parthian kings, ib.

——— II. his wars with Antiochus, 501.

——— the ſon of Ariabanus, made king of Armenia, 545. Murdered by Pharaſmenes, 546.

Arſacidæ, of Armenia, tributary to Perſia, 560, 561.

Artabanus, king of Media, invades Parthia, 544. Conſpired againſt, 545. Wars with Mithridates, 546. Driven out, ib. Reſtored, 547. Driven out again, ib.

----- IV. king of Parthia treacherouſly uſed, 559. Makes peace with Macrinus, 560. Killed by Artaxerxes, ib.

Artabazes's advice to Craſſus, rejected, 514.

Artavaſdes falls out with the king of Parthia, 541. Defeated by him, ib.

Artaxata, metropolis of Armenia, 551. Taken by the Romans, 557.

Artaxerxes, or Artaxares, defeats the Parthians, 560. His deſcent, 564, 565. Haughty embaſſy to Severus, 567. Defeated by him, ib. Succeſs and death, 568, & ſeq. His great power, ib. note (C).

——— the ſucceſſor of Sapor, who, 592, 593, M.

Aſcalon given to Salome, 280.

Aſcetic chriſtians, when firſt inſtituted, 244.

Aſhmon, the ſuppoſed centre of Galilee, 275, in fin. R.

Aſhmoneans, Aſmoneans, their reign ended, 153. Duration, ibid. (D).

Atargatis, how worſhipped, 23, (G). The temple of, burnt, 23. Plundered by Craſſus, 511.

Athenians, honours to Hyrcan, 118.

Athenion, Cleopatra's general, treachery to Herod, 165.

Athenobius ſent into Judæa, 64.

Athronges, a gigantic Jew, takes the royalty upon him, 277. Defeated, ibid.

Attrog, a fruit worn by the Jews on the feaſts of tabernacles, deſcribed, 90, (E).
Auguſtus's friendſhip to Herod, 144. Victory at Actium, 166. Accepts Herod's friendſhip, 168. His grand reception in Judea, 170. Preſents to Herod, ib. & ſeq. Makes him his procurator in Syria, 179. Receives him at Rome with all marks of friendſhip, 186. Highly diſpleaſed with him, 194. Decree for taxing the empire, 214, & (Y). Appealed to by Archelaus, 272. Partition of the Jewiſh kingdom, 279.
Auranitis given to Herod, 178, & (V).
Aurelian's ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, 572. Gives his daughter to Sapores, 573. Severity to the Palmyrenians, 574.
Azazene laid waſte by the Romans, 598.
Azotus taken by Judas Maccabeus, 26. Burnt by Jonathan, 50. Given to Salome, 280.

B

Babas, the ſons of, put to death, 173, & 174, (Q).
Babylonia, conquered by Mithridates, 502. By Trajan, 555.
Bacchides defeated by Judas Maccabeus, 7. Sent to invade Judea, 29. Retires into Syria, 30. Returns with an army, 37, & ſeq. Defeats the Jews, and kills Judas their general, 38. Cruelty to them, 39. Succeſs againſt them, 40, & ſeq. Returns to Antioch, 42, & (O). Sent to ſurprize Jonathan, 43. Beſieges him, ib. Defeated by him, ib. Makes peace with him, 44.
Balaam, the place of his birth, 218, note.
Balm, the plant of, deſcribed, 163, (F).
Banditti of Paleſtine, deſtroyed by Herod, 129, 149. Their invincible obſtinacy, 149, (Y). Kill Herod's general, 149.
Bardanes's wars with Gotarzes, 548. Murdered, 549.
Baris, by whom built, 83. Deſcribed, ib. & (Y).
Bartholomew called to be an apoſtle, 297, 317, (T).
Barzapharnes's treachery to Phaſael, 142.
Baſſus Lucil. completes the reduction of Judea, 488, & ſeq.
Batanea given to Herod, 178, (V).
Bath-col of the Jews, what, 361, (E).
Bellius diſcovers Antipater's plot, 255.

Bean, the children of, who, 15, (Z). Defeated by Judas Maccabeus, 15.
Beliſarius ſent againſt the Perſians, 611. Defeated, 612. Recalled and ſent againſt the Vandals, 613.
Berenice the daughter of Salome, married to Ariſtobulus, 187. Her off-ſpring, 197, ſub not.
——— daughter of Herod Agrippa, born, 296. Married to the king of Chalcis, 433. Her incontinency, 438, (E). Piety towards the perſecuted Jews, 446. Diſcarded by Titus, 492.
Bethabara, Beth-habara, whence ſo called, 296, (G).
Bethany, where ſituate, 350.
Bethel fortified by the Syrians, 42.
Betheſda, the pool of, deſcribed, 313, & (R).
Bethlehem, the place of Chriſt's birth, 214.
——— the children of, maſſacred, 256.
——— the prophecy of, explained, 257, (G).
Bethoron, where ſituate, 5, (Q). Fortified by Bacchides, 42.
Bethpage, where ſituate, 357.
Bethzura, deſcribed, 8, (S). The battle of, diſcuſſed, 9, (T). Fortified by Judas Maccabeus, 13. Where ſituate, ib. (Y). Taken and fortified by Bacchides, 42. Retaken by Simon Maccabeus, 53.
Beza's notion of the Herodians, confuted, 235.
Bezabda taken by Sapor, 586. Beſieged by Conſtans, ib.
Bibulus's ſtrange defence of his camp, 529. Bribes a Perſian nobleman to raiſe a rebellion, 530.
Bizarus's hiſtory of Perſia, diſcuſſed, 562, (A).
Boanergos, whence ſo called, 317, note. Their furious zeal rebuked, 346.
Body and blood of Chriſt, promiſed by him for food, offends the Jews, 333.
Boſſora, taken by Judas Maccabeus, 17.
Buda, a heretical impoſtor's doctrines and death, 573, (E).

C

Cabades, king of Perſia, vid. Cavades, 604.
Cabbis, Joſeph, made high-prieſt, 441.
Cæſar. Jul. releaſes Ariſtobulus, 124. Aſſiſted by the Egyptian Jews, 125. Gratitude to them, 126, 132. Murdered in the ſenate, 133.

——— Sextus

——— Sextus friendſhip to Herod, 129. Murdered by Baſſus, 133.
Cæſarea, by whom built, 175, (R). Deſcribed, 176. (S). Finiſhed, 189.
——— another built by Philip, 288.
Cæſarean Jews, 20,000 of them maſſacred, 446.
Caiaphas made high-prieſt, 287, & (Y). Prophetic ſentence againſt Chriſt, 355. Condemns him to death, 374.
Caius made umpire of Archelaus's title, 272. Contempt of the Jewiſh religion, 282.
——— Caligula's perſecution of the Jews, 424, & ſeq. Friendſhip to Agrippa, ib.
Calippian cycle, what, 32, (K).
Caliſthenes burnt, 8.
Caliſtus's ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, 571.
Calvary, vid. Golgotha, 381.
Camiſene, one of the five provinces of Parthia, 495.
Cana, the marriage and miracle of, 297, & (H).
Caoſes, prince of Perſia, diſinherited, 610, 614. The cauſe of it, ib. (S).
Capernaum, much frequented by Chriſt, 297, & ſeq. Where ſituate, 311, (P). Its fate, ib.
Capito, Ateius, oppoſes Craſſus's meaſures, 507, & ſeq. Not ſucceeding, utters imprecations againſt him, ib.
Caracalla's treachery to the Parthians, 559. Aſſumes the name of Parthicus, ib.
Caraites, vid. Karaites, 245.
Carnion, where ſituate, 23. Taken and burnt, ib.
Carrhæ, the battle of, 526, & ſeq.
Casbin, a city of Parthia, 496.
Caſpis, taken by Judas Maccabeus, 22.
Caſſius's ſucceſs againſt Alexander, 123, & (D). Seizes on Syria, 133. Sells the Jewiſh captives by auction, 138. Defeated by Marc Antony, ib. Quæſtor to Craſſus, 513. Intangled with him in Parthia, 523. Eſcapes, and gets ſafe into Syria, 524. Repulſes and defeats the Parthians, 529.
Catullus's treachery to the Jews, puniſhed, 491, & (G).
Cavades, king of Perſia, ſubdues the Eutbalites, 604. Oppreſſes the nobles and is depoſed, 605. His puniſhment, ib. Releaſed by his queen, 606. Reinthroned, ib. & ſeq. Wars with the Romans, 607. Behaviour to the Amidans, 608. Invaded by the Huns, 609. Makes peace with the Romans, ib. Deprives his eldeſt ſon of the ſucceſſion, 611. Breaks the peace, 611, Succeſs againſt them, 612. His death, 614.

Celer, a tribune, put to death, 436.
Cendebeus ſent to invade Judæa, 65. Defeated, 66.
Centurion in Judæa's extraordinary humility, 320.
Cerealis's expedition againſt the Samaritans, 453. Againſt Idumea, 464.
Ceſtius Gallus governor of Syria, numbers the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, 444. Marches againſt the zealots, 447. Defeated, 448, & ſeq. Diſgraced and dies, 450.
Chalcidius's account of the ſtar at Chriſt's birth, 221, & ſeq. ſub not.
Caphenatha, part of Jeruſalem, ſo called, 55.
Characa, where ſituate, 22, (F). Taken by the Jews, 22.
Chauneus, deſigning to betray the Romans, anſwers the ends of Ventidius, 533.
Chelkias, a famed Jew of Alexandria, 88. Prevails on Cleopatra to aſſiſt the Jews againſt Ptolemy, ib.
Chereas defeated and killed by the Jews, 16.
Choſe, an Idumean deity, who, and whence ſo named, 173, (O).
Choſroes, his adoption propoſed to Juſtin, 610. Declared king of Perſia. 614.
Chriſtians, primitive, their admirable lives, 410, & ſeq. Perſecuted in Judæa, 414. Leave Jeruſalem before the ſiege, 449, & (O).
Cicero repulſes the Parthians in Syria, and drives them out of Cilicia, 529.
Circenſian games inſtituted by Auguſtus, 543.
Ciſenna, a raſh commander in Syria, 121.
Cleopatra oppoſes her ſon Lathyrus in Judæa, 88. Friendſhip to Janneus, ib. To the Jews, ib. & ſeq. --- courtſhip to Herod, 144. Intrigues againſt him, 160, & ſeq. Comes into Judæa, 163. Her character, ib. & ſeq. Helliſh plot againſt Herod, 165. Her death adviſed to Antony by Herod, 166.
——— One of Herod's wives, 197, ſub not. Helps to ſupplant Archelaus, 271.
Cleophas's entertainment with Chriſt, 394.
Conſtantines letter to Sapores, 582, (H).
Conſtans, wars with the Perſians, 583, & ſeq.
Coponius, governor of Judæa, 283.
Corbulo Domit. oppoſes Vologeſes, 551, & ſeq.
Cornelius, a centurion, converted to chriſtianity, 420, & ſeq.
Coſdroes, king of Parthia's ſucceſs in Armenia, 554. Driven out by Trajan, ib. & ſeq. Recalled by the Parthians, 556. Lives in friendſhip with the Romans, ib.

Cosroes, a great favourer of the Karaites, 250, note.
Costobares, put to death by Herod, 173.
Crassus succeeds Gabinius in Judea, 122. Plunders the temple, ib. & 508. Sent into Syria, 505. His mottled character, 506, & seq. Invades the Parthians, 509. Sacrileges in Syria, 510, & seq. Extortions, 511. Answer to the Parthian embassadors, 512. Despises the advice of the king of Armenia, 514. Marches through Mesopotamia, ib. Betrayed by Abgarus, 516. Infatuation, 517. Defeated by the Parthians, 522. Retreat into Carrhæ, ib. Betrayed to Surenas, 524, & seq. His death, 526. Insulted after it, 527.
——— his son accompanies him against the Parthians, 510. Fights them, 519. Defeated and killed, 520.
Criminals executed without the gates of Jerusalem, 381, (X). How buried, 390. A terrible fight exhibited by them at Berytus, 430, sub fin. (U).
Ctesiphon, where situate, 495. Taken by Trajan, 555. Destroyed by Cassius, 557.
Cumanus Ventid. sent governor of Judea, 435. Refuses justice to the Jews, and is sent to Rome by Quadratus governor of Syria, 436. Banished, ib.
Cycle, a new one, introduced in Judea, 32, (K).
Cypris, wife of Antipater, her progeny, 129, (H).
Cypron, built by Herod, 190.
Cyprus, the golden mines of, given to Herod, 189, (F).
——— the castle of, taken by the zealots, 447.
Cyrenean Jews, relieved by Augustus, 190, & (G).
Cyrenius sent to tax the Jews, 283.
Cyriades, a Roman traytor, his rise, 569. Death, 571.

D.

Dalmanutha, where situate, 337, (M).
Damascen, Nicolas's address to clear Herod to Augustus, 194, (L). Pleads against Antipater, 261. In favour of Archelaus, 273, 279.
Daniel, his weeks, how computed, 200, (P).
Darkness, at Christ's crucifixion miraculous, 385, (C).
Dathema, where situate, 16. Relieved by Judas Maccabeus, 17.
David's tomb, the story of its being rifled discussed, 72, (M).
David, in what sense Christ is his son, 366, (H).

Deacons, the firſt ſeven choſen in the chriſtian church, 413.
Decapolis, whence ſo called, 337, (L).
Dedication of the temple by Judas Maccabeus, how performed, 12. The feaſt of, inſtituted by him, ib. & (W).
Demetrius, king of Syria, makes war againſt the Jews, 29. Forbid to go on by the Romans, 36. Renews hoſtilities, 43. Courts the Jews, 44. His letter to Jonathan, ib. Second offers to them ſuſpected, 46, 47. His general having made peace is ordered to renew the war, 33. Defeat by Alexander Balas, and death, 47.
——— Nicanor, a friend to the Jews, 51, & (U). Perfidy to them. 52. Dethroned by Antiochus, ib. & ſeq.
——— Eucherus invades Judea, 93.
——— governor of Gamala, taken priſoner, 95.
——— Nicator taken priſoner by the Parthians, 502.
Demus, the temple of, what, 118, (Z).
Devils, whether they poſſeſſed men, 309, (O).
Diogenes, a Saducee, put to death, 98.
Dion taken by Alexander Jannæus, 95.
Dioſcorinthus, the month of, explained, 20, (C).
Diſciples LXX, appointed by Chriſt, 346, & (R). Their joyful return, 349.
Dolabella eaſes the Aſiatic Jews from wars, 133.
Doris, Antipater's mother, conſpires againſt Herod, 199. Baniſhed, ib.
Doſitheus a brave Jewiſh general's ſucceſs againſt the Syrians, 23, & ſeq. In Idumea, 25. Loſes his arm in a battle, ib.
--- the betrayer of Hyrcan, 167, (K).
Drums, how uſed by the Parthians, 498.
Druſilla, daughter of Herod Agrippa, 433, Married to Azizus king of Emeſſa, 438. To Felix, ib.
Dryma, the canton of, where, 140, (Q).

E.

Eagle, golden, ſet up by Herod, pulled down, 264.
Eagles, Roman, a ſanctuary, 162. (D).
Earthquake, a violent one in Judea. 165, 166, (H). Another at Chriſt's crucifixion, 387.
Ecdipon, where ſituate, 141, (R).
Edeſſa taken by Sapores, 571.
Eleuzar, a ſurly Phariſee's affront to Hyrcan, 80, 81, & (W).
——— a fooliſh prieſt, betrays the temple treaſury, 123.

——— the ſon of Annas made high-prieſt, 287. Carried off by the Siccarii, 442.
——— head of the zealots, beats the Romans, 447. Made governor of Idumea, 449.
——— a worthy prieſt, raiſes a party againſt the zealots, 465. Surpriſed by John de Giſchala, 469. His deſperate end at Maſſada, 489, 490.
Eli, eli, lama, &c. in what ſenſe repeated by Chriſt on the croſs, 385, (D). In what language, ib.
Elioneus made high-prieſt, 431.
Elizabeth conceives in her old age, 202.
Elpis, Herod's laſt wife, 197, ſub not.
Emmaus, whence ſo called, 276, (T). Where ſituate, 288, (A). Fortified by the Syrians, 42. Whence called Nicopolis, 490, (E).
Ephron taken by Judas Maccabeus, 24.
Eſſa taken by Alexander Janneus, 95.
Eſſenians, why favoured by Herod, 156, not. Oppoſe his oath of fidelity, 180. Famous ſect among the Jews, 236. why not mentioned by the evangeliſts, 237. Etymon of their name, ib. (A). Their riſe, 238. Auſtere life, ib. & ſeq. Their faith, peculiar tenets, &c. 239, & ſeq. Degeneracy and end, 244, 245.
Etnarchy, what, 279.
Euthalites, a tribe of Huns, whence ſo called, 601. Defeat the Perſians, ib. & ſeq. A further account of them, 603, (P). Kindneſs to Cavades, 606.
Ezechias murdered by the zealots, 447.
Ezra, whether founder of the Karaites, 245, 246, & (H).

F.

FABIUS mounts the breach at Jeruſalem, 114.
Fadus Cuſpius ſent governor of Judea, 433, & ſeq. Suppreſſes an inſurrection, 434.
Fauſtus Cornel. mounts the breach at Jeruſalem, 114.
Felix driven out of Jeruſalem, 137. Made prætor of Judea, 436. His ſad character, ib. & (B). Murders the good old high-prieſt, 437, & ſeq. Marries Druſilla, 438. Trembles at St. Paul's preaching, ib.
Feſtus Portius ſent governor of Judea, 439. Severity againſt the turbulent Jews, 440. Partiality to the Jewiſh prieſts, ib. Hears St. Paul's defence, and acquits him, ib. Dies, 441.
Flaccus's cruelty to the Alexandrian Jews, 424. Baniſhed, and put to death, 425.

Florus Geſſius, governor of Judea's ſad character, 443. Rapines and cruelties complained of, 444. Horrid butcheries, 446. Brutiſhneſs to Berenice, ib.
Furius mounts the breach at Jeruſalem, 114.

G.

Gabala, by whom built, 175, (R).
Gabeſtus aſſiſts Ariſtobulus, 102.
Gabinius's treachery againſt Ariſtobulus, 108. Made governor of Syria, 118. Succeſs in Egypt, 121. Againſt Alexander, ib. Why recalled, 122, (B). Treachery to Mithridates, 505.
Gabriel, the angel ſent to Zacharias, 200, 201. To the virgin Mary, 204.
Gadara taken by Janneus, 89. Made one of the five Jewiſh courts, 119. Diſmantled from Judea, 280. Taken by the Romans, 463.
Galerius defeated by the Perſians, 578. Defeats them, ib.
Galileans maſſacred by Pilate, 335.
Galilee invaded by Timotheus, 16. Reduced by Herod, 148. Revolts to Antigonus, 151. Its converſion foretold, 309. Subdued by the Romans, 450.
Gamala taken by the Romans, 454.
Gamaliel's advice to the ſanhedrin, 412. Who he was, ibid. (K).
Games inſtituted by Herod, 174.
Garizzim, the temple of, deſtroyed by Hyrcan, 74, (O).
Gaulana taken by Alexander Janneus, 95.
Gaulonites, the ſect of, 235, & ſeq. Inſurrection, 284, & ſeq. The reſt vid. ſub Zealots, ib. & ſeq.
Gaza beſieged by Alexander Janneus, 89. Betrayed to him, ib. Deſtroyed, ib. Diſmembered from Judea, 280.
Gazara taken by Judas Maccabeus, 16. Where ſituate, ib. (A). Taken by Simon, 60, & ſeq. vid. & (B).
Gedor fortified by Cendebeus, 65.
Gellius's ill ſucceſs in Arabia, 177.
Genealogy of Jeſus Chriſt, 204, 205. St. Matthew's and St. Luke's reconciled, 205, (Q).
Genezareth, lake, why called the ſea of Tiberias, 287, & ſeq.
Gentiles, when their converſion firſt began, 420, & ſeq.
Georgias ſent againſt the Jews, 5. Defeated by Judas Maccabeus, 7. In Idumea, 15. By Doſitheus, 25.
Gergaſenes, where ſituate, 327, (D).
Gethſemane, whence ſo called, 371, (N).

Ghoſt, Holy, the ſin againſt, what, 323, (A). Why unpardonable, ib.
------ miraculous deſcent on the apoſtles, 405, & ſeq. The truth of the fact proved, 406, (H).
Gibeon, where ſituate, 448, (N).
Gilead, the Jews of, diſtreſſed by the Syrians, 16. Relieved by Judas Maccabeus, 23, & ſeq. Subdued by Alexander Janneus, 91.
Gileadites removed into Judea, 24.
Giſchala, the city of, taken by the Romans, 455.
------ John de, outwits Veſpaſian, and flies to Jeruſalem, ib. Treachery to Ananus, 475, (Z). Deſperate defence againſt the oppoſite parties, 465, & (H). Againſt Simon, 469. Plunders the temple, 476. Horrid hypocriſy, 477. Taken priſoner, 487. Puniſhment, 488.
Glaphyra, princeſs of Cappadocia, married to Alexander, 186. Sent back after her huſband's death, 196. Illegally married to Archelaus, 282.
Glones made governor of Amida, 608. Betrayed into an ambuſcade, and killed by the Romans, 609.
Golgotha deſcribed, 381, (X).
Gordian invades Perſia, 570. Murdered, ibid.
Gotarzes wars with his brother Bardanes, 548. Reſigns the crown to him, ibid. Mounts the Parthian throne, 549. Wars with Meherdates, ib. & ſeq, Death, 551.
Gratus defeats the ſeditious Jews, 276.
------ Valerius made governor of Judea, 286. Depoſeth the high-prieſt, ib.
Greeks that came to ſee Chriſt, who, 360, (D).
------ their treachery to the Parthians, 503.
Guſanaſtades's advice to the Perſian council, 605. Declared a rebel, 607. Put to death, ibid.

H.

H*Agerim Malcuth*, what is meant by, 75, (P).
Hallel, among the Jews, a ſet of euchariſtical pſalms, 371, (M).
Hardouin's pedigree of Herod confuted, 100, (L). And his notion of the Herodians, 233, & ſeq.
Haſſideans, al. Aſdanim, murdered by Bacchides, 30. Whether the ſame with the Eſſenians, 237, & ſeq.
Hebron taken and razed by Judas Maccabeus, 18.
Hecatompylos, metropolis of Parthia, 495. Where ſituate, 496.

Helepolis, a warlike engine, why ſo called, 479, (W).
Herod, when born, 100, not. His pedigree, ib. paſſ. Made governor of Galilee, 129. Succeſs againſt the banditti, ib. & ſeq. Summoned by the ſanhedrin, 130. Inſolence to that court,, ib. & ſeq. Puts to death his cowardly judges, 131. Made governor of Cœle-Syria, 134. Politic revenge on Malichus, 135, & ſeq. Quells the Malichean faction, 137. Contracted to Mariamne, ib. Defeats Antigonus, 138. Favoured by Marc Antony, ib. & ſeq. Made tetrarch by him, 139. Eſcapes Pacorus's trap, 142. Goes into Arabia, 143. Ill ſucceſs there, ib. More ſucceſsful at Rome, 144. Created king of Judea, 145. Relieves his family at Maſſada, 147. Amneſty to the Antigonians, ib. & ſeq. Engines to deſtroy the banditti, 149. Aſſiſts Marc Antony at Samoſata, 150. Defeats Antigonus, 151. Marries Mariamne, ib. Takes Jeruſalem, 152, & ſeq. Complains of Soſius's cruelty, 153. Begins his reign with cruel exactions, 154, & ſeq. Decoys Hyrcan into Judea, 157, & ſeq. Plagued with domeſtic jars, 160. Murders Ariſtobulus, ib. Abſolved by Antony, 161. Bloody orders concerning Mariamne, ib. Noble reception of Cleopatra, 164. Betrayed by her, 165. Defeats the Arabians, 166. Treachery to Hyrcan, 167, & (K). Bold ſpeech to Auguſtus, 168. Grand reception of him in Judea, 170. Puts Mariamne to death, 171, & ſeq. His remorſe turned into cruel madneſs, 172. Prophane buildings, games, &c. diſpleaſe the Jews, 174 Rebuilds Samaria, 175. Generoſity during the famine, 176. Palace deſcribed, 177. Sends his ſons to Auguſtus, 178. Accuſed by Zenodorus, is acquitted, 179. Rebuilds the temple of Jeruſalem, 181, & ſeq. Makes ſevere laws againſt robbers, 186. Goes to fetch his two ſons home, ib. Their marriage, ib. & ſeq. Accuſes them before Cæſar, 189. Plunders David's tomb, 191. Horrid butcheries, ib. & ſeq. Accuſed before Auguſtus, 194. Gets his two ſons condemned, 195. His wives, progeny, &c. 196, 197, & (N). Falls out with Pheroras, 198, & ſeq. Diſcovers Antipater's conſpiracy, 199, & ſeq. Fears at the arrival of the eaſtern magi, 222. His diſtracted ſtate at the birth of Chriſt, 254. Over-reaches Antipater, 255, & ſeq. Maſſacres the children of Bethlehem, 256, & 257, (G). Arreſts Antipater, 261. Pleads againſt him, ib. Finds new proofs of his treaſon, 262, & ſeq. His ſickneſs and teſtament, 263. Affronted by the Jews, 264. His ſpeech to them at Jericho, ib. Dreadful diſeaſe, 265, (M). Bloody orders ders againſt the Jews, 266. His death and character, ib. & (N). Pompous burial, 268. His will canvaſſed by the ſenate, 272, & ſeq.

——— Antipas's ſhare of the Jewiſh kingdom, 280. Cities built by him, 287, & ſeq. Veneration for the baptiſt, 305. Impriſons him at Macheron, 306. Beheads him, 307. Contempt of Chriſt, 378. Unſucceſsful wars with Aretas, 417. Comes to Jeruſalem, 418. And diſobliges Vitellius, ib. & ſeq. Affronts Agrippa, 423. Accuſed and baniſhed, 425, & (Q).

——— Agrippa's advancement by Caligula, 423, & ſeq. Various fortunes before it, ib. Affronted at Alexandria, 424, & (P). Supplants Antipas, 425. Intercedes for the Jews, 426. His letter to Caligula, 427, (R). Advancement under Claudius, 429. Attachment to the Jewiſh religion, 430. His character, ib. & (U). High credit, 431. Viſited by five kings, ib. Perſecutes the church, and beheads St. James, ib. & ſeq. His dreadful end, 432, 433, & (X). Indignities offered to his memory, 433, & (Y).

——— the ſon of Agrippa, deprived of his kingdom, 433. Succeeds his father, 434. Intereſt at the Roman court, 436, (A). Hears Paul's defence before Feſtus, 440. Affronts the Jews at Jeruſalem, 441. Becomes odious to them, 442. Driven out of the city, 445. His palace burnt by the zealots, 447. Joins forces with Ceſtius, 448. With Veſpaſian, 450. Accompanies him to Rome, 463. Careſſed by him, 492. His death ib. Laſt king of the Herodian race, ib.

——— the ſon of Ariſtobulus, and grandſon of Herod the Great, 197, ſub not.

Herodian line, its ſhort duration, 493.

Herodian, the hiſtorian's account of the Perſian wars, 568, (C).

Herodians, a real ſect in Chriſt's time, 233. Their particular tenets, ib. & ſeq. Confuted by Chriſt, 364.

Herodias, grand-daughter to Herod the Great, 197, ſub not. Inceſtuous marriage with Antipas, 305. Reſentment againſt the baptiſt, ib. & ſeq.

——— wife of Antipas's untimely ambition, 425. Goes with him into baniſhment, ib.

Herodion, by whom built, 177. Deſcribed, ib. (T). Taken by the Romans, 488, 489.

Hezechiah, chief of the Paleſtine robbers put to death, 129.

Hillel, the famed Jewiſh doctor, whether the Pollio of Joſephus, 157, in fin. not. When he flouriſhed, 226.
Hippocrates's writings, by whom brought to light, 573.
Hippon diſmembered from Judea, 280.
Hormiſdas, king of Perſia's ſhort reign, 574, & ſeq.
——— II. crowns his ſon before he is born, 579, & (G).
——— a revolted prince directs the Romans, 588. Forfeits his ſucceſſion, 592.
——— a chriſtian nobleman perſecuted, 597.
Hozannah, what is meant by, 357, (A).
Hyrcan the ſon of Simon, why ſurnamed Hyrcan, 66, (H). His reception at Jeruſalem, 68, & ſeq. Succeeds his father in the high-prieſthood, &c. 69. Beſieged by Antiochus, 70. Deſires a truce of ſeven days, ib. Makes peace with him, 71. Said to have rifled David's tomb, 72. Shakes off the Syrian yoke, 74. Takes Aleppo, ib. Invades Syria, ib. Samaria, ib. Idumea, ib. Renews his alliance with the Romans, 75, & (Q). Sends a new embaſſy to Rome, 76. Beſieges Samaria, 79. His great character, ib. Prophetic ſpirit, 80, & (V). Falls out with the Phariſees, 81, & (W). His death, 82, & (X).
——— the ſon of Alexander Janneus, made high-prieſt, 97. Forſaken by his ſubjects, 102, & ſeq. Depoſed, 103. The time when, ib. (N). His cauſe eſpouſed by Antipater, 106. Pleads his cauſe before Pompey, 109, & ſeq. Reſtored to the high-prieſthood, 115. Highly honoured by the Athenians, 118. Reinſtated by Gabinius, 119. Confirmed by Cæſar, 126. Allies with him, 127. Fatal partiality to Herod, 130. Cowardice, 136. Carried to Barzapharnes, 142. Diſqualified by the loſs of his ears, 143, & (T). Carried priſoner into Parthia, 144. Highly reſpected there, 157. Decoyed back by Herod, ib. & ſeq. Beheaded by him, 167.

I

Jacob's prophecy of the ſceptre, departing from Judah, explained, 421, & (O).
Jambrians, who, 40, (M). Puniſhed by Jonathan, 40.
James the Greater, ſon of Zebedee, made an apoſtle, 317, (T). With his brother ſurnamed Boanerges, ib. Beheaded by Agrippa, 431, & (W).
——— the Leſs, made an apoſtle, 317, (T). Why called the Lord's brother, ib. Why made biſhop of Jeruſalem, 419, & (N).

---- the ſon of Judas Galileus, crucified, 435.
Jamnia, where ſituate, 17, & (B). Burnt by Judas Maccabeus, 21. Given to Salome, 280.
Janneus, vid. Alexander, 87, & ſeq.
Janus, the temple of, ſhut up at the birth of Chriſt, 217, & (A). How oft before, ib.
Japhians, put to the ſword, 453.
Jazar taken by Judas Maccabeus, 15.
Idumea, new, deſcribed, 13, (Y). Conquered by Hyrcan, 74.
Idumeans forced to be circumciſed, 74, 75, & (P). Invited into Jeruſalem, 457. Return home, 459. Betrayed to Simon, 461.
Jericho taken by Bacchides, 42. Made one of the five courts of the province, 119.
---- the palace of, burnt, 276. Rebuilt by Archelaus, 282.
Jeruſalem rebuilt by Judas Maccabeus, 11. Fortified, 55. Diſmantled by Antiochus, 72. Beſieged by Pompey, 111. Taken, 114. How oft on the ſame day, ib. (T). Made one of the five courts of judicature, 119. Rebuilt by Antipater, 128, & 132. Beſieged by Herod, 152. Taken, ib. & ſeq. Its deſtruction foretold by Chriſt, 358, 359, & (B, C.) Inlarged by Agrippa, 431. The number of its inhabitants taken by Ceſtius, 444, & ſeq. Forſaken by crowds of Jews, 449, & (O). Torn into three factions, 465. Beſieged by Titus, 468, & ſeq. Its firſt wall entered, 470. Second taken, 471. Labours under peſtilence and famine, ib. Circumwalled, 472, & (N). Famiſhed, 473, & (O). Taken and deſtroyed, 475, & ſeq. 478, &c.
---- high city, taken by the Romans, 483. The number of Jewiſh priſoners made in it, ib. Prodigies foregoing its total ruin, 486. Razed, 487, & (B).
Jeſus the ſon of Sirach, an account of his writings, 73, (N).
-- - Chriſt, the redeemer of the world, his nativity foretold, 204, & ſeq. & (R, S, T.) Born at Bethlehem, 215. Birth proclaimed by angels, ib. Circumciſed, ib. The year of his birth computed, ib. (Z). Manifeſted to the eaſtern Magi, 217, & ſeq. Preſented at the temple, 223. Whether of the Eſſenian ſect, 243, & ſeq. Conveyed into Egypt, 258. Whence called a Nazarite, ib. The prophecy of it explained, ib. (H). At twelve years of age goes to the feſtival at Jeruſalem, 285. Stays three days there, ib. Aſks and anſwers queſtions of the doctors, ib. Firſt entrance into the miniſtry, 293, & ſeq. Baptiſm, 295.

295. First miracle at Cana, 297. Answer to his mother vindicated, ib. (H). Drives the traders out of the temple, 298. Other miracles, ib. Sublime discourse with Nicodemus, 301, & seq. & not. Goes into Galilee, 308. Cures the nobleman's son, ib. A dæmoniac, 309, & seq. Calls Simon Peter, 311. Cures a paralytic on the sabbath, 312. Calls Matthew, ib. & seq. Silences the offended Jews, 315, & (S). Chuses his twelve apostles, 317, & (T). His sermon on the mount, 319. Heals the centurion's servant, 320. Raises the widow's son, ib. & seq. His yoke, why light, 321, & (X). Absolves the sinful woman, 322. Condemns infidelity, 323, & (A). Why he spoke in parables, 326. Stills the winds and sea, ib. Heals two fierce dæmoniacs, 327. Raises the ruler's daughter, 328. Why he concealed his miracles, 329, (G). Sends his apostles to preach, 330. Feeds five thousand with five loaves, 332. Walks on the sea, ib. Forsaken by many of his hearers, 333. Reproves the Pharisees, 335. Heals the Syro-Phœnician's daughter, 337. Goes to Tyre, and Sidon, &c. 336. Feeds four thousand with seven loaves, 337. Cures a blind man, 338. Jews opinion of him, 339. Foretells his own death, ib. & 342. Is transfigured upon the mount, 340. Heals a dæmoniac, 342. Pays the tribute, 343. Checks his apostles ambition, 343. Enjoins humility, forgiveness, &c. 344, & seq. Reproved by his kinsfolk, 345. Appoints seventy disciples, 346. Teaches in the temple, ib. Acquits the adultress, 348. Reproved for curing on the sabbath, 351. Raises Lazarus, 354. Some circumstances of the miracle examined, ib. (Y). Triumphant entry into Jerusalem, 357, & seq. Foretells its ruin with tears, ib. & seq. (B, C.) Drives traders out of the temple, 360. Curse of the fig-tree vindicated, 363, (F). Silences the Jewish sects, 364, & seq. Washes his disciples feet, 368. Describes the day of judgment, 369. Celebrates the last supper, 370, & (L). His agony in the garden, 371, 372, & (O). Brought bound before the sanhedrin, 373. Tried and condemned, ib. & seq. Denied by Peter, 374. Sent to Pilate, 377. To Herod, 378. Brought back and scourged, ib. Accused of blasphemy and condemned to the cross, 380. Crucified, 383. The hour when, 382, (Y). Absolves the penitent thief, 384, & (B). His last prayer, 385. Expires, 386. Why pierced in the side, 389. Why buried apart, 390. His tomb, why sealed and guarded, ib. & (F). His resurrection, 392. Appears to the eleven, 394. To the reſt, 395, & (B). Commiſſion to them, 396. Aſcends into heaven, 401, & (D). Teſtimony of other authors concerning him, 402, (E).

---- the ſon of Damneus, made high-prieſt, 442. Goes over to Titus, 447.
---- the ſon of Gamaliel put in his ſtead, 442. Their fatal enmity againſt each other, ib. --- Oppoſes the Zealots, 457. Put to death by them, 458.
---- the ſon of Ananus, a dreadful prophet againſt Jeruſalem, 443. His ſufferings and death, 444, 470.
Jewiſh government, how altered by Pompey, 115. By Gabinius, 119, & (A). Reſtored by Cæſar, 126, 127, & (F).
----camp, the battle of, 125.
Jews, butchered in many places, 21, & ſeq. Their idolatrous ſuperſtition puniſhed, 25. In high favour in Egypt, 48. Build a ſchiſmatic temple there, ib. & (T). Superſtition fatal to Jeruſalem, 113. Dreadfully butchered there, 114. Highly favoured by Julius Cæſar, 127, 132. Complaints againſt Herod rejected, 138. Puniſhed, 140. Conſpire againſt him, 175. Frivolous anſwers to the chriſtians, 210, (S), 215, (Z). Cauſes of their infidelity and ruin, 225, & ſeq. Various ſects, 226, & ſeq. Two falſe notions concerning the Meſſiah confuted, 260, ſub not. Mutiny againſt Archelaus, 269. Puniſhed, 270. Take up arms againſt Sabinus, 274. Two thouſand of them crucified, 278. Send an embaſſy to Rome, ib. Revolt under Judas Galileus, 283, & ſeq. Why expelled Rome, 288. Petition Pilate againſt his ſtandards, 289. And ſhields, 290. Their infatuated ſtate at the appearing of Chriſt, 291, & ſeq. The cauſe of their rejection and ruin, 292, (E). Their incredulity accounted for, 298, (I). Offended at Chriſt's ſpiritual doctrine, 333. Had the power of life and death till after his time, 374, (R). 421, & (O). Perſecuted at Alexandria, 424. Raiſe new troubles, 434, & ſeq. Deluded by falſe prophets, 437. Break out into open rebellion, 445, & ſeq. Maſſacred every-where, 446, & ſeq. Prepare for an obſtinate defence, 449. Divided into factions, 455, 456, & (X). Cruelly butchered, 472, & ſeq. Famiſhed, 473, (O). 475, (P). Set fire to the galleries of the temple, 475. Maſſacred by the Romans, 481. Strict faſt for Jeruſalem, 482. Sum total of their ſlain in the laſt war, 484, & ſeq.
Joazar made high-prieſt, 266. Depoſed by Archelaus, 282. By Cyrenius, 283, (W).

John the Maccabee, killed by the Jambrians, 40.
----- the ſon of Simon, made general, 62. Defeats the Syrians, 66. Why ſurnamed Hyrcan, ib. (H). & 72, & ſeq. Cætera vid. ſub Hyrcan, ib. & ſeq.
----- the baptiſt's birth foretold, 200, & ſeq. Fulfilled, 212, & (U). Brought up among the Eſſenians, 243. His life, preaching, &c. 294, & (F). Baptizes Chriſt, 295. Reproves Herod,'s inceſt, 305. Impriſoned and beheaded for it, ib. & ſeq. Joſephus's character of him, 307, & ſeq.
—— the beloved diſciple takes the virgin mother to his home, 384. Runs with Peter to the ſepulchre, 392. Not to die till the coming of Chriſt, 400.
Jonah's whale deſcribed, 325, (C).
Jonathan the Maccabee ſucceeds his brother Judas, 39. Reveneges on the Jambrians his brother's death, 40. Defeated at Teckoa, 41. Defeats a conſpiracy, 43. Beats and makes peace with Bacchides, ibid. & ſeq. Judges the Jews, 44. Made high-prieſt, 46, & (R). Sides with Alexander, 46. His reception at Ptolemais, 47. Defeats Apollonius, 50. Beſieges, Acra, 51. In high favour with Nicator ib. (U). Joins with Antiochus, ib. Falls into an ambuſh, and beats the Demetrians, 53. Betrayed by Typhon, 56. Murdered, 57. His ſepulchre deſcribed, 58, (Z).
——— the ſon of Abſalom takes Joppa, 60.
——— a zealous Sadducee ſets Hyrcan againſt the Phariſees, 81, (W).
——— the ſon of Ananus made high-prieſt, 415. Refuſes a ſecond pontificate, 430. Ill requited by Felix, 437, & ſeq.
——— a Jewiſh impoſtor's puniſhment, 491, (G).
Joppa deſtroyed by Judas Maccabeus, 21. Taken by Simon, 55. Deſcribed, ib. Taken by the Romans, 453.
Joſeph the Maccabee left governor of Jeruſalem, 16. Deeated by Georgias, 18.
——— the third ſon of Antipater, 129, (H). Left in care of Herod's family, 143. Beſieged in Maſſada, 146. Defeated and killed, 150.
——— Herod's uncle diſcloſes his orders to Mariamne, 162. Put to death, 163.
——— the huſband of the virgin Mary, his genealogy, 205, (Q). Death, 286, (X).
——— of Arimathea buries the body of Chriſt, 389, & ſeq.
——— the ſon of Cami, made high-prieſt, 434.
Joſephus, the Jewiſh hiſtorian, cenſured for differing from the book of Maccabees, 66, (G). 67, (I). Another mi-take take corrected, 76, (R). His teſtimony concerning Chriſt diſcuſſed, 402, (E). Releaſes ſome Jewiſh prieſts at Rome, 430, in fin. (F). Made governor of Galilee, 449. His brave defence of Jotapa, 450. Surrender, 451, & (R). Speech to Veſpaſian, ibid. & ſeq. Promoted by him, 464, (F). Sent with offers of peace to the Jews, 469. Speech to the beſieged, 471, & ſeq. Wounded by them, 476. Suſpected by the Romans, ib. (R). Beloved by Titus, ib. & ſeq.

——— the ſon of Gorion, made governor of Jeruſalem, 449.

——— Ben Gorion, a fabulous author, trumped up by the Jews againſt the former, 493.

Jotapa taken by the Romans, 450, & (Q). Number of Jews there ſlain, 485.

Ireneus pleads Antipater's cauſe before the Roman ſenate, 271, & ſeq.

Iſaiah's prophecies concerning the Meſſiah explained, 207, & ſeq. & notes.

Iſdegertes, king of Perſia, 594. His character, ib. Made guardian to Theodoſius, ib. & 595, & (N). Becomes a favourer of the chriſtians, 596, & ſeq.

Iſhmael I. made high-prieſt, 286.

——— II. ſucceeds Ananias, 439. Depoſed for his zeal, 441. Detained as an hoſtage at Rome, ib.

Iſpahan, a city of Parthia, the antient Aſpa, 496.

Itabyr mount deſcribed, 454, (W).

Iturea given to Herod, 178, & (V).

Itureans, why ſo called, 85, (B). Forced to circumciſe, 85.

Judas Maccabeus ſucceeds his father, 1, & ſeq. Defeats the Syrians, 5, 7. Speech to his troops, 6. Defeats Lyſias, 9, & (T). Reſtores the divine worſhip, 11. Defeats the Idumeans, 15, Timotheus, 16. Succeſs in Gilead, 17. In Idumea, &c. 18. Makes peace with Syria, 19. Defeats the Arabians, 22. Timotheus, 23. Takes ſeveral cities, ib. & ſeq. Returns victorious, 25, & (H), Offers ſacrifices for the dead, 26, & (I). Forces Antiochus to a peace, 27. Defeats Alcimus, 30. Eſcapes Nicanor's treachery, 33. Defeats and kills him, 35. Allies with Rome, 36. Why ſtyled higl -prieſt by the Romans, 37, (L). Defeated and killed, 38.

——— al. Jude, choſen an apoſtle, 317, (T).

——— Galileus, head of the Gaulonitiſh faction, 235. Raiſes an inſurrection, 284, & ſeq.

——— a Jewiſh doctor, raiſes a ſedition againſt Herod, 264. Burnt alive, 265.

——— the

——— the ſon of Hezechias, raiſes a new ſedition, 275. Suppoſed the Theudas of St. Luke 476, & (S).
——— Iſcariot, one of the twelve apoſtles, 317, (T). Whence ſo called, ib. in fin. not. Why choſen into the college, 334, (I). His covetouſneſs reproved, 356. His reſentment at it, 357, & 367, & (I). Sells his maſter, 369. Betrays him, 372. His remorſe, 375. Kind of death, ib. (S).
Judea reſtored by Judas Maccabeus, 2, & ſeq. Invaded by Lyſias, 15. By Bacchides, 29. Freed by Jonathan, 55. Subdued by Pompey, 114. Deeply taxed by Caſſius, 134. Viſited with peſtilence and famine, 176. Laid waſte by ſeveral factions, 275, & ſeq. Made a province of the Roman empire, 433. Infeſted with Sicarii, 437. Filled with ſlaughter, &c. 446, ad fin. cap.
Judgment, the day of, deſcribed by Chriſt, 369, Julian invades Perſia, 587, & ſeq. Drawn into great difficulties, 588. Deceived by a deſerter, ib. & ſeq. His defeat and death, 589. Character, 590, (K).
Julias, by whom built, 288.

K.

Karaites, whence ſo called, 245, & (F). Their founder, ſect, &c. ib. (G), & ſeq. When they ſeparated from the traditionaliſts, 248, 249, (I, K). Their principles, 250, & ſeq. Why omitted by Joſephus, 249, (L). Hated by the other Jews, 252, 253, (O). Their character, ib. & ſeq.
Kaſhan, a city in Parthia, 496.
Kom, a city in Parthia, 496.

L.

Labienus, a Roman general of Pompey's party, commands the Parthian forces 530. His conqueſts in Syria, 531. Defeated, 532. Surprized by Ventidius, and taken and put to death, ib.
Lamb, the daily ſacrifice of, ceaſed, 478.
Lambs, the computation taken from them, uncertain, 444, (K).
Laſthenes inthrones young Nicator, 51, (U).
Laurence's ſurpriſing conſtancy paralleled from unqueſtionable teſtimony, 396, (C).
Lazarus entertains Chriſt at ſupper, 350, 356. Raiſed from the dead, 354, & (Y).

Lebbeus, vid. James the Leſs, 317, (T).
Levi, the evangeliſt, why ſurnamed Matthew, 312, (Q) Vindicated againſt Porphyry, &c. ib. Made an apoſtle, 317, (T).
Levites allowed to wear white garments, 442.
Libanius pagan orator of Antioch, his account of the ſurpriſing conſtancy of ſome chriſtian martyrs, 398, note. His character, writings, &c. ib. & ſeq.
Lights, the feaſt of, among the Jews, whence ſo called, 12, (W).
Longinus Caſſius ſent governor of Judea, 434.
Lucullus invades Pontus, &c. 101.
Lyſias ſent againſt the Jews, 5. Defeated by Judas Maccabeus, 9, & (T). Invades Judea, 15, 18. Defeated at Bethſura, 19. Sues for peace, ib. Puts the apoſtate high-prieſt to death, 28.
Lyſimachus, the brother of Apollodorus, murders him, 89.

M.

M*Accabees*, why ſo called, 1, (P). Their wars, ib. & ſeq.
——— books of, 3, note.
Macheras inſulted by Antigonus, 150.
Macheron taken by the zealots, 447. By the Romans, 488, 489, & (D).
Madeba taken by Hyrcan, 74.
Magdala, where ſituate, 337, (M).
Magdalen Mary's attention to Chriſt's preaching, 350. Falſely confounded with one of another character, ib. (U). Her profuſion of ointment unjuſtly blamed, 356. Preſence at the crucifixion, 384. Brings tidings of Chriſt's reſurrection, 392, & ſeq.
Magi come from the eaſt, 217, & ſeq. & (B). Their preſents to Chriſt, 222, & (D).
——— of Perſia, raiſe a perſecution againſt the chriſtians, 581. Put a ridiculous trick upon the king, 596. Decimated for it, ib. Cruelty to the chriſtians, 597.
Malabarcha among the Jews, his office, 47, (S).
Malchus king of Arabia's ingratitude to Herod, 143.
Malichus conſpires againſt Antipater, 134. Who he was, ib. (L). Poiſons him, 135. Outwitted and aſſaſſinated by Herod, ib. & ſeq.
Manes the arch-heretic, when he flouriſhed, 573. His doctrine and death, ib. (E).

Manlius T. interpoſes in favour of the Jews, 19, 20.
Marathas, a chriſtian biſhop, highly honoured by the Perſians, 595, & ſeq. Cures the king of an inveterate headach, 596. Heals the prince of Perſia, who was poſſeſſed, 597.
Mareſſa, where ſituate, 78, (S).
Mariamne, Hyrcan's grand-daughter, contracted to Herod, 137. Her character, 146. Marriage, 151, & (Z). Alienated from him by his barbarity and bloody orders, 162, & ſeq. Accuſed, ſhews her innocence, ib. Sent to Maſſada, 168. Accuſed of treaſon, 170. Her heroic behaviour at her death, 172.
——— the daughter of Simon married to Herod, 177. Accuſed of treaſon, 199.
——— daughter of Herod Agrippa, 433. Her incontinency, 438, (E).
Marion, prince of Tyre, joins with Antigonus, 137, & (N).
Mark, the evangeliſt, whether the founder of the Therapeutes, 243.
——— a chriſtian biſhop's noble martyrdom related by Libanius, 398, note.
Mars, the temple of, built by Auguſtus, 543.
Marſyas, a chriſtian martyr's conſtancy from heathen teſtimony, 399, ſub not.
Martace, one of Herod's wives, and mother of Archelaus and Antipas, 197, ſub not. Goes to Rome with her ſon, 270.
Martha's worldly care condemned, 350.
Martyrdom of the firſt chriſtians, an inſtance of the divine wiſdom, 396, not.
Marullus made governor of Judea, 423.
Mary the mother of Chriſt ſaluted by the angel, 204, 211. Her lineage from David ſhewn, 205, & (Q). Viſit to Elizabeth, 211. Return to Nazareth, 212. Delivered at Bethlehem, 215. Maintained by her ſon, 286, (X). Attends him at his crucifixion, 384. Taken home by St. John, ib.
——— Magdalen, vid. ſub Magdalen, 350, & ſeq.
Maſſada beſieged by Antigonus, 146. Taken by the zealots, 446. By the Romans, 488, 489. The deſperate end of the Jews there 489, & ſeq.
Mattathias a Jewiſh high-prieſt depoſed, 265.
Matthew called by Chriſt, 312. His readineſs juſtified, ib. (Q).
Matthias a Jewiſh high-prieſt, defiled on expiation eve, 199, (O).

——— a Jewiſh doctor, raiſes a new tumult, 264. Burnt alive, 265.
——— a diſciple of Chriſt, choſen apoſtle, 405, & (G).
——— a Jew made high-prieſt, 430. Lets Simon into the city, 463. Put to death, 475, 476.
Maximus defeated by Choſroes and ſlain, 555.
Mebodes made truſtee of Cavades's teſtament, 614.
Meherdates ſet up againſt Gotarzes, and ſupported by the emperor Claudius, 549. Betrayed by Abgarus, 550. Defeated and taken priſoner, 551.
Memmius Q. friendſhip to the Jews, 19, & ſeq.
Menahem, an Eſſenian, foretels Herod's riſe, 156, ſub not. Who he was, ib.
——— head of the zealots, maſſacred by them, 447.
Menelaus promotes a peace with Syria, 20. Put to a cruel death, 28.
Mermeroes, general of the Perſians, defeated by the Romans, 612. Outwitted by the Martyropolitans, 613.
Meſopotamia conquered by Mithridates, 502.
Michmaſh, where ſituate, 44, (P).
Mileſian fables, what, 527.
Mina of gold, 122, (C).
Miriam, a Jewiſh lady eats her own child at the ſiege of Jeruſalem, 473, & ſeq.
Miſdates, king of Perſia, vid. Hormiſdas II. 579.
Mithras, the Parthian name of the ſun, 499.
Mithridates reſcued by Antipater, 125, & 126, (E).
——— I. king of Parthia, his vaſt conqueſts, 502. Excellent character, ib. & ſeq.
——— II. Murders his father, 504. Driven out for his cruelties, 505. Put to death, ib.
——— king of Iberia, wars againſt the Parthians, 546.
Mizpa, a place of devotion to the Jews, 6, (R).
Moabites laid under tribute by Alexander Janneus, 91.
Moneſes goes to Marc Antony, 536. Adviſes him of the Parthian deſigns, 539.
——— general of Parthia, ſent into Armenia, 552. Diſappointed in his deſigns againſt Tigranes, ib.
Morinus's opinion of the Karaites, 249, (K).
Myrrhatum Vinum eſteemed by the Romans, 382, (Z).

N

Nain, where ſituated 320, (W). Widow's ſon raiſed from the dead, 321.
Narſes ſent to compliment Probus, 575. Mounts the Perſian throne, 577. Succeſs againſt Galerus, 578. Ill ſucceſs and death, ib. & ſeq.
——— Sapor's embaſſador to Conſtans, 584.
——— the Perſian general, ſent againſt the Romans, 598.
Nathanael called by Chriſt, 297.
Nazarenes offended at Chriſt's preaching, 309.
Nazarite, Chriſt, why ſo called, 258. That prophecy of him explained, ib. (H). The true ſenſe of that word, 260, ſub not.
Nicanor's fatal expedition againſt the Jews, 5, & ſeq. & 8. Sent a ſecond time, 31. Makes peace with Judas Maccabeus, ib. His treachery to him, 33. Cruelty to the Jews, 34, & ſeq. Blaſphemous ſpeech, 35. Defeat and death, ib.
——— Titus's general, wounded before Jeruſalem. 469.
Nicodemus, Ariſtobulus's embaſſador to Pompey, 109.
——— a Jewiſh ruler, comes to Chriſt by night, 301. The ſubſtance of Chriſt's doctrine to him, ib. & 302, note. Pleads for him againſt the Phariſees, 347. Embalms his body, 390.
Nicolas the deacon, whether author of the Nicolaitan ſect, 413, (L).
Niger, a Jewiſh captain, defeated before Aſcalon, 450. Narrow eſcape, ib.
Ninos taken by Meherdates, 550.
Niſibis, the province of, why given to Izates, 547. Taken by Trajan, 554. Reſtored to Sapor, 589. Invaded by the Romans, 598.

O.

Oath of fidelity required from the Jews by Herod, 180. Oppoſed by the Eſſenians and Phariſees, ib. Set aſide, ibid.
Oaths, how forbid by the Eſſenians, 241, & (C).
Obedas, king of Arabia, invaded by Alexander Jannæus, 91. Protects the plunderers of Judea, 193, & (K). Poiſoned by Syllæus, 194, (L).

Obolas, king of Perſia, vid. Valens, 603.
Octavianus, vid. Auguſtus, 144, & ſeq.
Octavius comes to Craſſus's aſſiſtance, 524. Killed, 526.
Odenatus, prince of Palmyrene's ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, 571.
Onias IV. Deprived of his ſucceſſion, 28. Retires into Egypt, ib. In high favour there, 48. Builds a Jewiſh temple, ib. & (T).
---- a devout Jew, murdered, 107.
Onion, the Jews of, very ſerviceable to Julius Cæſar, 125.
Ordonopantes, at the inſtigation of Bibulus, raiſes a rebellion in Parthia, 530.
Orodes, king of Parthia, murders his father, 504. Driven out, 505, Cruelty to his brother, ib. Invaded by Craſſus, 509. Embaſſy to him, 511. Aſſembles a numerous army. ib. Defeats the Romans, 520, & ſeq. Makes peace with Armenia, 527. Ingratitude to Surena, 528. Ill ſucceſs in Syria, ib. & ſeq. Refuſes ſuccours to Pompey, 530. Defeated by Ventidius, 533. Exceſſive grief for the loſs of his ſon Pacorus, 534. Takes Phrahates into partnerſhip, 536. Murdered by him, ib.
---- II. murdered for his ſavage temper, 544.
---- the ſon of Artabanus, defeated, 546.
Oromaſes, beheaded for debaſing his character, 504.
Orſaces, general of Parthia's ſucceſs againſt Syria, 528. Defeated by Caſſius and killed, 529.
Owl, pearches twice over king Agrippa's head, 433, in fin. (X).

P.

Pabec, the foſter-father of Artaxares, 564, 565.
Pacorus joins with Antigonus againſt Herod, 140. Defeated, 141. Treachery to Phaſael, 142.
———— the ſon of Orodes, fortifies Cteſiphon, 495. Allies with Armenia, 528. Sent againſt Syria, ib. His conqueſts, 530, & ſeq. Defeated and killed, 533. His character, 534.
———— I. king of Parthia's alliance with Rome, 504.
———— II. his reign, 554. Lives in friendſhip with the Romans, ib.
Paleas, by whom called Cæſarea, 288.
Pallas, one of Herod's wives, her iſſue, 197, not.
Palmyreans, defeated by Aurelian, 574.
Pappus kills Herod's brother, 150. Defeated and killed, 151.

Parables, why ſo frequently uſed by Chriſt, 326.
Paros, the Jews of, redreſſed by Cæſar, 132, 133, (K).
Parthanaſpates, made king of Parthia, 555. Driven out, 556.
Parthia deſcribed, 495. How divided, 476. Waſted by the Scythians, 503, & ſeq. Its kings, 501, & ſeq. Subdued by Trajan, 555. End of its monarchy, 560, & ſeq.
Parthians, whence deſcended, 496, & ſeq. Their cuſtoms, &c. 497. Excellent archery, ib. & (A). Religion, 499. Government, kings, &c. ib. & ſeq. Invade Judæa in favour of Antigonus, 140, & ſeq. Plunder Herod's palace, 143. Set Antigonus on the throne, ib. & ſeq. Invaded by Craſſus, 508, & ſeq. Defeat him, 521, & ſeq. Defeated by Caſſius, 529. Driven out of Syria, 532, & ſeq. Subdued by the Perſians, 560.
Paul perſecutes the church, 414. Pleads his cauſe before Felix, 438. Left in bonds by him, 439. Pleads before Feſtus, 440. Appeals to Rome, ib. Defence before king Agrippa, ib.
Pella taken by Alexander Janneus, 95. Demoliſhed, ib.
Peluſium, taken by Cæſar, 125.
Poroſes king of Perſia's expedition againſt the Euthalites or white Huns, 601. In great diſtreſs ſwears never to invade them, ib. & 602, (O). Invades them a ſecond time, 602. Cut off with his whole army, ib.
Perſia, the hiſtory of, 562, & ſeq.
Perſians ſubdue the Parthians, 560, & ſeq. Their hiſtory, 562, & ſeq.
Peter the apoſtle called, and ſurnamed Cephas, 297, 311, 317, (T). Walks on the ſea, 332. Noble confeſſion, 333, 339. Why blamed for his modeſt non-compliance, 368, (K). For his zeal, 372. Denies his maſter, 374. Haſtens to his ſepulchre, 392. His commiſſion and martyrdom, 396. Firſt ſermon makes 3000 converts, 406. Firſt miracle 5000 more, 410. His ſpeech to the ſanhedrin, ib. & ſeq. Second defence, 411. Miraculous deliverance from Herod, 432. Prophecy againſt the Jews, 452, & (S).
Petor, where ſituate, 218, note.
Petronius ordered by Caligula to perſecute the Jews, 426. His favour to them, ib.
Phædra, one of Herod's wives, her iſſue, 197, ſub not.
Phannius, an obſcure prieſt, made pontiff by the zealots, 456, (Y).
Pharaſmanes's ſucceſs in Armenia, 546.

Phariſees,

Phariſees, their riſe, 80, & 226. Enmity to Hyrcan, 81, & (W). Cauſe a revolt againſt Alexander Jannæus, 92. Inſolent anſwer to him, ibid. Impudent behaviour to his queen, 98. Cruelty to the Sadducees, ib. Requited by Ariſtobulus, 102, & ſeq. Their peculiar doctrines, 227, & ſeq. Cauſe of ther infidelity, 228, & ſeq. Reproved by the baptiſt, 296. By Chriſt much more, 335, & ſeq. Two falſe notions of theirs confuted, 260, note, & 349. Put to ſilence, 364. The reſt vid. ſub Jews.
Phaſael, Herod's brother, 129, & (H). Made governor of Jeruſalem, 135. Made tetrarch by Marc Antony, 139. Betrayed by Pacorus, 143. Kills himſelf, 144.
—— the ſon of Herod by Pallas, 197, ſub not.
Phaſaelis, the fortreſs of, built by Heood, 190. Bequeathed to Salome, 280.
Pheroras, Herod's fourth brother, 129, (H). Flies into Idumea, 142. Made tetrarch, 180, & (W.). Accuſed by Alexander, Herod's ſon, 192. Joins with Antipater againſt Herod, 196. Leaves the court, 198. Refuſes to come to his ſick brother, ib. His death diſcovers the whole plot, ib. & ſeq.
Philarchus, a bitter enemy of the Jews, killed, 8.
Philip the ſon of Herod by Mariamne, 197, (N). ---- By Cleopatra, ib. Made tetrarch, 266. His ſhare of the Jewiſh kingdom, 280. His death and character, 412, & ſeq.
——— the apoſtle, called by Chriſt, 297, 317, (T).
——— preaches at Samaria, 415.
——— the murderer of Gordian,, makes peace with Sapores, 570.
Philippion put to death by his father Mennæus, 124.
Philiſtines invaded by Judas Maccabeus, 18.
Philo's account of the Eſſenians, 237, & ſeq. Why different from Joſephus's, 240, (B).
Phlegon's eclipſe quoted by the fathers, 385, (C).
Phraatices murders his father, 544. Baniſhed, ibid.
Phrahates I. king of Parthia, overcomes the Mardi, 502.
——— II. defeated by Antiochus, 503. Defeated by the Scythians, ibid. His death, ibid.
——— III. was with Tigranes, 504. Murdered by his ſons, ib.
——— IV. bloody reign, 536. Defeats the king of Media 541. Dethroned, 542. Makes peace with Octavianus, 543. Poiſoned, 544.
Pilate, Pontius, made governor of Judea, 287. His character, ib. & (Z). Exaſperates the Jews, 289, & ſeq. Reproved proved by Tiberius, 290. Attempt on the treasury of the temple, 291. Tries and condemns Christ, 377, & 380, (W). His severity to the Samaritans, 415. Depolition and banishment, 416. His acts, the validity of, discussed, ib. (M).

Pitolaus, a chief of the Roman faction in Judea, 119. Goes over to Aristobulus, 120. Put to death, 123.
Placidus's success in Judea, 463.
Pliny's account of the Essenians, 238.
Polemon, king of Pontus, marries Berenite, and embraces Judaism, 438, (E).
Pollio's policy to gain Herod's favour, 155, (A).
Pompey invited by Aristobulus 108. Hears the pleas of the contending brothers, 109. Partiality for Hyrcan, 110. Besieges Jerusalem, 111. Takes it, 114. Enters into the most holy place, 115. Returns to Rome, 117.
Pontius Pilate, vid. sub Pilate, 287, & seq.
Poppea's friendship to the Jews, 439, in fin. (F), & 441. Josephus's flattering character of that princess, ib. (G).
Potters field, the buying of, price, &c. foretold, 376.
Praaspa besieged by Marc Antony, 537. The siege raised, 539.
Priapatius, third king of Parthia, 502.
Priesthood, high, become venal, 287.
Priestly vestments, where kept, 83, & seq.
Priests, high, fall into a civil war with the lower class, 439, & seq. & (F).
Priests, Jewish, admirable constancy amidst the slaughter in the temple, 114. Oppressed by the deposed pontiffs, 439, & (F). Sent to Rome, ib. in fin. (F).
Priscus Statius's success against the Parthians, 557. Drives them out of Armenia, ibid.
Procopius defeats the immortal troop of the Persians, 600.
Psalm xxii. in what sense repeated by Christ on the cross, 385, & (D). Its true lection vindicated, ibid.
Ptolemy Philometor's friendship to the Jewish high-priest, 50, & seq.
——— Lathyrus invades Judea, 87.
——— Macron sent against Judas Maccabeus, 5. Turned out by Lysias, 14, 15.
——— the treacherous son-in-law of Simon, 67. His perfidy and parricide, ib. & seq. Ill success against Hyrcan, ib. & (I).
——— Menneus's kindness to Aristobulus's family, 124.
Pyrrhonians, whether the Essenians were of their sect, 239.
Pythagorean doctrines held by the Essenians, 240.

Q.

Quadratus, governor of Syria, 436. Severity to the Jews, ibid. (A).

R.

Raba beſieged by Alexander Janneus, 96.
Raphia taken by Alexander Janneus, 89.
Raphon, where ſituate, 23.
Razis's great zeal for his religion, 34. His deſperate death, ib. & ſeq.
Reaſon, how far bound to yield to revelation, 305, (M).
Regeneration preached to Nicodemus, 301, 302, & (K).
Repta, the receptacle of the Jewiſh banditti, 193, [K].
Reſurrection, the ſtate of, deſcribed, 365, & ſeq.
Rhadamiſtus the Iberian driven out of Armenia by Vologeſes, 551.
Rhodagune given to Demetrius Nicator, 502.
Roman ſenate's partiality to Herod, 145. Cætera vid. ſub Romans.
—— empire, why viſited with peſtilence, 557.
Romans, their firſt alliance with the Jews, 36. Style Hyrcan king, 75, (Q). Friendſhip to the Jewiſh nation, 76. Defeated by the Parthians, 522.
Roxana, Herod's daughter by Phædra, 197, ſub not.
Rufus Anius ſent governor of Judea by Auguſtus, 286. Recalled by Tiberius, ib.

S.

Sabinus, intendant of Syria, goes to ſeize Herod's treaſure, 271. Beſieged by the ſeditious Jews, 274. Sets fire to the temple, ib. Sneaks out of Judea, 278.
Sacrifice daily, when ceaſed, 478, & (I).
Sadducees, why favoured by Alexander Janneus, 82. Perſecuted by the Phariſees, 98, & ſeq. Their peculiar tenets, 230, & ſeq. By whom founded, ib. Cauſes of their infidelity, ib. paſſ. Their character, 232. Fall, ib. Confuted by Chriſt, 365, & (G).
Salome, queen of the Jews, ſets Alexander Janneus on the throne, 87.
—— ſiſter of Herod, her character, 129, (H). Hatred to Mariamne, 162. Helliſh plots againſt her, 170. Saves her her husband, 173. Divorces him, ib. & (P). Cabals against Herod's sons by Mariamne, 187, 191, & (H). Accused by Alexander, 192. Raises new accusations, 194, & seq. Releases the Jewish chiefs, 267. Betrays Archelaus, 271. Her death, and last will, 286.

——— the daughter of Herod by Elpis, 197, sub not.
——— the fatal dancer begs the baptist's head, 307.
Salonicus's birth celebrated by Virgil, 147, (X).
Samaria closely besieged, 79. Demolished, ib. Rebuilt by Gabinius, 119. By Herod, 175, & (R). The rest vid. sub Sebaste, 175, & seq.
Samaritans invaded by Judas Maccabeus, 18. Subdued by Hyrcan, 74, & (O), 78, & seq. Pollute the Jewish temple, 285. Converted to christianity, 415. Deceived by an impostor, ibid. Fall out with the Jews, 435. Cast at Rome, 436. Defeated by Cerealis, 453.
Sameas's noble speech against Herod, 130, vid. & Shammai.
Samega taken by Hyrcan, 74.
Sanhedrin's various consultations against Christ, 347, 351, 355, 369. Unjust sentence against him, 374. Why they sent him to Pilate, ib. (R). Horrid hypocrisy, 376. Inveteracy, 378, & seq. Revile him on the cross, 383. Obduracy 389. Suppress his resurrection, 393. And the propagation of the gospel, 411.
Sapores I. king of Persia, his character, 569. Success against the Romans, ib. & seq. Barbarity to Valerian, 571, & (D). Manner of his death, 573.
——— II. Crowned in his mother's womb, 579. Persecutes the christians, 581. Ill success against the Romans, 583, pass. Letter to Constans, 584. Success against him, 586. Invaded by Julian, 587. Defeats him, 588. Makes peace with Jovian, 589, 590, & (K). His character as a general vindicated, ib. Other conquests, 591, & (L). Death, 592.
——— III. his reign, 594.
Saracens, a hundred thousand cut off by the Romans, 599.
Saramael, some conjectures concerning that place, 59, in fin. (A).
Sasan, the father of Artaxares, conqueror of Parthia, and founder of the Persian monarchy, 565.
Saturnius votes that the sons of Herod be punished, 195.
Saul's conversion, vid. Paul, 414., & seq.
Sawa, a city in Parthia, 496.
Scaurus gained by Aristobulus, 108. His letter to Aretas, ib. Made governor of Syria, 115.

Sceptre, when wholly departed from Judah, 421, & ſeq. vid. & (O).
Scythians, their friendſhip to the Jews, 24.
Scythopolis betrayed to Hyrcan, 79.
Scythopolitans barbarous ingratitude to the Jews, 447, (M).
Sebaſte, Samaria, why ſo called, 119, 175, (R).
Sects among the Jews, an account of them, 226, & ſeq.
Sejanus, whence his hatred to the Jews, 288, 289, & (B).
Seleucia taken by Alexander Janneus, 95.
Sephoris in Galilee, made one of the five courts, 119. Where ſituate, 275, (R). Taken and deſtroyed, 277. Rebuilt and fortified by Antipas, 287.
Seron defeated and killed, 5.
Seſoſes's fidelity to Cavades, 606. Rewarded, 607. Put to death, 611.
Severus's ſucceſs in Parthia, 558. Obtains the ſurname of Parthicus, Armenicus, and Adiabenicus, ib. Succeſs againſt the Perſians, 567.
Shammai, a famed Jewiſh doctor, 131, (I). Oppoſes Herod's oath of fidelity, 180.
Shechem taken by Hyrcan, 74. Where ſituate, 308, (N).
Shepherds, true and falſe, deſcribed, 352, & ſeq.
Sicarii in Judea, their cruelties, 437, & (C). Inſolence, 442. Join with the zealots, 446, & ſeq. --- a new ſet of them, 460.
Silo's falſhood to Antigonus, 147. To Herod, 148.
Simeon's teſtimony of the child Jeſus, 224. Conjectures concerning him, 223, (E).
——— a ſeditious Jew, burns and waſtes Judea, 276, & ſeq. Beheaded, ib.
Simon the Maccabee's ſucceſs in Galilee, 17. Made general by Antiochus, 52. Takes Bethzura, 53. Joppa, and puts Judea in a ſtate of defence, 55. Succeeds his brother, 56. Outwitted by Tryphon, 57. Buries his brother at Modin, 58. Renews his alliances, ib. &c. Letter to Demetrius, ib. & ſeq. Fortifies Judea, and takes Joppa and Gaza, 60. Takes the title of prince, &c. 59, & (A). Ungratefully treated by Antiochus, 64. His character, 62, (D). Alliances with Rome, &c. 64. His coin deſcribed, 63, (E). Anſwer to Antiochus, 65. Riches, ib. & ſeq. Treacherouſly murdered, 67, ——— father-in-law to Herod, made high-prieſt, 177. Depoſed, 199.
——— Peter the apoſtle, vid. ſub Peter, 297, & ſeq.

——— the Canaanite, why ſo called 317, (T).
——— a proud Phariſee, offended at Chriſt's charity, 322.
——— the leper, entertains Chriſt at ſupper, 367, & (I).
——— a Cyrenean, helps to bear the croſs after him, 381.
——— Magus converted to chriſtianity, 415. Gives a new name to an old ſin, ib.
——— Cantharas, made high-prieſt, 430.
——— a ſurly lawyer mollified by Agrippa, 430, (U).
——— the ſon of Judas Galileus, crucified, 435.
——— a Jew of Scythopolis, his deſperate end, 447, (M).
——— head of the new ſicarii, raiſes an army againſt the zealots, 460. Invades Idumea, 461. Marches againſt Jeruſalem, 462, & ſeq. Beſieges John in the temple, 463. Holds the city againſt him and the Romans, 469, & ſeq. Bloody ingratitude to Matthias, 475, & ſeq. Deſires a parley with Titus, 482. Taken priſoner, 487. His puniſhment, 488.
Singara taken and ruined by Sapor, 586.
Sinnaces conſpires againſt Artabanus, 545. Put to death, ibid.
Sohemus betrays Herod's cruel order to Mariamne, 169. Put to death, 171.
Soſius left governor of Syria, 150. Aſſiſts Herod, 151. Contempt of Antigonus, 153.
Sozomen's account of Sapor II. 582, (H).
Standards, Roman, why abhorred by the Jews, 289. Introduced into Jeruſalem by Pilate, ib.
Star, miraculous, appears to the eaſtern magi, 220, & ſeq. Deſcribed, ib. (C).
Stater, what, 343, (Q).
Statianus marching to join Antony is cut off by the Parthians, 538.
Stephen the protomartyr, his character, 413. Death, 414.
Straton's tower, by whom built, 175, (R). vid. Cæſarea.
——— a gallery in the royal palace ſo called, 86, (C).
Sun miraculouſly darkened at the crucifixion, 385, (C).
——— worſhipped by the Parthians, 499.
Surena's character, 512. Recovers Meſopotamia, 513. Stratagem againſt the Romans, 516, 517. Defeats them, 522, & ſeq. Takes Craſſus, 525. His mock cavalcade, 527. Inveighs againſt the debauchery of the Romans, ib. Put to death by Orodes, 528.
Swine, the herd of, drowned, 327, & (E).
Sylla's haughty behaviour to the Parthians, 504.

Syllæus's hatred to Herod, the cauſe of, 193, (K). Accuſation of him to Cæſar, 194. Put to death, ib. (L).
Syria invaded by the Parthians, 528. Revolts from the Romans, 530.
Syrians defeated by the Maccabees, 7.
Syrophænician woman, her ſingular faith, 336, & ſeq. Country, ib. (K).

T

Tacitus's character of Felix, 436, in fin. (B).
Tarichea taken by the Romans, 453, & (U).
Tekoah, the fight of, 41, & (MM).
Temple of Jeruſalem purified by Judas Maccabeus, 10, & ſeq. Walls demoliſhed by Alcimus, 42, & (N). Its moſt ſacred place entered by Pompey, 115. Rebuilt by Herod, 180, 181. Whether to be reckoned a new temple, 181, (Y). How long it was a building, 182, & (Z). Its deſcription, 183, & (B). Dedication, 193. Polluted by the Samaritans, 285. Forced by the zealots, 457. Defended by John de Ghiſchala, 482. Its gates fired, 475. The ſanctuary burnt, 480, & (X). Plundered 481.
——— at Samaria, vid. Garizzim, 74, & (O).
——— in Egypt, deſcribed, 48, (T). Shut up and plundered, 491, & (F).
Terebinthus, a heretic, vid. Buda, 573, (E).
Thaddeus, vid. James the Leſs, 317, (T).
Theodoſius left under the guardianſhip of Iſdegertes, 594. Lives in the ſtricteſt friendſhip with him, ib. Wars with the Perſians, 598, & ſeq, Theodotus ſtript of his vaſt treaſure, 95.
Theophilus made high prieſt, 418,
Therapeutes, their ſect, life, &c. 239. Prophetic ſpirit, 241. Auſterity, 242. Worſhip, ib. & ſeq. Whether Jews or Chriſtians, 243, & ſeq.
Thermuſa married to Phrahates, 543. Perſuades him to ſend his four ſons hoſtages to Auguſtus, ib. Poiſons him, 544.
Theudas, a Jewiſh impoſtor, beheaded, 434, (Z), & 435.
Thief, the penitent, why abſolved, 384, & (B).
Thieves, crucified with Chriſt, who, 383, (A).
Thimnatha fortified by Bacchides, 42.
Thomas Didymus, one of the twelve apoſtles, 317, (T). His incredulity reproved, 395.

Tiberias, by whom built, 287. Taken by the Romans, 453, & (U).
——— the ſea of, whence ſo called, 288 & (A).
Tiberius Cæſar, the fifteenth year of, how computed, 286.
Tigranes invades Syria, 101. Made king of Armenia, 551.
Tigranocerta taken by the Parthians, 551.
Timotheus defeated by Judas Maccabeus, 7. A ſecond time, and killed, 16.
——— invades Gilead, and defeated, 17. A ſecond time, 21, & ſeq. Taken priſoner, 24.
Tiridates ſet upon the Parthian throne, 542. Wars with Phrahates, ib. & ſeq.
——— the ſon of Phrahates ſet up by Tiberius, 546. Driven out by Artabanus, 547.
——— brother of Vologeſes, made king of Armenia, 551. Waits on Nero at Rome and receives the crown from him, 553.
Titus the ſon of Veſpaſian joins his father in Judea, 455. Puts off his journey to Rome, 464. Rejoins his father at Cæſarea, ib. Left commander in Judea, 465. Gratitude to Joſephus, 464, (F). Marches againſt Jeruſalem, 466, & ſeq. Order of his army, ib. (I). Lays ſiege to the place, 468. Engages the enemy, ib. (L). His frequent offers of peace, rejected, 469, & ſeq. Swears the deſtruction of the city, 474. Endeavours to ſave the temple, 480. Enters the ſanctuary, 481. Carries off the ſacred utenſils, ib. Shews mercy to many Jews,, 481, 482, & (Y, Z). Enters the city, 483. Triumph and trophies, 488, & (C). Cuts off the reliques of the houſe of Judah, 490. His fondneſs for Berenice, 492.
Tob, the Jews of, maſſacred, 16. The territories of, invaded by the Maccabees, 22.
Trachonitis, where ſituate, 212, (W). Given to Herod, 178, & (V). Infeſted with banditti, 193, 212. Deſtroyed by Zamaris, 213. Bequeathed by Herod to Philip, 266.
Trajan ſent againſt Japhia, 453, & (T). Takes it and puts all the men to the ſword, ib. Succeſs againſt Choſrocs, 554, & ſeq. Subdues Parthia, 555.
Trebonian law, what, 506.
Trophies miſtaken for idols by the zealous Jews, 174.
Tryphon's treachery to Jonathan, 56. The Syrians revolt from him on account of his tyranny, 63.
Tubieni, Jews, whence ſo called, 22.
Tyrians ſpared by Herod, 138.

Tyro,

Tyro accuſed to Herod by Salome, 196.
Tzani revolt to the Romans, 612.

V.

V Ageſes's noble anſwer to Craſſus, 512.
Valens, king of Perſia, wars with the Huns, 603. His character, ib.
Valerian marches to the relief of Edeſſa, 571. Is defeated and taken priſoner by Sapores, ib. Cruelly uſed by him, ib. & (D).
Varanes I. king of Perſia, 574.
——— II. kept under by the Romans, 575, & ſeq.
——— III. why ſurnamed Senganſaa, 577.
——— IV. ——— ſurnamed Cermaſaa, 594.
——— V. Perſecutes the chriſtians, 597. Wars with Theodoſius, 598. Solicits the Saracens, to break with the Romans, ib. Defeated by the Romans, 599, & ſeq. Makes peace with them, 600. Reſpect for Acates biſhop of Amida, ib, Grants the chriſtians many favours, ib. & ſeq.
——— VI. obſcure reign, 601.
Vargunteius ſlain by the Parthians, 523.
Varus Quinctil. appointed to judge Antipater, 261. Declares his ſentence only to Herod, 262. Informs the emperor againſt Archelaus, 272. Quells the ſeditious Jews, 273. Enters Judea, 277, & ſeq. His reception at Jeruſalem, 278.
Veil of the temple rent at the death of Chriſt, 388.
Ventidius extorts money from Antigonus, 146. Sent againſt the Parthians, 531. Defeats them, 532. Stratagem againſt Pacorus, 533. Defeats him, ib. Envied by M. Antony, ſent back to Rome, 534. His triumph, riſe, &c 535.
Verus ſent againſt the Parthians, 557. Carries the plague into Italy, &c. ib.
Veſpaſian ſent into Judea, 450. Enters Galilee, ib. Reception of Joſephus, 452. Treatment to the city Tiberias, 453, (V). His ſtay at Cæſarea very politic, 459. Choſen emperor, 464. Sets Joſephus at liberty, ib. (F). Goes to Rome, 465.
Vine, a rich golden one ſent a preſent to Pompey, 108, & ſeq Vinegar, why given to Chriſt, 382, (Z).
Virgil, remarks on his eclogue on Saloninus, 147, (X).
Virgilianæ ſortes, how imitated by the Jews, 362, note.

Vitellius's arrival in Judea, 415. Kindneſs to the Jews, ib. Depoſes Pilate, 416. Comes with Herod to Jeruſalem, 418.
Vologeſes I. king of Parthia, oppoſed by the Romans, 552. Succeſs in Armenia, ib. & ſeq. Allies with Veſpaſian, 553. His death, ib.
——— II. invades Armenia, 556. Confirmed by Antoninus, 558. His death, ib.
——— III. wars with the ſeveral ſtates, 558. His death, ibid.
Vologeſacerta built by Vologeſes, 553.
Volumnius condemns Herod's two brave ſons to death, 195.
Vonones, king of Parthia, defeated by Artabanus, 544. Killed by Remmius, 545.
——— II's ſhort reign, 551.
Vopiſcus Cai. animadverted upon, 576, (F).
Urſicinus ſent againſt Sapor, 585. Covers Syria from incurſions, ib.

W.

Water, the feſtival of, among the Jews, 347.
Whales, a particular kind in the Mediterranean, 325, (C).
Wine, mingled, why given to malefactors, 382, (Z).
Wiſemen from the eaſt, vid. Magi, 217, & ſeq.
Wonderful, one of the peculiar characters of the Meſſiah, 210, 215, 216.
Wood carried to the temple once a year, 347.

X.

Xlophoria, the feaſt of at Jeruſalem, 347

Z.

Zachariah's viſion in the temple, 200, & ſeq. Noble canticle at the birth of his ſon, 212.
——— the ſon of Barachias, murdered by the zealots, 459 Some conjectures concerning him, 458, (B.)
Zamaris, ſent by Herod againſt the banditti, 213.
Zambades choſen king of Perſia, 605. Depoſed and puniſhed, 607.
Zames, prince of Perſia, why excluded his ſucceſſion, 610.
Zebedee, the ſons of, become apoſtles, 317, (T).

Zechariah's prophecies, thoſe particularly which concern Chriſt's ſufferings, 372, (P). And deſtruction of the Jewiſh nation, 477, (S).

——— the ſon of Baruch, vid. ſub Zechariah, 458.

Zealots, the ſpawn of the Gaulonitiſh faction, 284. Join with the Sicarii, 446, & ſeq. Beat the Romans, ibid. Put all to fire and ſword, ib. & ſeq. Their curſed character, 455. Seize the temple, 457. Set up a high-prieſt of their own, 456, & (Y). Horrid butcheries committed by them, ib. & ſeq. Dreadful crimes, 462, (E). Joſephus's character of them, 471. Their deſperate defence, 473, & ſeq. Their ſuit to Titus rejected, 482. Seized with infatuation, 483. Raiſe new troubles in Egypt, 490.

Zelotes, Simon, whence ſo called, 317, (T).

Zenobia taken priſoner by Aurelian, 572.

Zenodorus, why ſtript of his toparchies, 178, & (V).

Zenodotia taken by Craſſus, and the inhabitrants reduced to ſlavery, 509.

Zeugma, where ſituate, 514, (E).

The end of the tenth Volume.

AN

Universal HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earliest Account of Time to the Present:

COMPILED from

ORIGINAL AUTHORS;

And ILLUSTRATED with

Maps, Cuts, Notes, Chronological and Other Tables.

VOL. XI.

Ἱστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξίρχισθαι μὴ κατιδόντι, ἐν αὐταῖς γὰρ ἰυρήσιις ἀπόρως, ἅπερ ἴτιροι συνῆξαν ἰγκόπως. Basil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

DUBLIN:
Printed by EDWARD BATE, for the EDITORS:
M, DCC, XLV.

CONTENTS

OF VOLUME XI.

CHAP. XIII.

SECT. I.

The Continuation of the Persian History from their recovering the empire from the Parthians, to their being subdued by the Arabs, 1

SECT. II.

The history of the Persians, from their recovering the empire to their being subdued by the Arabs, according to the oriental historians, 46

BOOK III.

The ROMAN History.

CHAP. I.

THE antient state of Italy to the building of Rome.

SECT. I.

Description of Italy, 118

SECT. II.

Of the antient state and first inhabitants of ITALY, 131

SECT. III.

Of the antient kings of Hetruria, Latium, and Alba, 138

CHAP. II.

The Roman History, from Romulus to the Commonwealth, 157

CHAP. III.

The consular state of Rome, from the beginning of that government to the burning of the city by the Gauls, 241

CHAP. IV.

From the rebuilding of Rome to the first Punic or Carthaginian war, 432

Directions to the Book-binder for placing the Maps, Cuts, &c.

	Page
A Map of antient Italy,	118
A Map of Gallia, &c.	120
A Map of the middle Regions of Italy,	124
A Map of Middle or proper Italy,	ib.
A Map of Great Greece, &c.	128
A Plan of Rome in the beginning of Romulus's reign,	152
A second Plan of Rome,	170
A Plan of Rome from the time of Servius Tullius, to that of its being taken by the Gauls,	241

AN

Universal History.

CHAP. XIII.

SECT. I.

Continuation of the History of the Perſians from their recovering the empire from the Parthians, to their being ſubdued by the Arabs.

CHOSROES, being ſettled on the Perſian throne, quickly received an embaſſy from Juſtinian, compoſed of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, at the head of whom was Ruſinus. The intent of this embaſſy was not only to compliment the king on his acceſſion, but alſo to treat of peace. Choſroes, who was a prince of quick parts, received the firſt kindly, and entered readily into the ſecond; but when they came to adjuſt the articles of the peace, then it was he diſcovered his true intentions, by inſiſting, that a ſum of money ſhould be given him; that the pretenſions of the Perſians and Romans ſhould be thoroughly canvaſſed and finally ſettled; all places taken on either ſide reſtored, and this peace declared to be perpetual. Choſroes II. Year of Chriſt 532.

perpetual. Some delays happened in the negotiations, and a report being ſpread that Juſtinian had put Ruſinus to death, who, at the requeſt of the Perſian king, had returned to Conſtantinople for inſtructions, Choſroes inſtantly took the field with a mighty army, which ſtruck ſuch a terror, that the inhabitants began to retire from the villages in all the frontier provinces, ſuppoſing that the war would become more bloody than ever. But, before Choſroes proceeded to hoſtilities, Ruſinus arrived and perfected the treaty; whereupon the Perſians retired, and the inhabitants of the frontier provinces returned to their habitations [f].

Diſcovers and defeats a conſpiracy againſt him.

THE morning of this great prince's reign, like that of his father, was not only darkened with flying clouds, but its luſtre in danger of being totally obſcured. The Perſian nobles, perceiving that Choſroes had much in him of the ſame ſpirit which had made Cavades terrible to his ſubjects, when he aſcended the throne, determined amongſt themſelves to procure their own ſafety at the expence of the king's, by depoſing him, and ſetting up in his ſtead one more tractable. This was Zames the brother of Choſroes. The law incapacitated him from being king, but they had a ſalvo for that; he had a ſon whoſe name was Cavades, who was extremely like his grandfather; him they intended to proclaim king, and to veſt the regal authority in Zames, as his tutor and protector. Into this ſcheme, when it was communicated to Zames, he readily came, and promiſed the conſpirators, to act in all things according to their counſels. As Choſroes made it a rule throughout his life to ſpare no money for intelligence, ſo it was not long before he was informed of all theſe machinations. He ſuffered them, however, to go on, that he might by this means diſcover who were, and who were not, devoted to his ſervice; for as he had the troops intirely at his devotion, and knew every ſtep his enemies took, he was not in any great pain for his own ſafety. When things grew ripe for execution, he ſeized the conſpirators at once, and had no ſooner ſeized them, than he put them to death. His executions were as wide as the conſpiracy; he had no idea of reconciling traitors; but every man, who had the leaſt ſhare therein, or the leaſt knowledge thereof, paid for it with his life [g].

The hiſtory of Cavades the younger.

THE young Cavades alone eſcaped, and eſcaped only by accident. He was not in the king's power immediately, being

[f] PROCOP. de bell. Perſic lib. i. c. 22, 23. [g] PROCOP. de bell. Perſic. lib. i. prop. fin.

ing brought up by Adergudunbades, to whom therefore Choſroes diſpatched orders to put him out of the way. This extremely grieved the good old man, who had educated him as carefully as if he had been his own ſon; but the royal orders and the royal ſafety were things not to be trifled with. But when he came to acquaint his wife with the command he had received from court, ſhe, who had nurſed Cavades, forgot all concerns, but for his ſafety; and as her huſband was naturally inclined to pity the unfortunate child, ſhe prevailed upon him to think of concealing the youth in their houſe, and to diſpatch a meſſenger to court to inform Choſroes that his orders had been exactly complied with. This was happily executed for Cavades, who thereby eſcaped a death he no way deſerved. It was no leſs prudently conducted by his wiſe and generous protector, who intruſted none with the ſecret, but his eldeſt ſon and an old ſervant. In proceſs of time, when Cavades was grown to years of diſcretion, Adergudunbades furniſhed him with a conſiderable ſum of money, adviſed him to retire out of Perſia, and to be careful of his ſafety, and his own. Sometime afterwards Varrhames, this nobleman's eldeſt ſon, diſcovered this ſecret to Choſroes, and produced the ſervant who was privy to it. The king, who was then employed in an expedition againſt the Hunns, ſent inſtantly for Adergudunbades to attend him. That excellent man, being now far in years, fell through weakneſs from his horſe, as he haſtened to attend Choſroes, and broke his thigh. The king, being informed of it, ordered him to be ſent to a certain caſtle, under pretence of taking care of his cure, but in truth to have him privately murdered; which was done, and his office given to his ſon Varrhames (T). As for Cavades, he retired to Conſtantino-

ple,

T) This conſpiracy againſt Choſroes was an event remarkably fortunate to him, if we conſider it in a political light. It gave him an opportunity of freeing himſelf from all who were diſaffected to him, and he uſed it without reſerve, ſparing not his own uncle, who had been in the number of the conſpirators. But the moſt cruel of all his actions was, the putting to death this old general, who had been the faithful ſervant of his father, and who had ſubdued twelve barbarous nations, and made them tributaries to the Perſians. There, ſeems, however, to have been ſome juſtice in giving to his ſon Varrhames the government which Adergudunbades had poſſeſſed. But it is to be obſerved that the Perſians were extremely ſtrict in two of their maxims, viz. in puniſhing treaſon without mercy, and in preſerving governments in the hands ple, where he was treated by the emperor Justinian with all the respect due to his birth [b]. We have digressed a little, in order to follow so remarkable a transaction to its close; let us now return to the thread of our history.

Chosroes resolves to make war upon the Romans.

As a peace with the Romans was at first very convenient to Chosroes, so he very faithfully observed it; and when he was informed of the victories obtained by Belisarius in Africa, he sent embassadors to congratulate Justinian thereupon; and, by way of raillery, directed them to tell the emperor, that he had a right to share the spoils of his enemies, since, had he not been at peace with Persia, he could not have had either forces or leisure to make those conquests in Africa. Justinian received these embassadors kindly, assured them of his great affection for their master, and on hearing his message, presented Chosroes with a considerable sum of money. But this fair correspondence did not last long. The Saracens, encouraged by the Persian king, made several incursions into the Roman territories; of which when Justinian by his embassadors made loud complaints, Chosroes returned for answer, that he

[b] PROCOP. ubi supra,

of one family, so long as they continued faithful to their sovereigns. These customs are so opposite to ours, that of course we have an indifferent opinion of them; but if it be considered, that in the east the slightest disaffection, if disregarded, ripens presently into a general revolt, fatal alike to the person and government of the reigning prince, the reason of this conduct will be no more a secret, nor can we with any colour of justice deny, that it is full as justifiable as many of our political maxims. As to the other, it is generally supposed, that it arose thus: The Persian empire though extremely wide in extent, being no more than an aggregate body of little principalities, some united to it for the sake of protection, and others, after long wars, by capitulations; their princes who were formerly independent, by this means became only governors for the Persian monarchs, but hereditary governors, with most of their old prerogatives, which in case of treason, however, were forfeited; and this it was which made the children of governors so many checks upon their fathers, as appears, not only in the instance of Varrhames, but in what we have heretofore read in the conduct of Cavades, who by the same policy drew a nobleman to sacrifice his parent to the preservation of the family interest. We cannot pretend to justify such extraordinary transactions. All we have to do is, to account for them; and this, we hope, is effectually done (53).

(53) Procop. de bell. Persic. lib. i. Theophan. Cedren. &c.

believed

believed what they alledged was not altogether without foundation; but that he could ſcarce believe his brother Juſtinian took this amiſs, becauſe they were arts of empire himſelf had taught him, having practiſed, not only on the Saracens, but the Hunns, to invade Perſia, as he could prove by his own letters; ſo that he had only turned his own weapons upon him, as he was obliged to do to preſerve his ſubjects. For a time, however, he ſuffered himſelf to be pacified, yet not without making the neceſſary preparations for carrying on the war whenever he thought fit; to this he was principally excited by Vittiges king of the Goths, who ſent an embaſſy on purpoſe to repreſent the formidable power of Juſtinian, and how much it was the intereſt of Choſroes, as well as himſelf, to ſee it reduced. On the heels of this came an application from the Arſacidæ, or petty princes of Armenia. They ſet forth abundance of grievances under which they laboured from the Roman power; they painted the methods taken by Juſtinian for attaining univerſal empire in the ſtrongeſt light, and beſought Choſroes to conſider not ſo much their caſe as his own. This determined the Perſian monarch to break the peace, and to fall upon Juſtinian before he was at leiſure to fall upon him. The ſeaſon of the year did not permit this reſolution to be executed as ſoon as it was formed; but it influenced Choſroes to aſſemble ſuch an army as might be able to act in the beginning of the ſpring, notwithſtanding he was adviſed of the death of Vittiges, and the abſolute ruin of his kingdom. Juſtinian, being informed of the preparations made in Perſia, found himſelf under a neceſſity of providing for the worſt; yet, not willing to have recourſe immediately to arms, he wrote letters to Choſroes, wherein he deſcribed at large the bad conſequences, which would attend a haſty and unjuſt breach of the peace ſubſiſting between them. To which letters Choſroes, being already fixed in his reſolution, returned no anſwer; but went on with his military preparations, as openly and as vigorouſly, as if there had been a war declared [1].

His great ſucceſs in his firſt war.

IN the beginning of the ſpring, Choſroes, at the head of a great army, entered the Roman territories. He did not, as it was generally expected he would, fall into Meſopotamia; but, on the contrary, made the provinces of Syria and Cilicia the ſeat of the war. The firſt place of conſequence which

[1] PROCOP. de bell. Perſic. l. ii. anecdot. l. i. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 149. ZONAR. annal. l. xiv. p. 67. EVAGR. l. iv. c. 17. JORNAND. de regn. ſucceſſ. in vita Juſtinian.

which he reduced was Sura, ſeated on the Euphrates, a place of great ſtrength, rich, and populous; yet Choſroes quickly maſtered it, rather by fraud than force, and treated the inhabitants very indifferently, notwithſtanding that he married a woman from among the priſoners taken there, for whoſe ſake it might have been expected he would have better treated her country. From hence he moved on, uſing ſeverity where any reſiſtance provoked him, and uſing great clemency towards the inhabitants of ſuch places as readily ſubmitted, impoſing, however, heavy contributions upon all. At length finding no Roman army in the field, he proceeded to Antioch, and encamped in its neighbourhood, on the banks of the river Orontes. Thence he ſent to acquaint the Antiochians, that, if they paid him a large ſum of money, he would ſpare them, and retire from before their city. As it was very ſtrong, its fortifications newly repaired, and a numerous gariſon in it, the mob were ſo elate, that they not only rejected the Perſian monarch's propoſition, but alſo mal-treated thoſe he ſent, and threw out unmannerly and impudent ſpeeches againſt Choſroes and his family. This irritated him ſo far, that, quite contrary to his intention, he inveſted the place, and, againſt the ordinary rules of war, and even the dictates of reaſon, ſtormed the city, before the walls were at all battered, making uſe of machines to raiſe his ſoldiers againſt them. This was a raſh and deſperate attempt, and notwithſtanding the preſence of Choſroes, who did all that man could do to encourage his ſoldiers, they were beaten off with a miſerable ſlaughter. When they returned to the charge, a worſe accident happened; for the beſieged, encouraged by their former ſucceſs, attacked thoſe who had the keeping of the machines, and having cut the ropes and chains which held them, precipitated them and all who were upon them from the top of the walls over the craggy mountains, on which they were erected, into the diſtant plain underneath. This proved the deſtruction of the city; for the dreadful noiſe of the rolling machines, and the horrid cries of the dying ſoldiers, being heard in the city, and the cauſe not known, the gariſon cauſed the gates to be thrown open, ſuppoſing the walls on the other ſide had fallen down, and, without ſtaying for better information, haſtily riding over women and children, they abandoned the place. Thoſe on the walls ſeeing this apprehended that the Perſians had made ſome other attack, and, thereupon quitted their poſt to retire into the market-place. Choſroes did not neglect ſo fair an opportunity; but, drawing freſh forces out of his camp, ſcaled the undefended walls, and, after a bloody ſtruggle in the market-place, inflicted all the ſeverities that could be expected from an incenſed enemy on the miſerable inhabitants of Antioch. Soon after this, and while the Perſian army ſtill remained at Antioch, came embaſſadors from Juſtinian, to expoſtulate with Choſroes on this breach of peace, and to treat of an accommodation. The Perſian monarch received them with much civility; he heard them patiently, and ſeemed to pay a great regard to what they ſaid. When they had done ſpeaking, he began to anſwer them with tears in his eyes; he made a more pathetic deſcription of the miſeries induced by the war, than they had done: he declared it was with the utmoſt reluctance he had taken arms; that he was, in a manner, compelled to it by the nobility of Perſia, who could no longer ſee, with patience, Juſtinian ſtirring up enemies againſt them on every ſide, and encouraging his ſubjects to treat them, on all occaſions, with outrageous contempt. He delivered all this with ſuch a ſolemn ſadneſs in his countenance, with ſuch vehement geſtures, and with expreſſions ſo calculated to ſtir the paſſions, that the embaſſadors were quite confounded, openly confeſſing, that the eloquence of Choſroes was more dreadful to the Romans than his arms. In the end, however, he began to intimate, that a conſiderable ſum of money in hand, and an annual tribute would ſend him back into Perſia, and fix the peace between the empires. As the embaſſadors demurred a little upon this, Choſroes, to quicken them, burnt the city of Antioch to the ground, and not long after concluded a peace very advantageous to himſelf, as well as very ignominious to the Romans. However, he did not even keep this; but, burning with a miſtaken deſire of accumulating wealth, went on taking city after city, and raiſing contributions where-ever he came. He did not indeed pretend to keep, but, on the contrary, ſlighted all the places he took, after he had extorted what he could from the inhabitants; but, by this means, he alarmed and terrified the Romans, raiſed the courage of the Perſians, and filled his coffers. The laſt city he beſieged was Dara, a place of mighty importance, and which he was very deſirous of having in his power; but whether he intended to keep or demoliſh it is uncertain. The citizens, however, weighing within themſelves the treatment which other people had received from the Perſians, and conſidering alſo the ſtrength and advantageous ſituation of the place, determined to defend themſelves to the utmoſt; in which they ſucceeded ſo well, that Choſroes, finding his troops fatigued, his forces diminiſhed, and the ſeaſon far advanced, raiſed the ſiege,

after

and

and returned, loaded with wealth, into his own territories [k].

Drives the Romans out of Colchis.

As he had now anſwered all the ends he propoſed in the war, he was well enough inclined to let peace take place; to which end he endeavoured to renew the negotiations, and to eſtabliſh things on the plan of the treaty he had concluded. But Juſtinian, by this time, had quite altered his opinion; and having recalled Beliſarius, determined to make the Perſians feel the weight of the Roman power, ſince, without it, there ſeemed no probability of preſerving peace for any length of time (V). The ſeat of the war was now ſuddenly tranſferred

[k] Procop. de bell. Perſic. l. ii. Evagr. l. iv. c. 25. Cedren. hiſt. comp. p. 371. Theophan. chronograph. p 152. Zonar. annal. l. xiv. p. 68.

(V) The hiſtory of all theſe wars, treaties and diſputes between the Romans and Perſians, are to be found at large in Procopius, who wrote expreſly or this topic, who had himſelf a perfect knowledge of all theſe tranſactions, and as little partiality for his countrymen, as is to be found in any Greek writer. From thence we might indeed have taken much more than we have done; but then this part of our hiſtory would have exceeded its natural ſize; for it is one thing to uſe memoirs, and another to tranſcribe them; and therefore we have endeavoured to reduce what we have taken from Procopius within ſuch bounds as might ſuit it to this hiſtory. In this note, however, we ſhall attempt to explain ſome particulars in the text, which need illuſtration. We have followed Procopius cautiouſly in what he ſays of the diſſimulation and inſatiable ambition of Choſroes, and for this reaſon. We find in all the Greek hiſtorians, and in Procopius himſelf, that the Perſian king pretended to be compelled to act in the manner he did, by the formidable power of Juſtinian, and by the attempts he had made to the prejudice of his empire, both in his own days, and thoſe of his father. Now, if this charge was true, either in whole, or in part, then was Choſroes more or leſs culpable in his conduct. But though Procopius, in his memoirs of the Perſian war, ſeems generally to excuſe the emperor his maſter; yet, in his anecdotes, he plainly confeſſes, that Juſtinian was a prince boundleſs in his ambition, and who acted under no very ſtrict ties of conſcience; yet, as this piece hath the air of a ſatire, we ought not to give full credit to it, but rather believe on the whole that each of theſe princes had in different qualities; that there were faults on both ſides, and that their ſubjects ſuffered through the reſtleſs and unquiet tempers of their governors. As to the complaints of the Armenian princes, they were, in all probability, pretty well founded; but, in order to diſcover this, we muſt remember who theſe princes were. In the ferred to Colchis, much to the diſadvantage of the Romans, and yet intirely through their own management. This region was at that time inhabited by the Lazi, a rude and barbarous people; but who had notwithſtanding, for a long courſe of years, adhered ſteadily to the Roman intereſt. This they did merely out of choice, the Romans having never ſubdued them; for the princes of this country obſerving, that by the ſituation of their dominions, they ſhould, ſome time or other, be reduced, either under the power of the Perſian kings, or of the emperors of Conſtantinople, conceived it to be alike for their own and their ſubjects good, to demand the protection of the latter; which was readily granted them, without prejudice, however, to their liberties; for they were neither charged with any taxes, nor obliged to admit any new magiſtrates as a conquered people. The emperor of the eaſt, however, on the death of any of their princes, appointed his ſucceſſor, and thereby manifeſted a kind of ſuperiority, rather honourable than of any great conſequence. But the emperor Juſtinian, having thoroughly conſidered the importance of that diſtrict which thoſe people inhabited, and which, as it lay upon what is called the Black-ſea, was a kind of frontier to his empire, and, at the ſame time, covered his metropolis; moved therefore with the apprehenſion of the conſequences that might follow, if this nation ſhould, at any time, prove unfaithful, he reſolved to make ſome further proviſion for his ſecurity on that ſide. To this end he recommended it to one Tzibus, whom he named a prince of the Lazi, to build a city, well fortified and ſecured by a ſtrong citadel, on the ſhore of the Euxine ſea, that it might be a check on the Lazi, if they ſhould be at any time inclined to revolt. This commiſſion Tzibus very faithfully executed, his countrymen aſſiſting him to the utmoſt of their power, rejoicing to behold ſo large and fine a city built in their country at the expence of the Romans; but when they found to what end it was erected, and ſaw that Tzibus had received into it a Ro-

the foregoing period, we have ſhewn how the Arſacidæ, after loſing the Parthian empire, came to be contented with ſmall principalities in Armenia, where they ſometimes pretended to be independent, ſometimes ſubmitted to the Perſians, and ſometimes again choſe the emperors of Conſtantinople for their protectors; no wonder then, that they were ſeldom perfectly eaſy, or that under ſo ambitious a prince as Juſtinian, they were anxious for thoſe ſhadows of ſovereignty, which they ſtill preſerved (54).

(54) Procop. Evagr. Theophan Zonar. &c.

man garison, they began to be quite of another opinion; and thus all the pains and expence employed about this city and fortress, turned to no other account than producing that very effect, which they were erected to prevent; for the Lazi instantly dispatched their deputies into Persia, to invite Chosroes to their assistance. This they did in the name of Gabazes, the greatest of their princes, who besought him to take under his protection a free people, whom Justinian was about to enslave. There wanted not much entreaty to induce so enterprizing a monarch to undertake an expedition so visibly for his service. He therefore closed speedily with the proposal of the deputies; and having given out, that the Hunns were about to invade the frontiers of his kingdom, he suddenly assembled a great army, with which he marched towards Iberia; but, turning short when it was least expected, he entered Colchis, through a thick, and, till then, impenetrable forest, which he caused to be cut down before him. As soon as he descended into the plain country, Gabazes met and paid his compliments to him, acknowledged him for his sovereign, and joining his army with a considerable reinforcement, they marched together towards Petra. Tzibus, with the Roman garison, made at first a gallant defence; but finding at last, that the place would be infallibly taken, they made their escape by sea, and left to the enemy not only the city and fortress, but also all the treasures and valuable merchandize, which had been laid up therein [1].

Belisarius checks his success.

While Chosroes was victorious on this side, the Roman general Belisarius assembled an army, and laid siege to Nisibis; but to little purpose, for Nabades, the Persian governor, made so firm a defence and so many vigorous sallies, that Belisarius was, in a short time, obliged to raise the siege, and, to console himself for that misfortune, to march farther into Persia, where ravaging the country, taking some inconsiderable places, and carrying off some spoil, he sent advice to Constantinople, that he had triumphed over the Persians, tho' in fact, his expedition was rather honourable than advantageous, the enemy having no army in the field. As soon as Chosroes had intelligence of this incursion, he made all imaginable haste back again into Persia with his army, that he might, early the next year, be ready to return the Romans this favour, by an irruption into their dominions. This he accordingly performed, and having wasted a great part of the frontier

[1] Procop. ubi supra. Cedren. hist. comp. p. 372. Theophan. chronog. ubi supra. Zonar. ubi supra.

frontier country, and raised vast contributions, he at last entered Comagene, intending to march from thence into Palestine, there to sack and plunder the city of Jerusalem. And in this design, if we consider the terror and confusion of the Romans, we must allow that he had a fair prospect of success; but Belisarius, having, with incredible diligence, posted quite a-thwart the empire to the banks of the Euphrates, there unexpectedly assembled an army, which checked the progress of Chosroes, and forced him to have recourse to his old method of negotiating, since nothing was to be got by force. Another reason concurred to drive Chosroes home into Persia; for the pestilence, which had wasted Egypt, passing over into Asia, made such a havock in the Roman territories, that the Persian king retired hastily out of Assyria, and directed his march towards the north. At first the Romans conceived, they were intirely rid of this formidable enemy; but it quickly appeared, that their hopes were vain; for having recruited his army in the northern provinces, he began to discover his true design, which was to fall into Armenia. Justinian, being informed of this, ordered an army to assemble on that side, and sent likewise embassadors to endeavour, by all means, to engage Chosroes to think of peace [m].

His general Nabades beats the Romans under Narses.

IN the mean time, Narses, being appointed general of the Roman forces, and finding the Persians not yet in the field, determined to make himself master of Anglon, a little town, but of great strength; in which Nabades, a Persian general, had taken up his quarters, with four thousand men. Full of this conquest, he marched, against the advice of many of his officers, with the utmost diligence to reach the place. When he drew near it, he sent out parties to make prisoners; and these reporting that Nabades was retired, Narses, reproaching his officers with timidity, pushed on to take possession of the place. The van-guard of the Roman army consisted of a body of the Heruli, lightly armed. These entering the skirts of Anglon, and perceiving the Persian troops regularly drawn up and ready to charge them, broke, even before they were attacked, and fled. The Persians made the best use of this advantage, following them close at the heels; and charging the Roman forces vigorously, disordered them also, and soon after compelled them to a plain flight, in which numbers were slain, and more would have been slain, if the Persians had not been apprehensive of the ill consequences that might attend their pursuing them too far. With this action ended that campaign; for Chosroes, having changed his views, did not endeavour to penetrate any farther on that side; and the Romans, taught by their misfortunes, forbore also the siege of this place [n].

[m] PROCOP. de bell. Persic l. ii. CEDREN. hist. compend. p. 372. THEOPHAN chronograph. p. 186. ZONAR. l. xiv. p. 68. GLYCAS. ann. l. iv. p. 267. EVAGR. hist. eccles. l. iv. c. 26.

Chosroes shamefully repulsed at Edessa.

The next year Chosroes made his fourth expedition into the Roman territories, and, if we may credit Procopius, upon a very extraordinary account. He had, in his first expedition, besieged the city of Edessa, and, tho' he had taken much stronger and more considerable places, was constrained to raise that siege. This was said to be owing to the particular favour of Jesus Christ to that city, whose letter to their prince Abgarus was inscribed over the principal gate of the place. This report so irritated Chosroes, that he made this expedition, not so much against the Romans, or against Justinian, as against the God of the christians, who had been said to have driven him from Edessa. His army was very numerous; and it is certain, that tho' he might have done many things more for his glory, and the advantage of the Persian empire, yet he chose, after ravaging the open country, to encamp in the neighbourhood of Edessa. In that camp, however, having either formed some new project, or doubting of the event of this, he sent deputies to demand of the inhabitants of Edessa a large sum of money; which if immediately paid him, he offered to turn his arms another way. But as what he demanded was not in their power to yield unto, Chosroes was forced to carry his first design into execution, tho' now against his will. We have, in the memoirs of Procopius, a long and circumstantial account of this siege, which was by far the warmest that any Roman city had sustained; and, after all, tho' it was not either succoured or relieved, the vigorous defence made by its citizens so diminished the Persian army, that, as the season advanced, Chosroes lost all hopes, and was compelled, notwithstanding the boast he had made, of turning Edessa into sheep-cotes, and placing all its inhabitants in the heart of Persia, shamefully to raise the siege, and retire into own dominions (X). Thither he was quickly followed [n] Procop. de bell. Persic. l. ii.

(X) As to the miracle whichwas wrought at the siege of Edessa, it makes a great figure, as well in the memoirs of Procopius, as in the writings of ecclesiastical historians. As it is a fact which very nearly concerns the Persian history, we might justly have been censured followed by the Roman embaſſadors, whom, as he had often done before, he drew into an inſidious treaty, more deſtructive to their maſter than an open war [o].

[o] PROCOP. de bell. Perſic. l. ii. THEOPHAN. chronograph. p. 186. CEDREN. hiſt. comp. p. 372. EVAGR. hiſt. eccleſ. l. iv. c. 27.

ſured with want of exactneſs, had we omitted it; and therefore we choſe to give it place in a note, in which we ſhall relate it, as we find it recorded in the hiſtory of Evagrius. There was an old report, that Chriſt had promiſed to Abgarus king of Edeſſa, that that city ſhould be inexpugnable. It is true, that no ſuch promiſe appears in the letter, ſaid to have been written by Chriſt to Abgarus, and which is printed at large in the hiſtory of Euſebius; but, notwithſtanding that, the report ſpread of this prophecy was believed, and ſome extraordinary deliverances which the city had met with contributed to keep up its credit. To deſtroy this report, and thereby to wound, as he apprehended, the honour of the chriſtian religion, Choſroes ſat down before this place. When all the attempts he had made to induce the people to ſurrender had failed, and his forces had been repulſed in ſeveral aſſaults, he at length determined to enter upon a laborious and troubleſome undertaking; which he did, however, the more patiently, becauſe he made no queſtion that by it he ſhould effect his purpoſe. He ordered his ſoldiers to cut down a vaſt quantity of timber, with which he began to erect a mount over againſt the town-walls; to which when it was become equal in height, his view was, by the help of engines, to make a bridge of communication, over which he might paſs as great a part of his army as he pleaſed into the place. The inhabitants of Edeſſa, perceiving the drift of this deſign, inſtantly began to undermine the new raiſed work, in hopes they might be able to ſet it on fire; but when they had done this, they found their labour loſt, not being able to make the fire burn for want of air, a circumſtance they had not before conſidered. This put them to their wits, and at laſt they bethought themſelves of the miraculous print of our Saviour's face, which he ſent to their king Abgarus, and was preſerved in their church. This they brought into their mine, poured water over it, and then this water upon the fire and the wood, which inſtantly lighted and burnt intenſely. Then, to prevent the enemy from apprehending whence the ſmoke came, they threw all ſorts of fireworks from the walls. After three days, however, the Perſians perceived, that the very heart of their mount was conſumed. Choſroes ordered water to be poured upon it in vaſt quantities; but when it was obſerved, that, inſtead of ſlackening, it increaſed the fire, as much as if ſo much oyl had been thrown thereon, he in deſpair ſuffered the mount to burn on; and, having ſent away his baggage, demoliſhed his works and raiſed the ſiege (55)

(55) Evagr. hiſt. eccleſ. l. iv. c. 27. Cedren. hiſt. compend p. 372.

THINK

The Colchian war concluded by a general peace.

Things, however, did not remain long in this situation: Chosroes was too stirring a prince to indulge his neighbours with much quiet. He had discovered, that his new subjects the Lazi were become already disaffected; and, upon examining the reasons, he found cause to apprehend, that their discontents were such as could never be removed. The country they inhabited stood in need of corn, of salt, and of wine. With these, on account of the badness of the roads, they could not well be furnished from Persia; whereas the Romans easily supplied them by sea, and at a moderate price, which preserved an intimacy between the nations. On the other hand, the Lazi, who were zealous christians, endeavoured to convert the Persians who dwelt among them; by which means they became obnoxious to the magi, who did not fail to insinuate, that difference in religion would everlastingly hinder them from being good subjects to the Persian crown. Chosroes thereupon formed a project of transporting them from their own country of Colchis into the heart of Persia, and to settle a colony of Persians in their stead. Previous, however, to the execution of this grand project, he determined to build a navy in the port of Petra, which might be able to guard the coasts, and prevent too strict an intercourse between the Lazi and the inhabitants of the Roman provinces; but knowing that this could not be accomplished, if the people were timely apprised thereof, he caused great quantities of timber to be sent to Petra, under pretence of repairing the fortifications, and constructing military machines. However, Gubazes king of the Lazi, taking offence at these preparations, and doubting the safety of his person, besought the protection of the Romans. This was quickly afforded him, and the emperor Justinian immediately dispatched a considerable army to his relief. This army was commanded by Dagisthæus, a young man very indifferently skilled in the art of war. Gubazes kept his word; for as soon as the Roman forces appeared he joined them, and compelled the Persians to shut themselves up in Petra, the only fortified place in the kingdom. The reduction of this place therefore was the sole point in question; for this once effected, the war was at an end. Gubazes quickly invested it on one side, as the Romans did on the other, to whom Gubazes most pathetically recommended the custody of the streights called Chisuræ, through which only the Persians, if they sent an army, could enter, if they attempted the relief of Petra. The Roman general, having viewed these difficult passages, conceived them to be so strong in their nature, that he left but a hundred men to guard guard them. As ſoon as Choſroes was informed of this ſtrange turn in his affairs, and that Petra was blocked up, he ordered Mermeroes, one of the beſt officers in Perſia, to march with an army to its relief. This took up a great deal of time, and in this ſpace the Perſian gariſon was reduced to the laſt extremity; nay, the Romans actually entered the city, and might have taken it, if the governor of the citadel had not drawn them into a treaty for rendering that fortreſs, at the ſame time with the city, into their hands. Mermeroes from the time he entered Colchis with his army, directed his march according to his own private intelligence, avoiding any correſpondence with the Lazi, who pretended to be in the Perſian intereſt; ſo that he arrived at the mouth of the Chiſuræ before he was at all expected; and finding how ſmall a guard the Roman general had left there, he cauſed it to be attacked again and again, till, with the loſs of a thouſand men, he carried the paſs, and then, without halting, marched directly to Petra. There he found, of five thouſand men, only nine hundred remaining, and of theſe three hundred and fifty diſabled. The dead bodies they had piled up againſt the narrow walls of the citadel, that the Romans might not be acquainted with their loſs, and from thence be encouraged to ſtorm the place. The Romans conceived that this was but a ſlight reprieve, the walls being every-where broken, and the place, as it were, in ruins; Mermeroes, however, repaired it in the beſt manner he was able, and when he had ſo done and left a freſh gariſon in it, he withdrew his troops from thence, having made a truce with the Lazi, though the Roman forces ſtill continued the war. When the place was put into a ſtate of defence, Mermeroes drew his troops towards Iberia, whence he hoped to receive ſuch ſupplies of proviſions, as might be neceſſary for the occaſions of his own army, as well as of Petra. Here incamping with a rapid river behind him, he conceived his forces to be in ſafety. But it ſo happened, that Gubazes deviſed a method of paſſing this river, and having informed the Romans thereof, and alſo furniſhed them with bridges, they fell upon the Perſian army, and made a dreadful ſlaughter. Mermeroes, however, repaired this miſtake, by incamping more cautiouſly for the future, and ſo kept the war alive, notwithſtanding the great diſadvantages he laboured under. It would oblige us to carry this hiſtory into an extraordinary length, if we ſhould relate all that paſſed in this Colchian war, of which we have very large memoirs in Procopius and Agathias. We ſhall content ourſelves therefore with obſerving, that in the end the Romans were ſucceſsful,

by

by reason of their having the empire of the sea, which enabled them to supply their armies with provisions and recruits, as often as they stood in need of them; whereas the Persians were obliged to make long and fatiguing marches by land, and to bring all their provisions in carriages. Mermeroes, so long as he lived, preserved the superiority of the Persian power, and a little before his death gave the Romans a signal defeat; but his successor Nachoraganus, a rash and haughty general, fell as far short of him in his performances, as in his boasting promises he surpassed him. His ill conduct was one of the great causes of the success of the Romans; and therefore Chosroes, on his return into Persia, ordered him to be flayed alive; and, perceiving that his affairs were in a declining condition on this side, resolved to make peace with the Romans. With this view he sent an embassador to the court of Justinian, who received him graciously, and entered readily into a treaty with his master, whereby it was provided, that each party should keep what they were possessed of in Colchis at the time of its conclusion; and thus the Lazi were deprived of their liberties, by calling in their too powerful neighbours, Gubazes having been assassinated some time before, who was extremely careful of his subjects, and who, in all the changes of his fortune, constantly sought their good [P] (Y).

TOWARDS

[P] Procop. de bell. Persic. lib. ii. Agath. Scholast. lib. iii, iv. Cedren. &c.

(Y) The history of the Colchian war hath, as we noted in the text, employed the pens of many eminent writers. Procopius, in the second book of his memoirs of the wars with the Persians, enters into a long detail of the causes, why the Constantinopolitan emperors on the one hand, and the Persian monarchs on the other, were so solicitous to maintain themselves in the possession of this country. He also prosecutes the account of the military expeditions on both sides, till such time as Mermeroes was first obliged to retire into Iberia (56). Agathias, who continued the history of Procopius, resumes the thread here, and describes at large all that happened afterwards in this country, till the conclusion of the peace between the Romans and the Persians. To him we owe the character of the Persian general before-mentioned. Mermeroes, says he, was of all the Persian officers the most distinguished for his thorough understanding of the art of war. He died full of years and glory, after having for a long space of time intirely lost

(56) Ap. histor. Byzant. Vol I.

the

TOWARDS the end of the reign of Justinian, Chosroes fell sick of a dangerous distemper; and, depending more on the skill of the Roman physicians than his own, he requested that some should be sent him from Constantinople, which demand of his was readily complied with. On the accession, however, of the emperor Justin, new troubles arose. The inhabitants of the Greater Armenia, who were subjects to the king of Persia, were by this time become generally christians; and therefore rather inclined to put themselves under the protection of the Romans, to which Justin rashly consented; and having privately encouraged them to revolt, the Armenians, under the command of Varanes, one of their petty princes, suddenly took arms, and, having murdered all the Persians amongst them, declared themselves allies and dependents of the emperor of Constantinople. Chosroes immediately complained of this, and the emperor Justin pretended to colour his conduct by his zeal for the christian religion; and, being deceived by the intelligence which the bishop of Nisibis sent him, gave orders to his general Marcian to enter the Persian territories with an army, and to lay siege to that city, which was accordingly done. The Persian governor, Chosroes makes war on the Romans afresh with success.

the use of his limbs, so that he was carried up and down in a litter; yet was he so dreadful to the Romans, that they never thought themselves in any security, while he was at the head of the Persian troops (57) The curious reader, who will take the pains of perusing the authors I have mentioned, will plainly perceive, that the art of war was at this time extremely well understood, as it appears also the art of negotiating must have been, since the conferences for bringing this treaty of partition to a conclusion afforded matter for the fourth book of Menander's history of embassies. Of this we have yet an abstract remaining, wherein the principal arguments made use of on both sides, the characters of the Roman and Persian plenipotentiaries are elegantly described, and the heads of the treaty, which consisted of ten articles, are briefly set down; but yet with such clearness, as demonstrates the skill of the politicians in those times, not to have been inferior to those who have been most famous for this kind of science in succeeding ages (58). We should have inserted some quotations from these valuable pieces, if we had not been apprehensive of extending the history of this period too far; but we could not avoid writing this note, to shew the carelessness of the former writers of the Persian history, who have slipped over all these things, as if the accounts of them had been buried in utter oblivion.

(57) Agath. Scolast. hist lib. iii. & iv. (58) Menand. Protect ap hist. Byzant. Vol. I.

incensed at the folly and rashness of the action, did not so much as shut the gates, but contented himself with relieving the guards at them twice a day, the Roman army being scarce numerous enough to invest the place. In the mean time Chosroes passed the Euphrates, and marched directly towards Nisibis, having first made a great detachment under Adarmanes, who laid waste the Roman provinces with fire and sword. The Roman army before Nisibis being dissatisfied with the emperor's measures, and his changing their commander, suddenly, and without any reason given, broke up, and retired the best way they could; whereupon Chosroes, finding no body in the field to resist him, took and sacked all the great cities in Mesopotamia and Syria, and gave the plunder to his soldiers. He also besieged and reduced Dara, a fortress that had always been a curb upon his subjects, and in the fortifying of which the emperor Justinian had expended vast sums. Into this place he put a great garison, knowing its importance, and resolving to make use of it for a barrier against its old masters (Z). But while he was meditating new exploits, Trajan,

(Z) We are obliged to Evagrius for the history of this war, which he seems to have written very candidly, since it is plain enough from his relation, that hostilities were begun by the emperor Justin without any just grounds, and that, notwithstanding the complaints of Chosroes, he refused to desist from the measures he had taken to gratify his ambition. There is, however, just cause to believe, that he was a little disordered in his senses, even before this war. During the time it was carried on, nothing could be more wild than his conduct He fancied all the little advantages that were gained, before the Persians well knew that the Romans were their enemies, so many victories. He commanded his general to lay siege to Nisibis with a small army, badly furnished with provisions; and being informed by the bishop of Antioch, that his affairs in the east took a very bad turn, he dispatched Acaces, an ignorant and assuming man, to demand of his general the keys of Nisibis, as if fortune had been subject to his commands. This man executing the orders of his master with the same temper, that is, with the same stupidity with which he gave them, the consequence was, that the army were afraid to trust either their new general or their distracted emperor, and therefore retired the best way they could. John the son of Timostrates yielded up Dara, either through fear, or from a worse motive; and Chosroes, as soon as he was master of it, put part of the inhabitants to the sword, made the rest prisoners, and, having disposed of every thing as he thought fit in the place, put a strong garison therein, it being held the best fortress in all that part of the world. Chosroes also treated all the frontier provinces in the empire with great severity, Trajan, a senator of Rome, presented to him letters from the empress Sophia, her husband Justin being run mad. In these letters the empress pathetically described the misery of the Roman empire, beseeching Chosroes to remember the kindness of former emperors, particularly the sending him physicians, the incertainty of all worldly greatness, and the little glory that would result to him from conquests, made from a headless nation, and a helpless woman. Chosroes, having read the letters, immediately withdrew with his troops from the frontiers of the Roman empire, consenting to a truce for three years, Armenia, however, being excluded [9].

Refuses to make a peace, and is miserably beaten.

THIS respite was very favourable to the Romans, who quickly saw their affairs absolutely re-established by the diligence and prosperous success of Tiberius, the successor of Justin. He was not only an active and vigilant prince, and one of a martial disposition, but a person well skilled in the art of war, and a horse officer of great experience. The first thing he did was to put the cavalry into better order than they had ever been before, knowing that the eastern provinces of the empire were better defended by them than by foot; and as he found the treasury full, through the extortions of his predecessors, it was no hard matter to make quick levies, especially for one so well acquainted with discipline. Chosroes, who had not the least suspicion of these mighty changes, prepared early the next spring to enter Armenia, resolving to penetrate Cappadocia, and to make himself master of Cæsarea, and such other cities in those parts as were of any consideration. The Roman emperor, foreseeing the consequences of such an irruption, sent embassadors to persuade Chosroes from this expedition, and to engage him to make a solid and lasting peace; but at the same time that he sent these embassadors, he dispatched Justinian with directions to assemble all the forces in the eastern provinces, in order, if it was necessary, to repel force by force. When the Roman embassadors came into the camp of Chosroes, he was so far from verity, assigning the emperor's breach of faith for a reason; for, it seems, he could not bear with patience that sort of behaviour from others, which he was himself but too apt to exercise This, however, was the last fortunate campaign he made, and indeed his conquests therein were of very great importance (59).

[9] AGATH. SCHOLAST. lib iv. p. 140. THEOPAN. chronogr. p. 208. EVAGR. hist. eccles. lib. iv. c. 7—13.

(59) Evagr. hist. ecclesiast lib. iv. c. 7—13.

receiving them as he was wont, that he refused to give them any audience, commanding them to follow him to Cæsarea, where he should be at leisure to hear them. Not long after he was informed, that the Roman army was at no great distance, and that they designed to give him battle. He looked upon this as an act of rashness in them, and as an accident favourable to himself; and therefore continued his march with the utmost expedition, that he might not lose this advantage. But when he drew near them, and saw their cavalry extremely numerous, disposed in excellent order, and the soldiers eager to engage, he fetched a deep sigh, shewing, by the heaviness of his countenance, how very much his mind was affected by this disappointment. On this account therefore he would, in all probability, have retired into some convenient camp, instead of fighting immediately; if Curtius a Scythian, who commanded the right wing of the Roman army, had not charged the left of the Persians, where Chosroes was in person. The combat was sharp and bloody, but in the end the Persians were beaten, the royal treasure and the sacred fire, before which the king worshipped, taken in his sight. In all probability things would have gone still worse, had not the night come on, which gave the Persians an opportunity of retiring. The next night, or rather evening, Chosroes having intelligence that the Romans were encamped in two separate bodies, he fell upon one of them at midnight, routed them effectually with a prodigious slaughter, and, having taken and set a village on fire that was behind their camp, he marched directly to the Euphrates, that, by repassing that river, he might winter in his own dominions. But Justinian the Roman general, penetrating his design, followed him so closely, that he was himself forced to pass the river on an elephant, and many of those who were immediately about him were drowned. After this the Romans wintered for the first time in the Persian provinces, and Chosroes, retiring to Seleucia, was so much affected therewith, that he broke his heart, when he had reigned forty eight years. This is the account which most of the Greek writers have given us, and the collectors of general history have followed them without scruple; yet there is just reason to believe, that this narration is wide of the truth, and therefore we take the liberty of subjoining what we apprehend comes nearer it[r]. Chosroes did indeed die of discontent, [r] Agath. Scholast. lib. iv. p. 140. Evagr. hist. eccles. lib v. c. 15. Cedren. hist. compend. p. 393. Theophan. chronogr p. 207, 208.

but

but not ſo haſtily as moſt of the Greek writers aſſert; on the contrary, he lingered on till the following ſpring, and actually ſaw a treaty brought to a concluſion, which he had begun with the emperor Tiberius, ſo that he had a proſpect of leaving his kingdom in peace. Of this he was the more deſirous, on account of the mighty diſorders occaſioned by the depredations daily committed by the Roman veſſels in the Caſpian ſea, as alſo from the mutinous behaviour of his ſoldiers, and the general diſcontent of the Perſians, too prone to murmur when fortune was againſt their princes (A). Choſroes, as

(A) We have more than once obſerved, that the Greek writers are exceſſively partial, and we have more than once commended Agathias Scholaſticus for digreſſing from the cuſtom of his country in this particular. However, with regard to Choſroes, who was his cotemporary, and with whoſe character he had many and great opportunities of being fully acquainted, he is at leaſt as faulty as any of the Greek writers; and, with a ſort of abſurd malice, firſt relates the excellent things ſaid of that monarch, by thoſe who were perfectly well acquainted with him, and then endeavours to deſtroy their characters, as well as that of Choſroes, by a number of weak, as well as ill-natured reflections (60); Procopius, who had ſtill better opportunities of knowing the true character of this prince than Agathias could have, treated him in a quite different manner; for he every-where magnifies his abilities, though he ſometimes bears hard upon his morals (61). According to Procopius, Choſroes was a very wiſe, but a very ambitious prince; according to Agathias, he was very fortunate and very vain-glorious. That the latter was not his true character, may be made appear from facts. His conduct towards the Roman embaſſadors, his harangues, his letters, but, above all, his ſucceſs againſt the emperor Juſtinian, are ſo many inconteſtable proofs of his ſkill in the art of reigning. As to his knowledge of war, Agathias himſelf confeſſes it in theſe words: In the field no man knew better than Choſroes how to contrive; nor did any officer execute his orders with greater alacrity, than Choſroes did his own projects; and, what was very wonderful, his activity did not forſake him even in his old age; but he was as quick, or rather quicker, in his laſt campaign, than in his firſt. It was not his reputation, as a ſoldier, that offended Agathias; but he could not bear, that a barbarous prince ſhould be cried up for a philoſopher, and a man of letters. This, we ſhall elſewhere ſhew, was, however, a tribute juſtly due to the merit of Choſroes; and when we do ſhew this, it will unqueſtionably prove, that we were not too raſh in cenſuring the veracity of the Greek writers. The eccleſiaſtical hiſtorians fall not at all

(60) Agath. Scolaſt. lib. ii, iii, iv. (61) De bell Perſic & in anecdot.

as he had lived, ſo he died like a great prince, after enacting that none of his ſucceſſors ſhould expoſe their perſons in any general engagement againſt the Romans, and after giving his ſon the moſt wholeſome inſtructions for the government of his people, for the management of foreign wars, and for the conduct of himſelf[f].

Hormiſdas II.

Hormiſdas ſucceeded his father in his dominions, but had neither his abilities nor his fortune. Haſty in his temper, haughty in his behaviour, cruel in his diſpoſition, obſtinate in all things, he no ſooner put on the diadem, than he proclaimed himſelf unworthy of it. He was always addicted to a ſilly curioſity as to future events, and his diviners having ſuggeſted to him that his ſubjects were not well affected, he began to conceive ſuſpicions of moſt of the great men in the kingdom, and to treat them as if ſuſpicion and conviction was with him the ſame thing. As to foreign princes, he kept no meaſures with them at all; he never notified his ſucceſſion to the emperor Tiberius, but left him to learn it from common fame. When that monarch ſent embaſſadors to compliment him and to renew the peace, he treated them diſdainfully, and refuſed to grant their requeſt, unleſs he had a ſum of money given him by way of tribute. A demand conſidering the circumſtances of things, moſt unreaſonable, and which therefore opened afreſh thoſe wounds which had been lately healed up, and equally diſpoſed both Romans and Perſians to enter on a new war, and which in the end proved very diſadvantagious to both (B). At firſt the military operations

[f] Theophylact. lib. iii. c. 16. See the hiſtory of this reign in the next ſection.

all ſhort in this reſpect of the authors of civil hiſtory. In the preſent caſe particularly Evagrius tells us, that Choſroes died miſerably, over born by ſorrow and grief, and covered with infamy, by making the law taken notice of in the text (62)

(B) It is to Theophylact we owe the account given in the text of the character of Hormiſdas, and his conduct in the beginning of his reign. This author was an Egyptian by birth, a man of letters, and one who propoſed to write of things, which either himſelf was well acquainted with, or of which he had an authentic account from thoſe who were perfectly well acquainted with them. He begins his memoirs with the ſucceſſion of the emperor Maurice, by virtue of his predeceſſor's nomination, and conſequently a good deal

(62) Evagr. hiſt. eccleſ. lib. v. c. 15.

operations were not of any great consequence; an action happened near the river Nymphium, in which neither party had any great advantage. The Persians soon after besieged a fortress called Aphumum, and the Romans invested another fortress called Acbas, which siege, however, was raised by the Persian general Cardariganus. But when the Roman army had received the recruits from Constantinople, and Philipicus, whom the emperor Maurice sent to command, arrived on the frontiers, the Persians were obliged to withdraw into the mountains, and leave the open country at the mercy of the enemy. Philippicus gratified his soldiers with the plunder of all the places he could take; but the thirst of spoil having drawn them too far into the Persian dominions, they were in the utmost danger of being vanquished, without so much as seeing an enemy, for want of water. This prompted them to a very extraordinary action, viz. putting deal later than the times of which we are now speaking. But in the latter end of his third book, he goes back to the succession of Hormisdas, that the remaining part of his history might be rendered clear and perspicuous; which it would not have been, if the death of Chosroes, and the character and succession of his son, had not been made known to his readers. He assures us, that Hormisdas was at once the most ambitious and the most cruel prince that ever held a sceptre; that he loaded his subjects with taxes, at the same time that he had no mercy on their persons? that the severities he was drawn into by his wizzards, were not only excessive in their nature, but also spread incredibly wide, since he massacred thousands upon his foolish suspicions (63). Evagrius the ecclesiastical historian, who was cotemporary with Hormisdas, though he mentions him often in his history, doth not enter so particularly into his character, but contents himself with saying, that he was the most unjust king the Persians ever had; and that, not content with exhausting their fortunes, he invented new tortures to imbitter the deaths of such as he suspected (64). Theophylact gives us likewise the character of Varamus, whose rebellion proved so fatal to Hormisdas. He observes, that he was a man of great quality, had served for many years in the army, was most successful in his expeditions against the Turks, and by his wisdom and valour rose so high in the favour of this very prince, that he not only continued him general in chief of his troops, but promoted him also to the office of mayor of the palace (65). These particulars would have swelled the text of the history too much, and yet are of too great consequence to be totally omitted; wherefore we have placed them here.

(63) Theophylact. hist lib. iii. c. 17 p 85. (64) Evagr. hist eccles. lib. vi. c. 10. (65) Theophylact. lib. iii. cap ult.

all

all the men and women they had made prisoners to the sword, reserving only the children, whom they intended to sell for slaves; but they died in the march, and thereby escaped miseries worse than death. After this Philippicus was more cautious, and though he plundered other provinces, yet he took care not to march far from cities. The next year he had the command again, and defeated Cardarigganus in a pitched battle, from which he escaped with a handful of men, rather through the inadvertency of the Romans, than any courage or conduct of his own; and with these he fled to Dara, but the citizens shut their gates upon him, and the Romans at the close of the campaign again made incursions into Persia, burnt the villages, and plundered the people. The next spring the Persians gained some advantages, upon which Philippicus was removed and Comentiolus sent to command in his place, who managed the war rather worse. At length Philippicus was sent to restore the ancient Roman discipline; but the army was so far corrupted, that they refused to obey their general; and having chosen Germanus against his will to command them, they threw off all regard to the orders sent them from Constantinople. The Persians receiving news of this, attempted to take Martyropolis; but the Romans, under the command of Germanus, having penetrated their design, marched directly and gave them battle, whereby they saved the city for that time. However, it soon after fell into the hands of Mebodes the Persian general; for he having an intelligence with Sittas, an architect in the place, by his advice sent four hundred men thither, who pretended to desert from the Persian army, and were thereupon readily admitted. These men, by the direction of him who received them, surprised the place; and the Romans making a quick march to recover it, were engaged, and beaten by Mebodes; whereupon Philippicus was again removed, and Comentiolus was once more trusted with the army. This man quickly lost his reputation; for coming to a battle with the Persians, he fled at the very beginning of it; but Heraclius, who commanded under him, managed things so well, that the Persians were intirely defeated with the loss of Aphraates and Nadades, two of their best generals [t].

He by his impudence gains a real war.

IN the mean time, the Persians were engaged in war with the Turks, now first mentioned by the Greek writers, and under the conduct of Varanes had been very successful.

[t] THEOPHYLACT. lib. i, ii, iii. EVAGR. lib. v. c. 20. THEOPHAN. chronogr. p. 217. CEDREN. hist. com. p. 590. ZONAR. annal. lib. XIV. p. 74.

To

To him therefore orders were ſent to paſs the river Araxes, and to fall on the Roman territories on that ſide. To oppoſe him, the emperor ſent Romanus; but before he could aſſemble an army ſufficient to take the field, Varamus had done a great deal of miſchief. At length, however, Romanus found himſelf in a condition to give the Perſians battle, which he accordingly did; for Varamus, preſuming on his former ſucceſs, deſired nothing more ardently than an engagement. This proved fatal to his maſter's affairs; for the Perſian cavalry being defeated, Varamus, with all his ſkill, had much ado to make an indifferent retreat. As ſoon as Hormiſdas received advice of this diſaſter, he gave a ſignal proof of his ſmall capacity for government. He ſent to Varamus, inſtead of a veſt of honour, a woman's garment, and threatened the troops with decimation; this inflamed their general, and united them to this intereſt. The iſſue of this buſineſs was, that Varamus wrote a letter to his maſter, in which he uſed always the feminine gender, as if he had been writing to a female ſlave, and prepared at the ſame time to treat him worſe. Hormiſdas, who began to ſee his error, ſent Sarames, a man of great quality to take upon him the command of the army, ordering him to pacify the ſoldiers at any rate, and to ſend him Varamus in chains. This Sarames would have done, but as ſoon as he arrived in the camp and had declared the nature of his commiſſion, Varamus ordered him to be thrown down from his elephant, and by provoking the beaſt, cauſed it to trample him to pieces. He ſpent the winter preparing for the execution of his purpoſes, and at the ſame time took all the care he could to hinder the progreſs of the Roman arms. The gariſon of Niſibis, declared for him, and the malecontents began every-where to commit ſuch diſorders, that when Hormiſdas was informed of them, and ſaw how unable he was to repreſs them, he began almoſt to loſe his wits, breaking out into ſuch furious fits of paſſion, as frighted all who were near him, and contributed no leſs to increaſe his misfortunes, than the arts of his enemies. Pherocanes commanded the troops which were ſtill faithful, and he ſeemed inclined to attempt the reducing Varamus to his duty by force; but when the two armies were near each other, Varamus ſent deputies to harangue the king's army, and to inform them, that his revolt, far from having any tendency, to the deſtruction of the Perſian empire, had no other motive than its conſervation; that Hormiſdas was no longer worthy to rule them; and that he ſought only to bring about such a revolution, as the ill conduct of that prince had made necessary for the safety of the state. The general himself made no answer to these representations; but the army, easily debauched from its duty, began visibly to waver; so that in the night, Zoanab, who was of the guard to the general, fearing that he would head the defection, stabbed him in his tent, and gave the plunder of it to the soldiers [u].

Which occasions his being deposed and murdered.

Hormisdas having intelligence of this fact, and not knowing what consequences it might have, retired out of Persia Proper to Ctesiphon, where he kept his court. The people in the mean time revolted in all the royal cities, and plundered the palaces, which afforded the nobility an opportunity of rescuing their relations from prison; and amongst those, who were at this time released, was a person of the royal blood, whom Hormisdas for a slight offence had loaded with chains, named Bindoes. This man making all the haste he could to the troops formerly commanded by Pherotanes, was by them readily received for their chief. In three days they reached Ctesiphon, whither they no sooner came, than Bindoes, well attended, entered the royal palace, and forced themselves into the presence of the king. It was after dinner, and Hormisdas was sitting in the hall, clad in his robes of state and with his tiara on his head. As soon as he saw Bindoes, he asked him, how he escaped out of prison, and wherefore he came thither? He answered by a torrent of injurious language, upbraiding his master with his ill conduct, and exciting all who were present to reject him from being their king. Hormisdas ordered some of his servants, who were present, to seize Bindoes; but they were afraid to execute his commands. On the other hand, Bindoes taking the king by the arm, drew him out of his chair, took the tiara from off his head, and ordered some of his soldiers to conduct him to prison; which they did without the least reluctance, though he was their prince. In the midst of this tumult, Chosroes the son of Hormisdas made his escape out of the palace, being apprehensive that his own life was not safe; but Bindoes having intelligence where he was, dispatched a person to assure him, that he was so far from having any intentions against his person, that his design was to set him upon the throne. Upon this Chosroes returned, and they took their measures together; but while they were consulting, Hormis-

[u] Theophylact. lib. iv. Evagr. lib. vi. c. 14. Theophan. chronogr. p. 221. Cedren. hist. comp. p. 396.

das

das ſent a meſſage from his priſon, requeſting, that a great council of the nobility might be called, and that he might have the liberty of ſpeaking to them freely. When the Perſian lords were acquainted with this demand, they inſtantly aſſembled at the palace, and then ordered, that Hormiſdas ſhould be brought from his priſon, and have liberty given him to ſay what he pleaſed. The king, after looking ſeveral times round on the aſſembly, made a long and vehement ſpeech, in which he deplored his own calamity much, but the miſery of the people more, inveighing bitterly againſt the authors of this anarchy and confuſion, exhorting them to ſave the ſtate from that deſtruction with which it was threatened, and to beware of eſtabliſhing a tyranny, while they endeavoured to avoid it. He then adjured them not to think of making Choſroes his ſucceſſor, becauſe he knew him to be of a haughty, turbulent, and cruel nature, prone to all ſorts of vices, and equally careleſs of his own honour and the public good. His other ſon, however, he recommended as a young prince of a mild and docible nature, one who was inclined to think right, and to do well. Laſtly, he entered into a detail of the ſervices he had himſelf rendered his country, in ſubduing many provinces, and in reducing ſeveral of their barbarous neighbours ſo low as to pay them tribute. When he had finiſhed all he had to ſay, Bindoes made a long inſulting anſwer, exhorted the people to have no regard to his words, but to act in ſuch a manner as might beſt inſure their own ſafety. This language ſuited well the genius of the people, ever prone either to ſlaviſh ſubmiſſion, or to licentious inſolence; they followed implicitly the directions of their leader, who cauſed the young prince Hormiſdas had recommended to be murdered in his preſence, and afterwards to be cut to pieces. Then they ſacrificed the unhappy woman his mother in the ſame manner; and that fortune might never reſtore Hormiſdas to his former dignity, they ordered his eyes to be put out with a hot iron. All which was performed with the ſame ready barbarity with which it was directed. This end had the reign of Hormiſdas, when it had continued one and twenty years * (C).

Choſroes,

* THEOPHYLACT. lib. iv. c. 6. THEOPHAN. chronogr. p. 223. EVAGR. lib. vi. c. 16, CEDREN. hiſt. comp p. 397.

(C) It is impoſſible to read this part of the Perſian hiſtory without emotion. One may ſafely number this among thoſe extraordinary revolutions, which appear but rarely in the records of nations;

Choſroes II. Year of Chriſt, 589.

Choſroes, as ſoon as theſe objects of popular cruelty were removed, was ſeated on his father's throne; whence riſing up, he came and ſtood under a golden arch, according to the Perſian cuſtom, and having received the homage of the principal perſons preſent, the reſt with loud acclamations celebrated the acceſſion of their new king, and made vows for his felicity. At firſt he treated his father with the utmoſt lenity, ſent him diet from his table, ordered him proper attendants, gave him rich wines, and provided for him many amuſements; but this prevailing nothing over the ſpirit of Hormiſdas, who continued to reproach his ſon with his barbarity, and unnatu-and when they do, ſtrike the judicious reader with an amazement mixed with horror. The Greek hiſtorian, Theophylact, relates the whole of this extraordinary tranſaction very circumſtantially, and inſerts at large the ſpeeches of Hormiſdas and Bindoes (66). One would be apt to think from the many rhetorical turns which are in them both, but in that of the king's eſpecially, that they were not genuine; but when we find the reſt of the Greek writers, and, which is ſtill more extraordinary, the oriental hiſtorians, putting the ſame words into the ſame perſons mouths, one is conſtrained to baniſh ſuſpicion, and to admit, that one of the moſt excellent harangues that was perhaps ever compoſed, flowed from the mouth of a Perſian prince, in a ſituation, when eloquence would have been leaſt expected. But there ſeems to be ſomething fatal in diſtreſſing majeſty, and that the divine character of kings, like the eſſential qualities of gold, appear moſt clearly from the ſevereſt trials The ſpeech of Hormiſdas, too long to be tranſcribed, but faithfully abridged in the text, proved a ſort of prophecy; for after this ſedition the reader will perceive the Perſians were never quiet. Choſroes was indeed juſt ſuch a king as his father foreſaw he would be, and the people ſuffered from his ill conduct much greater evils, than they had ever felt under the unfortunate prince his father. Authors do not agree about the manner in which Hormiſdas was put to death Some ſay, that he earneſtly deſired it himſelf, rather than to have his eyes burnt out with a hot iron, which was thought neceſſary to prevent his eſcaping, as Cavades had done (67). Theſe add, that his ſon, provoked by his reproaches, ordered him to be beat to death (68). Others affirm, that Hormiſdas refuſing food, Choſroes directed him to be ſlain 69. However it was, the people deteſted the cruelty of their new king, and he had the mortification to ſee himſelf abandoned by thoſe who had lately ſaluted him with the loudeſt acclamations. It is probable, that his reſentment for this continued with him as long as he reigned.

(66) Theophylact. hiſt. lib. iv. c. 3, 4. chronogr. p. 223. Theophylact. ubi ſupra. comp p. 396 Zonar. annal lib. xiv. p 75.

(67) Theophan.

(68) Cedren. hiſt.

(69) See an account of his death in the next period.

ral

ral baſeneſs, Choſroes, doubting what effect his reproaches might have, cauſed him to be cudgelled to death. Then, ſuppoſing himſelf firmly ſeated on the throne, he gave ſumptuous entertainments, and diſtributed moſt profuſely the royal treaſures amongſt thoſe he thought moſt capable of aſſiſting him; mighty largeſſeſs he likewiſe beſtowed upon the people, and ordered the priſon doors to be every-where ſet open, that the fame of his lenity and liberality might effectually ſecure the hearts of his ſubjects. On the ſixth day after his acceſſion, he wrote letters to Varamus, and ſent him alſo magnificent preſents, exhorting him to come ſpeedily and pay his duty to him, promiſing him, in caſe he did ſo, to make him the ſecond man in his kingdom. Varamus refuſed his preſents, and in a haughty letter, at the head of which, among a multitude of other titles, he called himſelf the friend of God, the glorious conqueror, and the ſcourge of tyrants, he rejected his propoſal, ordered him to lay down the crown, to come immediately and pay his reſpects to him, on which condition he ſhould have a government given him. Choſroes having exhibited theſe letters to his council, they were extremely provoked, and gave it as their opinions, that he ought to be puniſhed. Choſroes, however, wrote again to him, ſignifying his apprehenſion that his ſecretary had impoſed upon him, and written rather his own dreams than what was dictated to him by Varamus, exhorting him by his future conduct to redeem his credit, and not to perſiſt in his deſign of making his country a field of blood. Varamus, however, prepared for war, and Choſroes, ſince it could not be avoided, advanced to meet him. They faced each other near Niſibis, the city being in the power of the king, while Varamus encamped before it. Here a negotiation was begun, but it proved ineffectual; and Choſroes, ſuſpecting ſome of the nobility about him, put them to death without heſitation, which created him many more enemies than it delivered him from; ſo that ſhortly after, when Varamus attacked the ſuburbs, and put part of the army quartered therein to the ſword, the reſt preſently joined him, and ſhewed a ſtrong diſpoſition to treat Choſroes as ill as they had done his father; to avoid which, he fled, as privately as poſſible, exceedingly dejected under his misfortune, and the more ſo, becauſe he had ſcarce any friends to ſhare it with him. His women, menial ſervants, and a few of his guards, about thirty perſons in the whole, fled with him, they knew not where; ſometimes he had thoughts thoughts of retiring among the Scythians, at others he hoped to hide himself in the mountains [y].

Flies into the Roman territories.

At length, committing himself and his affairs wholly to providence, he came as it were by accident to a frontier post in the Roman dominions, and that too far in the night. Probus, who commanded there for the emperor, received him, and all who were with him, kindly and courteously, permitting the king to write immediately to the Roman general, who as readily consented to his sending an express with his letters to the emperor. In these he besought Mauritius, who then possessed the imperial dignity, to assist him against his rebellious subjects, preserving in the midst of a most pathetic supplication all the dignity of a king. While Chosroes was in this distress, Varanus entered the city of Ctesiphon in great splendor. Bindoes he seized and threw into prison, treating all such as had shewn any affection to the royal family with great severity; but towards the rest of the Persians, he affected the greatest humanity, and a superabundant condescension. He did not fail, however to illue his orders for apprehending Chosroes, if it was possible; and when he found that all his caution in this respect was vain and fruitless, he turned his thoughts to the securing of the frontier garisons, and the most considerable cities in Persia, in which he had better success. He likewise gave great feasts, and very bountifully bestowed that treasure he had so easily obtained; yet in the midst of all this pomp and splendor, he saw with concern, that the nobility were greatly dissatisfied, and the people not to be relied on. He could not, however, either extinguish or contain the violent desire he had to be a king. On a religious festival therefore, when of course there was a grand assembly of the nobility at the palace, he took upon him to use the royal ornaments and furniture with all the state of a monarch, though he forbore the title with reluctance. The Persian nobility seeing clearly what he intended, and disdaining to become the subjects of one born their equal, they began to cabal together, in order to concert measures for emancipating themselves and their country, and for restoring the antient lustre of the Persian empire. In their conferences upon this subject, it was unanimously agreed, that Bindoes was the most proper person to conduct an affair of this kind; and therefore they immediately delivered him out of prison, and acknowledged him for their chief.

[y] Theophylact. lib. iv. c. 7. Theophan. chronogr. ubi supra. Evagr. lib. vi. Cedren. hist. comp. ubi supra.

chief. By his advice they came to a reſolution to attack Varamus in the palace in the dead time of the night. This they performed with great courage; but Varamus and his attendants defending themſelves gallantly, the engagement was very obſtinate, and at laſt the nobility were vanquiſhed, many of them being ſlain upon the ſpot, and the reſt thrown to the elephants; only Bindoes, with a few who fought about his perſon, eſcaped, and, marching towards Media, endeavoured to raiſe forces for Choſroes [z].

He enters Perſia in conjunction with the Romans.

AFTER this victory, Varamus thought fit to ſend embaſſadors to court the friendſhip of the Roman emperor Mauritius; but they were ſent back without anſwer, the emperor having already made a treaty with Choſroes, and ordered the governors of his frontier provinces to furniſh him with whatever might be neceſſary for his reſtoration. Theſe timely ſupplies had a proper effect; for the Perſians, ſeeing their king now in a condition to protect them, began almoſt every-where to acknowledge him, and to open their gates to receive his forces. Among the reſt, Niſibis ſubmitted to the king, and Martyropolis was recovered by the Romans, to whom likewiſe Choſroes himſelf delivered Sittas the architect, who had betrayed the place to his father Hormiſdas, for which traiterous act he was now burnt alive. On the other hand, Varamus continued to raiſe forces, chuſing rather to hazard all things, in order to make himſelf a prince, than to deſcend again to the condition of a private man. The chriſtian writers ſuggeſt, that Choſroes, during his diſtreſs, ſeemed to abandon the religion of the magi; and not only worſhipped God after the chriſtian manner, but alſo vowed to dedicate a croſs of pure gold in the church of a certain martyr, in caſe he proved victorious againſt his enemy. Zadeſprates, one of Varamus's commanders, having attempted to enter the quarters of one of the lords who had declared for Choſroes, was defeated and put to death, and his head, and the ſpoils of his army, ſent to the king. The ſame fate had Anathonus very ſhortly after, of which Choſroes adviſed the emperor his protector by Sarames, one of the principal lords of his party; by whom likewiſe he ſignified, that Comentiolus was very backward in aſſiſting him in the recovery of his dominions; whereupon the emperor ſent an order, forbidding that general to meddle any more in the king of Perſia's affairs, appoint-

[z] THEOPHANES chronogr. p. 223. EVAGR. hiſt. eccleſ. lib. vi. c. 17. CEDREN. hiſt. comp. p. 397. ZONAR. annal. lib. xiv. p. 77. GLYC. annal p. 274.

ing

ing at the same time Narses to have the command of the Roman auxiliaries, destined to the service of the Persian king [a].

Beats the rebels, and settles himself on the throne.

This was very grateful to Chosroes, who early the next spring, with his own forces, and those lent him by the emperor, under the command of Narses, marched into Persia with an intent to decide the war at once. Most of the frontier places on his approach rendered to Chosroes, as did the great and strong city Dara, formerly the chief bulwark of the Romans on this side. Chosroes, in testimony of his sincere gratitude, and cordial affection towards the emperor Mauritius, determined to deliver it into his hands. About the same time, the Persian king received from his protector a tiara, richly set with jewels, golden household utensils of all sorts, and a chosen guard to attend upon his person. When the emperor learned that Dara was given up to him, he was so well pleased with the conduct of Chosroes, that he honoured him with the title of his son. In the mean time the Persians, in great multitudes, quitted the service of Varamus, and went to serve under the banners of their prince, who now sought to bring Varamus to a battle. Before this could be brought to pass, several skirmishes happened, and among the rest one, in which Beyzacius, a great officer in the army of Varamus, was taken prisoner; and, after his nose and ears were cut off, brought to their king by the Persians, by whose command he was soon after put to death. A short space after, Seleucia and most of the great cities near the river Euphrates, submitted to the king, and Varamus was forced to retire and to avoid fighting. His army consisted of about forty thousand men, whereas the Romans and Persians under the command of Chosroes were upwards of sixty thousand. The former, however, often attempted to fall upon the latter in the night, but were prevented through the vigilance of the Roman officers; sometimes also they presented themselves in the field by day, so disposed as if they intended immediately to give battle; and, after harassing and fatiguing the confederates, withdrew at last into their camp. The Roman officers all this time had much ado, to restrain the ardor of Chosroes, who was always for attacking the enemy, though on disadvantageous terms. At last, however, an opportunity offered, and the Roman officers consenting, he attacked the army of [a] Zonar. annal. ubi supra. Theophylact. lib. v. c. 1. Evagr. hist. eccles. lib. vii. c. 19. Cedren. hist. comp. p. 397. Theophan. chronogr. p. 224.

Varamus,

Varamus, defeated it, and took six thousand prisoners, most of whom he ordered to be put to the sword, or to be thrown to his elephants. The very tent of Varamus was taken with all his golden furniture, which the Romans presented to Chosroes, who, on the other hand, attributed all his success to them, and chose a thousand of them for his body guard, and in every other respect did all he could to testify his gratitude towards them. Chosroes likewise took this opportunity to send to the church of Sergius the martyr the golden cross, set with jewels, which he had vowed, and with it one taken away by Chosroes the son of Cavades, together with a letter, which is still extant in the history written by Theophylact (D). Chosroes

(D) Evagrius, the ecclesiastical historian, assures us, that Chosroes sent back to Gregory, bishop of Antioch, a cross of gold inriched with precious stones, which had been taken out of the church of Sergius the martyr by his grandfather Chosroes, and that he also sent therewith another cross of gold with the following inscription: "It fell out, that when I Chosroes, king of kings, son of Hormisdas, was obliged by the criminal infidelity of the accursed Varamus, and certain troops of horse who adhered to him, to fly for safety to the Romans, and that I sent some troops of my cavalry to the city of Carcas, under the command of a certain officer, to traverse the designs of the accursed Zadespras, who was come from Nisibis with an intent to debauch the troops I had in that city from my service, I having heard that the most celebrated martyr Sergius granted to every one, who sought his protection, whatsoever on their parts was desired, besought him on the seventh day of January, in the first year of my reign, to grant me victory against Zadespras, promising, that in case my troops either killed that rebel, or took him alive, that I would give to his church a cross of gold, inriched with precious stones. On the ninth day of the month of February the troops of horse I had dispatched against him returned, and presented me with the head of Zadespras. Having obtained my petition, and being willing to give the most public, as well as sincere, marks of gratitude and thankfulness, I have sent to his church this cross, which I caused to be made on purpose, together with one given by the emperor Justinian, and taken by my grandfather Chosroes the son of Cavades, which I found deposited among my treasures" (70). There is another pompous inscription in the history cited below; but this is sufficient to shew the hypocrisy of Chosroes, who afterwards declared himself the open enemy of Christ and of christians, not only by persecuting them in his own do-

(70) Evagr. hist. eccles. lib vi. c. 21.

roes alſo married a chriſtian woman, whoſe name was Sira, and honoured her with the title of queen, notwithſtanding the prohibition of the Perſian laws, ſhewing on all occaſions ſuch favour to the chriſtians, that many were of opinion he himſelf was that way inclined; though, in a few years after, he gave the ſtrongeſt demonſtrations, not only of his zealous attachment to the religion of his anceſtors, but of his peculiar averſion to the faith of Chriſt [b].

Alters his conduct intirely.

From the moment he was ſettled on his throne, he laid aſide the foreign cuſtoms he had hitherto made uſe of to ingratiate himſelf with the Romans, and put on the ſtate and behaviour of a Perſian prince, as if he had never experienced what adverſity was. The Roman general Narſes intimated to him, before he left his dominions, the vaſt obligations he was under to the emperor Maurice, and to the Roman people, whoſe power that general highly magnified, and ſpoke of them as lords of the univerſe. Choſroes modeſtly anſwered, that he was very ſenſible of the kindneſs ſhewed him by the emperor; but as to the Roman power, he predicted ſo exactly its declenſion and deſtruction, that the Greek writers will needs have it Choſroes was a great aſtrologer, and drew his knowledge of future events from the ſkill he had in that ſcience. As to his own ſubjects, Choſroes treated them with great rigour, or, as others phraſe it, with unreaſonable ſeverity; he proſecuted without mercy all ſuch as had any ſhare either in the favour, or in the government, while Varamus held the ſupreme power. By this method he quite extinguiſhed that faction, and, by reſtoring the antient Perſian conſtitution, he aggrandized himſelf ſo as to become terrible to his neighbours; whence it came to paſs, that the barbarous prince, with whom Varamus had ſheltered himſelf, and who had at firſt thoughts of lending him troops to invade Perſia, began to grow ſo apprehenſive of the vengeance of Choſroes, that he ordered his competitor to be poiſoned [c].

[b] Theophylact. lib. v. c. 5. Theophan. chronogr. p. 225. Evagr. hiſt. eccleſ lib vi. c. 21. Zonar. annal. ubi ſupra. Cedren. hiſt comp. 404. Glycas. annal. ubi ſupra. [c] Zonar. annal. lib. xiv. p. 80. Theophylact. lib. v. c. 7. Theophan. chronogr p 243. Evagr. hiſt. eccleſ. lib. vi. c. 23. Cedren. hiſt. comp. ubi ſupra.

minions, but by endeavouring to oblige the Greeks to quit that religion, the principles of which induced them to ſet him upon the throne of his fathers. We ſhall hereafter ſee, that he had reaſon to ſay with the emperor Julian, Vicisti ô Galilæe!

When

WHEN the Persian monarch found all things quiet at home, and himself at leisure to lay hold of any advantages that might offer, he began to threaten the Roman provinces on account of the excursions made by the Saracens into his dominions, by the encouragement, as he pretended, of the Roman generals, who commanded on the frontiers. When the emperor Maurice, whose affairs were already in disorder, was informed of this, he sent embassadors to Chosroes to set this matter in a true light, and to prevent, if possible, a war on this side, which he knew, as things were circumstanced, could not but be fatal to the empire. On the arrival of the Roman embassadors, Chosroes treated them but indifferently, suffering them to remain a long time at court without an audience. At last, he who was at the head of the embassy, took an opportunity of speaking to the king, and, after a short recapitulation of the favours done him by the Romans, he proceeded to shew the weakness of the grounds Chosroes pretended to have for making war, and the injustice of such a proceeding towards his benefactor; which free representation so affected Chosroes, that, far from taking it amiss, he told the embassador, whatever causes he might have for the measures he meant to take, he would for the present lay aside his resentment for his sake; and thus for this time war was prevented [d].

It with difficulty hindered from making war on the Romans.

IT was not long, however, before a fresh opportunity offered for the gratifying the ambition of the Persian. This was the murder of Maurice the emperor by Phocas, an impiety which filled the Roman empire with bloodshed and confusion, and gave at the same time Chosroes a fair opportunity of taking arms, under colour of revenging the death of his protector and father; for so he was wont to call the emperor Maurice. In vain did Phocas, by his embassador Bilius, endeavour to appease him with large presents and larger promises; he regarded neither; but having sent a rude answer to Phocas's letters by a messenger of his own, threw the embassador into prison, making all the preparations possible for entering speedily the Roman frontiers. At first he gave out, that he had no other view than revenging the murder of Maurice, and restoring the empire to his family; but this soon appeared to be only a pretence, since the king refused to send assistance to Narses, who at this time had taken arms against Phocas. The true intent with which Chosroes made war was, the enlarging his own dominions, while the Romans were divided, and in no condition to reſiſt him. In his firſt campaign he met with ſome trouble, the Roman troops endeavouring to make the beſt defence they could; but, their general being ſlain, and themſelves indifferently ſupplied, he at length triumphed over them, and laid all the frontiers under contribution. In the ſeventeenth year of his reign, he continued the war, and reduced ſeveral fortreſſes. The next year he recovered the ſtrong city of Dara, plundered all Meſopotamia and Syria, and carried off ſuch immenſe riches, that no computation could be made of them. In his nineteenth year he paſſed the Euphrates; ravaged Syria, Paleſtine, and part of Phœnicia, waſting all places, wherever he came, with fire and ſword. The year following, his general Cardaregas waſted Armenia and Cappadocia, defeated the Roman army with a great ſlaughter, and then, meeting no oppoſition, deſtroyed Galatia, Paphlagonia, and all the country as far as Chalcedon, burning cities, and putting people to death without any reſpect to ſex or age [c].

Invades the Roman territories.

[d] THEOPHYLACT. lib. viii. c. 1. GLYC. annal. p. 276. THEOPHAN. chronogr. p 244. CEDREN. hist. comp. ubi supra ZONAR. annal. ubi supra.

Makes a rapid conqueſt of its principal provinces.

In the two and twentieth year of his reign, Choſroes took Apamea and Edeſſa, and blocked up Antioch. This induced the Romans to hazard a battle, though they were much inferior in ſtrength; wherein they were ſo totally defeated, that it is ſaid the Perſians ſcarce left any to mourn the death of their companions. The year following he took Cæſarea, and carried away myriads of people into captivity. Syria had in the next campaign the ſame fate that Cappadocia felt in this. In his twenty fifth year, Choſroes made himſelf maſter of Damaſcus, to which city the emperor Heraclius ſent embaſſadors, beſeeching him to have mercy upon his ſubjects, and ſupplicating a peace on any terms he would impoſe; but Choſroes would not afford his embaſſador ſo much as an anſwer. The year following he conquered Judæa, took and plundered the city of Jeruſalem, carried away the croſs on which Chriſt ſuffered, and the patriarch Zacharias, into Perſia. In this campaign he ſold ninety thouſand chriſtians for ſlaves to the Jews in his dominions, who, out of their wonted humanity, cut every one of their throats. Theſe vaſt conqueſts ſerved only to increaſe the ambition of the Perſian, and to ſwell his imagination with mighty ideas of his own power; inſomuch, [c] Cedren. hiſt. comp. p. 410. Zonar. annal. ubi ſupra. Theophylact. lib. viii. c. 3. Glyc. annal. ubi ſupra. Theophan. chronogr. p. 245.

that

that, in the twenty ſeventh year of his reign, he made an expedition into Egypt, aad having divided his forces, with one part of his army he took Alexandria, and ſubdued all the country towards Libya, while the other was employed in the reduction of the Upper Egypt; wherein he puſhed his conqueſts to the very frontiers of Ethiopia; adding thus the empire of Afric to that of Aſia, executing in the ſpace of a few years what all his anceſtors from Artaxerxes had been ſo long endeavouring at in vain. The year following, he once more turned his forces againſt the Conſtantinopolitan empire, and that with ſuch ſucceſs, that he reduced the city of Chalcedon, which he had long blocked up. The remaining part of that year, and all the next, was employed in thoroughly ſubduing and regulating in all reſpects the government of the conquered provinces. As for the emperor Heraclius, incapable of reſiſting, and at the ſame time extremely afflicted at the ſight of the horrible cruelties every-where practiſed by the Perſians, he reſolved once more to make an effort towards obtaining peace. With this view he ſent deputies to Choſroes, with inſtructions to lay before him the miſerable condition of Aſia, the deplorable conſequences of continuing the war any longer, and the earneſt deſire that himſelf had to purchaſe quiet upon any terms. To all this Choſroes made a very ſhort and plain anſwer; that he would never ſpare the ſubjects of Heraclius, or grant him peace, till he and they abjured their crucified God, and embraced the religion of the Perſians f.

Forces the emperor Heraclius to take up arms.

IN the thirty firſt year of his reign, Choſroes beſieged and reduced the city of Ancyra in Galatia, and prepared againſt the next year to carry his conqueſts farther. Indeed, there was no probability that any check could be put to them, the emperor being ſo embaraſſed in Europe by other barbarous enemies, that he was only able to lament, without having it at all in his power to remedy the miſchiefs ſuffered by his ſubjects in Aſia. Yet when things were come to this extremity, and nothing could be more apparent, than that Choſroes intended the utter deſtruction of his monarchy, Heraclius determined to put all to the hazard, and, having granted his enemies in Europe what terms they thought fit, began to make the neceſſary diſpoſitions for turning the whole of his force, ſuch as it was, upon the Perſians. This happened in the thirty ſecond year of the reign of Choſroes, who, far f GLYC. annal. ubi ſupra. THEOPHAN. chronogr. p. 246. ZONAR. annal. lib. xiv. p. 84. CEDREN. hiſt. comp. p. 413. GREGOR. ABUL-PHAR. hiſt. dynaſt. p. 157.

from

from being displeased, rejoiced at this news, believing that it would afford him the opportunity he had so long sought of conquering all the Roman dominions, without appearing to make war on an unarmed and defenceless people. After Easter, in the succeeding year, the emperor Heraclius marched with all his forces towards the frontiers of his empire. Sarbanazas at that time commanded the Persian forces, and lay incamped in Armenia, where he was every day committing new outrages, having nothing else in view but the amassing money, and plundering the helpless inhabitants of what little they had left. On the approach of the Roman army the Persian general sent out spies to discover its strength; and on their report that it was very numerous, and that the emperor Heraclius had inflamed his men with a sort of religious enthusiasm, he thought it expedient to recal his parties, and to intrench his forces on the summit of a hill, where they could not be attacked, but at a great disadvantage. This he did, supposing that the emperor could not long keep the field, especially in that season. But in this he was mistaken, as he was afterwards in his notion of breaking through the Roman army, which he attempted in the night, but without success. At last, weary of being besieged, he determined at all events to fight. This resolution once taken, he divided his army into three bodies, and attacked the Roman camp in as many different places. Heraclius, who had previous intelligence of what the Persian general intended, suffered the Persians to prevail in every one of their attempts. By this means he effectually divided them, and then falling upon the rear of each corps, cut the far greatest part of them to pieces. This victory was so far from making Heraclius elate, that it served only to encourage him to make new propositions of peace and friendship to the Persians, which were received, as all the former were, that is, with the utmost contempt and indignation [g].

Loses all his former conquests.

Chosroes, to repair the mistakes of his former general, appointed Sais, a noble Persian, to command in chief a more numerous army, than that which had been defeated the last spring; and to make all things secure, when the season for action drew on, Sarbanazas was sent again to the army, with a considerable reinforcement; nay, the king himself went thither soon after in person. However, Heraclius did not fail

[g] Zonar. annal. ubi supra. Cedren. hist. comp. p. 414. Theophan. chronogr. p. 253. Glyc. annal. ubi supra. Gregor. Abul-Phar. hist. dynast. p. 258.

fail preſſing as hard upon this army, as he did upon that which he had defeated in Armenia; and the Perſians, wearied with long ſervice, and corrupted through their neglect of diſcipline, gave ſuch evident tokens of timidity, when the enemy drew near, and had ſkirmiſhed againſt them with ſome ſucceſs, that Choſroes thought it high time to provide for the ſafety of his perſon; which he did by leaving the army, and thereby increaſed the general conſternation ſo much, that the Perſians were quickly after totally defeated (E). It is ſaid,

(E) There cannot at firſt ſight be any thing more ſurpriſing, than this ſudden extinction of the Perſian power in leſs than twenty years, after it had been carried to a greater height by Choſroes the ſecond, than it had ever attained ſince the demiſe of Alexander the Great. A little attention, however, to the facts preceding this deſtruction of the Perſian empire, will lead us to a ſatisfactory account of its cauſes. From the death of Choſroes the Great the minds of the people had never been thoroughly ſettled. At the very beginning of the reign of Hormiſdas, they were prejudiced againſt his government by the ſtrange meaſures he took, and the infamous company of diviners, ſorcerers, and necromancers, that he kept about him. During the time that Varamus was at the head of affairs, who, by the way, is by ſome authors reckoned one of the kings of Perſia, things went ſtill in a worſe channel. His title to the crown was very indifferent; and therefore, to ſupport it, he firſt laviſhed immenſe ſums among the nobles; but finding this method unſucceſsful, he had recourſe to its contrary; that is to ſay, he oppreſſed the nobility, and turned the ſtreams of his bounty on the loweſt ſort of people. This anſwered his purpoſe better; but it made the condition of the Perſians much worſe, by ſpreading the poiſon of corruption through the maſs of the people. The ſeverity of Choſroes, or rather his cruelty, kept up a conſtant ſpirit of diſaffection, which all his numerous coniqueſts could not allay; though theſe ſerved to waſte his veteran troops, and to exhauſt Perſia of able men, to ſuch a degree, that it was with great difficulty, and not without having recourſe to the harſheſt methods, that he ſet armies on foot, ſufficient to ſtruggle with the Romans, as he did; and yet theſe ſtruggles put the laſt hand to the exhauſting of Perſia, and left it in a deplorable condition, when Siroes came to the crown. If that prince had lived, he would, in all probability, have reſtored the luſtre of the Perſian diadem. As it was, he only procured recruits, by the exchange of priſoners, ſufficient to keep up ſuch an army, as enabled his general to deſtroy his family, and to ſeal the ruin of his empire. The laſt monarch had viſibly no force capable of oppoſing the mighty armies of the Saracens; therefore we muſt look on the battles he fought as the laſt efforts of a languiſhing people. From whence it follows, that tho' they might be briſk and vigorous, yet they could not be either laſting or effectual.

that

that no less than fifty thousand persons were taken prisoners by Heraclius, who, when he found it impracticable to maintain them, first distributed amongst them all that could be possibly spared them, and then gave them their liberties, whereby he gained great reputation. Chosroes now found it necessary to exert his utmost strength, and having in the winter gathered as great a number of forces as he possibly could, he sent them under the command of Sarablagas and Perozites, two of his best general officers, into Albania. He likewise took care to recruit his other army in Armenia, and when he understood that the emperor Heraclius was determined to penetrate into the Persian dominions, he sent orders to his forces in Armenia to advance behind the Romans, as they pressed upon the grand army in Albania. This scheme, as it was well contrived, so it was also faithfully and exactly executed; insomuch, that the emperor found himself in the deepest distress, and in all probability would have perished with all his army, if the Persian generals had not been jealous of each other, which tempted them to engage the Romans separately; an act of rashness so apparent, that it revived the drooping courage of Heraclius's soldiers, and was the chief cause of gaining such a victory, as left not a Persian officer of distinction at liberty; so that Heraclius was forced to release one of his prisoners to carry the news of the defeat. After this the inhabitants of Albania rose upon the Persians, so that they were obliged totally to abandon Albania, where the Romans wintered [h].

Makes new efforts to no purpose.

The two succeeding years the war was carried on in the same way, and with the same success; that is to say, Chosroes made prodigious efforts, which yet were altogether ineffectual, or rather served to increase the power and reputation of Heraclius, who was alike successful in pitched battles and in long and painful expeditions. For his soldiers flushed with conquests, and fully persuaded that victory attended them on account of the justice of their cause, and the strictness of their discipline, made no scruple of undertaking whatever the emperor commanded. In this manner he penetrated into Assyria, passed the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, after routing several times the Persian armies, which endeavoured to obstruct his passage. In the mean time, Chosroes abated nothing either of his cruelty, or of his haughtiness. The christian churches he plundered throughout his dominions, and compelled

[h] Theophan. chronogr. p. 263. Gregor. Abul-Phar. histor. dynast. viii. p. 158. Cedren. Zonar. &c.

all all ſuch of his ſubjects as had embraced the faith to profeſs themſelves Neſtorians. He exhauſted likewiſe all his provinces, in order to form new armies to oppoſe Heraclius, who defeated them as ſoon as he met them in the field, proceeding ſo rapidly in his conqueſts, that Choſroes ſaw himſelf obliged to abandon two of his palaces, burning the rich furniture he could not carry away, and with his wives and concubines to fly firſt to Cteſiphon, and then to Seleucia. There he received intelligence, that his general Sarbarus correſponded with the Romans; which, tho' a calumny, he eaſily gave into, and, in conſequence thereof, diſpatched orders to his collegue then before Chalcedon to put him to death, and to march his army back into Perſia. The courier, who carried this order, being taken by the emperor's party, they opened his letters, and having read them, ſent them to the general, who was intended to be cut off. He, by interpolating theſe orders, ſignified the pleaſure of Choſroes, that four hundred officers of diſtinction ſhould be put to death with him, and then cauſed them to be delivered to his collegue. On reading theſe diſpatches, the whole army was in a tumult, and great numbers began openly to cry out, that Choſroes was unworthy to reign. Among theſe Gundabunas, a principal officer, made the greateſt figure; who, to ſecure himſelf from the reſentment of ſo blood-thirſty a prince, retired with a conſiderable body of men to the camp of the emperor, where he remained in ſafety [1].

Attempts to alter the ſucceſſion, and is depoſed.

AGE, fatigue, and ſorrow, having by this time much weakened Choſroes, he began to think of ſettling the ſucceſſion; but, as he had ever acted on very odd principles, ſo now, out of ſome pique to his eldeſt ſon Siroes, he determined to transfer the crown to Merdaſas, the youngeſt of his ſons. This ſcheme of his could not be long kept a ſecret, and therefore, as ſoon as it reached the ears of Siroes, he immediately projected to hinder it from being carried into execution. With this view he entered into a correſpondence with Gundabunas, who, as was obſerved, remained in the emperor's camp with a body of Perſian troops. The iſſue of this negotiation was, that application was made to the emperor Heraclius to increaſe the forces under the command of Gundabunas, by ſetting at liberty the Perſian priſoners, on a promiſe, that Siroes would inſtantly put himſelf at the head of that army, and march againſt his father. This propoſition was no ſooner made than accepted; and, as all the parties concerned therein were alike intereſted in its ſpeedy execution, all things were quickly ready, and Siroes in a condition to perform his part of the agreement, which he did very effectually. As for Choſroes, his tyranny had rendered him ſo hateful, that, as he wanted an army to ſupport him; he was not only diſappointed in its fidelity, but alſo found himſelf ſo deſtitute of friends, that to eſcape appeared as impracticable as to reſiſt. In a word, he was ſeized by his own ſoldiers, impriſoned, and depoſed by his own ſon, when he had reigned thirty nine years. We ſhall quickly ſee, that theſe were but the beginnings of his misfortunes [k].

[1] THEOPHAN. chronogr. p. 264. GREGOR. ABUL-PHAR. ubi ſupra. ZONAR. &c.

Siroes, Year of Chriſt 626.

Siroes, having aſſumed the regal dignity during the lifetime of his father, and while he was a priſoner, as his father had done in prejudice to his grandfather Hormiſdas, began inſtantly to endeavour the rectifying thoſe miſcarriages, which had brought the flouriſhing kingdom of Perſia into ſo miſerable a condition. In the firſt place, he ordered his father ſhould have his legs, arms, and neck, loaded with chains, and that he ſhould be expoſed in the dungeon where he lay, to all the ſcoffs and inſults of an incenſed unthinking populace. Theſe, forgetting the indelible majeſty of kings, upbraided him with his inſatiable avarice, reproached him with his preſent abject condition, telling him, that, as he had acted like the common enemy of mankind, and the peculiar curſe of the Perſian people; he now juſtly taſted that bitter cup, of which he had made whole nations drink, and was deſervedly degraded from a throne to a dungeon, who, while he ſat on his throne, had filled all the dungeons in his dominions. Five days he languiſhed in this miſerable way, having only bread and water allowed him for a ſubſiſtance; then his beloved ſon Merdaſas, whom he would have raiſed to the throne in prejudice to Siroes, was put to death before his face, together with his other ſons. After all this, and ſuſtaining a freſh load of indignities, Siroes gave orders, that he ſhould be ſhot with arrows, and left to expire of his wounds [l]. Of all theſe ſeverities, as well as of the cruel death of his father, Siroes adviſed the emperor Heraclius by letter, deſiring his friendſhip, and that the league between their empires might be perpetual. As a proof of his ſincerity in all his promiſes, he ſet the patriarch of Jeruſa-

[k] Theophan. chronogr. p. 272. Gregor. Abul-Phar. ubi ſupra. Cedren. Glyc. &c. [l] Theophanes chronogr. ubi ſupra. Gregor. Abul-Phar. ubi ſupra. Cedren. Zonar. &c.

lem;

lem, Zacharias, at liberty, and ſent him, together with the holy croſs, back into Paleſtine, well attended and with rich preſents. On the other hand, Heraclius received the Perſian ambaſſadors with great kindneſs, and readily embraced the peace offered him by their maſter. The next year, in conſequence of this league, all the Perſians, who were priſoners in any part of the Roman dominions, were ſet at liberty; and, notwithſtanding they were many thouſands in number, yet, in their return to their own country, no ill accident happened; ſo ſoon were thoſe nations reconciled, who were inveterate enemies ſo long. But as there is not any thing ſo precarious as human happineſs, while on the one hand the Romans, and on the other the Perſians, promiſed themſelves nothing but peace, plenty, and mutual good offices, from the union which ſubſiſted between their princes; all their hopes were blaſted by the death of Siroes, when he had reigned little more than a year, and had ſcarce effaced, by his mildneſs towards his ſubjects, the terror ariſing from his unnatural treatment of his father [m].

Ardeſer the ſon of Siroes, according to the Greek writers, ſucceeded his father. They might as well have called him Artaxerxes, ſince the name they give him is only a corruption of that Perſian appellation, which the antient Greeks, to accommodate it to their own way of ſpeaking, changed into Artaxerxes. We may be indulged this criticiſm on names, where we have little to ſay of things. This hapleſs prince was but ſeven years old when he was ſet upon a throne, where he remained but ſeven months, before he was barbarouſly murdered by the command of Sarbarazas, who had commanded the armies of Choſroes his grandfather. This ambitious man had ſtill the chief command of the troops when Siroes died. He thereupon pretended a right of being conſulted, before the ſon of his maſter was exalted to the throne of his anceſtors; and on this ſlight foundation rebelled againſt the child, ſlew him, and ſeated himſelf in his place [n].

Ardeſer, or Arhe-ſyr, Year of Chriſt 627.

Sarbarazas, or, as ſome authors call him, Sarbaras, having ſeized the diadem ſtained with blood, found himſelf immediately involved in new crimes to keep it on his head. An oppoſite faction had ſet up Bornarim, a prince of the blood-royal, who for ſix or ſeven months had the ſhadow of royalty, and then loſt it, together with his life, leaving the throne once Sarbarazas and Bornarim. Year of Chriſt 628.

[m] THEOPHAN. chronogr. p 273. GREGOR. ABUL-PHAR. ubi ſupra. GLYC. &c.

[n] THEOPHAN. chronogr. ubi ſupra. ZONAR. CEDREN. GLYC. &c.

more empty to this Sarbarazas. He held it now about six months, but always in fear, the friends of the royal family, and especially a sister of the deceased Artaxerxes, endeavouring, all that in their power lay, to disturb his reign. These contrivances broke at last out into several insurrections, till the flame of civil war catched almost every province in the kingdom, and all Persia began to swim with the blood of its inhabitants. This opened the eyes of the nobility, who now clearly saw that peace could never be restored whilst this usurper lived. They therefore made choice of the nephew of Siroes, the son of the only one of his brothers, who escaped his rage, when he put his father to death; and having once determined to raise this young prince to the throne, they opened him a passage to it by the death of Sarbarazas, the implacable enemy of his family [o].

Isdigertes, Year of Christ 630.

Hormisdas, or as most writers call him Isdigertes, was by this means raised to the regal dignity, as well by the free election of the people, as in consequence of his right of descent. He did not, however, enjoy the kingdom long, I may say, scarce at all, in quiet; for by the time that the domestic stirs of the late factions in Persia were thoroughly quelled, he found a new and most formidable enemy ready to over-run his country. These were the Saracens under the conduct of the successors of Mohammed. We shall elsewhere treat expressly of these people, their religion, government, and exploits. At present, we shall only remark on such circumstances of their affairs, as have a connection with their conquest of Persia, concerning which we have very different accounts from the several Greek writers, who have mentioned it. Some report, that the emperor Heraclius had a great body of Saracens in his army, when he invaded the Persian dominions; and that after the peace was made, they, on their return home, inflamed their countrymen with a desire of making themselves masters of so pleasant a country, as this of Persia was represented to be. Others affirm, that Mohammed himself, when he was thoroughly settled in his principality, made an irruption into Persia in the days of Chosroes; but that this monarch, with the assistance of the Turks, totally defeated the Saracen army, after a very long and very obstinate engagement, which so far broke their spirits, that they did not renew the war till now. But the general opinion is, that the Saracens did not invade Persia till after the reduction of Jerusalem, and that then the war lat-

[o] Theophan. chronogr. p. 275. Gregor. Abul-Phar. ubi supra.

ed

ed ſome time, and with variety of ſucceſs. Some authors repreſent Hormiſdas, or Iſdigertes, as an effeminate and indolent prince, while others again aſſert, that he defended his country with the utmoſt intrepidity, till after various defeats the ſpirits of the Perſians were intirely broken; nay, ſome ſay, that he was himſelf killed in the field. However, there appears to be no juſt cauſe for cenſuring either the courage or conduct of this prince, unleſs it was criminal in him to be unfortunate. He was the laſt of the line of Artaxerxes, who ſat upon the Perſian throne; and with him fell that empire, which had ſubſiſted with ſo much glory for upwards of four hundred years [p] (F).

THE total ſubverſion of ſo great a monarchy in ſo ſhort a ſpace muſt appear ſomewhat wonderful in our eyes, who are accuſtomed to ſee provinces defended for a much longer time, than was taken up by the Saracens in the conqueſt of Perſia; but we ought to conſider, that the ſucceſſors of Mohammed led vaſt armies of a needy ſtarving people, who fought for

[p] THEOPHAN. chronogr. p. 278. CEDREN. ZONAR. &c.

(F) As, at the opening of this period, we endeavoured in a note to point out the advantages the reader would receive from the method purſued therein, ſo we judged it neceſſary to cloſe it, by briefly exhibiting a view of thoſe deficiencies, which have made the following ſection, not only expedient, but neceſſary. In the firſt place, as we have confined ourſelves therein to the materials furniſhed us by the Greek authors, the reader muſt neceſſarily obſerve many wide chaſms in the narration, occaſioned either by the ignorance or careleſſneſs of the Greek hiſtorians, as to ſuch affairs of their neighbours as did not immediately concern themſelves. Secondly, the judicious peruſer muſt have obſerved very imperfect accounts of very important tranſactions, and, not a few, which carry in themſelves the ſtrongeſt appearances of falſhood. Theſe defects flow from the ſame cauſe, and there was a neceſſity of ſuffering this part of the hiſtory to appear in this dreſs, that the reader might know in what light the Greek writers ſet theſe tranſactions. Thirdly, the proper names, titles of honour, wars, and conqueſts of the Perſians, are ſo disfigured by the miſtakes of the authors, from whom we were obliged to take our accounts, that, if we had publiſhed them alone, they muſt have tended, rather to the propagating of error, than of knowledge; ſince it is better to know nothing, than to apprehend we know what we know not. All theſe deficiencies, miſrepreſentations, and miſtakes will be ſupplied and corrected in the following hiſtory; which will effectually demonſtrate the great uſe of ſtudying the oriental writers, hitherto much neglected, and, which is ſtranger, ſtill deſpiſed amongſt us.

new

new habitations, and who eaſily ſettled themſelves in the countries they ſubdued. In this empire of Perſia eſpecially, they had no ſooner defeated Iſdigertes, than they began immediately to canton out his dominions, and to make as exact a ſurvey of them, as the Conqueror did of our country, when he framed what we call the doom's-day book; ſuch a record, and for the ſame purpoſes, being taken here. Beſides, the Perſian prince, as the beſt authors aſſure us, though he laid aſide the enſigns of majeſty, after the great defeat he had received, yet he ſheltered himſelf in one of the diſtant provinces of his empire, and died there about the year 640 or 642.

As to the condition of the native Perſians ſince, we need not wonder that it hath been always very abject and depreſſed, ſince nothing can be more viſible, than that it hath been the chief maxim amongſt all Mohammedan conquerors, without exception, to break the ſpirits, and exhauſt the ſubſtance of the natives of all the countries which fall under their dominion. This they were particularly led to do in Perſia, on account of the difference in religion between them and the natives. At this time the Saracens were not only rude and barbarous, but a furious and enthuſiaſtic people; they were therefore incapable of diſtinguiſhing the true doctrines of the magian ſect, or of reclaiming, by gentle means, thoſe whom they conceived to be idolaters. They therefore perſecuted the natives through a miſguided zeal, and, having ſtamped on them opprobious names, tranſmitted to their poſterity the ſame brutal diſpoſition which they had exerciſed themſelves, as will be ſhewn in the following, and in ſeveral other ſections.

SECT. II.

The hiſtory of the Perſians, from their recovering the empire, to their being ſubdued by the Arabs.

According to the oriental hiſtorians.

THE wide difference there is between the hiſtories of eaſtern nations, as written by European authors and by their own, obliged us originally to diſtinguiſh the hiſtory of Perſia into two ſections; the firſt, according to the former; the ſecond, conformant to the memoir memoirs furniſhed us by the latter. When we laſt treated of this ſubject from the oriental authors, we ended with the conqueſt of the Perſian dominions by Eſcander, or Alexander the Great [a]. In order therefore to connect this period with that, it is neceſſary, previous to our account of the kings, who ſucceeded Ardſhir-Babegan or Artaxares, to ſpeak of thoſe who reigned in the intermediate ſpace, between the death of Alexander and the acceſſion of the before-mentioned Artaxares. The former part of our hiſtory contained the ſucceſſion of the Perſian kings of the two firſt dynaſties, and the third dynaſty is called by the oriental writers Molouk-al-Thaouaif, i. e. The kings of the nations. In order to have a juſt idea of the ſenſe and meaning of this term, we muſt obſerve, that the word Molouk ſignifies kings, and that all the oriental hiſtorians aſſure us, there were in the courts of the antient kings of Perſia Aulad-Molouk-Fars, i. e. Children of the Perſian kings, or princes of the blood, who were honoured with the chief governments, and, when they reſided in them, lived like princes. When therefore the captains of Alexander the Great cantoned all his conqueſts among themſelves, and ſet themſelves up for ſo many independent princes, the eaſtern writers gave to this new race of monarchs the general title of Molouk-al-Thaouaif, or kings of the nations [b]. Some, however, of the Perſian writers incline rather to call this the dynaſty of the vizers, and it muſt be allowed, that it is by far the darkeſt and leaſt intelligible period of the Perſian hiſtory, according to the orientals. This, however, is no reaſon, that, like ſome modern hiſtorians, we ſhall hurry over it, and leave it juſt as dark as we found it. Had the great men of the laſt century been of this lazy diſpoſition, all antient, nay, and all modern, hiſtory, had been a chaos. But to proceed; ſome of the writers of the Perſian hiſtory ſplit this dynaſty into two, and conſequently call them the third and fourth dynaſties of the Perſian kings: the firſt they diſtinguiſh by the name of Aſchkaniens: the latter, by that of Aſchganides [c]. To the firſt they allow twelve kings, who, according to them, reigned altogether one hundred and ſixty-five years. Of the ſecond race, they ſay, there were eight kings, and that they reigned altogether one hundred and fifty years. The truth ſeems to be, that theſe two

[a] See the hiſtory of the Perſians, according to the oriental writers, in the Univerſal Hiſtory, Vol. V. p 89. & ſeq. [b] MIRKHOND. ſect. xxi. D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. tit. MOLOUK AL THAOUAIF. SCHIKARD. tarich p. 102. [c] D'HERBELOT biblioth. orient. tit. ASCHKANIENS.

dynaſties dynasties were invented to fill up the time between the death of Alexander, and the commencement of the fifth dynasty. Our opinion therefore is, that the Aschkaniens and Aschganides are in fact one and the same succession, and no other than that called by the Latin writers Arsacidæ; Aschek, whom the eastern writers make the first monarch of this house, being, as we believe, no other than Arsaces the first of the Parthian kings. But as the proof of this proposition, and the shortest detail possible of the princes of this family, would exceedingly embarrass the thread of our narration, the reader will find what we have farther to say on this point in a note. In the mean time, we will pass on to the proper subject of this section: The history of the fourth dynasty of the Persian kings, distinguished by the name of Sassaniens (A).

A TABLE

(A) The design of this note is to give a short account of the Parthian kingdom from the oriental historians. Previous to this, it is necessary to observe, that though it is an error of a very old date, and an error universally embraced by all the Latin and Greek writers, yet it is still an error, to suppose that there was any real distinction between the Parthians and the Persians Therefore, notwithstanding the titles of the three last sections, in which, for the sake of conforming to the received history of these times, we have admitted this distinction, yet here we give our readers notice, that it is groundless in itself, and took birth from the ignorance of the western writers who would make distinct kingdoms of two provinces in the same kingdom.

Khondemir, the Persian historian, very wisely makes but one dynasty of the kings who succeeded after Alexander to the succession of Artaxares. The first of these was Aschek, or rather Arschak, who is the same with Arsaces. He is said to have been descended from Darius the last king of Persia, and to have taken thence his claim to the throne. He revolted therefore from Antiochus, whom the oriental writers call Anthakasch, or rather from the Seleucidæ his successors, about the year 248 before Christ, in the third year of the hundred and thirty-second olympiad, and from the building of Rome the five hundred and third.

To him succeeded Aschek the second, whom the Greeks also called Arsaces; but how long he reigned, we find not.

Schabour succeeded his father Aschek, and was the first of that name who governed Persia He was surnamed Padischahi Buzurk, that is, The Great King, because he recovered the treasures of the antient Persian monarchs from the Greeks, and brought them back to the royal palaces at Susa and Persepolis. He reigned fifteen years, and was succeeded by his grandson.

Baharam I. This word is properly the name of the planet we call

A TABLE of the fourth dynaſty of the Perſian kings called Saſſaniens or Khoſronians, according to the Perſian hiſtorian Khondemir.

I. Ardeſchir Ben Babek or Babegan, who reigned fourteen years after the defeat of Ardevan, the laſt king of the third dynaſty. II. Schabour call Mars. The monarch of whom we ſpeak ruled eleven years, and then left the throne to be filled by Balas. He governed eleven years likewiſe, and was ſucceeded by Ferouz, which in the Perſian language, ſignifies, good luck, or victory. He was a very gallant prince, and we meet with various particulars relating to his reign in the eaſtern hiſtories. Of theſe the moſt remarkable is, his diſcovering, as he was hunting, a cave, wherein Feridoun, one of the antient Perſian monarchs, had buried a great quantity of gold and ſilver, which Ferouz took from thence, and made uſe of in paying his ſoldiers. He held the kingdom nineteen years, and then left it to his brother

Narſi or Narſes, a warlike prince, who made very conſiderable conqueſts on the ſide of Tartary. He held the ſceptre fourteen years, and then tranſmitted it to his nephew

Ferouz II. who was the ſon of Ferouz I. who, after governing ſeventeen years, incurred ſome way or other the diſpleaſure of his ſubjects, and loſt his life by a conſpiracy. To him ſucceeded his ſon

Balas II. Of whom we find nothing remarkable; only we are told, that he reigned twelve years. He had for his ſucceſſor

Ardevan, whom the Latins and Greeks call Artabanus. Some writers, as we apprehend, give this prince the title of Khoſrou, which, amongſt the Perſian princes, was both a proper name and a ſurname; whence hath ſprung great confuſion. This prince governed thirteen years, and by ſuch of the oriental hiſtorians as divide the ſucceſſors of Alexander into two dynaſties, he is held to be the laſt of the firſt. He was ſucceeded by Aſchek III. but how long he governed is uncertain. Some authors report, that he was deſcended from the antient kings of the ſecond dynaſty. There are others, however, who affirm, that he was of the ſame family with his predeceſſors, who, inſtead of Parthians, were Armenians by birth, and only made choice of Parthia for the ſeat of their empire, becauſe it was in the heart of their dominions. After him reigned Choſroes II. his ſon, who governed the empire for twelve years in peace. The eaſtern writers place the birth of our Saviour under his reign. He was ſucceeded by

Balas III. his ſon, or his grandſon, the time of whoſe reign is uncertain; but he left the throne to his ſon

II. Schabour Ben Ardeschir, who reigned thirty one years.
III. Hormouz Ben Schabour, who also reigned thirty one years.
IV. Baharam Ben Hormouz, who reigned three years and three months.
V. Baharam Ben Baharam, who reigned seventy years.
VI. Baharam Ben Baharam, Ben Baharam, who reigned thirty years and four months.
VII. Narsi Ben Baharam, who reigned nine years.
VIII. Hormouz Ben Narsi, who reigned seven years and five months.
IX. Schabour Dhoulakthaf, who reigned seventy two years.
X. Ardeschir, grandson to Hormouz Ben Narsi, who reigned four years.
XI. Schabour Ben Schabour Dhoulakthaf, who reigned near five years.
XII. Baharam Ben Schabour, surnamed Kerman Shah, who reigned thirteen years.

Gudarez, who performed nothing of note, but, after reigning twenty one years, left the throne vacant to his son Narsi or Narses the second.

This Narses II. was a very warlike prince, and made great conquests in Khoraſſan, governed with great reputation twenty years, and then left the crown to Narses III. who reigned ten years, and extended his father's conquests. He was succeeded by Ardevan II. who governed long, and in whose days idolatry, or rather polytheism, after the Greek manner, became the prevailing religion of the east. He is said to have had for his successor

Ardevan III. who, after a reign of twenty three years, was defeated and slain, as we have shewn in the text, by Ardschir Babegan (1). To have attempted the reconciling all these names and dates to the accounts given us by the Greek and Latin writers, would have required a volume, and perhaps nothing of certainty would have resulted from such an attempt at last. A very learned German hath taken a great deal of pains in this way, whose work the inquisitive may consult (2). Our business was to make this note an introduction to the following history, by connecting it to the last period of the Persian affairs, according to the oriental writers; and this being effected, our end is answered.

(1) Khondemir, Lebtarikh, Mirkhond, D'Herbelot, bibl. orient. Art. Molouk, Thaouaif, Aschkaniens, &c. (2) Tarich. i. e. Series Regum Persiæ, &c. Auctore W. Schikardo, 4to. Tubingæ A. D. 1628.

XIII.

XIII. Jezdegerd Al Athim, or The Wicked, who reigned twenty one years.
XIV. Baharam Gour Ben Jezdegerd, who reigned twenty three years.
XV. Jezdegerd Ben Baharam Gour, who reigned eighteen years.
XVI. Hormouz Ben Jezdegerd, who reigned one year.
XVII. Firouz the brother of Hormouz, who reigned twenty eight or thirty years.
XVIII. Balaſch Ben Firouz, who reigned ſomewhat leſs than fourteen years.
XIX. Cobad Ben Firouz, who reigned forty three years.
XX. Nouſchirvan Ben Cobad, who reigned forty eight years.
XXI. Hormouz Ben Nouſchirvan, who reigned twelve years. Baharam Tchoubin, who held the ſovereign power ſome years, and is therefore by ſome reckoned amongſt the kings.
XXII. Khoſrou Perviz Ben Hormouz, who reigned thirty two years.
XXIII. Schirouich Ben Khoſrou Parviz reigned ſix or eight months. There is a tradition in the eaſt, that parricides, ſuch as this king was, ſurvive not their parents above ſix months.
XXIV. Ardeſchir Ben Schirouich, who reigned one year and ſix months.
XXV. Scheheriar, who was not of the royal family. He reigned two years and twenty days.
XXVI. Touran Dokht Benat Khoſrou Parviz, who reigned but two months.
XXVII. Azurmi Dokht, ſiſter to the laſt-mentioned king, who reigned one year and four months.
XXVIII. Farakhzad Ben Khoſrou, who reigned only one month.
XXIX. Jezdegerd Ben Scheheriar, Ben Khoſrou Parviz, who, according to ſome writers, reigned twenty years, and was the laſt king of this dynaſty [d].

THOUGH we have followed Khondemir exactly in this table of the Perſian kings, yet we do not conceive ourſelves bound to ſubmit always to his authority in our ſubſequent hiſtory. We followed him in the table, becauſe he is more conſiſtent and exact in his liſt of kings than any other writer; but in reſpect of facts we muſt take the liberty of diſſenting from him, as often as probability and better authority than his ſhall require it. This being premiſed, we proceed to ſpeak of theſe kings, and of the principal tranſactions in their reigns, according to the order in which they are placed above.

[d] KHONDEMIR in KHELASSAT ALAKHBAR.

Ardſhir Babegan.

Ardſchir, or rather, according to our orthography, Ardſhir Babegan, according to the moſt ancient hiſtories, was the grandſon of Saſſan, the brother of a certain queen of Perſia, who, ſeeing himſelf excluded from the throne, and being a little apprehenſive that his life was not perfectly ſafe, thought fit to travel; and having ſpent many years abroad, died at laſt in exile, and left among other children the father of this Ardſhir, who having a curioſity to ſee his native country, returned thither privately, and entered into the ſervice of Babec, who was governor of a province for Ardavan, or, as the Greeks call him, Artabanus, the laſt monarch of the Parthians. This nobleman, after ſome time, perceiving in this youth the evident tokens of an extraordinary genius, reſolved to fix him in his family, and with that view gave him his daughter in marriage, by whom he had Ardſhir, who, in gratitude to his mother's family, took the ſirname of Babegan.

His adventures at the court of Ardevan.

He was educated by his grandfather with great care, in all the learning of the Perſians, and was alſo taught by his father all the exerciſes becoming a perſon of quality; and being equally aſſiduous in acquiring both, he became, while a very youth, the wonder of the province; and, in fine, was ſo much talked of, that his fame reached the ears of Ardavan, who ſent for him to court, where he became ſo highly in his favour, that he ordered him to remain conſtantly about the young princes his ſons, and ſeemed to love him as tenderly as he did them. One day, however, when the young princes went a hunting, Ardavan followed them privately, that he might have a better opportunity of obſerving their behaviour; and having by this means an occaſion of ſeeing how much they were excelled in horſemanſhip and archery, as well as in ſtrength and gracefulneſs, by their companion Ardſhir, he from that moment entertained a jealouſy of him, and determined within himſelf to remove him from court, by beſtowing upon him ſome office, which ſhould require his conſtant attendance. Accordingly, he gave him the command of his forces in a diſtant province, whither he went immediately, and remained there till ſuch time as he was informed of the death of his grandfather Babec, which made him return to court, in hopes of procuring his government. Ardavan, far from liſtening to his intreaties, immediately beſtowed it upon the prince his eldeſt ſon.

This

THIS misfortune was quickly followed by another; the king was much diſturbed by a dream, and on conſulting the moſt eminent diviners in his court, they told him, it portended that a certain fugitive from his court would deprive him of his life and crown. It ſo fell out, that there was in the king's ſerail a lady, who was paſſionately in love with Ardſhir, and ſhe, being apprehenſive that this interpretation might be fatal to him, immediately gave him notice of it, upon which he inſtantly retired with all imaginable ſecrecy. His flight alarmed the king, who never thought of him before; but it was too late, for Ardſhir was gone into Perſia Proper, the province of which his grandfather had been governor. He was met at the city Eſtechar, or Perſepolis, by a croud of the nobility of the province, who were all devoted to his family, and who readily offered him their ſervice in any thing he deſired. In all probability, the interpretation of the king's dream was what firſt put it into the head of Ardſhir to attempt the recovery of the kingdom of his anceſtors; wherefore taking counſel from ambition on the one hand, and a juſt ſenſe of the extreme danger he was in on the other, Ardſhir began to ſet before the eyes of the Perſian nobility the advantages that would accrue to them from an intire revolution, and he was ſo fortunate in his applications as to bring them over intirely to his intereſt. From the moment he entered the province, the young prince, who was governor of it, conceived a jealouſy of him; but before he could get any thorough information of his deſigns, Ardſhir took the field with a conſiderable army. The prince preſently drew together ſuch of his father's forces as remained faithful, in order to oppoſe him; but after ſeveral engagements, there happened at laſt one which was deciſive; his army being totally defeated, and the prince himſelf ſlain upon the ſpot. The like fate ſoon after befel Ardavan himſelf, who, entering the province of Fars with all the forces of his empire, was there preſently defeated and ſlain by the victorious Ardſhir, who thereupon immediately aſſumed the regal dignity, and ſoon after the ſwelling title of Shah-in-Shah, or king of kings[e].

His flight from thence.

THIS monarch, in the beginning of his reign, very artfully tempered the ſeverity of a conqueror with the mildneſs of a natural prince. Where-ever he found reſiſtance, he deſtroyed Acquires a ſon and ſucceſſor by the prudence of his vizier.

[e] TARIKH KOZIDEH & BINA KITI ap. KHONDEMIR. MIRKHOND. ſect. XXIV. GREGOR. ABUL PHAR. H. D. dynaſt. vii p. 126.

stroyed it by the sword; but to such as submitted to his government, he shewed all imaginable kindness, without any respect of persons. On this account he spared all the family of Ardavan; and, to do them still greater pleasure, he married the eldest daughter of that prince. This lady, however, conceived such a hatred towards him, for depriving her family of the empire, that within a very short space after her marriage, she attempted to poison him, in order to set the imperial crown on her brother's head. Being detected in the fact, Ardshir gave orders to his prime minister to cause her to be put to death. When he came to acquaint the unhappy lady with her sentence, she told him she with child; upon which the minister, without acquainting his master, concealed her privately, and caused the son of which she was delivered to be brought up with the utmost care, giving him the name of Schabour, i. e. king's son, the same name as the Greek Sapor. The vizier waited a long time for a favourable opportunity of breaking this secret to his master. At length, observing the king to be one day in high good humour, after exercising on horseback with many of the nobility, he brought forth the young prince, introduced him to his father, and, not without some apprehension, entered into the whole detail of his preservation. Ardshir, on the other hand, received the young prince with the utmost tenderness, and, after reflecting severely on himself for his rashness, highly commended the prudence of his minister; and having caused Schabour to be conducted to the palace, declared him not long after his heir, and took all imaginable pains to instruct him in the arts of government [f].

His character as a Legislator.

The Oriental historians agree in affirming, that the character of Ardshir was, that of a complete hero; one no less distinguished for knowledge and virtue, than for valour and military skill. From the moment he was seated on his throne, he conceived the important design of restoring all the dominions which had belonged to his predecessors in the Persian throne. By arms he recovered large provinces from all his neighbours; and, when he had recovered them, he took care to make the people very sensible of the difference between his government, and that which they had been under before. He erected new cities, where-ever he found inviting situations; he fortified all the considerable towns on his frontiers; he divided the inhabitants of his empire into several classes or tribes, according to their professions, and not only appointed magistrates

[f] Lebtarikh.

trates to govern them, but also counsellors, whose business it was to instruct them in their true interest, to procure for them the redress of their grievances, as also such grants and privileges as might be for their service. Ardshir likewise rebated the edge of the law, taking away the excessive use of capital punishments, in order to make way for milder chastisements, pursuant to a maxim frequently in his mouth, That the sword was never to be employed where the cane might do as well. But the greatest of his performances as a lawgiver was in the literary way. He composed a book, intitled, Adab alaisch, i. e. Rules for attaining a happy life. In this treatise he laid down the maxims necessary to conduct a man in every station, from that of a monarch to that of a mechanic; and this he did with such penetration and perspicuity, that Nouschirvan, the wisest and greatest of his successors, caused this book to be solemnly published throughout all his territories, obliging every family in Persia to have a copy thereof [g] (B).

THE [g] KHONDEMIR. LEBTARIKH. RAOUDHAT. AL AKHIAR.

(B) The true orthography of this prince's name is, Ardeschir Bâbecân. The reason we have not writ it so in the text, is this; all the authorities that we have quoted make use of that manner of spelling which is inserted therein, and which consequently became necessary in our text. He was not only the restorer of the Persian monarchy, in respect to its civil concerns, by assuming the antient title, following the antient customs, and laying claim to all the dominions of the antient kings; but he was likewise so in respect to the religion of the Persians, which by this time, was miserably corrupted. For the purging out all idolatry and superstition, the king summoned a general council of all the wise men in his kingdom; the number of these was forty thousand. Out of these were selected four thousand; from these four hundred; from them forty; and from these seven. Among these was a young man, whose name was Erdâvirâph, of unspotted reputation, and perfectly versed in the writings of Zerdûsht. This man having drank three glasses of a certain odoriferous wine, remained, in the presence of the king and of the other six learned men, seven nights and days in an ecstasy or trance. Then rising up, he dictated to a secretary all that he had seen in his vision, and a very large recapitulation of the magian faith. This miracle, or pretended miracle, wrought so strongly on the king Ardschir, that he immediately cancelled all the laws which had been made from the time of Alexander the Great in favour of idolatry or polytheism, and fully re-established the religion of Zerdûsht This, as the reader will perceive by our quotations, we have from the very best authorities among the eastern writers.

He dies in peace and glory.

The wiſdom, moderation, and ſucceſs of Ardſhir Babegan, as they made him almoſt adored by his ſubjects in his life-time, ſo they cauſed his character to be regarded as a model by thoſe who ſucceeded him in his throne, which he left vacant, after a reign of fourteen years. A certain hiſtorian ſays, he reigned forty; but if any regard be paid to his aſſertion, we muſt ſuppoſe that term to commence from his firſt taking up arms againſt Ardavan; whereas moſt of the hiſtowriters (3). It is, however, very ſingular and worthy of obſervation, that a Rabbinical writer alſo hath conſerved the memory of this very fact: "Orſchir, the ſon of Bâbec, the firſt prince of that "family, cauſed it to be proclaimed throughout all Perſia, that "he had taken away the ſword of Ariſtotle the philoſopher, which "had devoured the inhabitants of that empire five hundred years "(4)." By the ſword of Ariſtotle are to be underſtood the political maxims of Alexander and his ſucceſſors, which, by this reformation, Ardſchir thoroughly extinguiſhed; and on this account the oriental writers attribute to him the ſubverſion of the third dynaſty, which they called Molouk Thaouaif, i. e. the kings of the nations; becauſe tho' the Arſacidæ were Perſians, yet they adhered to the Macedonian maxims, and ſuffered all the petty princes, to whom Alexander had given dominions, to retain them; whereas Ardſchir reſumed them all, aſſumed the title of Shâh-in-Shâh, or king of kings, and tranſmitted a new ſet of maxims to his ſucceſſors, who followed them very carefully. As to the famous book mentioned in our text, it may not be amiſs to quote from thence ſome maxims relating to the conduct of princes, as a taſte of that excellent work, which was, and is ſtill, ſo highly eſteemed throughout the eaſt. It begins thus: So long as a prince applies himſelf with diligence to the adminiſtration of public affairs, and the rendering juſtice to all degrees of people, his ſubjects continue affectionate to him, and look upon obedience in the light of their own intereſt. Elſewhere he ſays, The worſt of all princes is he, from whom the wicked have all things to hope, and the good all things to fear. That all the branches of ſociety are inſeparably united to the trunk, and that neither can be affected independent of the other; whence it follows, that kings have their cares, and ſubjects their duties, which reciprocally anſwer each other, and which when neglected on either ſide, produce ruin and confuſion to both (5). The Greeks certainly knew nothing of this book, otherwiſe they would never have ſtyled Artaxares a barbarous prince.

(3) Vid lib. cui titul. Erdâviraph-nâma Shahnâma neſr. (4) R. Abrab. in Kab. ap Tarikh. Schichard. p. 108. (5) D'Herbelot. B. O. Artic-Ardſchir. Babegan.

rians

rians reckon, as they ought to do, from his accession to the throne on the defeat and death of that prince [h].

Schabour, or Shah-pour, whom the Greeks call Sapor, succeeded his father, having been preserved, as we have related before, by the tenderness of his prime minister. He was very young when he came to the throne, and therefore the nobility thought it necessary to give him a guardian or protector, who was his uncle by the mother's side, and might consequently have pretended to the crown. He not only executed his charge with integrity and reputation, but when the Persian nobility besought him to change his title, and assume that of king, he absolutely refused it, giving up the government to his nephew, as soon as he was of an age capable of ruling his subjects. Schabour was so well educated, that, after he came to the exercise of the sovereign authority, he did not pretend to use his uncle as a counsellor, but rather affected to consult him as a parent; and whenever he had occasion, either to go into the field against the Romans, or to make a progress into any distant province of his dominions, he left his uncle cloathed with a royal authority; so that the Persian historians have actually accounted this Ardshir one of the kings of Persia. There cannot be any thing more different from another than the character of Schabour, as it is drawn by the Oriental historians, and that of Sapor, as it stands in the Latin and Greek writers. We have already seen what the latter say; our business at present lies with the former. They report, that this Schabour was a prince of a magnificent disposition, who sought above all things, to adorn his country with fine cities and stately public buildings. With this view he made frequent visits to all the provinces of his empire, that he might be the better acquainted with their situation, their trade, and manufactures, and consequently have it more in his power to confer upon them real benefits. In the province of Khoubistan, which we call Susiana, he built a fine new city, restored also its antient capital to its pristine beauty, and caused a most stupendous dike to be erected, to bear the weight of a river, which he brought to run over it, for the sake of supplying the adjacent country with water. In the province of Fars, or Persia proper, he built the city of Naoubendgian, in one of the finest plains in the universe; which city, in gratitude to its founder, was a long time called Casbah Schabour. But the most famous, and by far the greatest city of all he built, was that of Nischabour in Korassan. It seems the king was marching his army through that province, and by accident encamped near the ruins of an antient city, which had been destroyed by Alexander the Great, the remains of which were almost every-where over-grown by rose-bushes. The king, charmed with the situation of the place, returned thither again as soon as the campaign was over; and, after having ordered all the rose-bushes to be cut up, cleared away the ruins, and by sending regular detachments from his army to work upon the foundations of his new city, he, in a short space, saw it in such a forwardness, as invited all the inhabitants of the adjoining country to come and settle in it. On account of the rose-bushes, he called it Nischabour, i. e. the rose of Sapor, nei signifying, in the Persian tongue, a rose. As the Latin and Greek writers are very silent as to his virtues, so the Persian historians say as little of his vices, and not a syllable of his ordering the emperor Valerian to be flayed alive [i]. Mirkhond is the only writer who gives us any account of his death, which, according to him, happened in a very surprising manner. His severe justice so much alarmed some rapacious courtiers, that they took the opportunity offered them by a stormy night, to enter the royal tent, where they murdered Schabour and his attendants; which when they had done, they cut its cords, and set it on fire; so that the guards apprehended his tent had been set on fire by lightning. There are different accounts of the years of his reign; but the best writers agree, that he held the sceptre thirty one years [k].

Schabour I.

[h] LEBTARIKH.

Hormouz I.

Hormouz, whom the Greeks call Hormisdas, succeeded his father Schabour, and was a most generous prince; insomuch, that most of the antient historians call him Hormouz al Hori, i. e. Hormisdas the liberal. We are told of him, that when one of the governors of his provinces on the frontiers of the Indies sent him an express, to inform him, that he could purchase a quantity of very fine diamonds for an hundred thousand pieces of gold, the king wrote him back, that he should let them alone. Upon this the governor sent him a second express, to acquaint him, that they might be sold for two hundred thousand, so that his majesty might gain cent. per cent. Hormouz replied, A hundred or a thousand per cent. will not tempt me. If I become a trader, who must take up the trade of being a king? Or what will become of the Persian merchants, if the royal treasures are employed to forestal them? He was one of the handsomest princes of his time, and exceedingly beloved by his subjects, though it does

[i] KHONDEMIR. LEBTARIKH [k] MIRKHOND, sect. 25.

does not appear, that he was a very martial monarch, or that he made any conqueſts. It is ſaid, that he ſhewed a great deal of favour to the famous heretic Manes, and that he built for him, on the borders of the province of Suſiana, a caſtle or place of retreat, called Daſcarah; and it is further reported, that he embraced his opinions. This we apprehend, ought to be underſtood in a limited ſenſe, and be conſtrued only as to the notions that arch-heretic held in philoſophy; for tho' it be true, that Manes, or, as the Orientals call him, Mani, held very pernicious tenets in theology, yet it is as true, that he was a very great mathematician, and, by conſtant practice, attained ſuch a facility of drawing geometrical figures, that he would ſtrike circles of any given diameter with a pencil only, without the aſſiſtance of compaſſes. During the reign of Sapor, he was obliged to abſcond, that prince being an enemy to the ſetting up of all new religions in his country; and on this account it was, that Mani fled into Turqueſtan. There, by dint of his eloquence and ſkill in the ſciences, he acquired many diſciples. He affected great auſterity of life, and uſed to retire ſomtimes for a day or two to meditate in the deſert. This was very advantageous to him; for it made the people believe him a very holy perſon, and gave him leiſure to ſtudy how to confirm them more and more in that belief. Once, as he was rambling in this manner, he diſcovered a cave, which, tho' it had a narrow entrance, was very large within, and had a fine ſtream running through it. Thither he privately tranſported his books and papers, with as much bread and dried fruits as might ſerve him for a year. Theſe meaſures taken, he told his diſciples, that God would call him for a time up into heaven; but that, after a year, he would return and meet them in ſuch a plain. Upon this he withdrew into his cave, and, during the twelve-month that he lived there, he wrote a large book of enigmatical ſchemes, and pretended revelations; which book, at the end of the year, he produced to his diſciples, affirming, that he brought it from heaven. Shortly after, hearing that Schabour was dead, and that his ſon Hormouz was a very learned man, and a great patron of the ſciences, he returned into Perſia, and, as we have obſerved, ingratiated himſelf ſo with the king, that he built for him a hermitage, which was ſo well fortified, that, ſo long as he remained therein, his enemies were not able to do him any hurt. If Hormouz had reigned long, in all probability Mani would have ſecured to himſelf a party ſtrong enough to have ſupported him; but his protector died before he had reigned two years, with the reputation, however, of having been an excellent prince, one equally tender of his ſubjects welfare, and of the prerogative of the crown" (C).

Baharam I. Baharam, the ſon of Hormouz, ſucceeded him. This is the name which the Greeks endeavour to expreſs by the ſeve-" Khondemir, Lebtarikh. D'Herbelot. B. O. art. Hormouz.

(C) Beſides what is ſaid in the text, we ſhall add here ſome anecdotes concerning the heretic Manes. The learned Schikard is much miſtaken, when he affirms, that his name was not Manes, but Manicheus, quaſi mannam fundens (6). The great Epiphanius is as much out. He would needs ſuggeſt, that this heretic aſſumed the name of Manes, becauſe, in the Chaldaic tongue, Man ſignifies a veſſel: whereby he would intimate, that he was a pure and choſen veſſel. The truth is, he was a Perſian by birth, and his name Mani. Had he been a Chaldean, or had he lived on the borders of Chaldea, when he firſt vented his hereſy, there might have been ſome ground for this conjecture; but as he ſpread his hereſy firſt in the deſerts towards Turqueſtan, what probability is there, that he ſhould aſſume a name, the etymology whereof could not there be underſtood (7)? He was by profeſſion a painter; and we are told, that he could draw a line with a pencil twenty yards exactly ſtraight. His excellency in drawing made him convert moſt of his lectures in religion into emblematical devices, not unlike thoſe of Jacob Boehm. Hence the book he pretended to bring from heaven, was called Ertengh, tengh ſignifying a picture (8). What we have recorded of him in the text, we have tranſcribed verbatim from Khondemir, who opens his account with theſe words: Mani the Sadducee was a man excellently ſkilled in painting and ſculpture, who when he heard that Jeſus had promiſed the Comforter ſhould come, the devil ſuggeſted to him, that he ſhould pretend to be that Comforter; which accordingly he did, &c. As to the notions of him, and his diſciples, all the Oriental writers agree, that they were a mixture of the magian and chriſtian doctrines; and that, in a very ſhort ſpace of time, they ſplit into ſeveral ſects, according as they entertained different explications of their maſter's principles (9). The Oriental writers likewiſe agree, that his patron Hormouz was a moſt learned and beneficent prince; his favourite ſaying was this, That kings were like fire, they warmed thoſe who ſtood at a diſtance, and ſcorched ſuch as ventured too near (10).

(6) Tarikh. Schicard, p. 111. (7) Hæreſ. (8) Hyde relig. vet Perſ. c. xxi. p. 281. (9) Shariſtani in lib. de relig Orient. (10) D'Herbelot. B. O. artic. Hormouz Ben Schabour.

ral

ral appellations of Varanes, Varbaranes, and Vararanes. At the beginning of his reign he affected to treat Mani with greater deference than ever his father did, and even ſuggeſted to him a deſign of ſettling his opinions as the national religion of Perſia; in order to which he invited him to a conference with his magi, that the people might be the better convinced of their monarch's caution in ſo important an affair. His vanity engaged Mani to comply with the king's requeſt; ſo that, leaving his fortreſs, he went, without the leaſt apprehenſion, to court, in order to diſpute with ſuch learned men as he ſuppoſed would be aſſembled there. On his arrival, Baharam ordered him to be ſeized; ſhortly after he cauſed him to be flayed alive, and his ſkin being ſtuffed with ſtraw, he ordered it to be ſet on the top of a hill, with a good guard, as a ſignal to the Manichees of his kind intention towards them. This had the propoſed effect; for all the diſciples of Mani retired immediately out of Perſia, and not believing themſelves ſafe even on its frontiers, they fled into the very heart of the Indies, and ſome of them as far as China [n]. This ſeems to have been the greateſt exploit that Baharam performed, though he was a prince of parts, and who earneſtly ſought the welfare of his people, as we may gather from this ſaying of his; That humanity was not to be defined, becauſe therein were comprehended all the other virtues. He reigned with great applauſe three years and three months, at the end of which he was murdered in the baſeſt manner that can be imagined. A tumult happening in his capital, he went in perſon to appeaſe it, which when he had effected, a kinſman of his took the advantage of the croud and confuſion to let fly an arrow, which ſtruck the king to the heart, to the great grief, as well as to the great loſs, of his ſubjects [o] (D).

Baharam II.

[n] D'HERBELOT. B. O. art. Mani. KHONDEMIR. MIRKHOND, ſect. 26.

[o] LEBTARIKH.

(D) As we often quote the excellent work of D'Herbelot in this hiſtory, it is neceſſary to give the reader notice, to prevent his ſuſpecting him or us of a miſtake, that we do not reckon the Baharams kings of Perſia in the ſame order as he does; but ſo, that his Baharam III. is our Baharam II. his Baharam IV. our Baharam III. and ſo on. The reaſon is this: He reckons Baharam of the third dynaſty Baharam I. which, his method conſidered, is very juſt; but as the periods of Perſian hiſtory in this work are at a diſtance one from another, ſuch a mingling of dynaſties would occaſion

Baharam II.

Baharam II. ſucceeded his father Baharam I. Some writers ſay, he was only the adopted ſon of the laſt king. However that might be, it is generally agreed, that, at the beginning of his reign, he gave his ſubjects no great hopes of him. On the contrary, he acted with ſuch auſterity, haughtineſs, and cruelty, that the people gave him the ſurname of Khaleſ, i. e. the unjuſt. The nobility of Perſia, who were never over-complaiſant to tyrants, began to think of ridding themſelves of ſo bad a maſter, by depoſing him at leaſt, if not by putting him to death. The magi, however, checked this deſign in its birth, offering to riſque their own ſafety for the good of the people, by remonſtrating to the king on the folly of his conduct. This they did with ſuch warmth, and at the ſame time with ſuch an evident diſplay of loyalty, that Baharam acknowledged them for his counſellors and protectors, changed the whole bent of his conduct, and, from being a very bad, became a moſt excellent, prince, during the remainder of his reign. A certain chriſtian author affirms, that this monarch vanquiſhed the Romans, and that, having taken priſoner the ſon of the emperor Galienus, he cauſed him to be put to death. Of this, however, the Oriental writers ſay nothing; and there is reaſon to ſuſpect, that this author was impoſed on. Moſt authors agree, that this prince reigned but ſeventeen years [p].

Baharam III.

Baharam III. ſucceeded Baharam II. During his father's life-time, he was governor of the province of Seigiſtan, which is the reaſon that the Greek writers call him Seganſaa. He reigned thirteen years, without performing any thing extraordinary; or, if he did, the Oriental hiſtorians, as well as the Greeks, have treated him very indifferently; for we find little ſaid of him, even in their moſt copious authors; and as for Mirkhond, he ſays nothing of him at all. Hence it is apparent, that the Oriental writers are not ſo fond of fiction, as they are generally repreſented to be; for, if they were, they would not certainly ſuffer ſuch chaſms in their occaſion confuſion; which to avoid, we have taken a contrary method. We likewiſe take this opportunity of noting, that we cite the Oriental hiſtorians as we uſe them; ſo that the reader may at all times diſtinguiſh on what authority any remarkable fact is built [11].

[p] Lebtarikh. Ben. Batrik. in chron.

[11] D'Herbelot. B. O. artic. Babaram.

hiſtories,

historics, but rather try to fill them up with inventions of their own, as some of our northern writers have done [q].

Narsi. Narsi Ben Baharam, that is, Narsi the son of Baharam, succeeded Baharam the third his brother, tho' from his surname some authors have taken him for his father, and in truth he was the son, not of Baharam III. but of Baharam II. He proved a prince of a mild temper, gracious to his subjects, and desirous, as far as was in his power, of doing them good; but he had the misfortune to attack the Romans, when they had many great generals, and several potent armies on foot; in consequence of which he was defeated, and lost all his frontier provinces; for grief of which, it is said, he broke his heart, when he had reigned nine years [r].

Hormouz II. Hormouz the son of Narsi, or, according to the Greeks, Hormisdas the son of Narses, succeeded his father. All the Oriental historians agree, that he was a prince endued with all the virtues capable of adding lustre to a crown. Among these his justice was by far the most conspicuous. He saw with regret the ill use that too many of the nobility made of their great power and riches, in oppressing the meaner sort of people, and thereby discouraging industry and trade, the chief supports of all well-governed kingdoms. To eradicate so dangerous an evil, he fixed a particular tribunal or court of justice, wherein the complaint of the meanest man in Persia might be heard against the greatest; and for fear that interest or authority might beget partiality even here, he came frequently and presided in person. He likewise devised many new laws and regulations, for the benefit of the middling sort of people, and for the encouragement of trade; out of regard to which he was extremely careful of the maritime coasts, and of all the ports of Persia. He likewise built in the province of Kerman, which the Greeks call Caramania, a very famous city, and port, which he called by his own name Hormouz, or, as we pronounce it, Ormus. It was seated conveniently along the sea-shore, and, towards the land, was shaded by groves of palm-trees; so that, in process of time, it became equally remarkable for its being a trading city, and also the market for the commodities of a multitude of industrious people, who cultivated the fertile plain behind it. In the end, however, its riches proved its ruin; so that the inhabitants, finding themselves exposed

[q] LEBTARIKH. KHONDEMIR. [r] D'HERBELOT. B. O. artic. Narsi.

to

to continual ravages, abandoned it, and tranſported themſelves into an iſland in the Perſian gulf, almoſt over-againſt their old place of reſidence; where they built a new city, which they likewiſe called Ormuz, the ſame that was afterwards conquered by the Portugueze, and of which, in the ſubſequent part of our hiſtory, together with its kings, we ſhall give a particular account. But to return to Hormouz or Hormiſdas; he is ſaid to have extended his dominions very conſiderably, and to have been no leſs fortunate in war, than he was wiſe and temperate in peace. The province of Suſiana was peculiarly favoured by this monarch; inſomuch, that he built ſeveral cities therein, and repaired all ſuch as were fallen to decay: more he would, without queſtion, have done, if he had reigned longer; but, having ſat on the throne nine years, he gave way to fate[r] (E).

Schabour II.

Schabour II. ſurnamed Dhoulactaf, i. e. Schabour of the ſhoulders, ſucceeded his father even before he was born, the crown being placed on his mother's belly, and the nobles ſwearing to acknowledge for their ſovereign the child ſhe ſhould bring forth. In his nonage the Perſians were expoſed to many diſaſters, more eſpecially to the inſults and ravages of the Arabs, who, under their king Thair, broke in vaſt numbers into Perſia, and ſpread deſolation where-ever they came, plundering the royal cities, and carrying off the ſiſter of the late king Hormouz, and the aunt of Schabour into captivity. When the young king came to attain the age which qualified him for martial exploits, he determined, at all events, to revenge the injuries which had been done him and his ſubjects during his infancy. With this view he, with a choice body of troops, made a quick march, and ſurprized Thair in one of his frontier provinces. The place was indeed inveſted, be-

[r] Lebtarikh. Khondemir. D'Herbelot. B. O. art. Hormouz Ben Narſi.

(E) The Oriental writers differ among themſelves as to the foundation of the city of Hormouz on the continent, ſome attributing this to Hormouz the firſt, the ſon of Schabour; but we incline to think it was erected by this prince, becauſe the moſt accurate hiſtorians are of that ſentiment (12) A learned critic ſuggeſts that the planet Mercury in the Perſian language was called Hormouz (13); but we are of another opinion, for we apprehend it to have been an attribute or name of the Supreme Being (14).

(12) Khozideh. Lebtarikh (13) Schikard Tarich. p. 112. (14) Hyde relig. vet. Per. c. xi p. 177.

fore

fore the Arab prince had any notice of it; but it was ſo ſtrong, and the gariſon ſo well provided, that, in all probability, Schabour muſt have abandoned his enterprize, if Malekah, whom ſome call the ſiſter, others affirm to have been the daughter, of Thair, had not betrayed the place to Schabour, with whom ſhe fell in love, and thereby put the king, the nobility, and the gariſon into the hands of their mortal enemy. Schabour took this opportunity of revenging the cruelties committed by the Arabs in Perſia, by putting Thair, and all who were with him, to the ſword, aſſigning this as his reaſon, that if a king would ſo far forget his own dignity as to turn robber, he ought not to expect that his enemies ſhould conſider him in any other light. This prince was ſovereign of Yemen, which province Schabour immediately over-ran, putting numbers of the inhabitants to the ſword, and cauſing the ſhoulder-bones of all who were able to bear arms to be broke; whence he had the ſurname of Dhoulactaf, as the general opinion is. The Arab writers, however, give us ſomewhat a different account of this matter: they ſay, that, on Schabour's return into Perſia, Malek Ben Naſſer, one of the anceſtors of Mohammed, was deputed by the Arabians to intercede with the king, and to beſeech him to treat them with greater lenity, or at leaſt to diſcover the true cauſe of his implacable hatred. Malek, in purſuance of this commiſſion, took all the pains he could to ſoften the inflexible temper of the Perſian king, who at length told him, that his averſion to the Arabs proceeded from his being adviſed by his aſtrologers, that they would one day ſubvert the Perſian empire, and inflict the greateſt cruelties upon his people. Malek Ben Naſſer took this occaſion of remonſtrating againſt the ſeverity of his proceedings on ſo ſlight a pretence, ſince the predictions of ſuch ſort of people were at leaſt as often falſe as true, and therefore could never be of weight enough to paſs for reaſons of ſtate. On the other hand he remarked, that if there ſhould be any grounds for believing this prophecy, the king's conduct was the moſt impolitic that could be; becauſe his treating the Arabs ſo harſhly, could not fail of giving them the moſt inveterate hatred againſt the Perſians, which muſt prove fatal to them, whenever they became ſubject to thoſe whom they had thus mal-treated. Schabour, having reflected upon this, altered his conduct intirely, and not only put an end to thoſe miſeries which he had inflicted on that unhappy people, but alſo favoured and encouraged them on all occaſions; whence, as the Arab writers ſay, he acquired the ſurname of Dhoulacnaf, i. e.

on the wings; by which the Arabs would signify, that he was their protector, because the eagles are said to carry their young ones on their wings [t].

Schabour, as we have already seen in our former period, was at continual enmity with the Romans; and tho', during the reign of Constantine the Great, he durst not attempt any thing very considerable, yet that did not hinder him from taking all the necessary steps to act effectually, whenever an opportunity should offer. The Oriental writers give us an instance of this, of which there is not the least trace to be found in any of the Greek historians, tho' it be more singular than any thing they have recorded: Schabour was so desirous of being thoroughly acquainted with the state of the Roman empire, that he went to Constantinople himself, under colour of being an embassador from Persia. He had not, however, been long there before he was suspected, and thereupon imprisoned; during which time the Romans made several incursions into the Persian provinces, and treated the people with great severity. At length Schabour having corrupted a lady of the court, she not only procured him his liberty, but fled with him. They were obliged to travel with great circumspection, and, not without much-ado, and after many dangers passed, they arrived at a little hermitage in Media; which place hath ever since been called Schahbouran. It is not very clear, whether the religious Persians, who resided here, were of the christian, manichean, or magian religion; but, whatever they were, their chief was very loyal, acquainted the king with the present situation of things, took pains to convey his orders wherever he directed; so that, by degrees, Schabour assembled a very considerable body of troops, and with them fell so opportunely on the Roman forces, that he gave them an entire defeat. The king's stay in Media gave him an opportunity of observing the situation of that country, and the improvements of which it was capable. This determined him to build a new city not far from the hermitage, where he had reposed himself after his return from Constantinople, hoping that, when it became considerable, and was thoroughly peopled, it would serve as a barrier, and protect the open country from the insults of neighbouring nations [u].

As soon therefore as the circumstances of the times would permit, Schabour laid the foundations of the city of Cazvin, which we call Casbin. When he first began this work, he found

[t] KHONDEMIR. LEBTARIKH. [u] KHONDEMIR. D'HERBELOT. B O. artic. Schabour Ben Hormouz.

found himſelf exceſſively annoyed by the Delemites, who began to be jealous of his undertaking. Schabour, who was a very wiſe prince, perceiving that it was not at all in his power to carry on the building of his city and a war with theſe people at the ſame time, reſolved to bribe them; which accordingly he did, by conſiderable gifts for the preſent, and promiſes of ſtill greater things hereafter. When Casbin was finiſhed, and the Delemites began to renew their incurſions, Schabour, who was by this time at peace both with the Romans and the Arabs, turned his whole force upon them, and eaſily ſubdued them, adding thereby the province of Deilem to his empire, which had been an antient and independent kingdom till then, and which became ſo again, after the Arabians made themſelves maſters of Perſia. This monarch alſo beautified and inlarged the antient city of Scheuſtar in the province of Khouhiſtan, where he likewiſe re-edified another antient city, called Corkh, and which he afterwards called by his own name. He was one of the greateſt and moſt fortunate monarchs of this dynaſty, and, during his long reign of ſeventy two years, not only made great conqueſts on all ſides of his dominions, but alſo wonderfully improved his territories, by building cities, and encouraging the trade of his ſubjects[z] (F).

[z] KHONDEMIR. D'HERBELOT. artic. Hormouz Schabour Dhoulactaf.

(F) The learned Schikard (15) takes a great deal of pains in rectifying a miſtake in the verſion of Mirkhond by Teixera (16). The ſurname of the Perſian king is there written Zabel Ketaf, which, the judicious critic rightly conjectures, ſhould have been Dhul-Aktaf; but then he is in a great miſtake himſelf, for he attributes this ſurname to Schabour the firſt, to whom it did not belong. He is however perfectly juſt in his cenſure of Reineccius (17), who had condemned Nicephorus, an antient writer, for calling Schabour the firſt Choſroes, ſince that was no miſtake, all the kings of this dynaſty preſerving this appellation. The hiſtory of Schabour's being crowned in his mother's belly, is not only to be found in the Oriental writers and the Greek hiſtorians, but alſo in the writings of the Rabbins; and therefore, tho' the fact is an odd one, yet it cannot be called incredible (18). We thought it unneceſſary to load this reign with recapitulations of facts mentioned in the former period, or with ſuch immaterial circumſtances, as might have ſwelled this part of our hiſtory beyond its due bounds.

(15) Tarich. p. 110. (16) Lib. 1 c 26. (17) De gent. Arſacid. (18) Ben Dior. in Kab. ap. Schichard. p. 116.

Ardſchir II.

Ardſchir ſucceeded Schabour, and governed the Perſian kingdom for twelve years. One author aſſures us, that he was uncle by the mother's ſide to the laſt king; another, that he was only his couſin; and a third, that he was brother by the mother's ſide to Schabour Dhoulactaf. However it was, he aſſumed the government at firſt as tutor only, or protector, to Schabour III. tho' afterwards the nobility prevailed upon him to take the title of king. The reader will eaſily perceive, that the Perſians were afraid of nothing ſo much as of being governed by a child, which was the true cauſe, that they were deſirous of conferring the regal dignity on him, whoſe birth and abilities made him the moſt proper for diſcharging its eſſential functions. It may be, the miſeries the kingdom had endured, under the minority of the laſt king, might the more ſtrongly incline them to make uſe of this expedient, to prevent their falling under the like misfortunes a ſecond time. It is alſo very remarkable, that the nobility did not ſuffer this Ardſchir to transfer the crown to his family, though they gave it him for life; but immediately upon his demiſe called his kinſman the ſon of Schabour II. to the ſucceſſion, who was by this time become a man, and capable of taking the reins of government into his own hands.

Schabour III.

Schabour III. the ſon of Schabour Dhoulactaf, governed the kingdom of Perſia five years and four months in great tranquillity. He was cotemporary with Theodoſius the Great, with whom he made a ſtrict alliance, and lived in the greateſt friendſhip during his whole reign. As he was a very pacific prince, and ſought nothing ſo much as to keep his kingdom from feeling the plague of war, that his ſubjects might have leiſure to repair all their former loſſes, we ought not to wonder, that the account we have of his reign is very ſuccinct, and amounts to neither more or leſs than we have recorded [a].

Baharam IV.

Baharam IV. ſucceeded his father Schabour, whom he very much reſembled in his diſpoſition. He had in his father's life-time been governor of the province of Kerman, and, according to the privilege of the royal family, was ſtyled Kerman-Shah. This the Greek writers converted into a ſurname, which is the reaſon, that in their hiſtories he is called Varanes Cermanſaa. He governed the kingdom eleven years, in which ſpace of time the Perſians grew ſo extravagantly rich, that their pride inclined them to frequent revolts; in one of which the king, preſenting himſelf ſuddenly amongſt the rebels, and expoſtulating with them on the folly and madneſs of their behaviour,

[a] Khondemir, Lebtarikh.

behaviour, was basely shot with an arrow behind his back, and died upon the spot [b].

Jezdegerd succeeded his father Baharam, and proved a very bad prince. Equally cruel and avaricious, he distressed his subjects alike in their persons and their properties. This was the more grievous to the Persians, because in the life-time of his father he had affected so much modesty, humanity, and condescension, that never any monarch promised more at his accession, or performed less during his administration. Hence he was surnamed Al Athim, i. e. The Wicked, or, The Abandoned. There is some reason to suspect, that his character hath been injured through the malice of the magi, who could never forgive him his strong inclinations to the christians, and his keeping so strict a hand on the clergy of the established religion. This king had the misfortune to see all his children die within a month after they were born. This made him very uneasy; and therefore he consulted not only the Persian physicians, but also all the travellers who visited his dominions, as to the wholesomest air they were acquainted with, in order to try, whether, by removing a child as soon as possible thither, he might not conserve the succession in his family. The result of this inquiry was, that the province of Hirah was recommended to him, as that where the best air was to be found. This country was a part of Chaldea, which, on the falling out of Alexander the Great's successors among themselves, an Arab prince had seized, and having built a city therein, called it Hirah, and made it the capital of a little principality, which in process of time became tributary to the Persians. The name of the present possessor of this small sovereignty was Nooman, for whom Jezdegerd sent as soon as his son Baharam was born. When he came to court, the king put the child, who was then about a month old, into his hands, acquainted him how unlucky he had been in the rest of his children, and told him, that what he expected from him was, the education of his son, after the manner of the Arabs, in all those exercises which usually increase the strength of the body, and render men healthy and robust. Nooman on his part promised to take all imaginable care of the child, whom he immediately carried home with him; and Jezdegerd, being now at ease in his mind, governed his dominions, according to his own maxims, and little to the satisfaction of the magi, twenty one years. At the end of this space, as he was looking upon a horse extremely beautiful, and which he much valued, Jezdegerd

[b] D'HERBELOT. art. Baharam Ben Schabour.

the

the beaſt ſuddenly ſtruck him with one of its hind feet on the ſtomach, with ſuch force, that he immediately fell down dead, and thereby delivered the diſcontented part of his ſubjects from a maſter, whoſe government they hated, and whom yet they were not able to depoſe. As ſoon as he was dead, thoſe who were ſo much diſaffected to him, took advantage of the abſence of the prince his ſon to transfer the regal dignity to another family. Accordingly, they fixed on Kerſa, a nobleman of fair qualities and great fortune; from whom having drawn many advantageous conceſſions in their own favour, they ſaluted him king, and actually put him in poſſeſſion, not only of the royal robes and ornaments, but alſo of the royal treaſure, procured the ſubmiſſion of the forces then on foot, and the conſent of the greateſt part of the provinces of that extended empire [c].

Baharam V.

Baharam V. ſurnamed Gour, or rather Jur, for a reaſon that will appear in the courſe of our hiſtory, was, as we have ſeen, ſent in his infancy to the court of an Arab prince, for the ſake of eſtabliſhing his conſtitution; which end was perfectly anſwered by the care his guardian took of his education. Nooman Ben Mondir, to whoſe care he was committed, cauſed two palaces to be built for his reception in the capital city of his dominions. Theſe were built by the greateſt architect of the eaſt, whoſe name was Sennamar. Theſe caſtles or palaces were called Sedir and Khaouarnak, and the Arab writers tell us, that amongſt other ſingularities, the ſtones of which they were built were hewn in ſuch a manner, as to change their colour ſeveral times in a day, by their different reflections of light; and that they were ſo contrived, as to lean upon a ſingle ſtone, which, if removed, the whole building would have fallen to the ground. Nooman moſt bountifully rewarded Sennamar for his care and ſkill; but that unfortunate perſon having indiſcreetly given out, that he could have performed ſtill greater things, if he had expected to have been paid in ſuch a manner, Nooman began to doubt his fidelity, and whether he might not be induced by money to divulge the ſecret of the ſupporting ſtones in the palaces he had built; and therefore ordered him to be thrown from the top of one of them to the bottom, whereby the miſerable man loſt his life. In proceſs of time, Nooman, the tutor of Baharam, became a convert to the chriſtian religion, and, in conſequence thereof, thought fit to retire from the world, and to ſpend the reſt of his days in a hermitage in the deſert, reſigning the crown and care of the young

[c] Lebtarieh. Mirkhond fol. xxvii. Khondemir.

young Perſian prince to his ſon Hendu. This prince was no leſs careful of Baharam than his father had been; he provided for his health both in body and mind; he took care to have him taught all the exerciſes, and to be inſtructed in all the learning, with which a perſon of his high quality ought to be acquainted. He gave him leſſons himſelf in the art of governing, and at the ſame time that he diſcharged the duty of a governor, ſhewed himſelf on all occaſions his friend in the circumſtances of private life, as he was his conſtant companion in all his diverſions. By this means Baharam, who had an excellent genius, grew one of the moſt accompliſhed princes of his age, and had a ſagacity and reſolution almoſt incredible, conſidering his tender years [d].

Enters Perſia at the head of an army.

WHEN the news of his father's death reached Hirah, the young prince could not help expreſſing, not only his amazement at the conduct of the Perſian nobility, but his reſolution not to part with the crown on ſuch eaſy terms. He therefore addreſſed himſelf to Hendu, and beſought him to furniſh him with ſome troops, that he might endeavour by force to recover what was undoubtedly his right. The king of Hirah, who owed him his allegiance, as being dependent on the Perſian empire, promiſed him all the aſſiſtance in his power. When he was thus imbarqued in the buſineſs, he thought proper to invite all the Arabian princes his neighbours to a council, wherein he expoſed the right of Baharam to the Perſian throne, and the indignity offered them in his excluſion, on account of his being bred up among them. The petty princes, to whom he addreſſed himſelf, eaſily received the impreſſions he ſought to make upon their minds, and, with great alacrity, promiſed to ſupport the pretenſions of his pupil with their utmoſt force. This point gained, Baharam, at the head of ten thouſand Arabian horſe, entered the Perſian territories, and was ſhortly after followed by Hendu and the confederate princes with thirty thouſand more. The Perſian nobility, obſtinate in their rebellion, drew together a great army, in order to maintain the king they had made choice of upon the throne. Things being in this ſituation, a general and deciſive battle was daily expected, the armies being within half a day's march of each other; but, by the wiſdom of Hendu, a negotiation was ſet on foot. Both parties were deſirous of deciding the buſineſs without blood, and yet neither of them would recede in the leaſt from their pretenſions. In this critical juncture, Baharam propoſed an expedient.

[d] KHONDEMIR. MIRKHOND ſect. xxviii.

expedient, which was instantly accepted. It was this; that the crown of Persia should be placed upon a cushion between two hungry lions, and that the prince who would fetch it should wear it. On the day appointed the experiment was made, and the crown placed between the lions. Then Baharam, turning to his competitor, said, Kersa, Why don't you go and fetch the crown? I need not, answered he; I am in possession of it already; you desire it, therefore do you go and take it. Baharam instantly fell upon the lions, killed them both, and took up the crown. Upon which Kersa immediately ran towards him, embraced him, and did him homage. His example was followed by all the Persian lords; and thus this controversy, which had armed all the east, was determined without bloodshed, and to the satisfaction of all parties, the Persians being charmed with the generosity and volour of their new king; and Hendu and his Arabian confederates were no less pleased with the success of their undertaking, and with the vast presents, and other marks of gratitude, which were given them by Baharam at parting [c].

The Turks invade the Persians with a prodigious army.

Baharam, on taking possession of the throne, treated his subjects with such lenity, and excused them from so many duties and taxes, that the oriental historians say, he turned the heads of the whole nation; insomuch, that computing the hours between sun-rising and sun-set, they divided these into equal parts: the first for business, the second for diversion. The king was so far from disliking this, that he sent for twelve thousand musicians from India, not only to divert his subjects, but to prevent their becoming fidlers and dancers themselves; and it is said, that those who follow this profession at this day in Persia are descended from these Indians. The khacan, for so the orientals call the sovereign of Turquestan, having intelligence of the merry disposition the Persians were in, conceived, that a better opportunity would never offer for invading that rich and fertile country. Without therefore any previous declaration of war, he assembled a mighty army, some historians say, of three hundred thousand men, with which he broke into Persia like a torrent, spreading fire and sword, destruction and desolation, wherever he came. Baharam, as soon as he had intelligence of this, knowing well, that it was impossible for him to raise any forces sufficient to repel them, left his capital, and with a thousand chosen horse fled to the mountains, leaving the government

[c] Li b t a r i k h. D'Herbelot. biblioth. orient. art. Noomin Ben Mondir.

government in the hands of his brother Narſi. The Perſians inſtantly concluded, that the king had abdicated the government, and endeavoured to make the beſt terms they could with the conquerors; and thereupon ſent deputies to acquaint the khacan with the deſertion of their prince, and to implore his mercy. The khacan did not, however, take things upon truſt; he ſent out parties to obſerve the motions of Baharam and his horſe, and theſe on their return having reported that they had followed the Perſian king two days march into Armenia, their maſter concluded from thence, that he was fled into the Roman territories, and that Perſia was abſolutely ſubdued [f].

They are defeated and deſtroyed.

Baharam, in the mean time, puſhed with his thouſand horſe through the ſtreights of Derbent, and keeping cloſe by the Caſpian ſea, came quite round into Turqueſtan; and having there refreſhed and remounted his troops, he ſuddenly and ſilently ſtole into Perſia; ſurprized the forces of the khacan, who no longer kept any diſcipline, in the dead of the night; advanced in perſon to that monarch's tent, where he found him ſcarce awake, huddling on his cloaths, ſo that he ſtruck off his head without any reſiſtance; and the Perſians riſing every-where upon the flying army, ſcarce a man of this huge multitude returned again into Turqueſtan. This wonderfully raiſed the reputation of Baharam; his ſubjects began to look upon him as a perſon inſpired, and he on the other hand, being better ſatisfied with his brother's adminiſtration than his own, reſolved to travel for a time, and leave to him the reſettling of the affairs of Perſia. This unaccountable vivacity in otherwiſe ſo great a prince cannot be accounted for any other way, than by conſidering where he received his education. This roving diſpoſition is the very character of an Arab chief, and indeed all the accounts we have of this monarch ſhew, that his manners were exactly thoſe of that nation. As for inſtance, the word Jur ſignifies a wild aſs, and this prince was called Baharam Jur, becauſe he ſpent the greateſt part of his time in hunting that creature, a diverſion he had learned among the Arabs. But to return to the current of our hiſtory, leaving the government of Perſia in the hands of his brother, he appeared in the habit of a private perſon at the court of an Indian prince; where he quickly diſtinguiſhed himſelf, ſo far as to merit the notice of the king, whoſe favourable inclinations towards him he greatly improved, by killing a monſtrous wild elephant, which had done a prodigious deal of mischief. At length the king sent him at the head of an army to oppose a very potent neighbour of his, who notwithstanding he had offered him tribute, invaded and plundered his country. This prince Baharam was so fortunate as to defeat, and he made so prudent a use of his victory that he put it out of the enemy's power to think of renewing the war for a considerable number of years at least. On his return to court, the Indian king thought himself obliged to promote him to the office of prime vizier, and to give him his daughter to wife; which he accordingly did, with an immense fortune [g].

[f] KHONDEMIR, D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. Baharam.

He returns into his own dominions from India.

But as the graces of kings usually produce envy in the minds of their subjects, against those on whom they are conferred, so here the promotion of Baharam drew upon him the hatred of the Indians, though he had rescued them from oppression, and by his wise administration procured them as great felicity as a people could enjoy. When therefore he perceived this, he resolved to bear no longer with their ingratitude, especially when he found their whispers had pierced the king's ear, and inclined him to alter his conduct towards him, though on his side not the least occasion had been given. This resolution once taken, Baharam soon after discovered himself to the king, who was exceedingly alarmed, when he knew that the person, to whom he was so much indebted, was the king of Persia, his potent neighbour, and one whose ancestors had deprived him of a part of his dominions. The Persian monarch, to rid him of all apprehensions, acquainted him with his resolution of returning forthwith into his own territories; and that, as well out of tender affection for his wife, as in return for the many favours he had received, he was content to yield up the places in dispute. The Indian king received this declaration with the utmost joy, and Baharam, conceiving that no time was to be lost, quitted his court immediately, and returned with his wife and family, with all the immense riches he had acquired, into Persia. His subjects received him with all the demonstrations of loyalty and cordial affection; and the king on his part promised to apply himself more assiduously to public affairs than the vivacity of his disposition had hitherto allowed him to do [h].

Turns his arms on the Greeks and Arabians.

The first step of importance he took after his return was, to send his brother Narsi with a great body of troops into Rumestan, so the Persians call the dominions of the Greek emperor; emperor; and being informed that his forces met with no great opposition on that side, he ventured to make an expedition in person into Arabia, where he reduced the kingdom of Yemen with all its dependencies. After this he returned into Persia, and reigned the rest of his life in peace, beloved by his subjects, and revered by his neighbours. Authors differ very much concerning the manner of his death. Some, and indeed the most considerable, say, that, being exceedingly addicted to hunting and passing full speed through a wood, his horse fell with him into a deep pit, where he was stifled before any body came to his assistance [i]. Others affirm, that being engaged in a war with a neighbouring prince, and having defeated his army in battle; Baharam in the pursuit was so unlucky as to plunge his horse into a morass; whence being unable to extricate himself, he was either suffocated, or perished with hunger. The reason this point remains so full of doubt and uncertainty, is this; the body of Baharam was never found, and consequently all accounts of his death must be conjectural only [k]. It is, however, generally agreed, that this accident arrived in the twenty third year of his reign, and that, notwithstanding the many irregularities in his conduct, he left behind him the character of being one of the bravest and most generous, as he was evidently one of the most fortunate, princes that ever swayed the Persian sceptre [l].

[g] Lebtarikh. Mirkhond sect. xxix. [h] Khondemir. Lebtarikh.

Jezdegerd II. succeeded his father Baharam Gour. As he had been chiefly educated by his uncle Narsi, he became a prince of great knowledge and experience, though but a young man, when he ascended the throne. He followed his father's example, in placing his uncle at the head of all his councils, yet without neglecting business himself, or deserting any branch of it, to give himself up to another more agreeable to his temper. He was peculiarly strict in doing justice, especially between the great and such as depended upon them. He restored all the excellent constitutions of his ancestors, which in process of time were sunk into dissuetude; where he found these insufficient, he framed new laws, by the advice of his council. The care of seeing these executed he took wholly upon himself. The army on the other hand he rendered more affectionate to himself, than they had ever been to any of his predecessors; for he caused it to be excellently paid, and though he took care to preserve discipline amongst his soldiers, yet he caused their duty to be so tho- Jezdegerd II.

[i] LEBTARIKH. [k] MIRKHOND. ubi supra. [l] LEBTARIKH. KHONDEMIR. MIRKHOND. ubi supra.

roughly explained to them, and when he was obliged to puniſh, did it ſo gently, and with ſuch viſible reluctancy, that he acquired the ſurname of Sipahdoſt, or the lover of his ſoldiers. There is, however, but one expedition of his mentioned, and that is againſt the Greeks, who, in his opinion, had broken the terms of their alliance with the Perſians. In order to convince them of the folly of this proceeding, Jezdegerd marched with a very numerous army into the Roman territories. Far from ſuffering his troops to live as in an enemy's country, he obliged his ſoldiers to pay for every thing they had, to treat the inhabitants with the greateſt civility, and to behave rather like ſtrangers, who came to ſee the country, than like enemies, diſpoſed to deſtroy it. The Greek emperor, fearing the conſequences, in caſe his ſubjects ſhould come to change their opinion as to the Perſian government, ſent to acquaint Jezdegerd, that he was ready to accept the terms he had formerly refuſed, and that he would pay the arrears of the tribute which he demanded; upon which the Perſian retired with his forces into his own country, without committing the leaſt diſorder, which gained him more reputation, than all their conqueſts had done his predeceſſors [m].

Makes choice of his younger ſon for his ſucceſſor.

This great prince had two ſons, the eldeſt called Ferouz, and the younger Hormouz. The latter was the favourite of his father, who took all imaginable care of his education, and alſo very aſſiduouſly promoted his intereſt with the nobility, that upon his own demiſe he might ſucceed him in the throne. This naturally induced great diſturbances in the kingdom, the elder brother taking all poſſible meaſures for defeating the project of his father in favour of his brother. To cool theſe heats, as alſo to pave the way to his own deſigns, the king thought fit to make his eldeſt ſon governor of Nimrouz, an antient province of the Perſian empire, comprehending the greateſt part of thoſe countries which are now called Sigiſtan and Makran, obliging him alſo to go and reſide in his government. This had a fair appearance, but was ſo far from anſwering the purpoſe of Jezdegerd, that it proved the means of defeating all the other precautions he had taken. This, however, did not happen in his life-time; for the good king, after a reign of eighteen years, died ſuddenly, to the great grief, as well as to the inexpreſſible loſs, of his ſubjects, who ſaw themſelves plunged upon his death into a miſerable ſituation, out of which they were not extricated, till they had had felt almost all the various calamities by which providence chastises offending nations [n].

[m] Lebtarikh. Khondemir. D'Herbelot, biblioth. orient. art. Jezdegerd.

Hormouz III. being upon the spot, having a great interest through his father's solicitations, and being himself a person of so great merit, as to have deserved the name of Firzaneh, i. e. The sage, seated himself upon the throne, and was acknowledged by almost all the nobility. As he reigned but a very short time, most of the Persian historians are silent as to his character. One of them, however, assures us, that his conduct, after his accession, was very unlike his behaviour during the life-time of his father; for that he no sooner found himself possessed of the sovereign authority, but he began to tyrannize over his subjects, and to treat the nobility with equal contempt and severity, though his title to the crown depended in a great measure upon their choice. However it was, he did not long enjoy that dignity, which it had cost him so much pains to acquire. His brother Ferouz no sooner heard of his accession, than he determined in himself not to lose tamely what he looked upon to be indubitably his right. It so happened, that the province of which he was governor lay on the frontiers of the country of the Haiathelites, who in the works of the Greek historians are called Nephtalites, and by the translator of Mirkhond Euthalites. To the king of this nation, whose name was Khaschnaouar, he applied himself, offering him a part at least, if not the whole, of his province, if he would assist him in taking the crown from his brother's head to set it upon his own. This proposition was readily accepted, and Ferouz furnished by him with a body of thirty thousand horse. With these auxiliaries he entered Persia, and was quickly joined by such as had a good opinion of his title, and such as had not been well received at his brother's court. Hormouz was no sooner acquainted with this step taken by his brother, than he immediately marched towards him with all his father's forces. But it so fell out, that part of the Persian army being disaffected, and the other part afraid of the Barbarians Ferouz had brought along with him, made but a poor resistance; so that, without much difficulty, the situation of things was intirely changed and Hormouz was not only thrust from the throne, but also put into chains and committed to prison, when he had reigned but one year [o].

Hormouz III.

n KHONDEMIR. MIRKHOND, sect xxix. o KHONDEMIR. MIRKHOND. sect. xxx. D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. HORMOUZ.

Ferouz,

Ferouz. Ferouz, being now exalted to the regal dignity, could not think himself safe, while his brother lived, tho' in a prison; and therefore the first act of his reign was, the cutting off the head of Hormouz, together with the heads of three of his chief counsellors. As to his conduct afterwards, it was pretty much of a piece with this extraordinary severity, which darkened the very dawn of it: neither was it long before the Persians began to perceive, that heaven visibly punished them, as well for their own offences, as for the great wickedness of their prince. The rod by which they were chastised was, a most severe drought, all the brooks and small rivers being every-where dried up, the earth parched, and its fruits withered. It lasted six years, and in that space destroyed such multitudes, and brought the remainder into so miserable a situation, that we are told the king and the nobility consented to do open penance to avert the wrath of the Almighty. This they performed, and in the seventh year all the seasons were wonderfully kind and pleasant; the earth being thoroughly moistened, bore the next year as it was wont, and the scourge being removed, Ferouz and his people returned to their old manner of living; that is to say, the king ruled according to his will, and his subjects, as soon as they had the utensils of luxury, plunged themselves into all sorts of excesses. The obligations conferred upon the Persian monarch by the king of the Haiathelites were so great, that one may easily judge of the disposition of Ferouz, by his behaviour towards his benefactor. The people were no sooner recovered from that misery and consternation, which had been spread amongst them by the late famine and drought; but presently Ferouz was for turning his arms against him who had set him on the throne. It is true, that some Persian authors alledge, that the subjects of this prince entered the frontiers of Persia, and plundered them in a hostile manner; but there is little reason to believe this, because the same writers confess, that the Persians were out of comparison more powerful, and that the misfortunes they afterwards met with could not possibly have befallen them, but by their own temerity and ill conduct [p].

Invades the country of the Haiathelites. Ferouz was not long in executing his project; he drew together as numerous an army as the circumstances of the Persian affairs would allow, and as soon as he had drawn them together, he marched northwards in order to invade the country of the Haiathelites. The king of that people was under the greatest amazement, when he heard of the preparations

[p] Lebtarikh. Mirkhond, sect. xxxi. Khondemir.

Ferouz

Ferouz had made. An officer in his troops, as some historians say, but, as others affirm, his grand vizier took upon him to revive his courage, by promising him a victory without fighting, if he would listen to his advice. This man had, as some say, a hand wanting by an accident prior to this event; but others assure us, that when his master had promised to be intirely guided by his counsels, he cut off his nose, his ears, a hand, and foot. In this mangled condition, he caused himself to be laid in a wood, through the skirts of which he knew that the Persian army must pass. When the van-guard of Ferouz's army reached him, they took him up, and carried him to their king, who, struck with the miserable condition of the man, received him kindly, asked him, Who he was, and by whom he had been so cruelly mangled? The artful Haiathelite readily answered, that he had been thus treated by his king, for having exhorted him to give any kind of satisfaction to the king of Persia, rather than engage in a war, the more, because he was so excessively hated by his own subjects. Ferouz rejoiced at this account, enquired narrowly into the strength of the enemy, and where the king of the Haiathelites was encamped? The wounded man answered, that the king had with him the flower of all his people, and that they lay in ambuscade behind certain mountains, which were but a few days march from thence, if the king took his road through the woods; but if he continued in that wherein he now was, he would be obliged to pass on the other side of those mountains, and thereby give the Haiathelites an opportunity of falling upon his rear. Ferouz, not in the least suspecting the fidelity of his wounded guide, listened readily to the advice he gave him; and without more ado turned out of the ordinary road, and suffered himself to be led, sometimes through thick woods, at others through wide deserts, till at length his army was on the very point of being famished for want of necessary provisions. Then the Haithelites appeared on all sides, and in such vast numbers, that Ferouz seeing it alike impossible to defend himself, or to escape, surrendered with the small remains of his army, throwing himself intirely on the mercy of his injured benefactors. The king of the Haiathelites, supposing that this disastrous expedition would prove a sufficient warning to Ferouz, offered to send him, and those that were with him, safely back into their own country, provided they took an oath never to invade his dominions any more. This they readily consented to do, and, as ſoon as they had done it, were permitted to return without the leaſt injury done them [q].

as

Invades the Haiathelites a ſecond time.

THE firſt thing Ferouz projected after his return into his own kingdom was, the attacking the Haiathelites a ſecond time, in breach of the ſolemn oath which he had ſo lately made. The chief reaſon which induced him to apprehend that he ſhould be more ſucceſsful in this expedition than his firſt, was the obſervation he had made of the number of forces about the king of that people, when he had aſſembled the whole force of his nation. The Perſian army appeared to Ferouz capable of beating twice the number of Haiathelites he had ſeen, if they had not been circumvented by the policy of the wounded vizier. This fault therefore he determined to repair by marching directly into the heart of the country, without turning either this way or that. Accordingly, as ſoon as the neceſſary levies could be made, he appointed Saouk, a prince deſcended from the antient kings of Perſia, regent in his abſence; and with a prodigious army marched once more againſt the people, by whoſe aſſiſtance he was ſeated on the throne. There is no need of repeating here the ſame ſtory, which hath been already inſerted, in the hiſtory of this prince's life under the name of Perozes, in the former period. Let it ſuffice that he and his army were by a new ſtratagem buried altogether in a pit, and the Haiathelites delivered from all apprehenſions of ſuffering any more by the incorrigible diſpoſition of Ferouz. The oriental hiſtorians differ, however, widely from the text, in the accounts they give us of the conſequences of this war; for they affirm, that Saouk the lieutenant of Ferouz, as ſoon as he received the news of his maſter's defeat, marched with a conſiderable body of horſe he had drawn together from an apprehenſion of this diſaſter, and incamping with them on the borders of the Haiathelites, prevented their invading Perſia, and even obtained from their king, who was a prince of great wiſdom and juſtice, a peace upon honourable terms, on a ſuggeſtion that the Perſians were by no means well affected to the meaſures of Ferouz, but were conſtrained to follow that unhappy prince, becauſe he was their ſovereign. The king of the Haiathelites, on this conſideration, not only made peace, but ſent back all the Perſians he had taken priſoners without ranſom, as thinking the death of Ferouz a ſufficient ſatisfaction for the injuries he had done him. According to the beſt of the eastern historians, Ferouz reigned thirty, though some say, not above twenty seven years [r].

[q] KHONDEMIR, LEBTARIKH, MIRKHOND. ſect. xxxi. D'HERBELOT. biblioth. orient. art. FIROUZ.

eaſtern

Balasch II. Balasch succeeded his father Ferouz or Firouz, and was not his brother, as the Greeks give out. His accession to the throne was very grateful to his subjects, but his younger brother Cobad was so dissatisfied therewith, that he instantly retired from court, and fled to Turquestan with the son of Saouk, who was his friend and counsellor. It does not appear, that Balasch either ordered his brother to be pursued, or attempted by any means to take away his life; but, on the contrary, left him at full liberty to live abroad at his ease, since he would not live at home. This, however, had no effect upon Cobad; his heart was full of ambition, and his head as full of sinister contrivances. His friend had prevailed upon him to marry his daughter, who is represented by the Persian historian, from whom we have these particulars, as a woman of exquisite beauty, and of as exquisite parts. By her Cobad had a son, whom he left with his mother, that he might return again to the court of the Khacan, in order to solicit his assistance against his brother. Having prevailed in his suit, and orders being issued for raising an army, at the head of which he was to make an irruption into Persia, Cobad thought fit to make a visit to his father-in-law's family, in order to have his sentiments of this expedition; and while he was there seeking to draw the best intelligence he could from his friends in Persia, he first received advice, that his brother was so extremely beloved by his subjects, that any attempt to dethrone him would be vain; and while he was afflicting himself with the thoughts of being defeated in all his schemes, he received another courier, who brought him advice, that Balasch died suddenly a few days before, and that there required no army to set him on the throne, his subjects being very ready to receive him. Upon this he set out with his father-in-law, his wife, and young son, Nouschirvan, to receive that crown by succession, which he sought to have seized by force, or to have acquired by his intrigues. Authors are not agreed how long Balasch reigned, some giving him fourteen years, and others little more than four [s].

[r] KHONDEMIR, MIRKHOND, sect. xxxi. D'HERBELOT, biblioth. orient. artic. FEROUZ.

[s] MIRKHOND, sect. xxxii. LEBTARIKH.

Cobad. Cobad aſcended the throne with all the advantages poſſible: He was in his perſon one of the handſomeſt men in Perſia, very adroit in his exerciſes, of a very generous diſpoſition, and of quick parts; but as to his morals they were exceedingly depraved, and he had in his exile ſucked in ſuch falſe notions of politics, as ſerved only to make himſelf uneaſy, and to put him upon oppreſſing his ſubjects. The firſt wrong ſtep he took was, the putting to death Saouk, his wife's grandfather, becauſe that under his father and brother he had had the chief direction of all things, which Cobad ſuppoſed he would expect during his reign, a thing he did not care to grant, and which, conſidering Saouk's great power, he thought it might not be ſafe to refuſe. He therefore made uſe of one Schabour, a ſoldier of fortune, who offered him his ſervice on his acceſſion to the throne, and to whom he gave orders to take off Saouk, in ſuch a manner, as might leaſt reflect upon his government. Having this commiſſion, Schabour went to pay his reſpects to Saouk, and having drawn him into a converſation, quarrelled with him, and cut his throat. In the tenth year of the reign of Cobad a certain impoſtor appeared, whoſe name was Mazdek [t]. He followed the ſteps of Mani pretty cloſely; for he ſet himſelf up for a prophet in the deſert, and having drawn together a multitude of people by his ſpecious pretences, firmly perſuaded them of his having revelations from heaven. The drift of theſe revelations was to the old purpoſe, viz. the eſtabliſhing of a more pure and holy religion, than had been hitherto made known to mankind. But as auſterity and ſelf-denial were never very popular doctrines, he invented ſome new notions of purity; and in order to take away the luſt of wealth and of women, he propoſed rendering them both common. This ſuited well with the diſpoſition of Cobad, who, as we obſerved before, was a very diſſolute prince; and therefore he countenanced this impoſtor, brought him to court, treated him with reſpect, and, under pretence of promoting purity in religion, fell to plundering his nobility, and debauching their wives and daughters. This is that decree for rendering women common, which the Greek writers ſpeak of, and which they make the pure effect of the corruption of the king's heart, and repreſent as an action which loſt him the hearts of all his people. But this is ſo far from being true, that the bulk of the people were more attached to this prince than any of his predeceſſors. The poor hoped to have a ſhare in the trea[t] Sharistani de religion. orient. Megjdi in vita Kobad. D'Herbelot. biblioth. orient. artic. Mazdek.

ſures

ſures taken from the rich, and the youth were ſo tranſported with the thoughts of having all the women they pleaſed, that the nobility found it a very difficult matter to do what they did. Cobad had a ſiſter, who was wonderfully beautiful, and of whoſe adventures the oriental romance-writers have written very largely. This ſiſter Mazdek gave him a diſpenſation to marry, which is the cleareſt proof in the world, that the Greek writers are altogether in the wrong, in ſuggeſting that ſuch marriages were conformable to the magian religion; had it been ſo, Cobad needed not have turned heretic to have obtained ſuch a diſpenſation, nor would his making uſe of it have alarmed the nobility as it did. It was this that put the finiſhing ſtroke to his ruin; for the Perſian lords looked upon it now as a thing certain, that he would ſtick at nothing. Coming therefore in great numbers to court, with ſuch of their dependents as they could truſt, they ſeized the perſon of the king, committed him to priſon, and appointed one Giamaſp, a perſon of great wiſdom and integrity, regent of the kingdom [u]. As to the impoſtor Mazdek, they would likewiſe have ſecured his perſon, if they could; but he was too circumſpect to put it in their power. His diſciples were very numerous, and he failed not to keep a ſufficient number of them about him to repel any attempt of this ſort; and he likewiſe took care not to truſt himſelf in cities or fortreſſes, where the nobility might ſhut him up as in a cage [x].

Cobad recovers the kingdom.

THE account the oriental writers give us of the manner in which Cobad eſcaped from his priſon, differs ſo little from that given by the Greeks, already inſerted at large in the life of Cavades, that, to avoid prolixity, we ſhall repeat nothing of it here. The eaſtern writers aſſure us, that it was ſome time before the king of the Haiathelites could be prevailed on to raiſe forces, in order to re-eſtabliſh Cobad on his throne. At length he ſent thirty thouſand horſe into the frontiers of Perſia, to try the diſpoſition of the people; and it appearing that they were well affected to Cobad's intereſt, that prince followed in perſon, and was ſhortly after peaceably reſtored, Giamaſp readily reſigning all title to the imperial throne, which procured him a very favourable reception from Cobad, who treated him with much reſpect as long as he lived. After his reſtoration, it is ſaid, he altogether reformed his conduct, and became in every reſpect an excellent prince, equally careful of extending his empire by arms, and of improving it by the encouragement of arts. It appears not, however, that he quitted the ſect of Mazdek, though he durſt never attempt to carry his notions into practice after his return; and in all probability he was the leſs inclined to attempt any thing of this ſort, on account of the trouble he had with one of his own ſons, who embraced the opinions of Mani, and in whoſe favour all the Perſians, infected with that hereſy, diſcovered an inclination to revolt, in order to have placed him on the throne before the death of his father, had they not been prevented by the diligence of Cobad, who was of a moſt active diſpoſition, and preſerved his activity even in old age. Authors are not very well agreed as to the length of his reign; ſome giving him more years, ſome leſs. The beſt hiſtorians, however, agree, that he reigned forty three years with great variety of fortune, and that he died beloved by his ſubjects, and revered by his neighbours, after having reſtored peace and order throughout Perſia, repaired ſuch cities as were falling to decay, and erected many new ones to ſerve as monuments of glory to his poſterity [t] (G).

[u] MIRKHOND. ſect. xxxiii KHONDEMIR. SHARISTANI de religion. orient. [x] KHONDEMIR. SHARISTANI de religion. orient. MIRKHOND. ſect. xxxiii. MEGJDI in vita Kobad. LEB TARIKH.

To

[t] Mirkhond. ubi ſupra. Khondemir. Sharistani de religion. orient.

(G) There are ſome varieties in the relations we have of the reign of Khobad, which deſerve to be remarked. Khobad, according to Mirkhond, married Zarmeher, the grand-daughter of Saouk, who had governed the kingdom after the miſerable defeat of his father; but of this we find no diſtinct account in any other hiſtorian. What is ſtranger ſtill, Mirkhond makes this lady the mother of Nouſchirvan. As to his ſiſter, whoſe beauty and accompliſhments tempted him to accept of the impoſtor Mazdek's diſpenſation, Mirkhond aſſures us, that ſhe was taken priſoner at the time her father Feroüz was killed, a circumſtance we did not inſert in the text, becauſe it ſeems to be altogether improbable. The march which Feroüz made into the enemy's country was in itſelf attended with great difficulties, and who can imagine, that he would expoſe a young lady, the only daughter he had, in ſuch a manner? All the oriental hiſtorians agree, that during his reign there were prodigious numbers of Jews ſettled in his dominions, eſpecially in Chaldæa, where ſometimes he treated them with great lenity, and at others he loaded them with heavy taxes. It does not appear, that he ever had any good opinion of the Manichees, though they had been in favour with his father, and though the impoſtor Mazdek had concurred with them in ſome of their notions. The truth ſeems to be, that he was far from being nice in religion himſelf, and

To Cobad ſucceeded his ſon Khoſrou or Choſroes, ſo famous throughout all the eaſt, under the ſurname of Nouſchirvan, i. e. the magnanimous. This word, literally taken, ſignifies a ſoul candied in honey, and metaphorically, a mind equally diſtinguiſhed by ſweetneſs of temper and great abilities. He was by very far the greateſt prince of this dynaſty, and, in the opinion of moſt of the oriental hiſtorians, the moſt glorious monarch that ever reigned in Perſia; happy in his genius, more ſo in his education, excelling in all royal virtues, deficient in none requiſite to diſtinguiſh a man in private life. The dawn of his government promiſed much felicity to his people, and he reigned long enough to make good to them much more than that promiſed. The firſt act of ſovereignty with which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf was full of ſeverity, though he was naturally the mildeſt prince in the world. He found means to cauſe the impoſtor Mazdek to be ſeized, and to be brought priſoner into his preſence. On this occaſion Nouſchirvan made a long oration, in which he explained the many and great miſchiefs brought on mighty kingdoms by ſuch deluders, declared his ſettled reſolution to extirpate all this new ſect, and as an earneſt thereof, he ordered Mazdek to be immediately put to death. That deceiver, deſirous of keeping up ſome reputation, addreſſed himſelf to Nouſchirvan in theſe words, as the officers were about to take him out of that prince's preſence: Providence, O king! appointed thee to rule over us, that thou mighteſt protect and not deſtroy. True, thou ſon of corruption, anſwered Nouſchirvan, ; but doſt thou not remember, that thou didſt once impudently demand of Cobad my father permiſſion to lie with my mother, and that thy followers have pillaged all the reſt of my ſubjects? I do not therefore ſeek to deſtroy thee and thine, but to preſerve myſelf and the people committed by providence to my care. After the execution of Mazdek, Nouſchirvan did not proceed to any farther ſeverities. The death of their chief ſtruck ſuch a damp to the hearts of his followers, that they willingly laid hold of the alternative offered them by the king's edict, viz. either to reſtore what they had wrongfully taken from others, or to ſuffer capital puniſhment as thieves. Thus the peace and properties of the people of Perſia were ſecured againſt the attempts of theſe and only pretended a high zeal for the ſect of Mazdek, becauſe it gave him an opportunity of filling his coffers, and gratifying his paſſion for his ſiſter (19).

Nouſchirvan.

(19) Mirkhond. ſect. xxxiii. Lebtarikh. Shariſtani de religion. orient.

debauched

debauched enthusiasts, without any extraordinary effusion of blood [u].

Instances of his generosity and wisdom.

Nouschirvan also removed at the very beginning of his reign such officers of his court as, by their conduct in his father's life-time, had rendered themselves disagreeable to his people. Among these there was one particular person whom he forbad ever to come into his presence, and who, by this sudden and total disgrace, fell into extreme poverty. On the birth-day, however, of the king, when all the Persian nobility came to make presents, and to pay their duty to their sovereign, this officer appeared among the rest, and, after having dined at the royal table, put one of the golden plates into his bosom, unperceived by any but Nouschirvan. When the plate was missed, and the servants began to make some stir, the king bade them be at quiet: For, said he, the man who took it will not bring it again, and he who saw him take it will not discover him. On the next birth-day the officer came to court again, clad in a new robe, upon which the king calling him, whispered in his ear, Did my plate go to buy that fine robe? The man readily answered, Yes, and then drawing it aside, shewed him a pair of ragged breeches: But you see, Sir, said he, that it would go no further. Nouschirvan was so charmed with the frankness of the man, that he restored him to his place as well as favour, and the Persians were so delighted with the generosity and good-humour of their prince, that in all their histories this story is preserved, as a monument of his beneficence and clemency. For the better dispatching of justice, and the more easy management of all public affairs, the king, in the second year of his reign, divided all the Persian dominions into four vizierships: the first consisted of the frontier provinces towards Tartary and India: the second included Parthia, Armenia, and the provinces bordering on the Caspian sea: the third comprehended Persia Proper, and all the provinces between it and the gulph: the fourth was composed of Mesopotamia, Chaldea, the countries taken from the Arabs, and those conquered from the Greek emperors. Over each of these he appointed a governor of the royal blood, who, in all ordinary cases, judged without appeal: But in all extraordinary cases, and where judgments were capital, they could not proceed till they had instructions from court [x].

[u] Megjdi in vita Nouschirvan. Mirkhond, sect. xxxiv. Khondemir. Sharistani de religion. orient. [x] Khondemir. Mirkhond. ubi supra Megjdi in vita Nouschirvan. Lebtarikh. D'Herbelot. biblioth. orient. art Nouschirvan.

Early

EARLY also in his reign he made an expedition into Rumestan, or the territories of the Greek emperor; of which we have given a long account in the foregoing period. In this war, however, he did not so much endeavour to augment the bulk of his territories, as to increase the number of his subjects. It was with this view that he transported all the inhabitants of the great city of Antioch into the province of Irak, where he gave them the city of Mahouza for their habitation, the name of which, to oblige them, he changed for that of Antioch. This city lay at no great distance from Babylon; but the new name conferred upon it by Chosroes did not remain with it long; for after his decease the old one of Mahouza came again into use, and it is so called even at this day. After this he resolved to restore the Persian frontier on the other side of his empire, on which the Haiathelites had trespassed exceedingly, supposing they could never be too well rewarded for the assistance they had given to his father Cobad. At first Nouschirvan endeavoured to proceed by way of negotiation, representing to these people, that the widespread countries of Thebet, Candahar, and Brantolah, suited better their way of life, than the provinces they had usurped from Persia; but the Haiathelites having treated these representations with contempt, Nouschirvan was constrained to have recourse to force; whereby he answered his purpose better, and obliged this barbarous people to repass the mountains; by which means his subjects were delivered from those apprehensions, with which the neighbourhood of this mighty nation had tormented them for upwards of fifty years. This manner of proceeding alarmed all the neighbouring princes, and more especially the Khacan, who immediately raised a great army, and, while Nouschirvan was on the borders of India with his troops, broke like an inundation through the Persian provinces into the very heart of the kingdom. Nouschirvan, as soon as he was acquainted with what had happened, resolved to send his son Hormouz against this formidable invader, being afraid to leave his frontiers towards India uncovered, lest some advantages should be taken by his enemies on that side [y].

And of his martial dispositon.

Hormouz discharged his duty to his father and to the Persian nation, not only with great fidelity, but with great capacity also. Though but a young man, he had been a soldier from his childhood, and therefore wanted not experience, as he naturally abounded with courage. The troops he had a-

His son Hormouz defeats the Khacan.

[y] KHONDEMIR. MIRKHOND, sect. XXXIV. MEGJDI in vita Nouschirravan.

bout

bout him were daily augmented by the country people, who looked upon the army as the ſureſt aſylum, and prudently choſe to hazard their lives in the ſervice of their country, rather than to fly and hide themſelves from the enemy with equal hazard. Hormouz judged perfectly well of the ſtrength of his own forces, and did not, becauſe they were numerous, pretend to give the enemy battle, which, if he had loſt, muſt have loſt Perſia; but by haraſſing the unwieldly army of the Khacan by continual ſkirmiſhes, by withdrawing all ſorts of proviſion out of the open country, by gariſoning ſtrong cities, and by abandoning weak ones, he obliged that monarch to think of retiring, as, by burning all the country behind him, he had rendered his retreat almoſt impracticable. The Khacan, ignorant of this, began to march back, and was amazed when he found a deſert before him, and the Perſian forces behind, and on every ſide. In this miſerable ſituation himſelf, with the principal nobility, and a great corps of the beſt horſe, deſerted the reſt, and precipitately eſcaped into their own country, leaving to the young prince of Perſia the glory of having defeated him, and of having defeated him by his conduct. Nouſchirvan, on the other hand, having compleated his deſigns in reſpect to his Indian frontiers, made an offenſive war on the Khacan, and puſhed his conqueſts ſo far, that he obliged him to accept peace on the terms he thought fit to give him; after which Nouſchirvan married his daughter. This remarkable event happened in the twelfth year of his reign, and as it delivered him from any apprehenſions of danger from foreign enemies, ſo he laid hold of this opportunity to ſettle the boundaries of his vaſt dominions, and then to return to Madain his capital city; where he gave audience to the embaſſadors of the greateſt potentates of the world, who came to compliment him on his victories, and to penetrate, if poſſible, any new deſigns he might have formed [z].

The bounds of the Perſian empire.

It may not be amiſs to take notice here of the boundaries which Nouſchirvan gave to his empire, becauſe the reader will from thence perceive, with how great juſtice the Perſian writers acknowledge this prince for the greateſt monarch that ever ruled in their country. The city and country of Farganah, which lies along the river Sihon or Iaxartes, was the limit of Perſia on that ſide; the river Indus ſeparated his territories from thoſe of the independent Indian princes. Arabia, to the frontiers of Egypt, acknowledged him for its ſovereign, and in Syria he had puſhed his conqueſts as far as [z] Mirkhond, ubi ſupra. Lebtarikh. Khondemir.

the

the sea would permit. While Nouschirvan enjoyed in peace an empire of such an extent, he formed two projects highly commended by the eastern writers, and which, it may be, would not have gained him so much honour, had he reigned in another part of the world. The first was the bringing out of India a certain book, intitled Homaioun Nameh, i. e. The Royal Manuel, the work of the famous Pilpai, containing a multitude of parables relating to the art of government. This, by the care of his chief minister Buzurge Mihir, he procured, and caused it to be translated into the Persian language for his own use. His other project was of the same sort, but undertaken for the sake of his people. It was the publication of his predecessor Ardschir's instructions for all degrees of men. Of this he caused a multitude of copies to be made, and obliged every family in Persia to receive one [a].

Nouschizad the son of Nouschirvan rebels against him.

WE must not, however, suppose, that the life of Nouschirvan was spent without meeting with any troubles: For what prince, what private man, ever spent his life so? The source of his uneasiness was his own family, and the enemy who gave him most trouble was his own son. In one of his expeditions into Rumestan, or the dominions of the emperor of Greece, he had taken a female captive, by whose beauty he was subdued himself. This woman was a christian, and very devout. Nouschirvan espoused her, and had by her a son whom he dearly loved. The name of this young prince was Nouschizad. His mother took care from his cradle to educate him in her religion, and impressed the truths thereof so strongly in his mind, that when he grew up, he was not to be moved by the arts of the magi, or by the threats or promises of his father. Nouschirvan perceiving this, and being afraid of the consequences, confined him. For, as we have seen, religious disputes were dreadful to this wise prince, who thought he could not be master of the hearts of his subjects if they were not united amongst themselves. The prince's custody was easy enough, the king designing, not so much to punish him, as to prevent any thing which might deserve punishment; and therefore, when he found himself obliged to visit the frontiers of his empire towards India, he did not think fit to alter Nouschizad's condition, but left him under the same gentle restraint, wherein he had lived for some years. During his absence from his capital, he had a fit of sickness, whereupon a report was ſpread that he was dead. Nouſchizad hearing this took inſtantly an opportunity of making his eſcape; and, as there were many chriſtians in Perſia, he quickly drew together a conſiderable force, and continued to increaſe his army, even after he was informed, that his father was alive and well. The news of this revolt greatly afflicted Nouſchirvan, who did not, however, immediately ſend an army againſt his ſon, but ſuffered things to remain as they were, that the young prince might have time to conſider the condition he was in, and return to his duty. But when he ſaw this delay produced nothing, but that, on the contrary, many of the grandees, who were diſcontented at the ſeverity of the king's juſtice, took this opportunity of fortifying themſelves againſt his reſentment, Nouſchirvan reſolved to wait no longer; and therefore inſtantly diſpatched a body of forces under the command of Ram Berzin, one of his principal generals, to reduce the rebels. However, when that officer took his leave of him, he gave him theſe inſtructions: "I underſtand that my ſon "hath not only taken arms, but hath alſo poſſeſſed himſelf "of my treaſures, opened the priſons, augmented his army "with thoſe he found in them, and, by the help of my mo-"ney and his own promiſes, hath drawn abundance of my "officers to his party. My commands therefore are, that "you advance with all poſſible diligence towards him, yet "without attacking him, or thoſe of my ſubjects who are "about him, till you have adviſed him of your arrival, and "exhorted him to return to that obedience he owes me; "which if he inclines to do, I expect that he ſhould ſend "back to their priſons thoſe whom he has releaſed; that he "ſhould put to the ſword the officers who have deſerted to "him, and diſband his army. If he refuſes to execute theſe "things, do your utmoſt to reduce him by force, even "though it ſhould be at the expence of his life. But if "the young man falls alive into your hands, do not offer "him the leaſt indignity, nor ſo much as reproach him with "his want of duty; his conſciouſneſs thereof will be a "ſufficient puniſhment". Ram Berzin followed his inſtructions exactly, but the prince proving obſtinate, a general engagement enſued, in which Nouſchizad was defeated, and received a mortal wound, which when he perceived, he ſaid to thoſe who were about him, Tell the queen, my mother, that it is my laſt requeſt, that my body may be buried among the chriſtians. Nouſchirvan ſucceeded no leſs happily in his Indian war, than he had done in this domeſtic one; he compelled all the princes on his frontiers to do him homage and

[a] MEGJDI in vita Nourshirravan. KHONDEMIR. MIRKHOND. ubi supra.

to

to pay him tribute. After this he marched with a great army into Arabia, where he was fortunate in the higheſt degree, and uſed his fortune to the beſt purpoſe imaginable. He found the country diſtreſſed by tyrants, whom he diſpoſſeſſed of their power, reſtored the lawful ſovereigns, whom they had driven from their dominions, and did ſo many kindneſſes to the people in general, that Mohammed himſelf was wont to boaſt, that he was born under the reign of this monarch, ſurnamed by the Arabians Al-malek, i. e. The Juſt [b].

After all his victories Nouſchirvan adorns his capital.

AFTER this he returned to Madain, his capital, and began to adorn it with a multitude of new and ſumptuous buildings; amongſt the reſt with a palace, which was accounted one of the wonders of the eaſt. It was called Thak Khoſrou, i. e. The dome of Choſroes. It had a beautiful cupola, and underneath ſtrong and large vaults, in which were depoſited all the mighty treaſuresof this powerful monarch. In order to have a juſt idea of this wonderful building, the reader muſt be informed, that the caliph Almanzor ordered this palace to be pulled down, in order to employ its materials in adorning the citadel of Bagdat; but, after working ſome time thereon, he found the expence ſo great, that he was forced to abandon the enterprize, and leave the greateſt part of the palace of Choſroes undemoliſhed, on which a Perſian poet wrote the following diſtich, alluding to the founder of this glorious edifice:

Thy works, like thee, eternity enjoy;
Nor rage, nor time, can thy deſigns deſtroy.

If we were to mention the twentieth partof the acts recorded of this prince, which have come even to our hands, it would take up much more room than we have allowed to this period; we ſhall content ourſelves therefore, with giving the reader an account of his laſt expedition and death, and a ſhort view of his character, according to the Oriental writers, in a note, that we may not be condemned of negligence, amidſt ſuch immenſe materials. The laſt war, which Nouſchirvan made againſt the Conſtantinopolitan emperor, was occaſioned by his ſupporting the petty princes of Armenia, againſt the Perſian prince, who was their ſovereign. At firſt Nouſchirvan had the ſame good fortune in this as in his other wars; but truſting it too far, he was defeated, and conſtrained to paſs the river Euphrates on the back of his elephant, and not without great danger of being drowned. On his return to his capital Madain, which is either the ſame with Cteſiphon, or a city built upon its ruins, he began to find himſelf extremely weak, and not a little indiſpoſed. He therefore judged it time to think of making peace, and then of ſettling the ſucceſſion; for being now eighty years old, and having reigned forty eight, he had not either cauſe to hope for much longer life, or to repine at his approaching deceaſe, after having ſo long and fully enjoyed the good things of this world. When therefore he heard, that the Greek emperor was willing to conclude a treaty on reaſonable terms, and ſaw that the nobility were well inclined towards his ſon Hormouz, he diſpoſed himſelf chearfully to ſubmit to fate, having firſt delivered in writing the following inſtructions, or political teſtament, to his ſon [d].

[b] MIRKHOND, ubi ſupra. LEBTARIKH. KHONDEMIR. MEGJDI in vit Nouſhirravan.

" I Nouſchirvan, the poſſeſſor of the kingdoms of Perſia " and India, addreſs theſe my laſt words to Hormouz my " ſon, that they might ſerve him as a lantern in the days of " darkneſs, as a path when he ſhall enter the deſerts, and as " a pole-ſtar when he navigates through the ſeas of this " tempeſtuous world. When my eyes are cloſed, which " are already unable to bear the light of the ſun, let him be " ſeated on my throne, and let his luſtre be equal to that " glorious planet: but let him remember in the midſt of " his greatneſs that kings rule not for themſelves, but for " their people, and that they are, with reſpect to them, " what the heavens are to the earth. Can the earth be " fruitful, if it be not watered, if it be not cheriſh'd by the " heavens? My ſon, let all your people be ſenſible of your " benefactions; thoſe who are neareſt you firſt; by de- " grees thoſe who are at the greateſt diſtance. If I durſt, " I would propoſe to you my own example: but I will " rather put you in mind of that which hath been example " unto me. Behold the ſun, it viſits all parts of the world; " and if it is ſometimes viſible, and at others removed from " our ſight, it is becauſe the univerſe partakes of its ſplendor, " and is cheriſhed by its beams. Enter not any province " but with a proſpect of doing good to its inhabitants; nei- " ther quit it with any other view, than to do good elſewhere. " Ill men muſt be puniſhed; to them the ſun of majeſty is [d] Mirkhond. ubi ſupra. Lebtarikh. Khondemir. D'Herbelot. B. O. art. Madain, Nouſchirvan.

" eclipſed:

" eclipsed: the good deserve the utmost encouragement, and " ought to experience the morning beams. As that glorious " luminary answers all the purposes for which it was created " at all times, be thou careful to act always like a king, " since you will desire at all times to be revered as a king. " My son, present thyself often before heaven to implore its " aid; but be sure that thou approach it not with an im- " pure mind. Do thy dogs enter the temple? If thou " shalt observe exactly this rule, thy prayers shall be heard, " thy enemies shall be struck with terror, thy friends shall " be ever faithful; thou shalt be the delight of thy subjects, " and thou shalt have reason to delight in them. Do justice, " abase the insolent, comfort the unhappy, love your children, " protect learning, follow the advice given you by antient " counsellors, suffer not the young to meddle in affairs of " state, and let the good of your people be the sole and " supreme end of your designs. Farewell: I leave you a " great kingdom, which you will keep, if you will follow " my counsels; and which it will be impossible for you to " keep, if you follow others[e]". Such was the end of Nouschirvan, the most beloved prince of his age, and whose reputation survives to this day in the works of all the eastern historians, in the writings of their moralists, and more especially in the works of their poets[f] (H).

Hormouz,

[e] Histoire d'une revolut. arrivé en Perse dans le sixieme siecle ap. de l'academ. royale des inscrip. Tom. III. edit. Amsterd. p. 510.
[f] KHONDEMIR. LEBTARIKH. MIRKHOND. ubi supra. MEGJDI in vita Nouschirvan.

(H) Khondemir closes his account of the reign of Nouschirvan with this observation: " Princes in succeeding times ought to " place him, of whom we have been speaking, as a model before " their eyes, and make his conduct the rule of theirs, since he " possessed in a sovereign degree, as well the good qualities which " render amiable a private man, as the exalted virtues which add " lustre to a diadem; but, above all, justice without bias, liberty " without any other bounds than those assigned by reason, con- " tributed most to his high reputation while living, and have " preserved his fame fresh to posterity (20)". We have seen in the foregoing history, many instances of the grandeur of this prince's soul, in undertaking the most stupendous works for the benefit, and for the ornament of the several parts of his dominions.

(20) Histor. Persar.

There

Hormouz IV. Hormouz, whom the Greeks call Hormisdas, and who was the fourth of that name of this dynasty, ascended the throne with

There is one, however, of which we have not spoken; and as it makes a great figure in all the Oriental histories, it is requisite to take some notice of it here: This is the wall of Jagouge and Magouge, or a thick and high rampart commencing at Derbent, and running from mountain to mountain, so as to secure the frontiers of Persia from the northern nations. It was projected by Alexander the Great, and, as some say, begun by his command. However, it remained unfinished, tho' not altogether unprosecuted, till the reign of Nouschirvan, who undertook and happily concluded it (21). The court of Nouschirvan was one of the most magnificent that the world ever saw. The deputies from all the provinces of Persia constantly attended therein, as did the embassadors of all the great princes in the world. The expence of their entertainment was defrayed by Nouschirvan, who, in the midst of all this prosperity, preserved a mind so equal and undisturbed, that he was never surprized into any expression unworthy of a philosopher. A courier coming hastily into his presence, cried out, God is just! God is just! the implacable enemy of our king is taken away by death. Nouschirvan answered without the least emotion, Far be it from me to rejoice at the death of my enemy. There can be nothing more ridiculous, than for mortals to be pleased with instances of mortality (22). When he had been hunting, and was desirous of eating some of the venison in the field, some of his attendants went to a neighbouring village, and took away a quantity of salt to season it. The king suspected it, ordered that they should immediately go and pay for it; then turning to his minister, he said, This is a small matter in itself, but a great one as it regards me. A king ought ever to be just, because he is an example to his subjects, and if he swerves in trifles, they will become dissolute. If I cannot make all my people just in the smallest things, I can at least shew them that it is possible to be so (23). The same way of thinking induced him to put the following inscription on his diadem, after he had settled the immense dominions he had acquired, and was revered at home and abroad, as the mightiest of all monarchs:

What is long life? or what a glorious reign?
Since our successors close upon us tread.
My fathers left this crown, and I again
Must leave it too, and mingle with the dead (24).

These are sufficient specimens of the solidity of his understanding, (21) D'Herbelot. B. O. artic. Jagouge. (22) Saadi in Gulistan. c. i. (23) Id. ibid. p. 100. (24) Id. ibid. p. 119.

and

with the faireſt proſpect that ever any Perſian prince had. He was naturally of a very indifferent diſpoſition, addicted to his pleaſures, haughty, and cruel. His father, who was too wiſe a prince not to perceive theſe defects in his ſon, endeavoured to correct them by education. With this view he put him under the care of the celebrated Buzurge Mihir, the wiſeſt man in Perſia, and the firſt miniſter of Nouſchirvan. This excellent perſon took ſuch pains with Hormouz, and knew ſo well to ſet folly and vice in their lights, that he vanquiſhed his natural proneneſs to evil, and made him, in ſpite of himſelf, a great and a good man. For the firſt three years of his reign, while his old tutor remained about his perſon, he as far tranſcended Nouſchirvan, as Nouſchirvan had all his predeceſſors. His diſcourſes were fraught with wiſdom, his actions were all beneficent. He carried ſo far his reſpect for Buzurge Mihir, that he would not wear his royal ornaments in his preſence; and when ſome of his courtiers intimated, that his reverence to him was exceſſive, ſince it was more than was due to a parent, he anſwered, You ſay well, my friends; but I owe more to him than I do to my father. The life and kingdom I received from Nouſchirvan will remain with me but a few years; but the reputation I ſhall acquire, and of the ſtrength and rectitude of his ſentiments. We have therefore all the reaſon in the world to believe, what all the Oriental hiſtorians poſitively affirm, that he was one of the moſt learned men, not only in his own dominions, but in his age; that he was the moſt beneficent patron of the ſciences, and of thoſe who cultivate them; and that his court was the aſylum of merit in diſtreſs. He held regular aſſemblies for the promoting of real, that is, uſeful knowledge, at which he aſſiſted himſelf, with his miniſters of ſtate, as will be ſeen in the next note; and he was ſo far from being a ſmatterer, that not only in the politer branches of learning, but even in the buſineſs of mechanics, he knew as much as the artiſts themſelves. With all this, he was the moſt debonnaire man in his court; and tho' he never ſaid a light or trivial thing himſelf, yet he would laugh at the jeſts of others; and never took ill any poignant expreſſion that eſcaped a man in a flow of humour (25). No wonder then, that the wits of his own time loved him; that the wits of ſucceeding ages have done their utmoſt to embalm his character The facts related of him muſt ſtrike all generous minds; and therefore we make no excuſe for ſo long a note.

(25) Lebtarikh. Mirkhond. fect. 34 Hafez. Giami cum mult. al. poet.

quire,

quire, in virtue of his instructions, will survive to latest times. Happy had it been for this prince, had he always adhered to these notions; but when old age had rendered Buzurge Mihir unfit for the great employments he possessed, he requested, and had leave from Hormouz to retire; and with him retired the happiness and fortune of his master (I). The young courtiers who were about Hormouz, began from

(I) The character of Buzurge Mihir makes so great a figure it the oriental histories, that it is but just we should bestow a note upon it here. In the first place we must remark, that this is the surname only of the prime minister of Nouschirvan, and that it signifies, in the Persian tongue, well beloved. We have taken notice in the text of his being appointed governor to Hormouz; and that, with great difficulty, he triumphed over the evil disposition of that prince. It cannot be improper to give an instance of his address in this respect; he saw with regret that his pupil slept till noon, spent the afternoon in dressing, and the night in debauches; he reproved to no purpose, he expostulated to no end; yet he continued to expostulate and reprove, hoping, that importunity might effect what was unattainable by reason. Hormouz at length, quite tired out, devised a method, to rid himself of these lectures: he ordered some of his favourites to disguise themselves, and to strip his preceptor quite naked, as he came in the morning from his father's court to wait upon him. This being accordingly done, when Buzurge Mihir related his misfortune, You see, said the young prince, what comes of all this diligence; if you had not been up so early, you had not been robbed. You mistake, Sir, said the preceptor, the thieves were more successful than I, because they rose earlier. Vigilance, Sir, is a copy of the divine activity; it is a torch by which science becomes visible, the great treasure of virtue and true pleasure, and the key of victory in all things. Rise then, my dear prince, that the sun of good fortune may display his beams on thy head, and that the fresh air in the morning may dispose thy mind to receive those graces from heaven, which may in time make thee a blessing to the whole earth (26). One day Buzurge Mihir being with his master Nouschirvan at one of the assemblies of the learned, the king proposed for the subject of debate this question, What is the extreme degree of misery? A Greek philosopher who was esteemed one of the most learned men of his age and country, answered, Poverty in extreme old age. An Indian sage also, of great reputation, gave it as his opinion, That great pain, attended with dejection of mind, was the most unsupportable of evils. And what say you? said Nouschirvan turning to his master. My judgment is, replied he, that he is the most miserable of men, who begins to repent,

(26) D'Herbelot. B. O. artic. Buzurge Mihir.

when

from that moment, to have a viſible aſcendency over him, and to influence him to do many things alike contrary to his intereſt, and injurious to his reputation. Such of his old counſellors as were about his perſon, and had ſtill ſome ſhare in his eſteem, theſe ſycophants found means to remove, either by miſinforming their king, or by treating thoſe they diſliked in ſo rude a way, that they made it their choice to retire from court. It had been the policy of Nouſchirvan to provide the ſhorteſt and ſpeedieſt methods of diſtributing juſtice throughout his wide empire. Every little village had its judge, and, in all courts of judicature, care was taken, that decrees ſhould not coſt either more time or money than they were worth. At the time of his death he left thirty thouſand perſons in judicial offices in his dominions. Numbers of theſe were removed when Hormouz fell into the hands of bad counſellors; and the miſchiefs which followed on this raſh ſtep were ſo great, that the inſpectors of juſtice in the ſeveral provinces of the empire joined in a remonſtrance upon that head; which Hormouz was ſo infatuated as to conceive a libel on his government, in reſentment of which he perſecuted this whole uſeful and venerable race of men with implacable hatred, and by a new ſtrain of tyrannical madneſs, would be the ſole judge of his people himſelf. On this pretence he wore every day the tiara or royal diadem, which his predeceſſors never put on, but when they were about to adminiſter juſtice to their ſubjects. Hence his people gave him the ſurname of Tagedar, i. e. the crown-wearer[g].

[g] MIRKHOND. & ſect. 25. KHONDEMIR. LEBTARIKH.

when he finds his life is at an end (27). He had no ſooner ſaid this, than the other two ſages came immediately over to his opinion. It would take up a great deal of room to inſert a tenth part of the examples we have met with of this man's wiſdom: One inſtance, however, of his miniſterial virtues may not be amiſs. One day at council, after a great deal had been ſpoken by others, it was obſerved, that he remained ſilent. Upon which Nouſchirvan aſked him, Why he did not ſpeak his ſentiments as well as the reſt? Becauſe, anſwered he, a ſtateſman ought to give his advice, as a phyſician does medicines, that is, when there is occaſion (28). At this the king ſmiled, and the reſt of the counſellors teſtified their ſatisfaction at ſo well turned a compliment. This great man was privately a chriſtian, which chiefly induced him to retire from court, and for which the cruel Khoſrou Parviz cauſed him to be put to death, when he had arrived at an extreme old age (29).

(27) Saadi in Guliſtan (28) Idem ibid. (29) Khondemir.

The khakan invades Perſia.

It is impoſſible for a bad prince to maintain himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the hearts of his people, as well as of their obedience; and it is as impoſſible for a nation univerſally diſaffected to hinder their prince from perceiving the diſlike they have of his meaſures. This quickly became the caſe of Hormouz and his ſubjects. His jealouſies induced him to murder by thouſands. His people, believing themſelves in continual danger, could not avoid betraying an earneſt deſire of ſeeing themſelves ſafe, which begat further inclinations of revenge in their prince. To complete the misfortunes of both parties, the frontier provinces towards India and Arabia threw off the Perſian yoke, and ſet up princes of their own; and the khakan, who long waited for ſuch an opportunity, entered Perſia with an army of three hundred thouſand men, tho' he was uncle by the mother's ſide to Hormouz. The Perſian monarch, in this diſtreſs, called a general council of the nobility about him; and after hearing, without following, the advice of moſt of the great lords preſent, he ſuffered himſelf to be guided on this important occaſion by the counſel of an old man, who had been embaſſador for Nouſchirvan in the country of the khakan, at the time that prince demanded the mother of Hormouz in marriage. This old nobleman aſſured him, that, on this occaſion, an aſtrologer predicted, that, under the reign of a Perſian king to be born of a princeſs then choſen for Nouſchirvan's queen, a certain khakan ſhould invade, and almoſt conquer, his dominions; but would be at length vanquiſhed himſelf by a Perſian general, whoſe face ſhould reſemble that of a wild cat; that the aſtrologer being further intreated to endeavour by his art to diſcover the name of this general, he by degrees placed ſeveral letters on a tablet, which taken together, compoſed theſe words, Baharam Tchoubin. One cannot conceive any thing more viſibly abſurd than this ſtory, which was certainly invented to amuſe Hormouz, who was exceſſively addicted to the occult ſciences, and thereby to engage him to place this officer at the head of his armies, of whom otherwiſe he would probably not have thought, tho' he was the moſt capable of that command of any man in his dominions. He was at this time governor of Media, from whence the king ſent for him, and offered him the ſupreme command of all the troops in Perſia; which Baharam declined, and, to the amazement of his maſter, choſe only twelve thouſand men, at the head of whom he marched inſtantly againſt the khakan [1].

[1] Khondemir. Lebtarikh. Mirkhond ubi. ſupra. Relation d'une revolution, &c. p. 512. D'Herbelot. B. O. artic. Ho. mouz.

He

HE moved with ſuch diligence and ſecrecy, that he attacked the enemy upon their march, with ſuch a fortunate vivacity, that the khakan was conſtrained to advance againſt him in perſon at the head of his guards. This poiſed the ſcales for ſome time; but at length the khakan being killed and his ſon taken priſoner, their army fled in ſuch confuſion, that they left their baggage behind them; ſo that the Perſian collected two hundred and fifty camels load of treaſure. The moſt precious of the ſpoils, together with the captive prince, Baharam ſent to the king his maſter, with a very dutiful letter, and an exact account of the advantages he had gained. At firſt Hormouz was extremely well ſatisfied with his general's good fortune, gave the higheſt commendations to his valour, and propoſed to beſtow on him mighty rewards. His favourites, however, ſuſpecting, that Baharam might not have any great complaiſance for them, in caſe he arrived at the chief employments in the ſtate, reſolved to ſecure themſelves at his expence. With this view they inſinuated to the king, that, under pretence of ſending the richeſt of the ſpoils, Baharam had only given him a ſmall ſhare thereof, and kept the reſt for himſelf; that it was to be feared he might make an ill uſe of this, and that it was a dangerous thing to truſt ſo ambitious a man at the head of the army. The ſuſpicious temper of Hormouz rendered any proof in ſupport of theſe conjectures quite unneceſſary. Inſinuations were with him always ſufficient evidence; and therefore, on no better grounds than theſe, he not only diſtruſted his general, but moſt imprudently and ſhamefully diſgraced him, by ſending him, inſtead of a habit of honour, the uſual preſent of Perſian kings, all the neceſſary apparel of a woman. This ſo far provoked Baharam, that, in his own mind, he reſolved to dethrone his maſter, and therefore having arrayed himſelf in the woman's habit the king had ſent him, he came out and ſhewed himſelf to his ſoldiers; and having aſked them, whether they thought he deſerved ſuch treatment? he, by a premeditated harangue, drew them to concur with him in his reſentments, and to aſſiſt him in his project of depriving the ſon of Nouſchirvan of the regal dignity [k]

The khakan intirely defeated by Baharam, who is himſelf diſgraced.

THE Perſians, however, retained ſuch a reſpect for the royal family, that Baharam ſaw there was a neceſſity of making choice of ſome other prince of the ſame line. Accordingly he proclaimed Khoſrou Parviz, the eldeſt ſon of Hormouz

The army ſupport Baharam againſt his maſter.

[k] MIRKHOND. ubi ſupra. Hiſtoire d'une revolution, &c. p 514. D'HERBELOT. B. O. artic. Hormouz ben Nouſchirvan.

mouz, king. That young prince, being perſuaded by his uncles, retired from court, and countenanced the rebellion, cauſing money to be coined in his own name, and practiſing in other reſpects as if his father had been dead. Hormouz, having intelligence of theſe proceedings, ſeized Hindouiah and Botham his wife's brothers, whom he knew to have encouraged his ſon to deſert him. Their confinement, however, did not laſt long; for the whole maſs of the people, having contracted an irreconcileable averſion to their king, broke open their priſon, releaſed theſe lords, and aſſiſted them in ſeizing Hormouz; and notwithſtanding the excellent ſpeech made by that prince, at the motion of Hindouiah, put out his eyes. Khoſrou, who was at this time in Media, returned with all imaginable ſpeed to his capital, where as the Eaſtern writers unanimouſly agree, he went and comforted his father, aſſured him, that his uncles had acted intirely without his permiſſion or conſent, and beſought his forgiveneſs in the moſt humble terms. The old blind king, ſufficiently humbled by his misfortunes, and having no hopes but in his ſon, promiſed to forgive him, provided he puniſhed thoſe who depoſed him and put out his eyes; which Khoſrou promiſed to comply with, as ſoon as he ſhould be thoroughly ſettled on the throne. In the mean time, Baharam having inſinuated to the principal officers of his army, that Khoſrou, notwithſtanding he owed his crown to them, had yet a ſtronger affection to his family than to his people, whereby they had no hopes left, in caſe he ſhould have it in his power to puniſh them for the revolt, they determined, for their own ſakes, to ſupport their general, and to hazard all things, rather than his and their ſafety under a ſettled government. With this view they ſuffered him to lead them to Madain; before which city when they arrived, Khoſrou drew out his forces in a plain called Niherjan and offered them battle. The engagement was long and bloody; but Khoſrou was at length beaten, and forced to retire into the city, where going to viſit his father, the poor old man adviſed him not to ſuffer himſelf to be ſhut up in the place, but to retire into the territories of the Greek emperor, till his affairs ſhould take a happier turn. Khoſrou, having indeed no other meaſure to take, followed his father's advice, and diſpoſed all things for his retreat. When he was about to withdraw, or, as ſome writers ſay, when he was actually out of the city, his uncles came to him, and repreſented the danger of leaving his father alive, even tho' he was blind, on a ſuppoſition that Baharam might reinſtate him and govern under his name; wherefore they very humanely humanely propoſed to go back and put him to death. Khoſrou oppoſed all he could this deteſtable project; but his uncles, however, turned back, and, to ſecure themſelves, ſtrangled the old unhappy prince with a bow-ſtring, when he had reigned fourteeen years. This is a very different account from that given by the Greek hiſtorians, and yet all the Oriental writers concur therein; and their authority ſeems to be of at leaſt as much weight as that of ſtrangers, in a point regarding their own hiſtory [1].

Baharam Tchoubin, on the flight of Khoſrou, aſſumed the regal authority, tho' without the title. He was deſcended of the antient princes of Rei, and was the talleſt man in the Perſian dominions. He had ſerved, when a youth, as a voluntier in the armies of Nouſchirvan, and had riſen, gradually, and purely through merit, to the government of Media. As he was an excellent officer and mightily beloved by the ſoldiers, ſo he was naturally loyal to his prince, and, in all probability, had maintained him on his throne, notwithſtanding his ill conduct, if Jezdan-Bakſche, who was his firſt miniſter, had not inſtigated Hormouz to treat him as he did. When he had once taken the reſolution of rebelling againſt the king, he reſolved alſo to dethrone him, and to transfer the empire to his own family; but not daring to declare this, he made uſe of the name of Khoſrou, till his ſcheme was ripe for execution. When he was informed of the flight of that prince, he ſent a great detachment of horſe in purſuit of him, under the command of Siaonſchan the captain of his guards, with orders to re-take him, if it was poſſible, and to bring him priſoner to his camp. This officer executed his orders ſo punctually, that he came up with Khoſrou and his uncles at a certain hermitage; whereupon Hindouiah to preſerve his nephew, put on the royal robes, and looking out of a window, which was very high, told the ſoldiers, who had already inveſted the place, that, as ſoon as their commanding officer came up, he would ſurrender. On the arrival of the captain of the guards, Hindouiah reſumed his own cloaths, appeared at the window, and, in the name of the king, beſought that officer to grant him ſome reſpite for his repoſe; which was accordingly allowed, a ſtrong guard being poſted round the place. At evening Hindouiah came again to the window, told the captain of the guards, that the king was very ſenſible of the civility ſhewn him, and be-

Baharam Tchoubin.

[1] KHONDEMIR. MIRKHOND. ubi ſupra. Hiſtoire d'une revolution, &c. p 514.

ſought

ſought him to lie there that night, that he might recover his ſpirits a little, and be the more able to bear the fatigue of travelling next day, where-ever they ſhould think proper to carry him. This likewiſe was allowed; but the next morning Hindouiah acknowledged the fraud, and confeſſed that he did it to ſave his nephew, whom he perſonated when the place was firſt inveſted, that they might not purſue him any farther. Upon this he was made priſoner, and conducted to Baharam, who ordered him to remain in confinement; but did not put him to death, becauſe he affected to govern with greater lenity than his predeceſſor. He alſo gave out, that he would follow the example of Nouſchirvan, and reſtore the luſtre of the Perſian diadem to its antient ſplendor. A while the nobility remained faithful, and the people loved him; but by degrees they became diſſatisfied with his conduct; and hearing that Khoſrou was powerfully ſupported by the Greek emperor, they began to ſhew leſs inclination to his ſervice. Baharam, however, ſet a great army on foot, and for a time maintained himſelf in poſſeſſion. At laſt, after having been defeated in a general engagement, and finding himſelf quite borne down by numbers, he determined to retire to the khakan, by whom he was at firſt well received, and to whom he rendered great ſervices by his military ſkill; but, after having been put off for many years with fair promiſes, he was at length poiſoned, at the ſolicitation of Khoſrou, who could never be eaſy ſo long as he lived [m].

